

Embers

Posted originally on the Archive of Our Own at <http://archiveofourown.org/works/3591783>.

Rating:	Not Rated
Archive Warning:	No Archive Warnings Apply
Fandom:	Avatar: The Last Airbender
Character:	Zuko (Avatar) , Iroh (Avatar) , Aang (Avatar) , Toph Beifong , Sokka (Avatar) , Katara (Avatar) , Azula (Avatar) , Amaya , Yue (Avatar) , Meixiang , Huojin , Jinhai , suyin , Jia , Min , Tingzhe , the more show up the more are added , Shirong , Long Feng , Kuei (Avatar) , Bosco (Avatar) , Jet (Avatar)
Additional Tags:	Adventure , Family , NOT MY OWN STORY , Property of Vathara , I am bad with tags , dealing with spirits , Some angst , Some politics , a bit of character study , much more realistic in its ways than the actual show , Don't copy to another site
Collections:	Gammily's Bookshelf , Peldari's Favorite Fanfics , Kallipsos epics , Fics I Love , (these are) the magic words , Shadow's Favorite Long Fics , GD's Best Reads , My Heart Adores , avataner , This IS Cannon! , The Best of Zuko , My favorite stories , For rainy days and days a good book isn't long enough , Kree's Recommendations , It's 2 a.m. and I'm gonna read it again (cuz once wasn't enough) , Fics that made me happy 2020 , Cosmonauts Fic Recs , Crow's collection of shinys , My Favorite Works , SomethingNew Worldbuilding Creative OfQuality , Behold the Sacred Texts , Wonderful Worldbuilding Fics , 3am Fics Stealing My Sleep , Long Zuko-centric AU's that I LIVE for (seriously i'd marry them if i could) , Top 10% , All Rereads All The Time , Fics with Fantastic Worldbuilding , Lives in my head Rent Free , An Incomplete List of Masterpieces , Reasons I don't have a Life :) , CG's All Time Favorite Fics , Complete Legendaries (awesome finished fics) , Recommended Fics to Reread , All My Bookmarks , So Much Talent on AO3 , Good Readings (ymmv) , The Timelesses , Holy Grail of Rereads , Best Fics Make Brain Go Brrr , Fanfic Forum Discord Recs , the ones that stay good when the novelty wears off , Kai's Eclectic Collection of Fics , Favourite Fanfictions , Better than a lot of published books I have read , Fics I Love (Amelia_32) , Road to Nowhere Discord Recs , rel'isé , Paris Rereads , Zuko doesn't join the Gaang , Favorite Finished Fics , Fantastic Works of Fiction , Collection of treasures that I've cried river if it ever got delete :)) , the pickiest and pettiest , Banco Fic , Skelebooks (The Graveyard) , The Witch's Woods , Creative Chaos Discord Recs , Stories I Read Again and Again , Best Completed Stories , Complete fics I want to read (Nightowls) , Alicia's idea of good fics , long fic to binge-read , BL favorites , fics that destroy me (favorites) , God-Tier Recommendations , Delightful World Building , alta fics , Orochi-chi Anime , Read Count ≥3 , reread worthy fics , Earth Shakers - World Makers , Cheshure's Fav Re-Reads , The Best Fics I Have Had The Pleasure of Reading , Absolute Vibes to sink into , Mah Cabbages , great reads , cause i had too many tabs open , Good ATLA Stuff , International Fanworks Day 2022 - Classic Fic Recs
Stats:	Published: 2015-03-22 Completed: 2016-04-16 Chapters: 91/91 Words: 704200

by Vathara

Summary

Dragon's fire is not so easily extinguished; when Zuko rediscovers a lost firebending technique, shifting flames can shift the world...

Notes

-Disclaimer: I (meaning me as Inkgirl) do neither own Avatar nor this story. I post it on behalf of the author Vathara, with her permission.

Also: This story is already finished and if you want to read the full version right now, just search it on fanfiction.net. I just post it here on her behalf and also because it is easier to read on AO3 in my opinion. Have fun.

Chapter 1

It was the muffled groan that woke him, in the thin light before dawn.

Enemies? Surrounded? Ambush?

Zuko breathed in silently, deeply, ready to unleash a deadly surprise on anyone who might have succeeded in sneaking up on them-

No one. The Earth Kingdom night was quiet. Just their bare camp out of sight of the road, the annoyingly cheerful chirps of birds, the odd grassy smell of air with no coal smoke or salt in it....

And another sleepy grumble of complaint from Uncle's bedroll.

Zuko let his breath sigh out, flameless, wincing in sympathy. It'd been weeks since Zhao's hired pirates had blown him out of his own ship, and some of his deeper wounds still ached, despite all his uncle's efforts to clean them and keep them from getting infected. Work that had only gotten harder while they were drifting in the ocean without supplies. Fish caught under the raft and water chipped out of stray icebergs only went so far.

And now they were fugitives, sleeping in a brushy hollow without even a fire. If he was aching, Uncle was probably dreaming of a long, relaxing soak in a hot spring.

Right. Like the last time turned out so well.

Groaning, Zuko pinched the bridge of his nose, trying to blot out the memory of carting his all-but-naked uncle back to their ship, pulverized earthbenders eating their dust. If he never had to see that again, it'd be too soon.

...I'm not getting back to sleep today. Damn it.

He'd never been a heavy sleeper. Not since-

Sleep, and people disappear. Sleep, and the world falls apart, and nothing you do can make it right again, ever....

-Not for a long time. It hadn't been a problem on their ship. Much. Here on the run, though....

A pained grunt. Zuko froze. "Uncle?"

Silence. A sigh. "Old bones, my nephew. Do not worry. I'm sure in the next town, we will find a nice, soft bed." A chuckle. "Or at least a stable. Hay isn't so bad, if it is well-kept."

Uh-huh. The way his luck ran? The next town would be full of Fire Nation soldiers, or rabid Earth Kingdom thugs, or Azula. And if the spirits were in a particularly snippy mood, it'd be all three. "First we have to get to the next town," Zuko said shortly. "Turn over." He wasn't as good as Uncle - no one was, besides Azula and the Fire Lord himself - but he should be able to manage this.

Or at least, if he couldn't, Uncle would just end up with singed clothes. They could deal with that.

Slowly, he rubbed his hands together, palm just brushing palm in a tingling, circular flow. He built the heat carefully; kept it steady as he moved his hands apart, never quite reaching flame....

Fire was good. But sometimes - say, when you were trapped underwater, under ice - heat was better.

Air shimmering around his fingers, Zuko started kneading sore muscles.

"Hmm." Uncle sounded surprised, but not displeased. "Nephew?"

"Tricky," Zuko managed, holding hot-but-not-burning as he searched out knots and strains. If he closed his eyes, he could almost imagine he saw them; muted copper where the body's natural flow of fire should be molten gold. "Not real good at this."

"Ah. Well. Higher, then."

A few minutes, and he had to stop. No breakfast and not enough sleep were making his concentration fray at the edges, and he didn't want to set his uncle on fire.

...Well, not unless that stupid lotus tile went missing again.

Uncle Iroh sat up as he moved away, face thoughtful. "An interesting adaptation of wound treatment, Prince Zuko."

"...It wasn't an adaptation. Much." Zuko stared into the dawn, trying to match the road they were on to memories of Earth Kingdom maps. Maps now lost with his ship, and damn Zhao-

"Take my hand!"

Zuko shook his head, trying not to see the anger and horror in those eyes. Who needed any more proof the spirits had it in for him? He couldn't even save an enemy....

"Nephew?"

"Just - something Mom would do," he got out. "When I'd try to keep up with Azula, and - it didn't work." When I failed again. Painfully. "Hadn't really thought about it in a while... can we go, already?"

"Ah, so we will eat on the road? Young people, so hasty...." At his glare, Iroh only smiled. "I will be fine, nephew. You did an old man's back a great deal of good."

Nothing else. Thank Agni. Relieved, Zuko started striking camp. Mentioning Ursa was always a risk. Mention her, and Uncle might want to talk about her. And that just... hurt.

Iroh followed more slowly, breathing a lick of flame at their battered camp pot for a bit of morning tea. Staring into steam, as if it would part like mist to reveal the future. Or the past.

But then again, that was Iroh and tea. Always.

We should have spoken more before my father's death, Ursa. Letting his nephew take the lead, Iroh walked, lost in thought. Keeping pace with far more ease than he had any right to expect, after yet another night sleeping rough. It could simply have been the lingering wellbeing of deep heat; Agni knew, it soothed a multitude of hurts. And yet....

We should have talked, indeed.

But it had never seemed to be the right time. Even from the beginning.

"Prince Iroh, you have to come...."

He'd rolled out of bed on the darkest watch of the night, awakened by one of Lady Ursa's braver attendants. The story had poured out of the maid like storm-water off a roof. Ozai's heir, finally born not at fortunate noon, but at the accursed hour of midnight. Infant and mother both exhausted by the struggle, abandoned by the father-to-be when physicians decreed the child was unlikely to see dawn. Lady Ursa's sudden blaze of temper, throwing out useless so-called healers, demanding enough wood brought in to set half the palace ablaze, and then ordering everyone away....

He couldn't blame the staff for their caution. Ozai's marriage, like his own, had been to a daughter of a family known for firebending prowess, the better to ensure strong heirs to Sozin's legacy. And fire drew strength from passion. Lady Ursa might ordinarily be a gentle soul, but if she were... upset....

The door was locked, but he knew ways around that. He entered quietly, wary as if he were sneaking into an enemy fortress.

At least nothing is on fire.

Though considerable ashes had been shoved to one side of the hearth. A small, steady fire still burned on the other, flames bending away to-

Iroh held still, scarcely daring to breathe.

Ursa was seated directly on the stones bordering the fire, heedless of soot and smoke staining her loose robe. Her eyes were closed in utmost concentration, and her hands....

Her hands were wreathed in flames.

Gold. Green. Violet. Like sunlight through spring woods.

Flames she ran first over herself, briefly, breathing in strength. Then, slow and lingering, over the tiny form curled in her lap. Every wash of fire chased a bit more blue from the child's skin, eased his breathing from fitful efforts to more healthy hiccups.

Carefully, fervently glad he was alone, Iroh sank down beside her. If he were fortunate, if this were indeed what it appeared, she would be too deep in the healing trance to notice.

But how can it be? I have seen waterbenders heal, but fire?

At last, a full-throated cry. Ursa opened her eyes, sagging-

He caught them both. "If the crisis has passed, my sister, perhaps you should both be in bed?"

Ursa went white. "You saw...."

"A mother caring for her son," Iroh said firmly. And smiled. "So. This is my nephew?"

"Zuko." Her chin lifted, a little color returning to her face. "His name is Zuko."

"Zuko," Iroh nodded. "Lu Ten will be glad to meet his cousin, in the morning." He glanced down into half-closed eyes of bright, true Fire Nation gold-

Gold?

He'd held Lu Ten weeks after his own son's birth, looking into eyes of still-undecided infant blue.

Only months later, with growth and time, should any child show what element they were born to.

"I was born like this, too."

Startled, he looked up at his brother's wife.

"My family wouldn't have mentioned it. Not with Fire Lord Azulon making the arrangements... my mother said it was like trying to hatch a stone." Ursa smiled at her son, bittersweet. "But I was strong enough to live. And so is he."

"So I see." Iroh raised an inquiring brow. "But how?"

"It's an old legend." She glanced up. "He can't know."

No need to ask who he was. His brother did not take kindly to secrets. Or to things he had not predicted, and could not control.

"As I will tell my brother," Iroh said firmly, "I have only seen a mother, sitting with her son where a warm fire could do them most good." He gave her his most endearing look. "Yet I cannot deny, it is a technique I would most dearly like to learn."

"I suppose we can try...."

They had, Iroh reflected now, trudging through the dust. Several times. He'd learned to use heat to prevent infection, and help the body heal itself; skills that had become crucial thirteen years later, when royal physicians were certain Zuko would lose his eye and hearing, if not his life.

Still, he could only encourage the body. He'd never been able to mend it, as Ursa had; shaping the very essence of flame into the energy of life itself. And she never had told him what legend had led her teachers to such a rare technique. Though given his travels, and what he had seen, he could guess.

Gold and green and violet, Iroh thought, side-stepping a passing hornet. Dragon's fire.

A flame he'd thought Zuko, like himself, had simply proved incapable of using. Or had never had time to learn; his bending had bloomed late - he was such a small child - and Ursa had been gone when he was only ten.

You assumed, Iroh scolded himself. You never asked. You know your brother. Zuko is impulsive, and too quick to anger, but he is not a fool. A healer, as the Fire Lord's heir? Unforgivable.

Yes. It would be, wouldn't it?

And it was most interesting, how Zuko had reacted to that young healer's apprentice, Song. Thinking, for once, even if he'd needed a nudge to get started....

We can't go home. Azula lies like she breathes, but even she would never dare imprison us if it were not the Fire Lord's will.

And once in Azula's hands, his nephew would die. She longed to be the heir; thirsted for it, and Ozai's approval, like travelers thirsting in the desert. Only Zuko's exile - Zuko's life - stood between her and all she desired.

He'd seen them battle. Zuko would hesitate. Azula would not.

We cannot go home. But my nephew must realize that for himself.

Of course, what kind of uncle would he be, if he didn't help?

"Uncle?" Under the sedge hat, Zuko was eyeing him with deep, deep suspicion.

Iroh smoothed any hint of plotting into innocent surprise. "I was only considering how we might gain that bed, nephew. And perhaps some supplies as well."

"We're royalty. They should give us what we want!"

...This may take longer than I thought. Though part of that was simply pain and injured pride; his nephew had always been reasonable dealing with their suppliers. If a bit inclined to argue prices down to the bone. Which, given many of those willing to deal with them inflated their demands simply because Zuko was exiled, seemed only fair. "To their sworn enemies, Prince Zuko? They may be Earth Kingdom peasants, but they are not fools."

Zuko's fists clenched, daggers of fire blazing before he started, and furtively quenched them.

"But there are ways to ask," Iroh went on easily, as if the slip were unimportant. They were safely unseen, after all... and he knew full well one could only deny the spirits' gifts so long without pain. "And if we have something to barter with, we may fare very well, indeed." He scanned the roadside. "Now, if we can only find some nice, polished rocks...."

"Are you insane?"

Hmm. And sometimes his nephew was a little too quick to catch on.

"I can't - they'll catch me - we'll be exposed as Fire Nation and - nobody's going to barter for us to use hot rocks on them-!"

"We can't know until we try," Iroh shrugged. "I found it most worthwhile. And you should know, people see what they wish to see." He brightened. "Ah! I think I see a good one."

"...Please let there not be any poisonous rocks."

Pocketing the innocuous quartz pebble, Iroh chuckled ruefully. His nephew had every right to be worried. The fine points of hunting and foraging might not be among their skills, but a crown prince learned of everything Fire Nation mines produced. Including, of necessity, the lovely and lethal ruby arsenic, so horribly known as dragons' blood. "Don't worry. I do know what I am doing, this time."

"I hope so." Quiet; much quieter than he was used to hearing from his impulsive nephew. "You frightened me, Uncle." Zuko swallowed. "Don't do that again. Please."

Longer than I thought, Iroh reflected. But perhaps, not as long as I had feared. "I will be careful," he reassured the young prince. "Look! This must be a stream of some kind, when the winter snows melt...."

Stifling a sigh, Zuko left the road to help him hunt pebbles.

Spying another candidate, Iroh smiled as he crouched, listening to grumbled complaints like quiet music. "Rocks... crazy... never going to work...."

Yet he hadn't said no. And Zuko would have, if he weren't at least willing to try.

One step at a time.

Chapter 2

Chapter Notes

Disclaimer: Story written and owned by Vathara, Avatar owned by neither of us.

Sometimes, Zuko thought, even the most boring schoolwork paid off.

The Fire Nation usually used coal for fuel. The Earth Kingdom used everything from wood to coal to odd gases that seeped up in rock-salt pits. Given he'd been trained in preparation for conquering more of it, he'd had to know a little about them all.

Which was how he'd noticed a persistent scent of wood smoke, and followed it to a charcoal-burner's mound. Part of which he'd just carefully dug out, constructing a small but thick cup of not-yet-charred wood against the mound's side.

"Really, Prince Zuko, this is unnecessary...."

"I don't use equipment I haven't tested, Uncle." He held out a hand. "Rocks. Now."

"We could heat them by hand. You didn't have to undo a poor woodcutter's hard-"

"Yes, I did!" But he didn't move. Didn't attack. No matter how much he wanted to break something, just to loosen some of the knots in his gut. "Uncle, will you just trust me on this?"

Uncle Iroh frowned, but handed over the bag of pebbles.

Finally. Zuko dumped them unceremoniously into his makeshift kiln, punched down flames, and stood back. Waiting.

"The smoke will draw attention," Uncle warned, as flames blazed in the nest of wood. "Whatever you are up to, nephew, it cannot be as crucial as avoiding the notice of-"

Crack.

Zuko let out a breath, suspicions confirmed as more explosive cracks shuddered through smoking wood. A relief, actually. Maybe the universe would settle for this as bad luck, and leave them alone for a while.

Uncle didn't say a word.

He waited until the fire was quiet, and a few minutes more. Damped flames with a push of his hands, and started digging for surviving rocks.

Uncle was still quiet, watching over his shoulder. Unreal.

Finally he had the survivors, still hot to the touch. And two half-charred logs, studded with shards of stone like Mai's little knives. "You said that was a stream sometimes," Zuko said bluntly. "I couldn't trust them."

"Water in the rocks," Uncle said slowly, staring at glittering edges. "Yes, of course." He glanced at

Zuko. "How did you know?"

"Zuzu, can you heat these up for me? I want to play a game...."

"Oh look, Zuzu's an earthbender! And he can't even get that right!"

"How do I learn anything?" Zuko said grimly, blowing on pebbles to cool them, before he dropped them back into Uncle's bag. "The hard way."

Don't laugh, Iroh told himself firmly, deliberately ignoring Zuko's trembling hands as they placed warm stones on a cranky blacksmith's back. Most people wouldn't have noticed even a twitch. Indeed, the small crowd of onlookers taking part of their midday break in this inn had seen nothing; they were too curious of strangers, and too incautious, to have held their tongues if they had. But he knew his nephew. More, he'd led men in war for many years. He knew, even if the boy himself did not know, when a young man was heart-wrenchingly afraid. Afraid, and ready to run. Or attack, burying the shame of fear in action.

Don't laugh. This is a battle - not of the body, but of the soul. Remember the general you once were, and lead.

So far, his story to the local innkeeper - that they were healer and apprentice, there'd been a Fire Nation raid, how unfortunate, not even time to grab supplies - seemed to be holding up. They'd treated a few other men already; apparently the village healer was up to her elbows in caring for three difficult pregnancies, and these were but simple injuries, left to wait. Though perhaps their patients were also taking advantage of the fact that the strangers were refugees, and so all but forced to charge less for any business at all.

It didn't matter. He knew enough battlefield care to pass, as did Zuko. It should suffice, so long as no one asked them anything too complicated.

Or anything at all, at the moment. Fortunately, the blacksmith was lying on an inn bench, unable to see Zuko lower his head and breathe, slow and deliberately even. If there were candles about, Iroh was uncomfortably sure they would have been blazing in time to that rhythm. It was a wonder the inn's hearth wasn't flaring.

Well, perhaps not quite a wonder. Zuko knew they were watched. The young man was careful. Sometimes.

But why is he afraid? Iroh wondered, setting to work on muscles knotted by a long morning pounding iron. There is no danger here, nothing to fight. We are here to help this man, as we have helped his neighbors-

Hmm. Aside from his uncle, when was the last time Zuko had helped anyone, without suffering for it?

Our helmsman, in the storm. The Avatar.

Heh. His nephew might think Iroh knew nothing of that little escapade, but he was old, not blind. One day despairing, certain Zhao would take everything he longed for - and the next, simply going to bed? With a great many bruises, no less.

Ah, but I wish I could have seen the look on Zhao's face.

Iroh channeled that amusement into an approving smile as Zuko stepped in and began to work. Careful to make it seem as if the shimmer of heat were from the stones fished in and out of their camp pot on the inn's hearth, and not his hands. "Gently," Iroh instructed, matter of fact as any master to an apprentice. Act as if this is ordinary, and everyone will believe that it is. "Always ease the muscles first, to be sure they are not strained further."

"Ha!" their patient rumbled, not quite dislodging smooth stones. "Think I can't take it, old man?"

"You are a veritable wellspring of yang chi, Master Blacksmith," Iroh said cheerfully, waving Zuko back to work when the young man hesitated. "But healing requires balance. So some gentleness is called for."

Advice he would do well to remember himself. That demonstration, with the pebbles-

He could have told me. I would have believed him.

Yet, it seemed Zuko didn't believe that.

No. It is more than that. Iroh considered Zuko's actions, and their result. By not explaining, he gained the freedom to act, and so remove the danger to both of us.

Which meant Zuko had expected to have his concerns dismissed. Though why his nephew would believe anyone would deny the crown prince his right to protect himself-

I am a fool.

Learned the hard way, had he?

Ozai. Or Azula.

The girl, most likely. His brother's cruelty was more likely to be words and fire than tricking a young boy into harming himself. River rocks to explode in an innocent's face - oh yes. That was definitely Azula.

Which meant that he'd set his nephew to work in an inn full of strangers with the memory of Azula's mockery ringing in his head. Oh dear.

Well. At least he has not run yet. Or set anyone on fire.

Still. It would be wise to draw this to a close, while his nephew's nerve still held. Pain and danger, Zuko would face without flinching. The demons of his own mind....

Three years, and I thought I had at least scouted them all. But those years were without Ozai, and without Azula.

My enemy's forces are more deeply entrenched than I ever knew. And far stronger than I had imagined.

As they had been, at Ba Sing Se....

No. I will not lose another son-

"Uncle!" Zuko hissed, elbow jabbing him.

Ah, yes. Better to focus, if he did not wish to lose his nephew right now. "I would advise you take it easy for a few days," he informed the blacksmith as Zuko started packing up. "Or at least, no more ostrich-horse lifting contests for a while, hmm?" he chuckled. "Better to let them carry you."

A snort of laughter. "Where's the fun in that?"

The hearty backslap that accompanied it was enough to drive most men to their knees; Iroh let himself shift with it, only staggering enough to confirm their watchers' image of him as a lucky, harmless old man. Still smiling, he mentally held his breath; Zuko was twitching, within a heartbeat of attacking the man-

Wrestled down the rage, and stayed still. Though Iroh suspected the rocks in their pot were much, much hotter than they should be.

"I thank you for the use of your hearth, madam," Iroh bowed to the openly eavesdropping innkeeper. "But if there is no one else for now, I just remembered some supplies my nephew and I will need for our journey."

"You can come in again before the dinner crowd, cutie," the elderly woman dimpled at him.

"Ah, but you are too kind." Another bow, and he subtly dragged his disbelieving nephew out, pot and all.

A left, two rights, and they were behind the solid wall of a bakery. No houses too close, due to the risk of fire - and no one would be surprised at a few stray drifts of smoke. "Nephew. Breathe."

"Breathe? I don't need to breathe, Uncle! If we've got enough, let's get our supplies and get out-"

"Lee," Iroh said, very deliberately. "I believe, as your master, when I tell you to breathe - you breathe."

Shock, painted on Zuko's face. Betrayal. Anger-

Shoulders slumped in resignation, and Zuko breathed.

That won't hold long, Iroh reflected. Attack, and he will fight. It's what he does. What he knows. But if I maneuver elsewhere.... "When I was a younger man, I dealt with soldiers who had once been captured by our enemies. Who had not been... treated well." He grimaced, recalling how he had been then; proud and fierce and not nearly as kind as Zuko likely imagined. "And I did not treat them well. I had not lost what they had lost, and I did not understand."

"Uncle," Zuko said stiffly, "soldiers in the past aren't important. Not compared to soldiers who might be here, right now-"

"They are important," Iroh interrupted. "You are important, nephew."

Zuko eyed him warily. "I'm not a soldier, Uncle."

"Not in name," Iroh admitted. "But you were confined, and harmed by those you had no choice but to obey, and unable to free yourself, without aid-"

"Don't talk about my father like that!"

"And when you thought you had won your freedom," Iroh bore brutally on, "your nightmare returned, and threatened you with new chains. I have seen this fear, nephew! I knew it in their hearts. I know it in yours!"

"I'm not afraid of her!"

Quick as a striking snake, Iroh moved. "I am."

Wrapped in his arms, Zuko sputtered incoherently.

"She is skilled, and she is deadly," Iroh said, voice low. "She haunts your mind, and you cannot rest. But you must, nephew. Remember when we visited the Northern Air Temple, years ago." Zuko had vowed to search every Air Temple for traces of the Avatar, and his nephew never spoke lightly. But even a scarred, angry teenager had seen the wisdom in keeping Ji the Mechanist's work for the Fire Nation a secret. This was not the first time the pair of them had traveled in Earth Kingdom brown.

Yet that was only hours, to search quietly, Iroh knew. This has been days.

But he could not falter. Zuko needed his confidence, now more than ever. Exile was crushing to the soul; exile with the threat of agonizing death, far more terrifying.

"Lee and Mushi are but simple refugees," he said, voice deliberately steady. "To be always on watch, always searching for an enemy in the shadows - it marks us. And we must be as two leaves in the forest. It is the only way to survive." He held on tight, rubbing at too-thin shoulders. "I am here. I will not abandon you to her again."

"...I'm not afraid of her." A low, bitter whisper.

No, Iroh thought wryly. Not so much as you are of everyone, my nephew.

Not a fear of injury, or death. On the battlefield, his nephew could face any enemy-

Save two.

But to walk among those who might not be your enemies... he'd never had the chance to teach Zuko that. He'd never realized he had to.

That ends. Now.

"You should know, nephew," Iroh said matter-of-factly, voice still low, "that what we are doing is one of the most difficult and dangerous tasks in this world. To survive in a nation not your own, among ways and customs foreign to all you know - it is hard. Very hard. I do not believe Azula could do it." He pulled back enough to smile. "But I know you can."

Gold eyes blinked, incredulous and disbelieving. But Zuko did not pull away. "...How?"

"Have you not heard the proverb of the dragon and the mountain? The mountain is strong. It seems invincible. And to many things, it is. But if a fierce enough blow strikes it, it is only rocks and dust." He gripped Zuko's shoulder, light but firm. "The dragon seems weaker. It is mortal; if struck, it bleeds. But the dragon can move, and avoid the blow, and choose its own time to strike."

Good, Iroh thought, feeling Zuko's breathing even out under his hands. The fear is far from dead, but we have weakened it. He is thinking-

"The dragons are dead, Uncle."

Ah. Well. That was an honest objection, given what Zuko knew.

Do I dare? He still loves my brother, and fears him. The risk, if I am wrong....

The cost could be high. But the cost to his nephew, to the world, if he let Zuko fall back into that pit of awful doubt-

Mentally crossing his fingers, Iroh prayed. "So they said of the Avatar."

Now Zuko did struggle free, shaken. "You lied to Grandfather?"

Carefully. Carefully. "The Moon Spirit taught waterbenders, my nephew. Would you have followed Zhao's path, and drawn its blood?"

"No!" Zuko recoiled, horrified. "Is that why he came - and I...." He jerked away, fists clenched.

Iroh stiffened, recognizing the huddled shame, the way Zuko had turned so his scar shrouded any expression. He never cries. Not since Lady Ursa....

"Is it my fault she's dead?"

Yue. He'd told his nephew everything, those endless days drifting on the raft. The princess had had a rare courage, to give up her life for her people. It deserved to be remembered. "No," Iroh said firmly. "You did not know Zhao's plan. I did not know. I could not stop him in time. Her death was brave, and her own choice. It is not your fault."

"But I'm the one who took the Avatar away." Zuko swallowed dryly. "If he'd been there... if that waterbender hadn't followed me, she would have been there, and - if I'd known, I would have...."

Iroh kept his voice level, feeling the precipice his nephew stood on. "What would you have done?"

"...I would have waited."

Do not yell at him, Iroh told himself, unable to hide a sigh. He has been lost a very long time. You cannot expect him to recognize the path in an instant. "And if you had been there, and Zhao had overpowered them? What would you have done?"

"I'm not a traitor!"

"No, you are not," Iroh nodded. "I do not believe you ever could be. No matter what you chose."

Zuko was shaking his head, as if to drive away pain. "It doesn't matter now. She's gone."

Something in Iroh's heart eased, recognizing the truth. "You would have helped the Moon."

"I wouldn't have helped the Avatar!"

"I said nothing of the airbender, nephew," Iroh said deliberately. "Two who fight for the same cause are not always allies." He shrugged, as if it were of no importance. "I will admit, I am curious why you would choose so. It would have been a noble effort, but you are not usually the first to approve of dealing with spirits."

"They don't exactly approve of me, or none of this would have happened," Zuko said venomously. Closed his eyes, and gripped the bridge of his nose, fighting back frustration. "Uncle. In case you didn't notice, we've been living on a ship the past three years. If we didn't pay attention to the moon, we'd be dead." An explosive sigh, with only a hint of steam. "We need supplies, and we need to get moving."

Nodding, Iroh followed his nephew toward the market. Still a bit sore of foot, but much lighter of heart.

His spirit is wounded, but it still fights. He needs only time. And a little... encouragement.

"Well, if it isn't a little deserter," a smug voice drawled. "Front lines too hot for you?"

Spirits, Iroh thought darkly, eyeing the massive Earth Kingdom swordsman smirking their way, you are not helping.

Patience. Patience, and shadows.

"Who do you think you're fooling, old man? That boy's no healer."

Wait. For the right time to strike.

"Did his family pay you to take him, or did you just pick up a stray?"

Breathe. Crouch. There.

"Who's there?"

Swordsman, yes. Good one, no. Grab, pull, use the solid wall against the almost as solid skull-

The man was out. And the swords were....

Spin, and cut the air. Feel their movement; not as separate blades, but two halves of a whole.

Not bad. Not the best, but not bad.

How a bragging lowlife like this had ended up with master-quality swords, he'd never know. Bastard hadn't been taking care of them properly, that was certain.

Dao sheathed, he melted into the night. No real town watch here, but there was always the chance of wandering drunks, especially with such a full moon.

He made it back to their shelter in a stable's hayloft; the innkeeper hadn't been at all averse to arranging that instead of a paid room, once Uncle worked her over with hot stones and flattery. Which he really didn't want to think about. Ever.

The mask, Zuko tucked under the pile of supplies Uncle would have him pack in the morning. He should do the same for the dao....

No. I won them. They deserve better.

He hadn't weighted himself down with swords to raid the North Pole, not when he'd all but planned on going swimming. But he'd always carried the cleaning kit, ever since he first started learning blades. Through the invasion, the raft, their mad flight from Azula - always.

Unsheathing twin blades, Zuko peered along the edge of one for nicks and scratches, and set to work.

"I wondered if you would find him."

Sharpening stone in hand, Zuko hesitated, then kept working. "You don't want me to give them back."

"No, I do not," Uncle Iroh said thoughtfully, seated cross-legged in his bedding. "Our chances will be better if you are armed. Though it is just as well we are leaving early." He stroked his beard. "And since our men have never spoken of your extra training, even when Zhao asked - and believe me, he did ask, when he conscripted our men for the fleet - no one should connect this theft with us."

Zuko tried not to wince. "Theft? We're at war!"

"The Fire Nation may be. We are not." Iroh regarded him sternly. "You have always kept your honor, Prince Zuko. Do not lose it to despair. A leader of men does not allow his soldiers to pillage. That way lies hatred for the Fire Nation, and not a future of harmonious rule, but a bloody conquest that will never be satisfied." The stern look softened. "And a wise leader first commands himself."

Steel seemed to burn in his hands. Zuko swallowed, and laid it down. "...He called you a liar."

"There will always be those who believe the worst of men," Iroh said easily. "You are not a deserter, Prince Zuko. That, we both know."

Do we? "I'm not fooling anyone as a healer!" Hold the temper. Hold it. Hay and fire were a bad mix. "Uncle, this is crazy, I'll never - real healing takes years to learn, it's going to be obvious I - I can't do it!"

A sigh. But it didn't sound resigned, or disappointed. More... decided. "Nephew," Iroh said quietly. "Come here."

Biting his lip, Zuko did.

"Sit," Iroh instructed, lighting a small flame in the palm of his hand. "Fire and healing are more closely entwined than most will ever know. Fire is not only destruction; it is passion, will, and life itself. And that life can affect other lives." He held the flame in front of Zuko. "Your mother may have shown you this."

My mother?

"The motions are like what you use to raise warmth in your hands. Only instead of the heat of your body, you use the flame. Gently... do not pull, but coax it to you... blend the energy of the flame with your own...."

It was like ice giving way underfoot. One moment it was flame. The next-

Lighter. Different.

The circular motions fell into place, reminding him of the Avatar's sweep of calm air to storm, the waterbender's shove that froze waves into ice. The fire was more than flame, but it had to be coaxed there, held, persuaded....

"Good," Uncle said softly. "Now, let us see what you can do for an old man's sore feet."

Blinking - since when did his fire have bits of green? - it took a moment for his uncle's meaning to sink in. He can't be serious.

"Try," Iroh urged. "Only try. If it does not work - then yes, you may call your old uncle a fool, and we will find another way."

"Don't say things like that!" Zuko snapped, heartsick. I said that. Because I wanted to believe it. Because otherwise Azula was lying, again, and I wanted to go home so much.... "You're not a fool, and you're not a liar, and he had no right!"

No one should say that to Uncle again. Ever.

Green. Bright as moonlight. Not hot, but warm as summer noon.

I can't hold this long....

Near, but not touching skin. Palms both turned outward now; he moved them over road-strained ankles, feeling strength leached out of him as it fed frayed energies. In his mind's eye, hints of copper warmed to antique gold.

"Enough," Uncle said firmly, wriggling his toes. "Reach back, and allow me to redirect what I can."

A wash of warmth, and sparks of pain burned away like dead leaves. Zuko lost the motion, flames falling apart into smoke. "...I couldn't hold it." He was not going to cry. Even if he was - tired. So tired of failing.

"That you could summon it at all, is more than I have ever been able to do."

Zuko stared at him.

Iroh gave him a wry smile. "Your mother showed me the kata many times, yet I could never master it. She said it had been passed down in her family. A technique based on legends. A secret, and a gift, from Kuzon of Byakko."

"Kuzon?" Zuko blanched.

"Your mother's grandfather. A powerful firebender, with quite the sense of humor, from his letters." Iroh raised curious brows. "You have heard the name?"

Zuko swallowed. "The Avatar... I overheard him say it." Kind of. "Someone he knew, a hundred years ago."

"Kuzon would have been fifteen," Iroh said thoughtfully. "It is possible. And perhaps that is why I could never master it. I have studied the waterbenders, but never have I held my own against an airbender."

Held my own. For all of two minutes. "Why would you study waterbenders?"

"Wisdom can be found in many places, Prince Zuko. Have you not studied the waterbender who bested you?"

Zuko tried not to snarl. "...Yes." And she'd better have some new tricks, next time. He was not going to be crushed under a column of ice again.

"Study her not only to defeat her, but to learn what may be useful for your own form," Iroh advised, running a careful hand over his nephew's back. "Does that hurt?"

Zuko frowned. "No." Which didn't make sense.

His uncle smiled. "Then it would seem, Prince Zuko, that we are not lying."

Realization sank in, and Zuko buried his head in his hands to muffle a disbelieving groan. Oh, Agni. I'm going to have to go through with this....

"Rest now." Iroh ruffled his short hair. "We will finish with your blades in the morning."

Chapter 3

Chapter Notes

Disclaimer: Story belongs only to Vathara, Avatar belongs neither me nor her. Enjoy, and just a tipp: Vathara always wrote a little note in the end and I will include it of course, and you should definitely read it. It is really worth it.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The days began to fall into a pattern. Walk. Find someone - anyone - moderately friendly. Offer assistance, and keep asking, until they reached someone who needed them; to heal, or just help carry firewood, or who knew what. Bargain for something in return; sometimes coin, sometimes food, and sometimes... odder things.

"Fish hooks?" Uncle Iroh murmured under his breath, as a grateful farmer beamed at his cow-pig.

"Ask him to throw in some cord, and it's worth it," Zuko murmured back. Spear-fishing like a Water Tribe brat might not be up his alley, but with a hook and line, he could get somewhere. Doing something useful, keeping out of trouble... people left you alone on the ship if you were fishing. "That's Fire Nation steel. The hooks should last a while." Not like Earth Kingdom iron. Lousy stuff. Swordsmiths forged their own steel; either with some of the better local ores, or sometimes from ingots imported from the Fire Nation. Outside of that, local iron... well, there was a reason he could shatter it with a good heel-strike.

Uncle eyed him, curious, but set to bargaining the man out of a roll of cord as well. And was delighted to accept a small round of cheese, pressed on them by a relieved farmwife who'd been looking at short milk rations with her oldest daughter's first baby on the way.

It ought to keep while we travel, Zuko thought, making his farewell bows with Uncle and heading down the road. And some fish will go after anything-

"I'm surprised you agreed, nephew."

Zuko rolled his eyes. "Uncle, do you even know how much fish hooks cost?"

"Er...."

"I've been paying attention to what you charge. We weren't cheated."

"Really?"

"Really." Zuko hated shopping, at least as much as his uncle seemed to love it. Hated being where people could see, and stare, and whisper. But he hated being cheated more. Which meant if he wanted to get it over with, he had to know exactly what he needed, and how much it was worth.

The walk was quiet for a while. Zuko focused on breathing, trying not to think of what they would do next. In and out. In. And out-

"I did not expect you would be so willing to work with simple animals."

...Of course it couldn't last. "It's easier to hide what we're doing," Zuko said shortly. Which was worth cleaning off his boots. Mostly.

They'd found out the hard way that if he wanted to do anything more than just ease pain, he needed a fire to draw from. Using hot rocks, or even just his own fire, would work - but it left him dizzy and staggering, on his feet only through sheer will to keep moving until Uncle found a spot for him to collapse for the night.

No. If they wanted to keep this up - if they wanted to keep moving, keep alert - he had to have fire. And as long as their little pot of fire stayed out of sight of curious eyes... animals didn't ask questions.

"True," Uncle allowed. "But you were also kind to the creature. Even when she tried to bite."

"She didn't like me. She didn't lie about it." Zuko shrugged, unwilling to look at that thought too closely. "People are crazy."

"Some are, yes." Iroh frowned. "I wonder if that is the case where we are going."

Oh no. Oh, no. "We're not just going farther down the road."

"Well, we are."

Zuko winced, waiting for the other boulder to drop.

"It seems our last client believes the source of his cow-pig's illness is on our way. The Lu Yu ranch. They appear to have been having trouble, since the night the moon was eclipsed." Iroh frowned more deeply. "I wonder...."

Definitely a boulder. Of the cliff-sized variety. "Uncle. I don't want anything more to do with spirits."

"That does not mean they will have nothing to do with you, Prince Zuko."

Right. Like the universe would ever be kind enough to just leave him alone. "I don't have to go looking for them."

"That may be," Iroh allowed. "Yet in this case, it may be better to find them before they find us. If Zhao unleashed more than he knew, those moments the world was out of balance... spirits do not always distinguish between mortals well. Simply being of the Fire Nation may be enough to rouse their wrath."

"Which is an even better reason to go the other way."

"Well, it could be nothing but a sickness," Iroh said easily. "Indulge an old man's curiosity. Who knows," he chuckled, patting his stomach, "we may get dinner out of it!"

Zuko sighed, trying to ignore his own rumbling hunger. They'd been getting by, but not exactly well. "This is a bad idea."

Not that it really mattered. He knew how the world worked. Turn his back on whatever this was, it'd be sneaking up on him in the middle of the night. Better to face it head on. And hope he could improvise better than he had at the North Pole.

"And nothing has changed in their food or water?" Iroh tried not to scowl. He'd dealt with enough mounts in his time as a general to have a fair understanding of their afflictions. These black sores encrusting hooves of the ranch's few cow-pigs, and claws and legs of their ostrich-horses, seemed... unnatural. "Have you brought in any new stock in the past months? Perhaps from river bottoms, in a moister territory?"

"First thing I thought of," rancher Sho Lu Yu grumbled. "No. There's been nothing. Unless it was just hanging around for three months waiting, after those Fire Nation bastards-" Grim lips pressed together, cutting off his words.

"There was a raid?" Iroh inquired, careful not to keep too close an eye on his nephew as the young man moved along the corral, letting the herd take his scent. Ironic, that the blow Ozai had meant to shame his son forever shielded him here. So long as no one looked too closely. "If they knew their beasts were ill, it would explain why they sought yours."

"Nothing explains that filth-!"

Iroh did not react, watching out of the corner of his eyes as Zuko stiffened - then walked on, heading into the stables to check on sicker beasts.

"But it makes a lot more sense than a kamuiy," the rancher allowed, healed welts visible across corded muscles as he crossed his arms. "I swear, as if our family would ever allow ourselves to be dishonored enough to lead to that.... Well? What do you think?"

A malevolent kamuiy? A plague-spirit would explain this. All too well. And the healed marks of fingernails on the burly rancher's arms.... Zuko was right. This was a bad idea. "I can promise nothing," Iroh said reluctantly. "We may be able to help those who are less ill. And after that, if it is possible, I would like to walk the land they have been pastured on. Perhaps we may find something-"

"Uncle."

Not strident. Not demanding. He hurried into the stables anyway, somehow all the more worried. And winced, seeing the poor wreck of a creature his nephew was dribbling water into, one beak-full at a time. Black feathers, tattered and molted in the straw, ravaged legs and body.... "Nephew."

"She's still alive."

"Don't waste your time!" Sho's fist struck one of the stable's supporting beams, raising dust. The rancher drew in a snarling breath, limping slightly. "That's Asahi. She was - she's Ping's favorite. My daughter. If she could stand, she'd be trying to rip your throat out, boy. She's been crazy ever since the girl went missing. Ever since the moon went crazy."

"Our hopes for your daughter's safe return," Iroh said courteously. Really, what else could one say, in the face of that glare? "Is she the most ill?"

"Worst that's still alive. Tough bloodline; I'll say that much for Yonaguni stock. Too small for hard work and a lousy temper, just like the damn firebenders... but they don't give up." A muscle in his jaw jumped, and dark eyes smoldered.

Iroh regarded his handful of facts, and liked none of them. "So if she was one of the first to fall ill, where has she been?"

Spirits. That glare didn't look promising at all....

"Just over here." Huan pointed down the slope before them, where lush greenery and a liquid chuckle betrayed a hidden spring. One of Sho's older sons, he was almost as tall and burly, with a sour look on his face as he stamped his feet on the ground, obviously disgusted at actually having to walk somewhere. "Hope this isn't the source. Some of the best water on the place, here."

"Is that why Asahi was here?" Zuko asked, all too aware of time slipping away like grains of sand. If they could just get back soon, then maybe... he stomped on hope, trying not to think about it. "Looking for water?"

"...Yeah. Yeah, that's right."

Liar. He wasn't even any good at it. Zuko glanced at his uncle.

"Do not let us keep you from your work," Iroh said generously. "We can surely find our own way back."

"You do that," Huan said shortly. "There should be something left for you."

"We are much obliged," Iroh smiled. Which lasted only until the rancher was out of sight, and out of earshot. "Something is wrong here. Very wrong."

Zuko frowned, unwilling to go any closer to what should be inviting water. "It... does feel wrong." Like the spirits' oasis, a little. But swampy.

"The energy of the world has been disrupted here." Iroh shook his head. "Yet nothing seems tainted by human carelessness." He waved a hand. "Let us spread out and search. If the spirits are disturbed, something should be visible."

Search, Zuko fumed, after long minutes of fruitless efforts. I don't even know what I'm looking for-

Rocks turned under his feet.

Tired, hungry, and frustrated enough to spit sparks, he still had his balance. A skip back, and he avoided the unstable stones, if not the waft of decay that rolled out in their wake. Decay, and-

Iroh was there, holding him back. "Come away, nephew. Come away."

Zuko swallowed, unable to not look. "It's Ping, isn't it."

"I am afraid that it may be." Iroh's face was grave. "We cannot be found here, nephew."

No. That would be... not good. Especially since- "She hasn't been dead long enough for it to be the raid, has she?"

"A month and a half, perhaps. Let us go." Iroh sighed. "Well. Now I know why there is an evil kamuiy."

"A what?"

"A plague-spirit." Iroh led them away from the lonely cairn. "They are drawn by many things, but the most certain way to attract them is the murder of one with child."

"But why would anyone-?"

"I fear I know, nephew. I fear I know."

I will have to thank Madam Lin again later, for the coal, Iroh thought, taking a moment away from his careful arrangement of salt-dipped cut thorn branches to watch his nephew work. The first few times Zuko had tried to heal had been... well, not quite disasters. His nephew had discipline, when he was calm; even if it was shaken by disbelief that fire could ever heal, and stark terror that he could mend instead of destroy.

He'd improved since, yes. But Iroh had still had doubts anything could be done for Asahi. Such deep-rooted illness....

I underestimated my nephew's stubbornness. Iroh chuckled at himself. I should know better.

"They will notice, if you succeed," he'd warned his nephew earlier, voice light with a grim amusement he hadn't felt in a very long time. Once a general, always a general, it seems.

"Let them," Zuko had snarled. "She bit him, Uncle. She was there."

Iroh had nodded then, acknowledging that likely truth. And set to work in this fallow pasture, away from the main ranch, setting his kamuji trap. And watching.

Discipline, anger, and compassion. Iroh smiled to himself, watching his nephew call out veil after veil of fire, green flecked with warm gold. A leader needs them all.

Asahi lay quiet and mostly calm, black feathers only ruffling now and again to show her dislike of open flames. Weak as she had been, Iroh had still had to hold her down for the first pass; yet now she lay relaxed and still, peering curiously at the boy who was taking the pain away.

Thank you, little one, Iroh thought gratefully. You help him more than you know.

Last thorns and stones in place, the old general straightened, looking over the outline of the spirit-maze for any gaps not part of the pattern. It may not even come.

Perhaps. But then again, his nephew was currently stealing one of its most stubborn victims right out from under its repulsive nose. It should at least be interested.

Which will not make my nephew pleased.

On the other hand, something the young man could fight might do him a world of good. And kamuji could be fought. They could be beaten.

Whether there was a spirit or not, his nephew seemed to be expecting trouble. Zuko had already packed their gear for a midnight evacuation. Which was likely wise, no matter what the night might bring. Iroh didn't think the Lu Yu family knew they had noticed, but as they'd made their way back to the ranch, Zuko had spied Huan riding off to town. At twilight.

It could be innocent. An important errand. A girlfriend. A request for a squad of soldiers.

...Hmm. Perhaps Zuko's dire outlook on the world was contagious.

Or perhaps, Iroh thought, seeing a shadow move toward them from the stables, it was simply his belated recognition that he couldn't depend on Zuko's younger ears in the midst of healing.

"Nephew. Someone is coming."

"Almost done." Another wash of fire, and Zuko let the flames fade, reaching out so Asahi could sniff still-warm hands. He glanced toward the approaching woman, but kept his focus on the uncertain steed as she gained her feet. "How's that, girl? Shh. It's just me and Uncle, nothing to worry about."

"Madam Lin," Iroh nodded, as the rancher's wife came toward them with a lidded basket and wide eyes. "Is that perhaps breakfast, that we need not trouble you when we take our leave?"

She looked at his careful piles of thorns and stone, and Iroh knew she understood. "No," she said in a worn, worried voice. Opened the lid, and drew out dark clothing.

"Fire-thorns," Iroh observed, catching the glint of wild silk embroidered in protective patterns; glossy wood brown along edges of a fine green scarf, ruby-rust on hems and sleeve-seams of a pine-dark robe. "You must have been working on these for quite some time."

"They were for Ping," Lin admitted. "We'd been having so much ill luck, since the raid, I just wanted to...." She swallowed, and looked away. "I finished them a few days after she disappeared. If you're going to face the kamuiy... please. They might help."

"They may, indeed," Iroh said graciously, draping the scarf about his neck before he took Asahi's reins. Just as well for them that Earth Kingdom women tended to take after their men; taller and more solid than most in the Fire Nation.

Hands on the robe, Zuko hesitated, obviously uneasy. "If you made this for your daughter...."

"Ping is beyond its aid, now," Iroh said with quiet compassion. "You are not."

Lin's gaze whipped to him, wide and wild and-

Broken, with a terrible wonder, as she finally recognized the fine black steed alive and well beside him. "Oh, Asahi...." She pressed a fist to her lips, eyes closed, voice thick with tears. "Are you spirits, come to take your vengeance?"

Agni, let Zuko keep his head for once, Iroh prayed. "If we are, you know what you have done." He shook his head. "You knew she was not missing."

"You don't understand!" The break in her voice was awful to hear. "The town knew. They knew! It wasn't enough that we had to rebuild what burned, but my daughter...."

"Yes! She was your daughter!" Zuko said angrily. Clenched his fists, and shifted swords and sheath from hip to back, where the robe wouldn't interfere with his draw. "Who cares what the town knew? You should have protected her!"

"I tried!" A desperate wail. "We thought it would pass, and then... the rumors, and the whispers, and no one would give us fair prices anymore, and Huan's marriage contract was going to fall through, and... we were going to send her away! Where she'd be safe. Where no one would know! It was all arranged, she would have left in just a few days...."

"When the moon became as blood, and your husband decided he had no more use for pity," Iroh said sternly.

"I didn't know!" She fell to her knees, dripping tears. "I swear, I didn't know!"

"You didn't not know," Zuko started, disgusted-

Paused, glancing warily into the night.

It is near. "Build up the fire," Iroh ordered, grabbing a stem of thorns. "Do not let it touch you-"

Tear-soaked ground erupted, and he threw.

"Ahh! Salt! Salt!"

A high, chittering voice, like the mole-rat it resembled. If mole-rats ever grew to the size of a man. Its fur was sleek and glossy gray, as if in perfect health - yet eaten away with the same sores that afflicted the ranch.

"Stay back, and protect Madam Lin!" Iroh warned Zuko. "I will deal with this creature."

"Ohhh, will you, old fire?" Eyes like Azula's flames sneered at them all, one by one. "Old smoke, all your hope burned to ashes. Rotted willow, breaking in grief's storm; oh, so tasty. And-" A hissing laugh. "Little dragon, just barely hatched! And no wings to protect you."

"I can protect myself!" Zuko flared.

But he held back, even without Iroh's raised hand to stop him. Lin was whimpering, too pale to scream, and Zuko would never be so heartless as to leave her unprotected.

An Earth Kingdom woman. A peasant, and at least reluctant accomplice to murder. And the prince of the Fire Nation offered her mercy.

I have won, brother, Iroh knew, quiet pride warming him. The battle will be long and dark, and he may doubt himself - but he will never be yours again.

"Leave," he warned the spirit in his next breath. "You have no more place here. Ping's murder is known, to those who will see justice done. Lin Lu Yu will denounce her husband to the law, and that poor girl will have the proper rites. Begone!"

"Lin Lu Yu?" Another hiss of a laugh. "Old smoke. Old fool! Why would she, when it's her word against theirs?"

"No!" Lin gasped. "My sons would never-"

"Oh, they will, broken willow. Your little plan meant they'd have to live with their shame. A dead sister is nothing; hidden away, forgotten. A living child of fire to call them uncle- Augh! Salt! You dare!"

Iroh dipped thorny branches back into his pot of salted water, ready to sprinkle the beast again.

"We know the truth," he said grimly, "and there will be a reckoning. You have served your purpose. Your time in this world is past!"

"Silly smoke!" Teeth gleamed at him. "You're no earthbender! Your maze only touches the surface!"

A blast of dust, and the beast had burrowed out of sight.

That, I did not expect, Iroh thought worriedly. Where could it have-

The kamui erupted under Zuko's feet, but the young prince was already moving; a leaping spin of steel that took him away from unstable ground and cost the swift little monster half its whiskers and one ulcerated toe.

The scream knifed through the night, a caterwaul of rage and revenge.

If the Lu Yus did not know something was amiss before, they know it now.

Iroh blinked, catching a glint of fire. Zuko knew they had to stay hidden, he'd agreed not to bend unless the need was dire-

He didn't.

Spirit-fire, invisible to ordinary sight. It glimmered around his nephew from sheer force of will, glinting off blades, blazing high on protective fire-thorns. The sickly-gray power of the kamuiy tried to cling to steel, to climb and rot tempting flesh-

And was burned away. Vanquished.

Hissing, the beast turned on Iroh. Charged him, teeth and claws and flailing naked tail-

Vanished into the earth, just ahead of salt water.

"Where'd it go?" Zuko demanded, scanning the ground for movement.

"It wishes to cause pain," Iroh said grimly, backing up to his nephew and the trembling woman.

"But it is at heart a coward, and we can defend ourselves- nephew, no!"

Too late. Zuko had already swung onto Asahi's bare back, and was racing for the ranch, just behind mocking laughter.

Don't know why I'm doing this. Thought my family was messed up, but these guys! They deserve whatever the kamuiy's going to do.

Only it wouldn't stop there. Zuko knew it. Already, the animal-plague was starting to spread off this ranch to innocents. If it got into people....

Not going to happen.

Asahi moved like a dark wind. Ping must have loved her.

You tried to get away, didn't you, Ping? You fought him. Your own father.

I wish I was that brave....

The ranchers were out and angry, lanterns and spears in hand. "You!" Sho growled. "What are you doing on one of my mounts? Thief!"

"The kamuiy, you moron!" Zuko snapped, racing to track that telltale ripple of dirt. There!

In front of them. Too far for swords. The ground erupted-

Sorry, Uncle.

Zuko slashed air, fire blazing out to smash the spirit away from its target. Asahi squawked in protest, hopping sideways-

Which was just as well, as Sho's spear sliced through where they'd just been. "Firebender!"

"Plague-spirit, you rock-headed idiot!" Zuko twisted off Asahi, blades sweeping out to intercept screaming teeth. "Do you really want to fight me instead of this?"

From the number of spears jabbing his way, they really did.

Time to stop being subtle.

Earth was solid, rooted, stubborn. That's how they came at him, spear-points bristling like thorns, eyes wide and glazed as if they could ignore the malevolent spirit by sheer will.

Solid. Stubborn. Predictable. He could see exactly how to slice, leaving them all defenseless-

A sway of a waterbender's body, trapping his spearmen in ice....

Zuko echoed that flow of memory, twisting away from jabs with inches to spare. Spears struck unnatural fur-

Bounced off, as if the spirit were made of steel.

What the-?

"Die, little dragon!"

The kamuiy leapt for him, a whirlwind of teeth and claws and hate-

But he'd fought the wind before. He'd fought the Avatar. This creature wasn't even close.

Don't let it touch you.

One blade slashed fire at it to knock it back. Its twin cut behind him, spearheads falling like iron hail. He somersaulted over the porch rail and brought a heel down blazing fire onto dry wooden planks, searing through to intercept the spirit as it burrowed.

Amazing, how such an awful screech was music to his ears.

A more human howl, followed by blistering curses. "-Damn bitch hen!"

Aww. Asahi had bitten the bastard again. Shame she'd missed his throat.

Earth writhed under the hole ringed by blazing timbers. The kamuiy, trying to burrow away-

No. You. Don't!

Zuko yanked his arms up, feeding rage and pain and betrayal into flames already blazing. Fire roared, consuming wood like flash paper, whirling as he swept his arms across into a firestorm drilling down-

Burning into the soil itself. Consuming it, in white-hot rage.

This maze isn't just on the surface, spirit!

The kamuiy's screech rose higher and higher, itching at his ears like the calls of cricket-mice-

Cut off, with a sudden sense of absence. Filmy gray vapors rose from the flames, and shredded away.

"It is over, nephew."

Zuko staggered, painfully glad of the firm hand gripping his shoulder. Everything ached, and the world had an unsettling tendency to gray out at odd moments. "Uncle? Are you all-"

Groaning ranchers were scattered on the ground behind them, like so many fallen leaves. At least one beheaded spear had been further shattered by an annoyed blade-hand strike. And Asahi was standing over Sho, hissing.

Hungry and exhausted, Zuko grinned.

Uncle coughed into his fist, eyes ruefully amused. "I think, perhaps, it is best we go."

"My house!"

"Swiftly," Iroh added dryly.

Zuko stepped back, finally taking in the blazing building. The ranch-house was already crumbling into itself; flames vining out along attached fences, the very ground smoldering as fire crept through it. Wincing, Zuko lifted a hand-

"Let it burn."

Zuko swallowed, sheathing his dao. "Uncle?"

"Fire cleanses. If the town will not exact justice - I believe this should suffice."

Zuko grimaced, glancing down the road. Lanterns, torches, the glint of iron and steel.... "They may not agree with you."

"Oh dear," Uncle Iroh murmured.

They're armed, Zuko thought. They're fresh - fresher than we are, anyway. And we don't want to hurt anyone.

Decided, he whistled.

Asahi perked up her head, and stalked over to them.

Catching her reins, Zuko glanced at his uncle.

Iroh eyed the ostrich-horse. Glanced at the semiconscious ranchers, and the aghast Madam Lin. Looked at the roaring flames, and sighed.

Leaving his uncle to raid the stable for tack, Zuko ran for their supplies.

Asahi saddled, Iroh wasn't far behind. "Where are we going, nephew?"

"Anywhere but here."

I should have been a little more specific.

He should have known better. Really. They had hooks, line, bait - of course they'd end up in a dry waste where water was scarce and fish even scarcer. Not to mention a town full of scared civilians and a bunch of thugs masquerading as a home guard.

At least Sela's stew had been filling. Though he really wasn't sure about the job he'd done on their barn roof. Didn't match the other shingles at all.

But even Uncle had admitted it might be better to drop the traveling healer act for a few towns. Just in case the Lu Yus had spread the word. No matter how hungry it left them.

The robe was still wrapped up tightly in one of their saddlebags. Uncle insisted he hang onto it. For luck.

I hate luck.

"Why, Uncle?" Zuko asked now, as they rested in the grass to work out their next move. Not that there were that many directions to go from here that didn't end up in a desert. "We all hit it. But they couldn't cut it. It doesn't make sense."

Lying back, Iroh laughed softly. "I thought you did not wish to know more of the spirits, Prince Zuko."

"I don't," Zuko insisted. "And why are you calling me that? We're in the middle of nowhere."

"Because it is important." Iroh tapped his fingers together, choosing his words. "Many believe strong benders run in families. To a certain extent, this is true. Bending is a gift of the spirits, and those with strong spirits often raise strong children."

Zuko frowned, and sat up. "If that's true - why wipe out the Air Nomads? What was the point?"

"The point was to destroy the Avatar, and remove the knowledge of airbending from the world, so the cycle would remain broken," Iroh said gravely, rising to look him in the eye. "Unless a few sky bison have hidden themselves in the farthest mountains, they are gone. Any who might be born with the gift have no one to teach them." He chuckled. "Though I have heard interesting stories, of the Earth Kingdom refugees we saw at the Northern Air Temple-"

"I don't want to know."

Iroh raised an eyebrow. Zuko glared, and tried not to think. "We saw them gliding. Using the wind. That's all."

If I know anything else, if Father knows, I might have to - no. Not my problem. The Avatar is my problem. That's all.

He let his gaze slide aside, feeling oddly guilty. "So what does bending have to do with swords?"

"It was not your swords that cut him, young prince. It was the strength of your technique. And of your will." Iroh smiled at him. "I would not have risked dealing with a spirit bent on malice, if I did not know we both had the strength to survive the encounter."

Zuko swallowed. "I'm not strong." Not like you.

"We must teach you more history," Iroh mused. "Though finding the scrolls I seek outside the Fire Nation may be difficult... even before Fire Lord Sozin, the Avatar could not be everywhere at once. People had to deal with some spirits on their own. And those benders with the strongest will, who could defend their people from evil - they often became great leaders, and their children after them. That is your heritage, Prince Zuko. And mine. No banishment, no decree, no shame-" he reached out.

Zuko stiffened.

With a sigh, Iroh let his hand fall. "None of that can change who you are, my nephew. You are strong. Here." He tapped gently over his own heart. "Never forget that."

Never forget who you are. His mother's face, disappearing into the night after - after Azula had said those horrible lies. "But Azula's stronger."

"Azula is more skilled," Iroh said bluntly. "The two are not the same. Azula could not even attempt what you are beginning to master."

Zuko glanced at Asahi, happily cropping grass, shrubs, and the occasional cricket-mouse. Looked away. "Like that's really going to impress my father."

"The Fire Lord would not be pleased," Iroh admitted. "My brother is a suspicious man. I understand why your mother did not bring her skill to his attention. You may not have time for my proverbs, nephew, but I think Ozai learned one too well: all medicines can be poisons-"

The world crumbled.

Mother could heal.

Grandfather died.

"Everything I've done, I've done to protect you."

"Zuko. Zuko!" Uncle's hands were on his shoulders, shaking him. "Agni, you are pale as death... what is it?"

No. No, it can't be. "Azula always lies," Zuko whispered.

"It is best to assume so." Iroh studied his face, eyes grave. "Nephew. Tell me what is wrong?"

Zuko swallowed. "Grandfather was old, wasn't he?"

"Almost a hundred," Iroh acknowledged. "Though that is not always old, for a strong bender; King Bumi of Omashu is at least a decade older, and still an earthbender to be reckoned with. Sozin himself lived over a century and a half, vibrant to the end. And my father seemed well, before I left. But much can change in two years." He frowned. "Zuko. Tell me."

Zuko shook his head. No. She wouldn't. But... she said... and I'm like her, I'm like her and I- "Don't hate her. Please." Don't hate me.

Paling, Iroh let him go.

I'm going to be alone again. Like after Mom... I don't care if I deserve it, it hurts....

"Zuko." Iroh's voice was calm, the sea before a storm. "Why would you believe your mother could do such a thing?"

"...It's my fault."

"You were ten." Still that same ominous calm. "How could it ever be your fault?"

"He was going to kill me." Zuko swallowed hard, closing his eyes. If he didn't look, he wouldn't see. If he didn't look, he could pretend his uncle didn't hate him. Just for a little longer. "That's what Azula said. But she always lies."

"Please." And there was a tremor in Iroh's voice that made him want to curl up and hide. "Start from the beginning."

Tell the truth. That's what Ping needed, wasn't it? Uncle's always looked after me. He should know.

He shouldn't have to stay with a monster.

Eyes shut, fists clenched, Zuko looked back into memory. "It started after we - heard about Lu Ten. Father went to meet the Fire Lord.... Azula wanted to hear what they said, so she pulled me behind a curtain to listen. Father... he said your line was ended, and he had heirs, he should be the next Fire Lord." Zuko swallowed. "I don't know what happened next. Grandfather was mad. I was scared. I ran away."

Iroh sighed. "But Azula did not."

"She - she came into my bedroom later. She said-"

"Dad's going to kill you. Really, he is."

"-She said Fire Lord Azulon was angry. That... that he told our father he should know the pain of losing a firstborn...."

"Oh, Agni," Iroh whispered.

"And - and then Mom came in, and took her away - and she woke me up in the middle of the night and I didn't even know to say goodbye, and - she was gone. And Grandfather was dead." He wasn't going to cry. He wasn't. "Mom said - she did it to protect me, it's my fault...."

"Zuko-"

A wagon's rumble; Zuko shot to his feet, reaching for his blades-

Sela. Face taut with an all too familiar fear. "You have to help!"

Who, us? You've got a whole town full of real Earth Kingdom neighbors to ask, lady. We're leaving.

"It's Li...."

Of course it was. And of course, they were the only other armed so-called citizens for miles, what was wrong with these people? Didn't they realize that if you sent men off to war, you made damn sure the women knew how to defend themselves? How to defend their children?

Like Mother fought for me.

Argh. How did he keep getting into these things?

You are a kind and gracious woman, Madam Sela, Iroh thought, calmly absconding with a length of chain from the blacksmith's forge while his nephew provided a distracting spectacle to the watching townsfolk. But I do wish you had come along just a few minutes later.

His nephew might have buried his pain under his determination to rescue the boy, but he still believed Iroh should hate him. And there had been no time to correct those awful fears.

Now, Zuko fought well, but he fought alone. And while Iroh had no fear for the young prince against any number of ordinary thugs, to face both numbers and an earthbender, without giving himself away... well, it might be difficult.

But he is not alone.

The earthbender's hammer lifted for a mighty blow-

Chain twirling over his head, Iroh threw, and yanked.

It never ceases to amaze me, how many benders fail to train with anything more than their arms.

Zuko's spinning kick caught the earthbender under the chin, and the man crumpled like a wilted flower.

Smiling in satisfaction, Iroh cut that troublemaking young scamp Li free-

"Boo! Cheater!"

Delivering one gap-toothed boy into Sela's anxious arms, Iroh turned toward the mob, incredulous. Surely, these people were not about to turn on his nephew simply because-

"What do you think you'd do against our guards in a fair fight, pretty-boy?"

Ah. The closest thing this town had to a village elder. Who'd been all too quick to bow to the Guard, while they were standing. For an instant, Iroh admired his nephew's self-control. Not a flicker of flame or breath of steam to be seen. Amazing, given he himself felt more than inclined to turn back the wheel of time a decade and start setting strategic points on fire.

Enough of that. "If you are depending on warriors who can only win a fair fight," Iroh declared, pitching his voice to carry, "then you are all doomed. The Fire Nation has no interest in fighting fair." No good general was. A fair fight meant a chance that you would lose. And then all your dead haunted you for nothing....

Reaching his nephew's side, Iroh smiled ruefully. "Some days," he said, voice low, "one can only make a strategic retreat."

Zuko stared at him, stunned. Disbelief, incredulity-

Hope, flickering in gold eyes like the embers of burning joss sticks.

Mounted double, they left the catcalls and anger behind.

"I do not hate Lady Ursa."

Reins in hand, Zuko stiffened. Forced himself to relax. "He was your father."

"True," Iroh allowed, heartsick. "But no father should ask what he asked of his son. And no son should ever grant such a horrible request." He sighed. "I hope my father meant only a line adoption; to give you to me as an heir in Lu Ten's place. But it would seem your father, at least, thought... otherwise."

That, or Ozai simply could not live with the insult of being passed over as heir for a boy he thought weak and useless. And had decided to rid himself of the shame. Directly.

Suddenly, that horrible Agni Kai made far too much sense.

How long have you wished him dead, brother? How long?

But past was past, and Zuko already carried enough pain. "I think of what I would have done, had the Fire Lord asked me to harm Lu Ten," Iroh said soberly. "And though I feel pain, and grief... I do not blame your mother. Your death, or Fire Lord Azulon's, or her flight; those were her choices. And brave and cunning as she was, I do not think she would have survived fleeing the very heart of the Fire Nation with you at her side. Ozai would have hunted you down. Both of you." Iroh swallowed the anger, if he could not hide the grief. "I do not hate her, nephew. And I do not hate you."

Zuko glanced behind them, checking for any pursuit. So far, there was none; the villagers content to have merely run trouble out of town. "Azula...."

"Yes?"

"...Never mind."

"Such poisonous words are like knives in the dark, nephew," Iroh stated gravely. "Force them into the light, and they have lost the advantage."

Zuko swallowed, and drew Asahi to a halt. Dismounted, checking her feet quickly, and started walking, leading the black hen. "She'd... quote that proverb. A lot. And look at me."

All medicines are poisons. Yes. He could see it, Agni help him. "You believe she knew of Lady Ursa's skill."

"She's Azula." Zuko's hands fisted on the reins. "She'd... do things, leave them bleeding, and I couldn't...." He shook his head, violently. "At least - she got bored with that. After a while."

Oh, Zuko. His nephew was not a fool. Try to heal, and mark himself a traitor, as he knew Ursa would have been marked? Try, and fail, as a young firebender with no one to correct such a delicate technique would have failed....

It is not a wonder he feared to try. That he fought the fear, when I asked, and when Asahi needed him - Ozai, you are a fool. "Why did you not tell me?"

"Who was going to stop her?" Zuko said bitterly. "She's... she has a pattern. She starts on something, and - she keeps doing it, more and more, until you blow up. And then she does it even more. But if you can act like it doesn't matter, like you don't care... sometimes she gets bored." He swallowed. "I'm not good at keeping still. Acting like I don't care. I should be better."

You fooled most of your crews for three years, Iroh thought wryly. "Do you remember the storm? I believe your men prefer the prince who honestly risks their lives, rather than a ruler who executes those who hesitate at her whims."

That earned him a troubled glance back, before his nephew's jaw clenched, silent.

Iroh hid a smile. Certainly, a prince commanded by right. But if your men followed out of their own will, as well as duty - that was a tie not lightly broken. Not among their people, at least.

And I do not doubt that is part of what Fire Lord Sozin played on, to lead us to destroy the Air

Nomads. We of the Fire Nation are loyal, to the death - and when the airbenders would change their minds and shift, as history says was their way, those of us who might have counted them as friends would have felt... betrayed.

And unearned betrayal drove his people to desperate acts. If history had not sufficed to teach him that, three years on his nephew's quest had driven the point home to the heart.

"Do you think she suffered?" Zuko's face was set, and he would not look back. "I've heard - some people hang on for days before...."

Heard, indeed. How Azula had used that to prey on his nephew's mind, perhaps he was better off not knowing. "If she had died that way... there are limits to what my brother could conceal."

Zuko did look at him then, grim and hurting. "She betrayed the Fire Lord."

"If she did, she did so as your mother," Iroh said bluntly. "Her loyalty is to her children, her husband, and her family. So it has been since the first firebenders earned their skills under dragons' wings; so it will be, until the nations are no more. To kill her own beloved father - yes, that betrayal would have wounded her spirit to the grave. But Fire Lord Azulon... it is quite possible that she survived."

"Then where is she?"

"If I knew, my nephew, I would help you find her." Because she is your mother, and so holds her own claim on you. Though I would not do so without help. For my sake, as well as hers. I do not think I would be gentle, asking about that night. And about why she left you behind.

"Maybe you're wrong," Zuko said quietly. "Maybe she was loyal." He stared down the road, seeing nothing. "Have you seen someone die like that?"

"In war, anyone's loyalty may be strained past bearing," Iroh admitted. "I have seen traitors' deaths. And they are not pleasant." If my aide had not nursed me, and kept silent... well.

"So how can she post those lies? Calling you a traitor?" Zuko said fiercely. "You're the Fire Lord's brother. You'd be-" He cut himself off, with a breath of irritated steam. "But... Sho killed Ping. And she was his daughter. How could he... I've seen these people, and sometimes they act like decent people, like Sela, but others...."

"Other nations are not bound as we are," Iroh acknowledged. "And they do not risk their lives, when those bonds are broken."

"So if Azula posts a reward for traitors, they'll believe it." Zuko muttered something under his breath, almost too low to hear.

Iroh stifled a rueful laugh in a deliberate cough. Three years aboard ship might have been good for his nephew's spirit, but they had wreaked unholy havoc on a prince's vocabulary.

Perhaps he will listen, now. If I am subtle. "It is not impossible. We have been gone for some time. It is likely Fire Lord Ozai has considered that any illness of mine," or yours, "might have been hidden by our crew."

"They haven't!"

No, worse luck. "And while it is rare, some firebenders have survived."

"General Jeong Jeong," his nephew nodded grimly.

"I know of others." Carefully. "Sometimes, when you are trapped by two bonds, one must break. From need, from fear... from finding one's loyalty was gifted to one not worthy of it, and you must take it back." Listen to me, nephew. Listen, and heed.

"I know where my loyalties are."

"As do I, Prince Zuko." Unfortunately.

Patience, the elderly general reminded himself, as he had for years. Fire wishes to burn through the enemy - but you must be like water, wearing away stone.

Easy enough to tell himself years ago, when searching for the Avatar had been a fruitless quest. With the airbender returned, and Sozin's Comet on its way... things were beginning to become difficult.

At least we have not seen the bison since the North Pole-

Zuko stopped. Stiffened. Dropped to one knee to study the road.

Stood, with a tuft of familiar fur.

If there had been a spirit in front of them, Iroh would have set it on fire.

Chapter End Notes

A/N (by Vathara): This chapter owes at least as much to Princess Mononoke as it does to reading about Chinese and Japanese mythical beasts. Especially the idea that outraged spirits have a tendency to wreak havoc on anybody in reach, innocent or not. We see this with the Hei Bai forest spirit, and somewhat with Koizilla; you have to wonder what would have happened to the Water Tribe if they hadn't hit the ice in supplication, and if Zuko had been a little slower, he'd have been grabbed right along with Zhao.

(Which makes me wonder what Iroh would have done if that happened; he's been to the spirit world, canon. No matter what the outcome, I can't imagine him being very happy with Aang. Bunny for adoption, anyone?)

According to Wikipedia, the eight native Japanese horse breeds are the Hokkaido Pony, Kiso, Misaki, Miyako Pony, Noma pony, Tokara, Tsushima, and Yonaguni.

A kamuiy - the more modern spelling is kamui - is an Ainu spirit, fairly similar to the Japanese concept of kami. Some are good, some are evil, some downright mischievous, and all of them are dangerous. A thorn/flame embroidery pattern is historically used to prevent evil spirits from entering the body.

The whole "spiritual metamorphosis" bit never worked for me. And given Iroh's later-exposed desire to have the world back in balance, the way he barely nudged Zuko along the right path always seemed odd. Which got bundled up with several other plot holes in Avatar canon. First, a century of war, and Jeong Jeong's the first to desert? Very implausible given human nature. Second, how did large, dangerous, intelligent creatures such as dragons go from "lots" in Aang's time to barely hanging on a hundred years later? Especially given they were known to be the inspiration for firebending? Glory only motivates people so far in the face of imminent death. Third... "Crossroads of Destiny". I grant that Zuko is screwed up, a bit thickheaded, and desperate to get back in Ozai's good graces - but just a few months earlier, Azula tried to kill him. Listening to her at all seems about as smart as walking up to a guillotine.

So, given that bending is connected to the spirit, that fire is the source of life, that the Fire Nation was inspired in part by early modern Japan, and that very few members of the Fire Nation ever desert, and survive... this is what the bunnies came up with. Clan loyalties, and loyalties to your commanders - and the consequences for breaking either come straight back on you.

Note, this doesn't mean Ozai suffered any consequences for what he did to Zuko. Your loyalty, and your spirit, belong to you; and it's very obvious Ozai never felt loyalty to his son at all. But since Zuko is loyal to his father - Iroh has to be very, very careful, indeed.

And in Welsh law, while sneaking a horse out from under your host's roof constitutes Very Bad, grabbing one under combat conditions to escape a lynch mob was looked at a lot more leniently.

Chapter 4

Chapter Notes

Disclaimer: The whole thing about being Vatharas work and the rights of the tV-show and me owning nothing.

This is too easy, Zuko thought darkly.

They were alternating riding and walking through the grassland; not the fastest they could have gone, but he wanted Asahi in shape to run if things went wrong. And he had a lot more practice tracking that flying fur rug than Azula did. He could cut loops off the trail, see in advance obstacles the bison would have soared over and the tank had to crunch its way around, and work out their own route, easier than hers.

And it was definitely Azula. Who else could divert a valuable war machine out here, where there were no strategic objectives to be taken? Given that - he'd take every advantage he could get.

But it was too easy. And that had nothing to do with the trail, and everything to do with the older firebender currently humming that bawdy tune about girls in Ba Sing Se.

"You should be talking me out of this."

"Hmm?" Currently riding, Uncle Iroh gave him a look of bemused surprise.

"We're outnumbered."

"That is very likely," Iroh allowed.

"She's in better condition than we are." Azula hadn't spent more than two months injured and hungry, count on it. "She has access to supplies. Probably better maps, too, and we're heading into unknown territory."

"All true."

"She's flushed them out of at least two camps," Zuko went on. "She's got them on the run. They're reacting, not thinking. Meaning the Avatar's lost his best tactical asset." That idiot Water Tribe boy might be annoying as all hells - Zuko knew exactly where he was going to jam that boomerang, if he got the chance - but he was the closest thing the Avatar had to a strategic planner. If he was too tired and shaken to come up with a plan, the Avatar's little gang was screwed. "Sooner or later the bison's going to get tired - sooner, if they don't start thinking - and it'll be all over... why are you looking at me like that?"

Iroh was smiling at him, hands folded on the saddle's pommel. "A teacher is always pleased to know when his student has mastered the lesson."

Mastered the- never mind, even if he asked it wouldn't make sense. "Uncle, this is a bad idea."

"It is," Iroh nodded. "You have summed up the worst of it quite well. If this were only a matter of your honor, nephew - yes, I would object. But it is not."

Only my honor? Only my- Wait. "It's not?" Zuko asked warily.

"No." Iroh frowned. "Fire Lord Ozai wishes the Avatar alive, which is wise. Why hunt among the Water Tribes, who still resist, if we do not have to? You know Azula's power, and you believe she can capture the Avatar. That may be true. But you also know the Avatar's power. Can she hold him, nephew? Without killing him?"

A whirlpool rising out of southern polar seas, sweeping sailors from his ship. A massive, glowing thing at the North Pole, blasting through the Fire Navy's might. "...No."

"And will she be humble enough to admit that she cannot?"

Azula, humble? The two words didn't even belong in the same universe. Wordless, Zuko shook his head.

"And if she does slay him.... Avatar Roku's fate may be known to some among the Fire Sages, none can say for certain. And our nation conquers in the wake of that uncertainty. If it were to become known that the royal family killed an Avatar - there would be no chance for peace in our colonies while this generation lives." Iroh regarded him gravely. "We are loyal to the Fire Nation. We must not allow this to happen."

My people. The colonies were as close as he'd come to home for three years. Technically, he wasn't supposed to be there, either... but all nations came to trade in some of those ports, and on festival nights when everyone wore masks, even he could go unnoticed. It was worth being no one, to taste fire flakes and listen to people who sounded nothing like the Navy. "What should we do, Uncle?"

"You have laid out our disadvantages well," Iroh said thoughtfully. "Please, continue."

"This isn't a tactical exercise, Uncle!"

"Is it not?" Iroh regarded him with mild reproach. "Remember, nephew. The warrior whose anger rules him has already lost. We have time. They are not near. Calm yourself, and consider the situation for all its outcomes. Even, perhaps, victory."

Treat it like an exercise. His blood boiled, he wanted to burn something - but that would be stupid, here in the middle of flammable grass. Though they had used that to their advantage, earlier; the pair of them controlling a circle of flame to flush out enough vole-rabbits for their first hearty meal in days. Asahi hadn't minded roasted cricket-mice, either.

nd Azula thought it was stupid to read stories about primitive firebenders- stop. Stop right there. She's the obstacle, remember? Just... try not to think about her. Much.

"We've probably got surprise," Zuko said at last. "She doesn't know we're here, or we'd know it by now." By way of lethal blue fire; no, she couldn't know. "And the Avatar probably thinks we went down with the fleet." If he thinks about us at all. And he was not going to let that make him mad. He wasn't. If the Avatar underestimated him - well, good. He could use another edge.

Besides, it wasn't like it was personal. The Avatar was a kid. He underestimated everybody. After all, the so-called link between the two worlds hadn't seen Zhao's plan coming either....

Zuko frowned, trying to pin down that thought.

"Surprise may help," Iroh nodded. "What else? You have thought of something."

"I'm not sure it helps, Uncle...."

Iroh raised an eyebrow. "I am curious, nonetheless."

"They don't know what they're dealing with," Zuko said at last. "None of them do." Azula probably thought, of the two Water Tribe siblings, it was the waterbender who was dangerous. And sure, she was - but not nearly as dangerous as she and the Avatar were with her brother's plans backing them up. And as far as what the Avatar thought about Azula....

"If we knew each other back then, do you think we could have been friends too?"

"Spirits," Zuko hissed, "please tell me he's not that stupid."

Even as he said it, he had an awful suspicion the spirits were laughing at him.

When they found the decoy trail, it wasn't a suspicion anymore. "Uncle?"

"Yes, nephew?"

"If those monks weren't dead, I think I'd kill them all over again."

"Prince Zuko-"

"Washed bison fur? Forget the Avatar - don't those primitive, hunting Water Tribe peasants know any tracker could tell the difference? A blind hog-monkey could see through this!"

Dismounting, Iroh coughed into his fist, eyes suspiciously alight. "A pity that we will not be able to tell him so."

"Oh, we will," Zuko snarled.

"He has his airstaff," Iroh observed, patting Asahi while she nibbled on spruce buds, apparently out of curiosity. "When he finishes laying his trail, he can simply fly away, without a trace."

"Which is why he won't," Zuko said grimly. "He's an airbender, Uncle. He thinks flying can get him out of anything. He's not going to do the smart thing, and retreat. He's going to find a spot for an ambush, and he's going to wait. Only he's not going to ambush her. He's going to talk."

Iroh was silent a long moment, considering that. "Do not take this the wrong way, nephew... but I hope that you are wrong."

"...I know."

He wasn't.

"So, where is your nephew?"

Good question, Iroh thought, looking past the little blind earthbender. "Scouting ahead." Which had seemed best, one person alone on Asahi could retreat far faster.... "But he should have returned by now. I hope he has not run into something unexpected." Or worse, the one danger they did expect, that he had planned to face with his nephew.

Agni, let my nephew be sensible. Let him not try to take her alone.

Assuming, of course, Zuko had a choice.

"Scouting?" Toph chuckled. "You make him sound like a whole army patrol."

Oops. "Ah, well. I was a soldier, a long time ago." And not long enough, sometimes. "Traveling... it brings back old memories."

"Huh." Her bare feet felt at the ground, like a fisherman absently knotting a net. "Well, I don't think there are any bad guys around here. Maybe he's just lost."

"Yes, he is. A little bit." Iroh smiled sadly. "Our lives have recently changed, and while I think much good may come of it, it has been difficult. My nephew has choices to make. Some, I did not even know he might have, when we began our journey. He doesn't know it yet, but he is trying to figure out who he is, and what he wants." He sighed. "It is hard, to even look down a path your father would not approve of." Belatedly, he remembered his guest. "Er, that is, I meant to say-

"It's okay, I get you." Toph grinned, in a way he'd seen on some of the best firebenders in the service. Cocky, and with good reason. "He's an idiot, but he's your idiot. Want some help finding him?"

Hmm. Accept the aid of a young, if powerful, earthbender, and run the risk she'd turn them both over to the Earth Kingdom? Or refuse, and possibly find his nephew facing Azula?

Well. As he'd decided with the white jade, it wasn't much of a choice. "I would be honored to accept your assistance."

"You're really worried," Toph said, not smiling. "What's wrong?"

Finishing his tea, Iroh sighed. "I believe there may be a small Fire Nation force nearby."

"What, here? In the middle of the kingdom?"

Iroh frowned. She didn't seem surprised....

"Yeah, you do need help," Toph said decisively, dusting off green robes as she stood. "Let's go find some idiots."

"I would not say my nephew is an idiot," Iroh said judiciously. "Most of the time."

Toph snickered, picking up her bag as he packed away his teapot. "Your nephew's very lucky, even if he doesn't know it."

Iroh smiled ruefully. I doubt he would agree with you....

"Zuzu?" the Avatar laughed.

It was like white-hot barbs under his skin. Don't let it get to you, Zuko seethed. Almost cursing himself for leaving his dao on Asahi. But Uncle had been adamant. Leave the swords - leave the very fact that skill existed - as a tile up his sleeve. Azula would never take him and sharp edges seriously, anyway. Unless he was trying to kill her. And he couldn't. Just - don't.

It wasn't helping. On one side of him, the living symbol of everything he'd fought for three years; the only thing between him and his honor, his throne, his country.

Father's love....

On the other side, his nightmare. His little sister.

"You're a big brother," his mother had told him, over and over again, when he'd been especially bratty and jealous of an annoying little baby taking up his mother's attention. "It's your job to protect her. No one will ever do that like you will."

He'd believed it. He'd wanted to believe it. Agni help him, part of him still believed it.

I love you, Mom. But who was supposed to protect me from her?

He had to try.

"This isn't going to work, Azula!" You don't have chains, you don't even have rope - you don't have a clue. "The Fire Lord wants him alive."

"Like the little failure knows what Father wants." Her smile was mocking as ever. Chilling to the bone. "I'm not going anywhere."

Zuko swallowed dryly. "Yes, you are." For Father. For my people. For me.

I have to get this right.

The smile spread, glinting white teeth. "Who's going to make me? Mom?"

Traitor. Poisoner. You'll die like she did, and no one will even care you're gone....

Years of whispers, eating at him like acid. He knew what she was waiting for, and hated himself for it; the temper that would flare out of control, leaving him easy prey to her attack-

A memory of shaped warmth, bringing an absence of pain. Of a soft whistle, and feathers pressed gratefully against his hand. Of a firestorm, wreaking justice for an unmarked grave.

"Azula could not even attempt what you are beginning to master."

Zuko breathed, letting the whispers fade away. Not this time, Azula.

Her smile faded slightly, and he couldn't quell a shiver. He knew that look. Azula had seen something she didn't expect, and was calculating how to fit it into her plans-

Blue fire.

"The best block, is not to be there."

Too bad Uncle's advice about fighting never quite seemed to catch up with Azula. He had to block, fended off her fire with a breath-stealing impact on dusty ground.

Faster than I am, better than I am, she's going to win-

"We do not need to win this battle, Prince Zuko. We simply must not lose."

My people. Fingers clenched, Zuko coughed, and got back to his feet, dimly surprised Azula hadn't finished him off-

She was chasing the Avatar. Of course.

"The wise warrior knows his limitations, and accepts them. If she is more skilled than you - how can we use that against her?"

Good question, Uncle. Azula was punching blasts of blue fire at Aang, every one just barely a miss. She was faster, more skilled, more precise-

Precise. Control. Azula controlled everything and everyone around her, just like their father did. What they couldn't control, they destroyed.

Make her lose control. Make her angry.

Azula chased the Avatar into a wrecked building. Zuko let her hear him follow - then whipped around, fighting down the impulse to chase as he raced back to open air.

Sure, chase him into a building. Airbender, Azula. He loves bouncing people off walls; I should know. He can head out a window and be gone.

Just outside the doorway, Zuko swept his arms in a deliberate arc he hadn't used in weeks, hands curling and ready-

Blasted fire into the main support beams, and felt them catch.

A superior fighter made the terrain his ally. Ghost town. Dry wood.

This isn't going to kill you, Zuko knew; not sure who he was thinking of, as he urged flames upward. Like a graceful, angry flow of dark hair and blue dress, fighting him to the last in a spirit-touched oasis. Like nothing Azula would have ever fought.

This isn't going to kill you. But it's definitely going to get your attention.

And no matter how deeply Uncle might be contemplating his tea, he'd never miss this.

Well, Azula thought coolly, clinging to the second-story ledge as flames rose around them, this is new.

Either this was a particularly desperate gambit on her pathetic brother's part, or little Zuzu had grown a ruthless streak while he was exiled.

Please. With his tea-drinking kookiness?

For a once-great general, Uncle was amazingly easy to fool about how she played with her brother. Just smile at the right time, and look oh so concerned about how hard Zuzu tried, wasn't it a shame he'd had to start a year behind her and just never caught up....

Not that Zuko ever could catch up. He worried about people. Cared what they thought; as if what weaklings thought mattered to the royal family. He had no focus.

So. Had to be desperate, then. Not that it would work. She was the prodigy, after all. The best. Keeping a bit of over-enthusiastic fire from singeing her was easy.

Though it did split her concentration. Which was annoying, when the Avatar was so close-

Well. Look at that. Trembling, sweating, even the ball of air fizzling out from under him... the little airbender was afraid of fire.

Oh, poor Zuzu. You're such a good brother.

Such a good fool.

...Ow.

He was in the street. At least, Zuko thought he was in the street. He'd been fighting Azula for control of the fire, she'd made some kind of twist in the midst of the flames....

After that, everything was fuzzy.

I can't be dead. I hurt too much. He blinked, and faded brown resolved. "Uncle?"

"Get up!"

He grabbed Iroh's hand with trembling relief. Uncle was here. He'd promised, and he was here.

No. You can't collapse. Not yet. "Need at least two benders to make that work," Zuko observed, world still spinning.

About to speak, Iroh blinked instead, and raised an eyebrow at the structure crumbling into flames. "Azula was in there?"

Fire-blasts and wind-bursts echoed through the streets. "Was," Zuko said grimly.

They ran for the fight.

Zuko? Katara thought, dazed, water at ready.

Of course Zuko. Why not Zuko? Miss crazy blue firebender had chased them all the way from Omashu, why shouldn't their very own personal bogeyman show up again?

Sokka was right. We should have let him freeze....

Except crazy as it was - and Sokka was right about lack of sleep making you crazy, not that she'd ever admit it - Zuko didn't seem interested in Aang at all. He was totally focused on the girl in Fire Nation armor, backing her into a corner right along with the rest of them.

He's... helping us?

He was with the old firebender, the one who'd tried to save the Moon Spirit from Zhao. Fire Nation, her enemy - and he'd still tried.

But this is Zuko. It's got to be a trick. Somehow. I don't know how, yet, but-

Gold eyes didn't even flicker, before blue fire flew. Not toward Aang. Not toward them. Toward....

Fire Nation, but he was trying to help, and - he's an old man, how could she-?

He didn't cry out. But Zuko....

Katara hadn't heard anyone scream like that since-

Mom.

No one deserved to suffer like that.

Not even Zuko? the same surly, malicious voice that had picked a fight with Toph sniffed.

No. Not even an arrogant, high-handed, spoiled prince of an enemy... what in the world was he doing to that fire?

Flow with the flame.

Forget knots of copper instead of gold threads; part of what he was working with was charred, and too much just blackened ash. He had to dig in, pour in the fire and his own strength, somehow clear what couldn't be restored out-

"Katara! Don't put out the fire!"

The Avatar. Serious, for once. And damn right. He needed that fire. Uncle needed it, and while he'd never tried to seriously hurt the Avatar's little band of renegades, if they got between him and Uncle now....

Something cool slipped in under the flames, laving away ashes.

The waterbender. I should-

But the water didn't push. It just flowed around his fire, working at knots he hadn't touched. Or had touched, and couldn't - quite - unravel.

Why is she helping?

Didn't matter. Worry about it later. Just keep working, keep healing, and damn Azula....

"Don't push too hard. You want to work with the body, not against it."

He tried. Panic was the enemy. Uncle needed him to be thinking, not crying. Definitely not driving off a healer who seemed to know what she was doing, no matter how much he wanted to scream his fury to the skies.

How could she? How could she?

"It's okay, you're doing fine... whoa, that's a weird thing to say. Okay, just listen. Move around me, all right? I'm going to get the tricky parts. Just back me up, and everything's going to be fine."

Just because you're after the same goal, doesn't mean you're allies.

Some of the screaming in his head - you're helping the Avatar! - finally went quiet.

She's a healer. She's helping Uncle. Which is going to help me, and the Fire Nation. I don't have to like her. I just have to use it.

Better. Much better. As was the feel of Uncle's pulse under his hand when he ventured to touch healing skin; still fast, but steady.

Water retreated, and he let the fire go. She uses a waterskin, Zuko thought suddenly. So even when there's no water near to grab.... I wonder... didn't one of Uncle's scrolls say something about firepots...?

Grimacing, Zuko tried to gather his scattered concentration. Fire or no fire, he'd really overdone it this time.

I need sleep. Soon.

But not yet. Not until- Gathering his courage, he looked at the awful wound. Cloth was charred, still tainted with the awful scent of roasted flesh, but....

Letting the little earthbender help him sit up by way of a raised rock, Uncle smiled at him. "Well done." And lifted an expressive brow.

I know, Uncle. I know. Rising to his feet - he was not going to wobble, damn it - he ignored the rising babble from the two boys. And bowed to the waterbender.

Katara. You owe her that. And more.

"I owe you," Zuko said roughly, rising. "And I pay my debts." He skewered the airbender with a look. "Azula's going to kill you."

The Water Tribe boy snorted. "You've got a real funny way of-"

"Let him talk, Snoozles!" The earthbender stamped a foot on the ground for emphasis, dropping the boy, boomerang and all, into a sudden sinkhole. "This is important."

"Toph!"

"He's just talking, Sokka." Katara's voice was hard, but level. "Let him."

Amazing. Someone in the little bunch actually had sense. "Azula's not an exile," Zuko went on. "Fire Navy ship, Yu Yan, fresh mounts, tanks - if she asks for it, she'll get it."

"Zhao had all that," the Avatar started, "and-"

"Zhao just killed people when he didn't get what he wanted," Zuko bit out. "Azula is worse."

"Oh yeah?" Sokka challenged, up to his chin in dirt. He should have looked ridiculous, except for the determination in blue eyes. "And how, exactly, do you get worse than death?"

"She finds what you love, and she takes it away." No. I shouldn't have said that. I shouldn't have....

But he had. And from the way the airbender flinched, something had finally, finally gotten through that shaved, tattooed head.

Use it.

"She'll track you," Zuko went on harshly, standing his ground. "I did it by asking questions and following what I could see; you think it's a hundred years ago and sky bison are everywhere? They're not. People notice. And maybe some of them wouldn't talk to me because you're the Avatar, but believe me, they will talk to Azula. Because she smiles, and she knows how to make people want to trust her - and if they don't talk, someone will disappear. Maybe their wife. Or their friends. Or their children. And if they're lucky, they'll get a body back. She broke her neck. He drowned. They got buried in a landslide. Oh, what horrible accidents." He had to stop, and breathe, smoke curling up from clenched fists. "She'll say it just like that. And smile. And ask again." He stared into gray eyes, trying not to shake. "She's trying to kill you. She won't stop until she catches you. Any of you." Another breath. Spirits, he was going to kill something. Or throw up. Maybe both. "Do you understand me? Didn't any of those monks tell you what real people are like? We're not all worth saving, you idiot!"

Aang swallowed hard, but met him gaze for gaze. "I don't believe that, Zuko." He shook his head. "I can't."

Zuko saw pure, blinding red. "Then you're going to die-!"

"Nephew."

Enough. Just enough, to catch him before his temper teetered over the ragged edge. Zuko forced clenched fists open, dissipating daggers of flame.

"Go find Asahi," Iroh directed, golden gaze worried and sympathetic. "We will need to move swiftly."

Yes. They would. Zuko nodded to the old general, and took off down the street, leaving the whole infuriating band behind.

Iroh sighed in relief as his nephew vanished around a building. Now, to deal with-

"Did you see that nut?" Sokka sputtered as Toph bent him back out of the ground. "Don't do that again! We were about to have crispy-fried Aang-"

"My nephew," Iroh said, in a voice that had cut across parade grounds at need, "was trying to help. Difficult as that may be to believe."

"Oh, sure. Chase us all over the world, and now he's on our side?" Sokka shook his head, wolf-tail whipping fast enough to catch him on the ear. "Ow!"

"No, he's not," Aang said firmly. "He was helping Katara."

"Who, me?" the waterbender said skeptically. "Just because I- um."

"Even so," Iroh nodded graciously. His shoulder was still sore, and likely would be for some time, he imagined. Still, he had no complaints.

That was meant to be a deathblow. Long, lingering, and painful.

Oh, Azula. Have you fallen so far, to please my brother? Or were you always this cruel, and we were all blind?

All, save Ursa and Zuko. Why had he never truly believed the boy?

It was too horrible, Iroh admitted to himself. My nephew had already lost his mother. It only seemed reasonable that he would be angry, and blame his rival for Ozai's love. As Ozai felt I was, for our father's. Only... expected.

"Honor's really important in the Fire Nation," Aang was saying. "That's what Kuzon always said."

So you do not know why. Iroh hid a grimace. And why should you? Roku was an Avatar; he was not bound by a firebender's loyalty. Avatars serve the world, they cannot serve their own clan. How Sozin must have ached, knowing one born as his dearest friend was as foreign to him as an airbender in the wind.

Still, the past was done. These children needed his mind on now. "Kuzon of Byakko?" Iroh asked.

"Yeah!" Exhausted as they all were, Aang still brightened. "Did you know him? Is that how Zuko healed you? I saw Kuzon doing something with green flames once, but he'd never show me. Even when I asked him a lot of times-

"There is no time."

The Avatar's face fell, and Iroh almost regretted his brusqueness. Almost. "Azula will return, and she will not be alone. You must not be here when she does."

"And what about you, Uncle?" Toph asked, jabbing a finger into his unwounded shoulder. "You'd better not be here, either."

Uncle. Iroh smiled at the strong little girl. I do not think I would mind another niece. One who would at least give my nephew a chance to be himself, without always watching for pain. "Zuko and I have eluded her before. We will be all right."

"Whoa, whoa," Sokka was waving his arms in disbelief, "you're running from her?"

"Did you not hear her call us traitors, young man? Which is quite unfair to my nephew. He has always been loyal to the Fire Lord." He gave Aang a piercing look. "He still is."

"So... I guess we should get moving," Aang said reluctantly.

"It would be wise," Iroh said dryly.

"But... you helped us. And I really, really need a firebending teacher-" Aang saw his look, and gulped.

"Avatar Aang," Iroh said, with deliberate finality, "I hope, when next we meet, you will know why what you have asked is cruel."

"I'll say," Toph grumbled. "Don't worry, Uncle. I know enough about the nobles to clue Twinkletoes in." She clapped dust off her hands. "Come on, slowpokes!"

"Wait," Katara said hurriedly. "Uncle... what did Azula take from Zuko?"

Iroh closed his eyes, wrung by grief too worn for tears. "More than you will ever know, child."

"But-"

"Katara, come on!" Sokka hissed. "Creepy ladies. Blue fire. Sleep!"

Footsteps faded, and Iroh breathed a sigh of relief.

"They're gone."

Iroh started, looking about guiltily. Pain distracted one from the stillness needed to feel another firebender's fire, and his nephew was silent enough; that Asahi could almost match him for stealth was a bit unnerving. "Trying to take them would have been-"

"You're wounded. I'm exhausted. And Azula wants us both. I'm determined, Uncle. Not stupid."

Yet tired as he must be, Zuko didn't look angry. Or even resigned. In fact, if Iroh didn't know better.... "And what has you in such a good mood, my nephew?"

Openly smirking, Zuko dropped a hand-sized patch of familiar scales in front of him, one side still raw and bloody. "Guess who's going to be walking in an hour?"

Mongoose dragon scales. The rear thigh, if he remembered their patterns correctly. "But how...?"

"Who's a sweetheart?" Zuko crooned, scratching under a black-feathered beak.

If Iroh didn't know better, he would have sworn Asahi's trill was a chuckle.

Chapter 5

Chapter Notes

Disclaimer: Always the same: I own nothing, Vathara owns the story, Avatar is owned by neither of us.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

"Okay," Sokka said, with what Toph thought was probably supposed to be strained patience, but just felt sarcastic. "We're fed, Appa's all shedded out, no crazy ladies or metal monsters in footsie range, and, most important of all, we've all had sleep. Now. Are you going to explain what you meant about knowing nobles, and what that's got to do with Aang asking one of the less crazy fire-guys to teach him?"

Toes feeling everyone's place in the loose circle around her, the earthbender frowned, and cracked a nut between two rocks to buy a second to think. Most of the time, she'd just bull through with the blunt truth, and let people's illusions shatter around her. But even though she'd been locked out of sight by her own parents, she'd still managed to slip out for months of earth-rumbles. You met people that way. Good people, weird people, people you never, ever wanted in touching range. And you learned stuff. Some of it stuff that might have turned really nasty, if she wasn't the best.

These kids? Just look how they'd tried to deal with her parents. They were - well, they weren't dumb, but they could stand to learn a few things. "First off," Toph asked, getting her thoughts in order, "why didn't you say Prince Zuko, instead of just some angry guy with a ponytail?" Which he didn't even have, anymore; she would have heard his hair swishing around, like she heard Sokka's. And she hadn't.

"So he calls himself a prince," Sokka shrugged. "Big deal. Our dad's a chief. Who cares?"

"It is a big deal." Toph stabbed a toe into the dirt, flinging up a pebble to smack him from behind. "There's plenty of kings in cities across the Earth Kingdom, but there's only one Fire Lord. Ozai's got two kids. And we just met both of them."

"Zuko's the Fire Lord's son?" Katara said warily.

"Azula's his sister?" Sokka squeaked, almost at the same time.

Toph swung her head toward Aang. "You're not surprised."

"She asked if I could see the family resemblance," the airbender admitted reluctantly. Vibrations told her he was clinging to his airstaff. "She thought Zuko's scar was... funny."

"That's what most of the Fire Nation thinks," Toph said sourly. "My parents didn't like me around when they entertained, but when you can walk through walls, you overhear lots of stuff. Earth Kingdom merchants like to talk." That some of what she'd overheard had really been from Fire Nation merchants - maybe she'd better not lay that little bit of truth on them just yet. The Bei Fongs weren't rich from being stupid. They traded with anybody honest enough to strike a good deal with.

"So you know some stuff about the guy who's chased us all over the planet?" Sokka sounded reluctantly interested.

"I know he doesn't have a choice," Toph said flatly. "Nobody I heard really knew how he got scarred, but they think it had something to do with why the Fire Lord banished him right after. And everybody who's anybody knows he got told he couldn't come back without the Avatar. For three years, it was one big joke. And not the good kind." She pointed toward Aang. "And then you woke up, Twinkletoes, and all of a sudden? People aren't laughing anymore. Prince Zuko just might have a shot to do it. You have any idea how many people that got mad? Really, really mad?"

"Like Azula," Katara whispered.

Huh. Sugar Queen's heartbeat felt way confused. Good. She needed to fall off that high ostrich-horse once in a while. "You got it," Toph nodded sharply. "Zuko's her older brother. He gets out of exile, he could be the heir. He fails - or dies, you don't want to know how many people were sure he'd croak chasing rumors all over the world - she gets the throne. And from what people say? She's the one Ozai wants. Daddy's little girl, all ready to go out and burn soldiers alive." Toph snorted. "Makes me glad I'm an only child."

"But she's his sister," Aang protested. "Isn't that important?"

"Hey," Sokka patted the airbender on the shoulder. "We all know Zuko's the bad guy. No way would he tell the truth about-"

"He. Wasn't. Lying," Toph ground out. "He was mad, and scared, and just about dead on his feet, but he was not lying. I know when people are lying."

"You do?"

"You scarfed the last berry-tart out of Katara's bag and blamed it on Momo," Toph said bluntly. "Earth lets me know about people. Zuko's got really good stance; he's probably been training it for years. That's why you guys didn't realize you could have knocked him over with a lizard-bird feather."

"And we left him back there with her?" Katara swallowed uneasily.

"Relax," Toph waved. "Now that Uncle knows she's trying to kill them, if she does catch them, she won't get off that easy. You don't tick off the Dragon of the West."

"The who?" Sokka said skeptically. "He doesn't look like a dragon to me. Just kind of short, stumpy, follows after Zuko like an old... um." Sokka's heart sped up, as that rock-like (but strangely, unbendable) brain finally let a few conclusions through. "Uncle? Ah. You mean, on Zuko's mother's side. Right?"

Toph grinned at him.

"...Oh, this is not cool...."

"Um, raised by monks," Aang put in warily. "Am I missing something?"

"Are you ever." Toph raised a handy rock to lounge against. "The guy you asked to teach you? General Iroh. The Dragon of the West. The only firebender who ever breached the outer wall of Ba Sing Se." She paused, just to drive the point home. "Fire Lord Ozai's older brother."

The airstaff fell from nerveless fingers.

I'm not going to scream at Uncle. I am not going to scream at Uncle.

Singed, blackened, and ears still ringing from the third failed explosion, Zuko punched fire into the ground instead.

"Zuko!"

"Leave me alone!" He clenched the more hateful words behind his teeth; they weren't true, Uncle was trying to help, it wasn't Iroh's fault that Azula was perfect at this while he was just-

A failure.

He breathed out pain and flame and the simmering fury of Uncle was hurt, I couldn't stop her-

It should have been me.

Another long, shuddering breath of fire, and Zuko sat back, drained. Going to have to cover the ashes if we want to keep our trail cold. Spirits, that was so stupid.... "I don't think this is going to work."

"You must clear your mind, Prince Zuko. Let go of your shame-"

"I'm not ashamed!" I know what I am. I try, and I try, and I can't fix it! I'm not ashamed-

Just angry.

Angry, and tired. And tired of being angry. There had to be something he could do.

"If the enemy is too strong to face directly, change your tactics."

Zuko blinked, absently weaving flame between his fingers. "Lightning... the energies are inside."

Iroh sighed, resigned. "Yes, they are. You separate your chi, and-"

Zuko let the flames flicker over his hand. "This is outside. So is healing. I can move my energy, Uncle - but I move it outside."

"...Hmm." Iroh stooped to feel through the ashes, rising with a few blackened, glassy lumps.

"Perhaps I have forgotten what it is like to be your age, nephew. Lightning requires calm. And if your temper is anything like mine was then, calm will not come easily for some years."

Zuko blinked at the odd shift of tone. Not the impatience he'd expected from a master faced with a substandard student, but... understanding? "You had a temper?"

"The stories I could tell, could curl an airbender's hair," Iroh said with great satisfaction.

"...They're bald."

"Not without shaving." Uncle looked him over with a considering frown. "But I had thought you were calm, when you healed."

"You did?" Zuko said incredulously.

"It would seem I was mistaken," Iroh said thoughtfully. "You have always seemed quiet, with the healing fire. Focused."

Zuko eyed him a long moment, then shook his head. "It's not calm, Uncle. It's-" He hesitated, reaching into memory for the feel of it. "It's like a fight."

And now Uncle was looking at him very strangely.

"It's like fighting with someone else." Zuko glanced away, remembering that first touch of flame on Asahi, and how the wounds had seemed to scream a challenge at him. "They're fighting too, but they're just outnumbered. So you step in, and guard their weak side. And you keep fighting until it's over." He took a breath. "The energies - what you use is from you, and the fire, but what you're fixing is inside. Knots. Sort of. That you're trying to get straight again. Katara... she soaked them, until they loosened up and did what she wanted. I - kind of have to melt them. A little."

Iroh smacked himself in the forehead.

"Uncle?"

"At my age, I should know better than to assume," Iroh said ruefully. "I have another idea."

"So what's got your hair-loops in a knot?"

Hand on the canyon wall, Katara groaned. Aang was snoring the sleep of the earthbending-exhausted, and Sokka was busily cleaning out any scraps left in the cooking pot, but apparently it was too much to hope that Toph's feet would let her brood in peace. "My hair's fine, thanks."

"Sparky, huh?"

"Sparky?" Katara sputtered.

"I've heard a lot about firebenders," Toph shrugged, leaning back against comforting stone. "Never heard of any of 'em who could fix people."

"No," Katara said quietly. "That's just weird. I mean, Master Jeong Jeong said-"

"You met Jeong Jeong the Deserter?" Toph cocked her head, obviously interested.

"He tried to teach Aang firebending," Katara nodded. "That... didn't go so well." She looked down at her unmarked hands. "That was the first time I ever healed myself. He saw me do it; he was the first person to tell me waterbenders could heal. I think he would have given anything to be a waterbender instead of fire." She frowned. "It just doesn't make sense! Master Jeong Jeong - well, he wasn't nice. He was hard, like Master Pakku at the North Pole. But he was a good man. Why should Zuko-" She cut herself off.

"Masters don't know everything," Toph said seriously. "Mine thought I was still working on kiddie moves." She stirred dirt with her toes, a sandy whirlpool. "Don't tell Aang this, but some of my serious stuff? I kind of got started on by accident. Just to see what I could do. So I can pull moves other benders think are impossible. 'Cause nobody told me I couldn't."

Katara stared at her. "You think Zuko figured out how to heal by accident?"

"Why not? You did."

That... actually made sense. Kind of. "It just seems crazy," Katara shook her head. "I know what fire does, it-" Her throat tightened. Mom.

"It's like Azula?" Toph said wryly. "Hey, if you think you're confused, what do you think he feels like?"

"I don't care what that jerk feels like!" Katara snapped. "He came to our home, he threatened Gran-Gran, he's always trying to hurt us, and Aang-"

"I could go home," Toph said matter-of-factly.

Katara rolled her eyes. "If this is about the camp chores...."

"No. I could go home. You and Sokka - you could go home. If you really wanted. And now you're thinking about how Sparky can't, and it's got you twisty as a nest of dragon-flies."

"Well, Aang can't go home either!" Katara bit out. "And who can we blame for that?"

"Is Zuko really a hundred years old?" Toph said wryly. "'Cause I gotta tell you, Sugar Queen, he sure doesn't move like it."

"But it was the Fire Nation!"

"This time." Toph snorted. "Never had to sit through history lessons, huh? Check out Chin the Conqueror. If he could've gotten up to the Air Temples, you bet he would have."

"And they didn't do anything to him, either!"

"Yeah. They didn't. Nice, peaceful guys, right? Didn't do anything to him. Didn't do anything to stop him. People kind of don't like other people sitting back and watching them get creamed." Toph looked straight at her, blind eyes serious. "I don't exactly do maps. But last I heard, the Air Temples aren't in the Fire Nation. They're on big mountains, right? Surrounded by the Earth Kingdom. Or up near the poles. Which means Water Tribe territory."

"So?" Katara said, puzzled.

"So. Who let the Fire Nation get to those mountains?"

Katara swallowed, chilled. "You're wrong. You don't know my father. You don't know anything!"

"I know your father's not a hundred years old, either," Toph shrugged. "You going to tell me I'm wrong, Snoozles?"

Katara smiled as her brother wandered their way, scratching the back of his head with a thoughtful scowl. Her big brother, would-be warrior, pretty much a good guy when he wasn't thinking with his stomach-

And then he had to open his mouth.

"Well, Dad wouldn't have," Sokka frowned. "But Gran-Gran's a lot older than any of us, and she left the North Pole for some kind of good reason."

"Sokka!" Katara exclaimed.

"Hey, you know what you had to go through to get Master Pakku to teach you waterbending," her brother pointed out. "And they were going to use eighty-five-year-old Fire Nation armor to try and sneak into the fleet. They didn't even know it changed!"

"So?" Katara griped, folding her arms.

"So, what do we really know about the Fire Nation? Besides the fact that they did start the war, they are after Aang, and Zuko's so stubborn even a city full of waterbenders couldn't keep him down. Well, him and his uncle," Sokka amended. "And that's... weird. Interesting, but weird."

Katara snorted. "Believe me, Sokka, nothing about that jerk is interesting."

"Still mad he tied you to that tree, huh?"

"I'll save you from the pirates." That high-handed, arrogant, over-confident-

"Ooo!" Toph bounced. "You've got to tell me about that!"

"Never mind about the tree!" Katara snapped. "I can't believe you're still thinking about him. Or his uncle!"

"I kind of can't believe you're not," Sokka said seriously. "Iroh told us something important." He held up a finger for emphasis. "Remember how he said Azula thinks they're traitors? And that wasn't fair to his nephew?"

"I really could care less what's fair to Zuko, Sokka," Katara grumbled.

"He didn't say it wasn't fair to him."

"Whoa. Good point," Toph said. "He helped you guys at the North Pole, right? Which kind of squashed Admiral Zhao's whole invasion flat. He really is a traitor."

Katara let her arms fall, unable to argue. "But Zuko trusts him." She frowned. "And he said he wouldn't help Aang."

"He's not going to teach Aang," Sokka said, with what was meant to be a wise and knowing air. "Doesn't mean he won't help, next time we run into them."

"Next time?" Toph asked.

"Oh, yeah," Katara sighed. "With Zuko? There's always a next time."

"All this four elements talk is sounding like Avatar stuff," Zuko said warily.

Meaning he was treading on the very thinnest ice of his nephew's willingness to listen, Iroh knew. Lifting a hand from his dirt drawing, he tossed another twig to the small fire he'd built in Zuko's seared pit; deliberate distraction, to ease the singing tension. The Avatar was the bridge to the spirit world - and the spirits had ever been less than kind to his nephew.

Well. Except, perhaps, in one instance. Asahi browsed in and out of view, clearly unworried by any fire so long as it was theirs.

"It is the combination of the four elements in one person that makes the Avatar so powerful," Iroh agreed. "But a true Avatar's power is rooted in more than just bending. The Avatar was meant to travel the world, and teach each nation of the others, so none of us forgot why we need each other. He saw the ways of each people, and so we saw them in him. For sometimes it is only by looking at another that we can see the truth of ourselves."

"I don't understand."

Nor do I. Not as I had thought I did, Iroh thought. "I have been considering what you said, nephew. And I believe I may have an answer. But to be certain - and I must be certain - I will need you to do something very difficult."

Zuko sat up straight, determined. "I'm ready."

"Good," Iroh nodded. Waved at the fire. "Imagine a small child, who has just started to firebend. Like yourself, perhaps, when Lu Ten was your age. Teach him to heal."

"Uncle?" The unscarred eye was wide.

"Imagine, nephew," Iroh said gently. "Imagine that I ask for him, why does this work? How do I begin?"

Zuko stared into the fire, silent.

Perhaps it is too soon. I hoped not, but what Azula did to both of us... betrayal cuts deep.

"Fire wants to fight."

Iroh sat back, listening.

"It wants to fight, and it wants to burn." Zuko frowned, feeling his way through words. "If you want it to be more, you have to give it part of you. You have to flow with it. It's like... if firebending is being the captain of the ship, healing is turning it so you don't get swamped by the rogue wave. You get what you need, but you're not - all the way in control." He paused, shaking his head. "Fire is a rhythm, a heartbeat. It knows how to dance, it just doesn't know what dance you need it to do. You have to show it the steps. It's you, and the fire - and you're not trying to match it, not like breathing. You're trying to find a rhythm you can both fit. And then it's you and the fire and the person you're healing, and that gets complicated, and sometimes you trip a little. But you care, you have to care - and if you just keep going, it'll work." Zuko blew out a breath, obviously not happy with his own words.

Look outside yourself, indeed, Iroh thought, smiling. Dancing, especially with a partner, was a habit of other peoples, not the Fire Nation.

And why should it be otherwise? Other benders must find their element outside themselves. We carry ours within. Which is why those like Zhao proclaim us superior. And perhaps we are - in combat, in killing.

But in our dances, we dance alone.

"It seems a place to start," Iroh nodded. "Now. Show me."

Eyeing him doubtfully, Zuko beckoned to the fire-

Stopped. Took a breath, and reached out again with both hands. Slowly.

Shaping a fireball, Iroh thought, watching intently. But he called it from the fire, not himself, and he has not separated it wholly from the flames. And he is adding his own energy to it. Much like a waterbender, riding a wave.

Ball of flames between his palms, sparks trailing to the fire, Zuko began moving his hands in slow, opposing circles. Glints of green caught and spread, ribbons reaching out to wreath his hands.

It is like the dao, Iroh realized. They do not move exactly as one. As two halves of a whole, yes. But one is sometimes faster, or slower. And sometimes they are near to block a single enemy, while at others, they separate to fight a host of opponents.

A fight. A heartbeat. A dance. If there were something less akin to the calm separation of lightning-bending, he had never seen it.

Zuko took the opportunity to reach back and run flames over the bruises from his meeting with the street, and let the fire in his hands die. "I guess that's it."

Nodding, Iroh reached out to the fire himself.

This is not as easy as it looks.

Training said to keep his movements precise, sharp, controlled. To establish boundaries between himself and the flame. Fire, taught the masters, was anger, destruction, deadly passion. It could not be left to rage unchecked.

But Iroh had seen dragon's fire. And yes, rage was in it - but also warmth, compassion, friendship. Even the rage was no cold thrill in destruction, but desperate love of what they fought to protect.

Flow with the flame. Let it be part of you. Care.

It seared inside, like the times he'd snuck into hidden caverns to try to bend lava. Not so much physical pain, as of the spirit; he'd ached for his family and his people so very long....

It was the searing that kicked in training again; fortunately his own, and not any gained from Sozin's teachings. Live! Let the energy flow. In, down, up, out-

Green blazed between his hands, before it shattered apart.

"Uncle!" Soothing warmth kneaded his shoulder, sinking in to his heart. "You - you weren't breathing right...."

Iroh drew a deliberate breath, and felt the flow of his own chi. A bit uneven, but Zuko's efforts were mending that. "The technique," he said wryly, "is not so harmless to the student as it appears."

"Not harmless? What did you do?"

Green flickered away again from Zuko's hands, and Iroh leaned gratefully on his nephew. "On the bright side, it appears that I am right. And for that, I am sorry. I am truly sorry, nephew. It has been in plain view for years, and I did not see."

Zuko's fingers felt for his pulse. "Uncle, are you sure you're all right? Because you're not making sense."

Iroh chuckled ruefully. "I am, no thanks to my own training. Zuko. When you change the fire to heal, you leave its energies linked to the flames. And to yourself. This is not what firebending teaches."

Zuko stiffened, pulling back. "So I'm doing it wrong."

"No!" Iroh gripped his shoulders, holding the young man before he could escape back into doubt and pain. "No, nephew. You are doing it right! I did it as firebenders are taught; I controlled the flow, precisely. And like the rogue wave on the sea, it is not meant to be so tamed."

"Your heart." Zuko was desperately pale. "You have to feel it with your heart, and...."

"Yes," Iroh nodded, relieved to have finally - finally! - gained a clear view of his enemy's position. And if his intuition was correct, it might yet become an ally instead, if he were clever enough. "The heart has a rhythm as well. Control the fire too tightly, it turns on those rhythms of your own it can reach." And I thought only lightning could so stop a heart.

Which led to grim thoughts of exactly what Ursa might have done... no. His father's death was the past. Zuko's life was here, and now. "You did it right, Zuko," Iroh said simply. And laughed at himself, ruefully. "Which means, of course, I have been teaching you firebending as I might calligraphy, left-handed."

Zuko gave him a look askance. "Did you get hit with a boomerang when I wasn't looking?"

"Listen to me, nephew," Iroh said patiently. He couldn't blame the boy for his doubts. Any other master would swear he'd been sunstruck. But if he closed his eyes to the lessons of Sozin and Azulon, and looked at what his nephew had actually done.... "To throw fire together with another bender is a fundamental technique, yet it remains one of the most difficult. Many do not even bother to master it. Why should they, when we can order the mass fire of hundreds? But at the South Pole we threw, and you did not hesitate."

"I know my basics, yes, thank you, Uncle-"

"Hush, and listen," Iroh directed. "When you faced Zhao, I worried he had you; yet with one spin you shattered his fire and his stance. I have known masters who could not have struck that blow. When you raised fire about Azula, why did she not wrest it away the instant it burned? Unless she could not, until she forced herself free with all her strength. And now, when you heal...." He let go, and smiled. "What do these fires have in common?"

Zuko swallowed. "They're outside." He grimaced. "But that's not how it's supposed to be."

"At the moment, I believe we should be less concerned with proper style, and more with what will work if Azula does bring reinforcements." Iroh nodded toward the dao resting by their packs. "Is that not why you learned swords as well?"

Zuko's fists clenched. "I just - wanted to be good at something."

"And so you are," Iroh said firmly. You are good, nephew. Not a master, perhaps; but you are only sixteen. Give yourself time.

Azula was chasing them. Sozin's Comet was coming. Time, they did not have.

"Do not discount your gifts, Prince Zuko," Iroh said instead. "They may yet save your life. There is a firebending technique neither Azula nor my brother know, and it depends on something very much like what I have seen you do."

"There's a move the Fire Lord doesn't know?" Zuko said warily.

Iroh smiled. "He doesn't know, because I made it up myself." He dropped his nephew a wink. "I was studying waterbenders years before Katara drew your attention, nephew."

"Drew my attention?" Zuko sputtered. "She buried me in ice in the middle of a blizzard, Uncle!"

"You should have seen what my Natsu did when I was your age," Iroh said fondly. "Ah, what a fiery chase she led me, before she caught me!"

"Uncle." Zuko was gripping the bridge of his nose in the exasperated way that meant he'd decided this was another bout of temporary insanity, which just might pass if he waited it out. "She's Water Tribe. She is not waiting to ambush me with a red cord and three cups of wine. Trust me."

"Ah, a shame," Iroh sighed gustily. Mentally chalking another point on his side of the tally: one distraction, complete. "Well. The cold fire is powerful, and certainly impressive, but it has a weakness. More than any flame, it is energy, and it seeks the path of least resistance. If you let the energy in your own body flow, the lightning will follow." He stood. "Let us begin."

In, down, up, out, Zuko chanted to himself as they practiced through the afternoon, shifting the flow of energy as he moved. Trying not to think of that flash of pure fear, as he'd stared Azula's sparkling death in the face-

Before Uncle had stepped between them, and redirected her bolt into the cliff.

He saved me. I didn't even realize what he did, not then - too scared, too angry - but he did.

Next time, I want to save myself.

In, down, up, out.

It was and wasn't like healing. Healing was a dance, a partnership, both sides trading off the lead. This was more like Jun the bounty hunter's whip, snapping out against danger. But it was still a flow. A pattern.

It makes sense.

He could feel the technique, solid as any of the basics Uncle had taught him. This was how it would flow. How it would work. "I'm ready."

"Ready?" Uncle Iroh said incredulously, dropping out of stance. "What, are you crazy?"

"I have to know it works, Uncle!"

"And if it does not?" Iroh blazed. "I have lost my son; I will not lose you as well! If you are lucky, you will never need this move in your life!"

He's angry. He never gets angry. Zuko clenched his fists, unwilling to back down. "When have I ever been lucky, Uncle?"

Silence, stretching taut between them as gold warred with gold. "No," Iroh said flatly, every inch the Dragon of the West. "You are not ready."

I need this! It was all the banished prince could do not to scream. I need this, Uncle. I need to win. I need to beat her!

...I need to be good enough. Just once.

Breathe. Bite back the anger, even if smoke rose from between his clenched fingers. "Azula's after us, Uncle. If she brings troops - if she gets us separated...." Zuko swallowed hard, pride burning like acid. "If she does that, I'm dead anyway."

I'm not good enough to take her. I never have been. All I can try to do is stay alive.

All we can do is run.

It wasn't fair. It just wasn't fair. The rage burned in him like lava, demanding to blaze free....

It's never been fair, Zuko reminded himself, forcing the anger back. And I don't care. I'll make my own destiny. Whatever it takes.

Uncle sighed, anger draining away like water, leaving him worn and tired. "You make a good argument, Prince Zuko. I will consider it."

Zuko let out a breath of relief. "Thank you, Uncle-"

"No!" Iroh slashed a hand across, trailing smoke. "If you wish me to risk your life, you will earn it! You will practice. You will listen to me. And for once in your life, you will wait, until I say you are ready!"

Zuko swallowed, shaken. Uncle Iroh was always calm, always controlled. To see him half-raise fire without even thinking about it.... He shivered.

Iroh sighed once more. "We are tired," he went on, more quietly. "And healed or not, a fight like that we faced yesterday would drain trained soldiers, much less-"

"You don't have to explain, Uncle." Biting his lip, Zuko bowed, student to master.

And tried not to flinch, as Iroh's arms closed around him.

"I love you, nephew," Iroh said softly. "I do not tell you that enough. If I could, I would stand between you and harm forever. But you are right. I cannot." One hand lifted, brushing back unfamiliar short hair. "I can only give you the skills to protect yourself, and pray."

Uncle's hand in his hair. It should have been comforting. It was.

And somehow, that made it even worse.

No familiar weight of a phoenix-tail. No breeze across shaved skin. Clothes that weren't meant to be worn with armor; that weren't even red. No taste of salt, no coal smoke, no sway of the ship under him....

Nothing was right in the world. Nothing.

"I'm sorry, Uncle," Zuko choked out, hating the tear that trickled from his good eye. "If I hadn't chased him to the pole, you wouldn't have been with Zhao. Our crew wouldn't have- they couldn't call you a traitor-" He swallowed hard, words a bare whisper. "I just wanted to go home."

"I know, nephew. I know." A chuckle against his shoulder. "And you may underestimate Lieutenant Jee. Our crew has seen the Avatar unleashed before. If anyone had a chance to survive that fury, they did." Iroh let go, and nodded. "Come. We can make some more distance, before dark."

So it begins.

Lying awake beside Asahi's warmth, Iroh looked over at his nephew. Even in sleep, Zuko frowned, huddled on himself, hands clenching and unclenching on the bedroll.

"I just wanted to go home."

Zuko knew. He had not admitted it to himself, not yet. But he knew.

We can never go home again. Iroh smiled wryly. Perhaps I should almost get killed by Azula more often.

Though he doubted matters would have gone this well, had Zuko not been able to heal him. Azula had won the physical fight, but Zuko had denied her the victory. It gave him strength. A place to stand, to be certain of himself, when all the world seemed to fall apart around him.

And it will.

All his life, Zuko had tried to please his father. To win, by painful effort, the approval Azula seemed to gain simply by breathing. To admit that they could not go home, would be to admit he had failed. That he had not - could not - wring love from Fire Lord Ozai's heart of stone.

I love you, Zuko. I wish that were enough.

Futile wish. A child's first love and loyalty was to his parents, always - and while soldiers might put that as second to their commander's orders, the Fire Lord was the crown prince's commander. Exiled or not.

To admit the truth, will break my nephew's heart.

But would it break his loyalty? That, above all, was the question.

Well, no, Iroh admitted to himself. Whether or not Azula will catch us - all else will hinge on that.

So. First, avoid the she-devil on their trail. Though if they were lucky, Azula would leave them for later, pursuing glory from her father by seeking the Avatar's head.

...Not that he wished the young airbender harm. Quite the opposite, despite that horror at the North Pole. The boy was twelve. He could not, truly, have known what he was unleashing, allowing the Ocean Spirit his way with all an Avatar's power.

Hope that is so, Iroh told himself grimly, recalling torn ships and bodies, awash in the sea. Remembering weeks trapped on the raft with Zuko's nightmares and his own. Hope he did not know, and that he will never do so again. The consequences, otherwise....

Well. There were reasons beyond family he had trained Zuko, and followed his nephew on what seemed a fool's quest. Reasons Aang had best hope he never learned.

Still. Young Aang had friends, and allies, and a flying bison. He and Zuko had only each other and one stubborn ostrich-horse. And with Sozin's Comet on the way, they were running out of time-

Iroh sat up suddenly.

"Mmph? Uncle?"

"Only thinking, nephew. Go to sleep."

"Mmph...."

Leaning back as his nephew settled, Iroh probed at that sudden thought. Sozin's Comet would arrive by the end of summer. After that-

After that, it would be the Avatar against the Fire Lord. One would win. If that one were the Avatar, his nephew would be safe. If it were not....

We would have to run again. But the comet does not last forever.

We do not know where the Avatar has gone. And even my nephew will not strike out blindly. If I can only keep us moving....

No. No, that would not do; Azula was moving, and the Avatar was definitely traveling, and the more they themselves crossed the land, the more chances the spirits had to arrange another meeting between all of them.

Iroh was not feeling charitable toward spirits, at the moment.

We are in the Earth Kingdom, and we should take a lesson from the badger-mole. Go to ground, and hide.

Easy to say. Far more difficult to do. The Earth Kingdom and the Fire Nation were locked in war, territory changing hands with each shift of the tide. Nowhere was safe-

Iroh drew in a sharp breath. It hurt; even all these years later, it hurt. But he steeled himself. Considered the option. And nodded.

Ba Sing Se.

Those walls had not fallen to his assault. They would hold. At least until the comet came.

Still. To venture there, where he would never escape memories of a young man who had never had the chance to give him grandchildren... he shook his head.

"Father," Zuko murmured in his sleep. "Please...."

Almost against his will, Iroh's fists clenched. Deliberately, the old general called to mind those high walls, those proud earthbenders, the whole massive edifice that had denied him victory.

You took my son. Iroh let out a quiet, angry breath of flame. Let us see if you can save my nephew.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: If bloodbending is internal waterbending, why shouldn't firebending - as it is currently practiced - have had similar origins? All the other elements involve external control of an existing substance. It'd make a lot of sense if firebending started the same way... and then evolved, into the internally-controlled fire which can be much more handy for combat.

Chapter 6

Chapter Notes

A/N: Warning, violence.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

I'm starting to not like roads, Zuko thought darkly, touching the side of Asahi's neck to keep her quiet. The sounds from up around that blind corner were... not good.

On the one hand, roads meant people. Asahi needed grain to stay her best, and while he might be getting better at hunting, people couldn't live by meat alone. And letting Uncle try to gather wild plants was not happening. Roads meant towns, farms, trading posts. Places they could trade skills or just willingness to work for a few meals or coin.

On the other hand... roads meant people. With all their lovely habits.

"Three at least," Iroh estimated quietly, as they snuck closer. "No more than seven, or we would hear more. They waited around the corner for their victims - a light wagon, hmm...."

Smart place for an ambush. A blind, sharp turn, as the road bent around a tall outcrop of dust-brown stone. Brush crept up on the road's other side, making flight that direction a difficult choice, in those first critical moments of surprise. Zuko did not want to go around that corner. Not if there were any chance one of the attackers had enough sense to keep watch.

"Mommy!"

"Go!" Iroh dropped back, already plotting his own assault. "Find the child!"

Sort out who're the bad guys later, Zuko knew, urging Asahi into a sprint. They rounded the bend, and she skipped sideways, dodging the lump in the road-

The body.

Earth Kingdom brown, splotted with red from an arrow driven all the way through. And never mind, it wasn't moving, worry about it later. The handful of people around the wagon with its stolid draft ostrich-horse were moving, and he had his dao out and separated before the spearman could even register there was a new fighter-

Bandits. Spearman. Two with swords, holding an older woman. One in the wagon, on the girl.

Meaning snatch, grab, and ride wouldn't work. And Asahi wasn't combat-trained. One of many reasons he hadn't taken her near Azula.

Zuko launched himself from her back instead, trusting the hen's truly rotten temper toward strangers to keep her out of grasping hands. The first whirling strike bisected the bandit's spear before it could come to bear.

The second took his head.

Swordsmen. Letting the woman go, now, going for steel, but Zuko wasn't worried about them. Not as much as he was about the bow and quiver laid in grabbing range against the side of the wagon. Probably by the bastard just rising to his feet in the back, surprised at the sudden shouting.

Green and tan wriggled away, still shrieking.

So small. She's just a little girl-

The distraction almost cost him. Zuko dodged the first wild swing, and parried the next few with a flourish of what appeared to be completely unnecessary footwork. Letting them drive him away from the wagon, and their probable leader.

And smirked, as the pair suddenly realized that impressive bow had been kicked far too many yards away.

"Zhen!" The bruised woman bolted around them, heading for the shrieks with desperate determination.

"Back off, woman!" Steel flashed, as the disarmed archer grabbed for the struggling girl. "You, boy! Put the swords down."

And have you cut her throat anyway? Zuko glared back. "No."

The woman froze in place, face flashing between fear and hate. "You can't! My baby-!"

"Let her go," Zuko said grimly. "Now."

"Are you deaf?" the bandit snorted. "Put them down, or the girl-"

Bloodied fletching sprouted from his throat.

"A bit high." Iroh's voice carried across the battlefield as the incredulous bandit choked on his own blood. "It would seem I am badly out of practice."

The swordsmen hesitated, looking at Zuko. Looking past him.

Zuko waited, knees bent, blades out and ready. Smirking, to hide the uncertainty of, Uncle only had that one shot....

They bolted.

"Let them go!" Iroh ordered, before he could leap after them. "We may still be able to save this man."

"Heng!" Zhen in her arms, the woman glanced back toward the fallen man, torn.

"Get your supplies!" Zuko ordered, shaking off his blades before he sheathed them. He jumped into the wagon, and hauled the dead weight out. "We need to move!"

Terrified, she jumped. And started grabbing what had been scattered onto the road; bundles of roots, dried plants, and what looked like odder things. Some of them looked familiar, he just couldn't think from where.

Whistling for Asahi, Zuko helped Uncle manhandle the unconscious merchant across her back, then down again into the wagon bed. Stooped, and tossed the quiver in as well.

They're going to be back.

"Can you drive, Madam?" Uncle asked with courteous haste as he climbed into the back. "Asahi will follow, and I need to help my nephew with your husband."

"He's bleeding so bad...." Pale, she grabbed the harness reins and snapped them, one arm still wrapped around Zhen.

"Mommy! They're hurting Daddy!"

"Hush, little one! Don't look back."

"But they're bad-"

"Zhen, quiet!"

It probably did look like they were hurting him, Zuko knew, wincing as Iroh's knife cut free the bloodstained inner robe. Shoulder wounds weren't good at the best of times, and Uncle hadn't had time to be gentle yanking that arrow out.

Too much blood. No way is just a bandage going to be enough.

Uncle grimaced, obviously reaching the same conclusion. "We cannot risk it," he murmured regretfully. Raised his voice. "How far is the next town, Madam-"

"Hot water," Zuko said abruptly.

"Lee, what-?"

"Hot water, Uncle. For clean bandages!"

"Ah!" Iroh went to work, bracing a pot against the jouncing of the road, lighting a few precious pieces of coal inside it, and tucked his teapot atop the flames. "Will this work?" he murmured warily.

"I have to try." It works with rocks. It works with my own fire. Water can't be that different.

I won't let it be.

Soak one of their bandages in boiling water. Press it into the wound, with the same circular flow he used on fire. Pick up the bits of fire still singing through steaming cloth, and guide them into the dance. Dive into the worst knots, and soften them, and hold, until Uncle could pass him another cloth.

It was like trying to climb sheer rock with his fingertips. But he'd done that, too.

Soak and melt and hold. Soak and melt and hold....

And somehow the sun had slipped a handspan across the sky, and Uncle was shaking him. "Lee. Lee! Stop. Stop now."

Zuko blinked, looking at red, raw flesh. Still gouged. Still not whole. "But-"

"Enough," Uncle said flatly. "He will live." Iroh gently shoved him down, onto canvas covering fragrant roots, away from drying blood. "Rest."

But they could be back-

He was out before he hit the canvas.

"Is your son going to be all right?"

Iroh lifted his hand from Zuko's pulse; strong and steady, if a bit fast. "Lee is my nephew." He smiled slightly. "And he will be. Master-?"

"Heng Mu." The merchant grimaced as the road jarred his bandaged shoulder. "Dyes and spices. This is my wife, Nuan, and our daughter Zhen-"

"You get away from Daddy right now!"

"Zhen, that's enough," Nuan ordered. Looked over her shoulder for just a moment of heartsick gratitude. "Thank you, sir. Spirits bless the both of you. Even if-" She swallowed hard, and turned back to the road.

"Your mother's right, Zhen," Heng stated. "They were helping us. Even if I don't know exactly what you did..." He left the question hanging, green eyes curious despite the pain.

"They hurt you! And the ugly one, with the swords, he-" The young girl shivered, hiding her face in her mother's arm.

"We'll talk about it later." He gave Iroh a hard look, and lowered his voice. "Just what did my daughter see?"

"More than enough," Iroh said firmly, matching his low quiet. "She will have nightmares, I think. Treat her kindly. She will not forget, but time will reassure her that you all live."

Heng frowned toward Zuko. "My daughter usually doesn't call anyone ugly."

Iroh sighed. "It is likely she saw him dispose of the spearman." He shrugged. "My nephew does not enjoy defending himself with such force. Even so, he is good at it. Fortunately for all of us."

"Dispose of- He's a boy!"

"A pity, that the war does not care." Iroh raised an inquiring brow. "Will it be far to the next town? It is good to have company on the road, but I would like to know how likely it may be that the two who fled will try their luck again."

"Two?" Heng said uneasily. "I thought there were four."

"There were," Iroh agreed mildly.

Heng stared at him. Opened his mouth-

Shut it again, paler than blood loss could account for. "Oma and Shu. You're F-"

"Please." Iroh met his gaze, knowing what he saw. We can hide our bending, but we can never hide our eyes. "The arrow was within a finger of your heart. If Lee had not healed you, you would never have woken."

"Healed?" Heng said, dazed. Looked at Zuko. And the bandages. And the teapot.

Blinked, and looked back at Iroh with mingled shock and amazement. "How did a waterbender get born in the Fire Nation?"

"Ah." Iroh leaned back, smiling genially. "That, is a very long story...."

"That's the bow, all right," the Earth Kingdom Guard said grimly, gripping it in one gloved hand. "Cut-Horse Meng. We'll have to send a patrol out for the body. Good riddance, if it is him." The man's mustache wrinkled in distaste. "You might want to light some incense to Guan Yin. If those healers hadn't come along when they did... that filth has a record when it comes to little girls."

"I was already planning to, but..." Heng swallowed dryly. "Yes. I'm very glad they found us."

"Why can't lowlifes like that go off and die fighting the Fire Nation, that's what I'd like to know," the guard grumbled. "Animals deserve animals."

"Is there anything else you need to know today?" Heng asked humbly. "My wife and daughter are... well, I'm sure you can imagine. We were going to be staying in town to sell for a few days anyway, even before this." He lifted a hand, not quite touching his bandaged shoulder. "I don't think I'll be up to the road for a while."

"Mu's Dyes and Spices, right?" The guard looked a bit less grim. "My wife's been looking for a good fast jade green, whatever that means. I don't suppose you'd have any advice?"

Three sales and some frank advice on cheap fabric tricks later, Heng finally escaped into the twilight, ducking into the inn stable to check on Sand. And their - rescuers. Odd as that thought was. "He's still asleep?"

"Asleep again," Mushi corrected, patting the black hen curled protectively next to his nephew. "He woke enough for dinner. Thank you for sending Madam Nuan with it. I would prefer not to leave Lee alone among strangers. Sometimes, it seems he attracts bad luck."

"Is that how he got that scar?"

Mushi's gaze rested on him, calm as a saber-moose lion stalking its prey.

Heng raised a hand to fend off... he didn't know what. Mushi couldn't be a firebender. He'd used a bow, hadn't he? Everybody knew firebenders were too proud of their element to use steel. "I just want to understand," he said honestly. "You said it was a long story, and then you just say it's probably from his mother. I can understand why you're hiding, and that you don't want my wife to know-"

"I was more concerned with your daughter."

"Zhen?" Heng said in disbelief. "Why?"

"We frightened her, and she nearly lost you," Mushi said frankly. "If she knew something that would bring trouble to us - and she is young, she would not realize the consequences would be far worse - well. It is better not to take the chance."

"Oh." He hadn't even thought of that. Zhen was eleven. She'd never really want to hurt anyone.

But she was scared.

"I'll talk to her," Heng stated. "But she's not here now. And - a waterbender?"

Mushi sighed, and shrugged. "His mother could heal. I knew, but I said nothing. I knew my brother's temper. And she was a wonderful person. Kind, strong, and honorable. I thought she would temper my brother. Give him a balance he lacked." He shook his head. "Something went wrong. I am still uncertain of what. I was... away. When I returned - I should have taken Lee and left, then." Gold eyes met his squarely. "My brother is a firebender. A strong one. To think his son was simply powerless was disappointment enough. To discover the truth-" He winced, and sighed.

Heng swallowed, eyes drawn to the ridges of scar under dark hair. "Are you saying, his father...."

"Lee does not speak of it." Sadness shadowed Mushi's face, mixed with a cold, terrible anger. "He knows a score of firebending forms; they are useful for defense, even for one who cannot bend. But not one of water. He could not heal himself. When he was well enough to move, I took him. We have not returned to the Fire Nation since."

Spirits, what a nightmare. And yet - something didn't ring right. "So why were you lost?" Heng said cautiously. "You don't seem like the kind of man who ends up not knowing where he is."

"I do not? Ah." Mushi rubbed at his left shoulder ruefully. "Unfortunately, my nephew is not an only child."

Heng had to lean on a stall door. "I don't really want to know, do I?"

"Let us just say, we misjudged the tides of war," Mushi said dryly. "We were recognized, and fled. With only what you see. Though I am grateful even for that. Still, we did not escape unscathed." He regarded Heng soberly. "Yours is the second mortal wound Lee has healed in a week."

No wonder they were jumpy. Well, besides the obvious. "He needs a teacher."

"Hiding in the Earth Kingdom is difficult enough," Mushi observed. "I do not think we could pass at the North Pole."

"Who said anything about the poles?" Heng chuckled, thinking of the odd dyestuffs that came out of the Foggy Swamp. And the even odder people who traded them. Oh, the women were graceful enough, neatly dressed as any Earth Kingdom villager, if exotically different. But the men, especially if they were on a hunting trip... Augh, my eyes! Heng thought ruefully. "Ice isn't the only water in the world."

"That is true," Mushi allowed. "But the ports are never safe."

And they'd never fit in at the swamps, Heng knew, after a moment more to think about it. They might look the part, except for the eyes - but that accent would be a dead giveaway. Accent on dead. "There's still one port that is."

Mushi straightened. "The inland sea of Ba Sing Se."

Heng nodded. "I don't know for sure, but I've heard there are healing waterbenders there. I know some people travel to the city, if they can, if ordinary healers can't handle their sickness."

"Hmm." Mushi stroked his beard thoughtfully.

Heng winced, suddenly remembering a problem. "But you need documents to get into the city, and-"

"Do not worry, Master Mu. There are ways." Mushi was considering the problem with the same abstract air he'd seen in the most skilled Pai Sho players. "What else do you know of the waterbenders?"

"They like blue?" Heng said uncertainly. "I've never been to Ba Sing Se."

"But you know those who have?" Mushi inquired.

"Well...."

Mushi smiled. "Well, indeed. Tell me of someone who has been there, and what they said of what they found."

"Did you mean it?"

Just back from seeing Heng off to his family, Iroh sighed. I should have known better than to expect him to sleep while I talked to strangers. "If we can find a waterbender who heals, perhaps we can-"

"About... Father."

Oh. "I did," Iroh said quietly, entering the stall to look his nephew in the eye. "Your mother was a ray of sunshine in the midst of clouds. Her presence eased the heart; her smile was the rainbow. Even the coldest soul, I believed, must warm and thaw to her."

"But he didn't." Gold eyes closed, still weary.

"No," Iroh sighed. "She was sunshine in the falling rain, and then she was gone... like the tales of the dragon-wife...."

"Uncle?"

I am tired, Iroh thought ruefully. I should never have said that. "Only an old man's wandering thoughts, nephew. Sometimes, when the world seems coldest, the old stories give us hope."

"Maybe." Zuko gave him another skeptical look, before settling back into the straw. "But she wasn't a dragon, Uncle. I think somebody would have noticed if I came out of an egg." He took a breath, let it sigh out in a whisper. "Besides. Everybody knows dragon-children were special."

And you, who can heal, are not? But Iroh kept quiet, letting his nephew sink back into restless sleep. Zuko was in no mood to hear comfort. He had saved a life today, yes - but he had also taken one. And that never became easier. Not for any soul who still claimed a heart.

He could still feel the bow's grip in his grasp, see the spray of blood as the arrow sank home. It'd been years, but he'd never quite forgotten the archery lessons that were part of every Fire Nation noble's training.

Well, almost every noble's. His nephew was a rare exception. Archery was not easily practiced on board a ship. And even before his exile, Zuko had never taken to the bow.

Dragons have always hated archers.

Ridiculous thought. Truly. Zuko was correct. Someone would have noticed if Prince Ozai's firstborn had-

"Like trying to hatch a stone," Ursa's voice echoed in memory.

An old legend. Hidden, like those stories the Fire Nation never spoke of to outsiders: that the gold eyes many feared as inhuman truly were. For it was said the first firebenders had been no mere mortals learning from dragons, but a dragon's own children....

The Avatar has returned, after a century of silence. Powers are stirring. Spirits are moving.

Still. His Zuko? Lady Ursa had never been unfaithful. He would stake his soul on that. Zuko was his brother's son.

But whose daughter was she?

He hadn't recalled it before, but Lady Kotone's relations with her husband had been rumored to be... odd....

No. Impossible, Iroh decided, making his own nest in straw to seek sleep.

And yet....

Spirits. If you stacked the deck against my nephew before he was even born, we need to have a very long talk.

A turtle-duckling crying in the reeds, blood and the knife coming down-

Zuko woke with a strangled gasp in the gray darkness, straw rustling through his fingers. No pond. No blood. No little girl's life riding on his desperate guess at the right thing to do.

Nightmare. You knew you'd have them.

Close to dawn. No point in trying to go back to sleep. Zuko crept out of his bedding, drawing his dao to check them.

Clean. Uncle's work.

Uncle had helped him clean his blades the first time, too. Water and oil and a shoulder to lean against until the shaking stopped, when the fire of battle finally guttered out and a scared fourteen-year-old remembered exactly how close some of the blades had come.

Stupid. I should have listened to Uncle.

But he'd been fourteen and full of himself and angry - and he'd just wanted to get away from the ship. From the quest, the stupid, useless quest, no one had seen the Avatar in a hundred years and he just couldn't take it anymore-!

I just wanted to go home.

But he couldn't. All he could do was leave the ship and leave the armor, just dress in quiet black and leave the Fire Nation behind.

He'd taken the dao, though. He wasn't that stupid. Firebend, and he might as well fly a banner saying idiot prince here. And the point was to be alone.

A port's back streets were no place to be alone.

He couldn't remember everything that had happened. Uncle said that was common, in your first real fight. He'd just felt something wasn't right-

I should have paid attention.

Heard the coarse laughs, smelled cheap wine, felt the ropes-

They thought I was a kid. Ten, maybe twelve. He'd put on height since then, but it still looked like he'd never be a match for his father... and why in the world had the spirits made men in other nations so damn big?

They thought I was a kid. Spirits, that's sick.

One-Hook Bai; that'd been the name he'd heard, in the midst of the roaring and the stink and the painful twist of his left wrist as he misjudged a blow and it skidded off ribs. He'd dealt with a thousand petty palace intrigues before his exile, he knew to remember names-

-And then he'd had just enough brains left to say screw pride, and start setting bastards on fire.

When it was over, some had run, two were melting in pools of flame....

And one was rattling out his life on top of a shaking teenager, blood bubbling black in the starlight from a half-cut throat.

Never wanted to do that. Never.

But he had, and he couldn't undo it. Like stepping off a cliff. Bending his first flame. He'd closed a door he'd never even realized was open, and locked himself on the other side.

Uncle had found him back on the ship, cleaning up. An unfamiliar, grim-faced Uncle, jaw set and hands hard as he looked over scrapes, bruises, and one knife-gash to the cheek Zuko couldn't even remember getting. Iroh had helped him clean up, taken his stumbling report - then hugged him within an inch of his life. And stayed with him, all that awful, numb day, and through the first night of nightmares.

Then yelled at him, once the retired general was certain his nephew was back in touch with reality.

Worked, Zuko thought wryly. I never did anything that stupid again.

Not just because of Uncle. Because... he'd asked, and listened, and found out about Bai's - preferences. And anybody who would turn over anyone to that was just sick-

But killing was awful and horrible and he hated it. And being good at it didn't change that.

There wasn't another way. Not this time.

Didn't help. Not today. Tomorrow, maybe.

Just keep going. Uncle needs you.

Iroh didn't have nightmares; not that he knew of, anyway. But he did get... sad. And clung even more tightly to his tea than usual.

Dyes and spices. Maybe Heng Mu has some ginseng? I could ask. I think. It couldn't hurt-

Footsteps. Heavy, and not trying to be quiet. Zuko faded into the shadows by Asahi.

"Hard to believe Cut-Horse Meng got taken out by an old refugee."

Two Earth Kingdom guards. Looked a lot more polished than the bullies he'd run into in Li's village. Good sign, in that they were probably professional enough to actually guard the town instead of terrorize it. Bad, in that if they saw him, they might know what they were looking at.

Stay hidden.

"He picked the wrong refugee." A third guard near the door, with some kind of insignia on the brim of his uniform hat. Probably the leader, by his stance. "I saw him talking to the Mu family last night. He may act harmless, but if that man wasn't a soldier a few decades back, I'm an airbender."

"Always thought your head was up in the clouds, Sergeant."

"Funny, Bao. Very funny." The sergeant watched his men saddle up their ostrich-horses and nodded as they checked their gear. "Stay sharp. Word has it Red Ling didn't like Meng either, but he won't take losing two of his gang well. Especially to a boy...." The sergeant stepped over to Asahi's stall. "Odd. I could have sworn the innkeeper said they were both here."

Asahi snapped at him.

"Better count your fingers," the other guard said dryly. "That's a Yonaguni hen."

"Yonaguni?" The sergeant frowned, absently checking. "Sounds almost Fire Nation."

"Probably did come from the occupied territories," his subordinate shrugged, leading his mount to the stable doors. "Give me a good, solid Feng any day. Just look at her! Too small for a real man, and that temper... they may be tough as steel, but it's just not worth it."

"Hmm." Still frowning, the sergeant followed them all out.

Zuko waited a moment, then patted Asahi on the neck. "Idiots. Don't listen to them." We need to get out of here.

Thinking of what they needed to get on the road, he ticked off tasks in his head. Asahi fed and tended, supplies packed, Uncle breakfasted....

Okay. There ought to be time for one more small errand. Assuming Heng Mu didn't just slam the door in his face.

"Where has that boy gone?" Iroh muttered under his breath, holding Asahi's reins in the early morning. It wasn't like Zuko to disappear....

Well. That wasn't quite accurate, given some of his nephew's... adventures. But it was certainly not like Zuko to hurry them both into readiness to travel, then disappear.

A few more minutes, and I had best start asking questions.

No; there was his nephew, at last. Looking a bit stunned, which was never a good sign. Carrying a tied bundle, and walking with... Heng Mu? Well, well. "How are you faring, Master Mu?"

"Better than yesterday," the merchant admitted, still moving stiffly. "Moving on?"

"It seems wise," Iroh said graciously.

"Be careful," Heng said seriously. "Sergeant Ying said those four we ran into were part of a larger gang. I don't know what the kingdom's coming to; there's never been bandits on these roads before."

"Lee told me," Iroh nodded. "We will be wary."

"That's good." Heng winked at his nephew's bundle. "Don't want you to have to use that all in one place."

Iroh raised a curious brow.

"Dyes, spices - and medicines, though that's more Nuan's specialty than mine," Heng said, smiling. "It's not much, but I hope it'll help keep you on your feet until Lee can find a teacher."

Ah. No wonder his nephew was in shock. "You are very kind," Iroh bowed.

"Thanks," Zuko got out, still dazed with disbelief.

"You two make my head hurt," Heng said honestly. "But I hope you find what you're looking for." He brightened. "And maybe the war will be over soon. They say the Avatar has returned!"

...And the morning was going so well, Iroh lamented.

"So I've heard," Zuko ground out.

Heng took a step back. "I don't understand. It's good news. The best we've had in a century. Why...?" One hand waved, helpless.

Why, indeed. Iroh racked his brain, trying to come up with something.

"The Avatar's supposed to keep a balance between the four nations," Zuko said, low and cold and angry. "Airbenders in the Nomads. Firebenders in the Fire Nation. Earthbenders in the Earth Kingdom. Waterbenders in the Water Tribes." The searing gaze swept them both. "What happens when someone's born who doesn't fit?"

Heng started to speak, and stopped. Shook his head, green eyes wide. "I don't know."

"An interesting argument, nephew," Iroh said quietly a few minutes later, as they made their way out of town. "I must admit, I did not think you would be interested in adding to our story." And he'd sounded perfectly sincere when he said it. Which was odd. Zuko was a horrible liar.

"I was thinking about the airbenders." Zuko kept his gaze straight ahead, flicking a glance toward the little travelers' shrine some way down the road. "If someone like that was born into the Fire Nation...."

"Yes?" Iroh asked cautiously.

"What would we do, Uncle? They'd be our people. Fire Nation. I don't care what the spirits say!" Fists clenched, but there was no trace of flames. "What kind of balance would take people away from their homes? From the people they care about?"

"You do not know the Avatar would do any such thing, nephew," Iroh said firmly.

"Do you know he wouldn't? Does anybody know?" Zuko's eyes narrowed. "The Avatar keeps the four elements balanced. The Avatar keeps the four nations separate. People whose grandparents were Earth Kingdom are in the Fire Nation now! What happens to them, Uncle? What happens to my people, if the Avatar returns?"

"...I do not know," Iroh admitted at last. "I am glad you spoke of this, nephew. I will think on the question." He frowned, troubled. "I will think on it, very carefully." He nodded toward the shrine off the side of the road, little statues under a rough-hewn alcove of rock to keep rain off inked strips of paper. "Perhaps a few moments to pray?"

Zuko's jaw tightened, and Iroh braced for the explosion-

"Why not."

Er, what?

Iroh kept his smile mild and thoughtful as he made bows to those honored in the shrine, no matter how startled he felt. To draw attention to his nephew's behavior would be to force Zuko to justify it. And if it did not fit the mold of a loyal exile bent on capturing the Avatar - well. His nephew's reaction would not be helpful.

For every step forward, a step back, it seems, Iroh thought ruefully. He does not try to be contrary, I think. Only stubborn. Push, and he pushes back. Pull, and he fights to escape-

There, tucked into a crevice in the rock. A rough circle of blue stone, carved so its shadows suggested yin and yang.

Tui and La. Moon and Ocean. Push and Pull.

Do you remember us, Yue? We tried to help, and we failed - and perhaps we have no right to ask your aid now. But you of all spirits should remember what it is to be human, and to love your people.

I can fight Zuko's love for his father. I will fight it. He is fighting it, though he does not yet know he does. Every moment he leaves his quest to help another, every time he struggles to think instead of chase after his honor - he is fighting, Yue. He is fighting so hard.

I can fight Ozai's hold. But how can I fight his love for his people? We are what we are; the royal blood of the Fire Nation. As you were, of the Northern Water Tribe. Those within our nation's borders are in our care, no matter what element they were born to.

My nephew has been betrayed too deeply, and too well. He cannot trust the Avatar will be merciful. And I know too much of spirits to believe all will be well. Zuko may be right. The Fire Nation has taken so much from the world. The balance may require that we give it back. Even if it breaks our hearts.

But if there is any way... if there is any way... help us, Yue. Help us see a way to help our people.

Help us, or I go no further. I will not betray my nephew for the Avatar.

Not the most reverent end to a prayer, perhaps. But there came a time when a man simply had to say, enough.

He had lost his father, his wife, his son. He had lost brother and niece as well, though they yet lived. If the spirits' balance required Zuko as well - no. No. Not while he yet breathed. Not while one scrap of his soul even existed-

Rough stone glimmered with blue.

So. Iroh sighed, straightening. I have been heard. What the answer may be, though- He blinked, and looked again. "Prince Zuko!"

"It's information, Uncle." Zuko's face was set, as he tucked the prayer-slip he'd been reading back into place. "We can't ask too many questions without risking our disguise. There are bandits around here. I want to know what else people have met on this road. Or think they might." Zuko brushed off his hands. "If they wanted the prayers to be private, they would have burned them."

In the Fire Nation that would have been true, yes, but - ah, never mind. "What did you find?"

"No plagues. A few rock-falls; we should keep an eye on overhangs. And somebody has a vicious sense of humor." Zuko glanced at a slip near the last he'd put back.

Brows up and interested, Iroh dipped his head to read. Hmm, some kind of malediction on Red Ling, a plea to set two evils against each other....

Reading the last lines, he took a deliberate step back, and turned away. "We should go."

Perhaps they could move fast enough. Perhaps they did not fit the spirits' requirements. Good as they both were, they were hardly a long-range Fire Nation raiding party-

And three hours down the road, he knew it didn't matter.

"I hear you killed two of my men...."

By the time Sergeant Ying and his men got to the ambush site, the bodies had almost stopped smoldering.

"Spirits," someone muttered. "Fire Nation? Here?"

"Look for a trail," the sergeant ordered. Oma and Shu, so many dead. "That many firebenders should have left tracks."

The men looked dubious, and who could blame them? But they split off, two pairs of two, leading their mounts as they looked for the characteristic scuffs of armored feet.

Sergeant Ying stayed behind with old Gui, watching the elderly veteran walk among the bodies. And cursed the war. Gui ought to be carving wooden necklace chains for grandchildren, not keeping up with the young men and wounded veterans who made up most of the home guard. "Let's not take more time than we need," Ying said aloud. "I hear raiding parties don't stick around after a slaughter like this, but I don't want to risk our being outnumbered...." A scrap of cloth caught his eye, seared and crumbling, but one edge still blatantly scarlet.

A red bandanna. A group of armed men, their weapons now twisted metal. Mismatched arms; this was no army patrol.

"Red Ling's gang," Gui said with grim satisfaction. Nodded toward one of the blackened skulls. "I recognize the teeth on that one."

The teeth of a man who'd tried to take advantage of Gui's widowed daughter, before the veteran had driven him off with a sword and a bluff. Gui had wasted no time afterward, either, bringing the shattered family into town to work in the inn, before joining up with the guard himself. Bringing decades of experience... and a grudge. Ying could put up with the one, for the sake of the other.

Red Ling's men. Well. That was one piece of good luck for the day, then.

A drift of wind blew corpse smoke over them, and Sergeant Ying fought to breathe. "I've never have you seen anything like this before?"

"I have," Gui said gravely. "At the siege of Ba Sing Se." He stepped back from the bodies, and motioned Ying to join him. "I think they were standing... here."

Ying moved there, and frowned. "That doesn't make sense. Why come so close?" Red Ling's body was barely ten yards away. Why come within range of firebenders when he had archers among his men?

"Do I look like a fortune-teller?" Gui hmped. "The scorch marks make a pattern. Put that together with the bodies, and those," he waved a hand, indicating Red Ling and a sweep of five men about him, "went down in one blow."

"One blow?"

"Hmm. A mass fireball, it looks like. Not something most common firebenders learn."

"One blow?" the sergeant repeated, incredulous. Six men dead, in one fireblast?

"They're grouped together, Sergeant. Which means they had no chance to run. Yes, I think so." Gui shaded his eyes, looking up at surrounding cliff walls. "Ah. There are the archers." A snort. "I should say, were."

Seared wood, scattered in pieces down the slopes. Each bow had been seared through as if cut by a flaming knife. Ying measured the distance with his eyes, and swore.

A firebender's fire died, the further it got from him, the Army always said. Get far enough away, and you'd be safe.

"That's over a hundred feet! No firebender can do that-"

"No common soldier, no," Gui said dryly. Frowned, old eyes sweeping the scene. "Only imperial firebenders are that precise."

For a moment, Sergeant Ying devoutly hoped rumor was right, and Fire Nation raiders did strike and move on. Because he desperately wanted men capable of doing this to be anywhere but here.

"One blast while they still had surprise," Gui said thoughtfully. "Archers next. And then... hmm. They separated, to take out the stragglers; there, and there." He shook his head. "It was probably over before most of them knew they were dead."

Chilling thought. As was what he wasn't finding on the ground. "Why aren't there tracks?" Ying demanded. "If a troop went through here, they should have left some sign."

"Oh, this wasn't a troop," Gui shrugged.

The sergeant eyed him, taken aback. "More? Spirits, if we're outnumbered, warn a man!"

"No, not more." Gui smiled darkly. "Four, I'd guess."

"Four?" Ying sputtered. "Four firebenders did this?"

"Or less," Gui agreed. "Feel any better?"

"No," Sergeant Ying gritted out. Raised an eyebrow, as his scouts came wandering back. "What did you find?"

"Nothing, sir," Chen, the oldest of the four said uneasily. "No boot prints, no komodo-rhino tracks, no scorch marks where somebody blew off steam. It's like they just... disappeared."

Like spirits, Ying could hear in the silence.

Well. If no one else was going to say it, he certainly wasn't. "Let's get back," he said frankly. "We've got a report to make."

A/N: On why I decided Zuko has experience in lethal self-defense.... First, "The Blue Spirit". Even vastly outnumbered, Zuko never hesitates. Second... one thing that's struck me about the series is that compared to several firebenders (hi there Zhao, Aang), Zuko is careful with his fire. Hell on meditation candles, yes, but he doesn't set things on fire by accident. Even when he fights Katara as the last thing in his way at the Spirit Oasis, he does not burn her. In fact, if you look at the havoc the Gaang has caused throughout the series, Zuko's a lot more careful than a lot of benders. ("The Earth King." Whoof.)

And in real life, "careful" is what you see from martial artists who know they can really hurt someone.

Given Zuko often needs to be hit over the head with the obvious, and was exiled outside the Fire Nation (to areas where, surprise! People don't like firebenders), the odds of him having gotten into a deadly fight are depressingly high.

Top that off with his uncle being General Iroh, whom the Avatar creators avow was "very good at what he did". Zuko is a crown prince of the Fire Nation, specifically trained to rule and conquer more of the world. He may hate killing. He may go to great lengths to avoid it. But he's definitely been trained that it is an acceptable option.

He's not Aang.

Reverence for life is fine, upstanding, and idealistic. But when all's said and done, count which nations are still standing.

(Though, Gyatso? Wow.)

Chapter End Notes

Notes by me: Soo, this was a very long delay. Sorry for that, I couldn't get access to my computer for a few days. I hope I will be able to post regularly from now on.

Something else: Read Vatharas notes!! They give a lot of insight how the story developed, and is also very interesting. Have fun. Oh and also, the usual disclaimer, which I won't write down in every single chapter, since it applies to the whole story.

Chapter 7

Chapter Notes

Disclaimer: Like usual

PS: If it isn't clear, the A/N notes which you find usually at the end of the chapter are Vatharas. I just include them as notes.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Baths are good, Zuko thought wearily, sneaking from the tavern's bathhouse in through the kitchen's back door, silently dancing through the blind spots of the preoccupied cook at the stove and her harried sons as they scurried in and out with food and dishes. Uncle might have found a fellow Pai Sho enthusiast in the bartender, but Zuko still preferred not to use the front door. No sense asking for attention.

No sense at all, given the bartender apparently wasn't just a bartender.

Order of the White Lotus. What on earth is that? And Uncle's a Grand Master? What the hell's going on?

Out of the kitchen, through the common room's shadows, and up the stairs. They actually had a room, for once, even if it wasn't much more than a glorified closet with a cot and a window. And how Uncle had pulled that off, he really didn't want to know.

He should want to know. He should be down there kicking in the bartender's door, or at least leaning on it, listening in to Uncle's conversation.

But he was tired. And sick, in a way fire couldn't heal.

Door closed behind him, Zuko curled up near the window, breathing in spring's night air. Baths were good. Clean hair. Clean skin. Clean clothes - though half of them were borrowed, and he was wearing a too-familiar embroidered robe over them all to hold in as much of the bath's heat as he could manage.

Too bad a bath couldn't do anything for his mind.

No witnesses.

Eleven bandits, snuffed out like candle flames.

Candles I could light again.

Tactically, he knew Uncle was right. There had been too many to take them with just bare hands and steel. And once they started bending....

Once they started, they couldn't leave anyone alive.

If we're discovered, we're dead.

And they hadn't been good people. To put it mildly. He still felt sick.

I don't want to die. I don't want Uncle to die. Zuko dug fingers into his scalp, nails biting even through hair. So get a grip and deal with it already!

It didn't feel right. Nothing felt right.

Letting go, he stared at his fingertips, and wondered when his own hands had betrayed him.

Still strong, despite everything they'd been through. Still callused with years of stubborn blade-work and firebending katas. But other marks were starting to appear. Red-rubbed skin, where Asahi's reins tugged against him. Nails rough-trimmed almost to the quick, after hunger had left them prone to tearing. Thin white scars on the back of his left hand; he thought they were from that ill-fated attempt to drag the Avatar through the blizzard. But he wasn't sure.

It scared him, that he wasn't sure.

You had him, Zuzu, Azula's voice crooned in his mind. You had him, and you were just too weak to hold him.

At the fortress. At the North Pole. In the desert-

No, Zuko told himself, remembering fear and panic and rage as charred flesh knit back together under his fingers. Not that time.

Three master benders and an idiot with a boomerang against him. On his side, an injured man. And the sure knowledge of a returning enemy.

Loyalty to the Fire Lord-

Did not require suicide. It never had. Soldiers might choose to fight to the death; he'd heard what other nations did to captured firebenders, and it was the stuff of nightmares. But loyalty meant living for your lord, not dying for him. He was alive, and Uncle was alive, and they'd have another chance. Just as Iroh's soldiers had, after he'd broken the siege of Ba Sing Se.

He wasn't a traitor, Azula. He wasn't a coward. Did you read the casualty reports? It wasn't just Lu Ten. Those earthbenders made the terrain inside the wall a deathtrap. We can't afford losses like that. Not if we want to hold the rest of our territory in any kind of good order.

If we take land, it's ours. If people live there under our laws, they're our people. If we can't give them something better than the war, what's the point?

But it was the Fire Lord's war.

It's - it's not my problem. I have my orders. Capture the Avatar. Alive.

Azula said their father didn't care anymore-

Azula always lies!

Breathe. Fold fingers into fists. Unclench them. The Avatar was gone, and Uncle was alive, and he was not a traitor. He just - had to think. About what to do next.

Scars and wear and callus, and the weird tickling of hair against his ears. Why couldn't he think?

Someone knocked on the door, brisk but quiet. "Hello?" A fumbling at the latch. "I'm looking for Lee? Your uncle said you could help."

Act normal, Zuko told himself, standing to reach the door.

...Would help if I had any idea what normal is.

He braced himself and opened the door. "I'm Lee," he managed. "What's the-"

Green. A kind of nice, darker forest green, bordered by pale yellow like a shaft of sun through shadows. Only if the frogs closing her dress were there, then the soft roundness he was looking at was-

Flushing, Zuko jerked his eyes up to meet a blue gaze. "Where are you from, Kyoshi Island?"

Almost a head taller and at least a few years older, she looked down and back, her own jaw dropping as expressions flitted across her face. Annoyance, surprise, sudden shock....

Zuko stared right back, fingers curling. Don't you. Dare. Pity me. "What's the problem?" he said roughly. "Is someone hurt?"

"I'm Xiu," she said, eyes narrowed slightly in consideration. "My Grandma has an awful headache. Your uncle said you'd help." She backed up a step, and crossed her arms. "He didn't say you were raised by raven-wolves."

"I was not!"

"And you're half right. Dad was from Kyoshi Island. Left to join the military over here; no way was he wearing a dress. He just never went back."

Zuko blinked, struck by the memory of a Southern Tribe wolf-tail above red and white makeup. It'd been pretty funny, afterward. Once he'd gotten over being slammed into the wall by the Avatar's fans. "Why are you telling me this?"

"You remind me of my cousin, Yingpei," Xiu said ruefully. "He's lousy with people, too. And when he's surprised - well. It's not pretty." She tilted her head. "Coming?"

This was so many different kinds of wrong, it made his head hurt. Just get through it. "I need to get our teapot-"

"We've got hot water downstairs." She gave him a hint of a smile. "That's what your uncle said you like to work with, right?"

"Y-yeah." The floor was solid. He could feel it under his feet. Why did he have the same kind of knot in his gut as when the ship was about to fall into the trough of a rogue wave?

Just keep moving.

No candles lit the room the old woman rested in, though a basin of water sat on a warming pan of coals near a worn towel. She looked up when they opened the door, brown eyes slitted. "So you're a healer, young man?"

Just inside the doorway, Zuko froze.

I'm not a healer. I'm a firebender.

I'm not Earth Kingdom. I'm not a waterbender. If Uncle didn't need this for our disguise....

I'm your enemy! Can't you see that? You don't want me here!

"He's not real great at talking, Grandma." Xiu shut the door, forcing him forward. "Go on, it's all right."

No. It wasn't. But-

Do what you have to.

Grimly, Zuko picked up worn cloth, and reached for hot water.

I think he thinks Grandma is going to eat him, Xiu thought wryly. Not quite like Yingpei, then. Her cousin didn't usually know someone had ill intent until they stole his lunch out from under him. Lee seemed perfectly aware that Grandma was best handled with kid gloves, or possibly iron pincers. She was proud enough of her status as a fine silk weaver at the best of times; headaches made her downright cranky.

Leaning against the wall by the door, the younger weaver watched Lee work with interest. Outside of ports that the Water Tribes visited, how often did anyone get to see a bending healer?

No one told me there were pretty colors.

Flickers of gold and green and violet, shimmering through cotton as Lee moved the steaming towel over Grandma's forehead. Like stories her father had told of the southern lights, dancing in Kyoshi Island's winter skies.

How did he know where Dad was from? Xiu wondered. Kyoshi's been neutral since the war started. Most people have never met an Islander.

A puzzle. And not the only one. Lee - well, from his height, she'd have guessed he was fourteen, tops.

Then again, maybe short just runs in the family. His uncle's pretty... compact.

Must be. Lee certainly didn't act fourteen, and once you looked past the scar, he didn't look fourteen either.

Once you looked past the scar....

I'm an idiot. Burn scar - looks years old - and he's with his uncle? No parents?

War orphan. Had to be. Spirits, no wonder Lee was jumpy.

And no wonder he didn't know what to do with his eyes, either. If he was the late teens his voice gave away, he would have been burned just about the time he'd started figuring out girls just might like to go on walks in the moonlight. Ouch.

Still. Some things about Lee just didn't fit.

That robe, for one.

Pine-dark, embroidered with old-fashioned fire-thorns in ruby-rust on every hem and seam. Not the expensive, flashy materials someone would use trying to impress; she was a master weaver, she knew what was in style. No; that was old-fashioned wild silk thread, spun from broken oak-cedar moth cocoons and dyed with cochineal-dew roasted with sea salt.

Earth and Air, Water and Fire. Someone was serious.

Mushi wearing a protective scarf was one thing; he was old as Grandma, probably, the kind of person who adhered to traditions because they suited him. Both of them? Either respect for the spirits ran in the family-

Somehow, that just doesn't seem to fit Lee.

-Or they'd run into the same kind of trouble as the villagers near Hei Bai, after the Fire Nation burned the forest down. Angry spirits, who didn't care if the people they hurt were innocent. Which was... scary.

Kind of makes sense for him to be panicked, though. Great-Gran used to say, benders touch the spirit world to get their power. And it can touch them back.

Even that didn't sit right. There was just something about Lee that-

Pale hands shifted as he plunged cloth back into steaming water, and Xiu swallowed.

"What?" Lee asked roughly, glancing her way.

"I thought the dao were your uncle's," Xiu said honestly. She hadn't had much chance to look inside their room, but it wasn't much of a room. "They're yours, aren't they?"

Lee looked down at callused hands, and something shut down in his face. "The roads aren't safe."

Which was no answer at all, and more than she wanted to know.

I've seen Dad look like that, after....

After he had to kill somebody.

Cool and calm, Xiu. Remember what Dad always says. Be like a mountain lake. If you're right - Lee's already jumpy. Don't make anything worse.

"No wonder you're such a confused young man," Grandma said sternly, squinting to test the absence of pain as Lee put the towel down. "A healer, learning steel? What is the world coming to?"

The door creaked slightly. "And why should one not?" Mushi said genially. "The waterbenders of the North Pole are some of the fiercest fighters anywhere. I have heard they recently turned back an assault by the Fire Navy."

"I heard they had help," Lee said darkly.

"Hmm. A giant spirit-monster rampaging through the fleet," Mushi's hand made a sort of swimming motion, "would count, yes."

"Spirit-monster?" Grandma said skeptically. "Nonsense. The spirits haven't bothered with our world in over a century. They've abandoned us." She scowled. "Just like the Avatar."

"...He didn't abandon you."

"Lee," Mushi said quietly.

"It's wrong, Uncle! The Avatar has to save us. The Avatar abandoned us. The Avatar's returned, and he's going to fix everything. 'That's all I hear, everywhere we go. And it's crazy! The Avatar is twelve years old!'"

He's... what? Xiu thought, stunned.

"The Avatar is a child! An idiotic, naïve, hyperactive little airbender who thinks everybody deserves to live! And people think he's going to save them? How? Ask the Fire Lord to think really, really hard about the war and decide to play nice?" Knuckles were bone-white in clenched fists. "You want somebody to save you from the Fire Nation? Grow up and do it yourselves!"

The door slamming was almost an afterthought.

Mushi blinked at the space where his nephew had been, and sighed. "I must apologize-"

"Indeed you must!" Grandma snapped, eyes glinting. "You're training that boy as a healer? He may be a bender, but he'll never do!"

"I'd go to him," Xiu cut in, before her grandma could really get going. Respect for your elders was honorable and right, but it was also the reason Dad had left Kyoshi Island in the first place. And the reason she'd been stuck with Grandma on the trip back home, when Mom had decided to stay to help nurse Aunt Wen through the latest bout of fever. Thanks, Mom. You owe me. Big-time. "I like to hear the truth. Even if he is as blunt as a dropped ax." She stood straight, and gave Mushi a sober look. "It is true, isn't it?"

Mushi hesitated. "I might leave out idiotic...."

"Oh, boy," Xiu said faintly.

"My nephew spoke nothing but the truth," Mushi agreed soberly. "We have encountered the Avatar on our travels, and while he is a master airbender, he has no wish to take a life. If people are hoping for a great warrior to stop the Fire Nation's advance, they are mistaken." He bowed to Grandma. "If you will excuse me...."

"Good riddance," Grandma sniffed.

Xiu sighed, already considering what she'd have to do to clean up, given Grandma's fading eyesight. Towel, water, coin purse - oh no. "Grandma! Did you pay him?"

Grandma straightened, obviously feeling well enough to act her stature. "We are silk weavers, Xiu. If a rag-tag tramp of a water-blooded peasant doesn't have enough sense to hold his tongue when- What are you doing?"

It's dark in here. She probably didn't even see the scar. Much less... ooo, respect be damned! "He was bending, Grandma. He's hungry." Snatching clinking strings from the purse, she dashed out.

Light was flickering under their door; they must have had the window open, though Xiu couldn't feel any draft. She couldn't make out what they were saying, either, but she didn't have to. Older sane relative trying to talk sense into a sullen teen was easy to pick out. She knocked. "Lee? You forgot something."

The door inched open, and Lee swallowed. "I'm - sorry?"

"Don't worry about it," Xiu said bluntly. "Grandma can't stand Yingpei, either." She looked at him askance. "I know your uncle's already given you an earful on this, but listen. If you're good, and I'm betting you are going to be good, you're going to have to deal with a lot of people like Grandma. This isn't like the border towns, or whatever little port you came from. This is the heart of the Earth Kingdom. I hate to say it, but a lot of our nobles and artisans think acting like that is a good reason to cheat you." She pressed the coins into his hands. "Don't let them."

He stared at her as if she were as weird as the Earth King's bear. "But... why?"

"Dad was from Kyoshi Island, remember?" Xiu smiled wryly. "I've seen it all before. He always said, noble blood might be a gift from the spirits, but noble behavior is a gift you give your family. And yourself." She backed up a step, and grinned. "Besides, you kind of did me a favor. Grandma's going to be so mad about you, all 'improper behavior' and 'what is this world coming to', she's not going to even think about pestering me to 'stop pining after that no-good soldier boy and settle down with a nice rich young man'. As if. Rich men's wives don't get to weave the way I do." She winked at him.

"Um... you're welcome?"

"Xiu!" rang down the hall.

"Good luck, Lee!" Still grinning, she dashed off.

One nag-free night, coming up. Yay!

"I must give my compliments to Master Xueyou's wife," Iroh said, leaning back on his cot as he rubbed a bit of candle-wax between his fingers. "That was delicious!"

"You can probably tell her in the morning. If you catch her early enough." Zuko's eyes were closed, but he lay tense on the futon below, obviously awake despite the darkness.

"Early?" Iroh arched an eyebrow. Firebenders rose with the sun, true, but given the chance, most people slept later.

"Bread with dinner. Made this morning. She's probably up hours before dawn."

"Ah, yes." Iroh smiled. "I forget, sometimes, how often you found the ship's ghost watch convenient, to be... unobserved."

"Not as easy as you'd think," Zuko said quietly. "Bakers, millers, brewers... smiths, sometimes... all kinds of people get up in the dark." He shifted on the futon. "Where are we going?"

"Full Moon Bay, eventually," Iroh answered, allowing the conversation to shift. One of these days he would pin Zuko down about the Blue Spirit. But not tonight. "We will make a stop shortly beforehand, to pick up some... documentation."

"False documents."

"But very good forgeries, I am assured," Iroh said cheerfully. "From there, we should be able to reach Ba Sing Se unhindered. The city is vast, and full of refugees. We should pass unnoticed."

"You mean hide." But it wasn't accusing. Just... tired.

"Yes," Iroh acknowledged. "We are tired, nephew. We need rest, and time to breathe, before we plan our next move." And I intend to stretch that time as long as possible.

"We have a bounty on our heads, Uncle! Hiding's no good if someone knows where you are!"

But no one would- oh. He had not explained, had he? "Master Xueyou does not know who we are," Iroh said firmly. "He recognized the moves, and certain words. But the only name he knows, is Mushi."

Zuko's hand lifted, hesitated near his face. "I'm not exactly easy to miss, Uncle. If Azula finds this place-"

"Then it is well that Xueyou knows my nephew is a waterbender, is it not?" Iroh said pleasantly.

"...You set up that thing with Xiu's Grandma on purpose."

"It was convenient," the retired general allowed. "Two leaves in the forest, nephew. I rely on your courage, and determination."

"You do?"

Spirits, the surprise in his nephew's voice. And - was that a hint of hope? Toph was right. I do need to tell him I need him. "I have always relied on you to do what you believed was right, nephew."

Gold eyes glanced at him, then away. "Why did she do that?"

"Because Xiu has her own honor," Iroh said plainly. "Get some rest, nephew. If we move too slowly in the morning, I fear we are destined to meet that most unpleasant woman again. And some destinies are best avoided."

With a snort of laughter, Zuko pulled the covers over his head.

Smiling himself, Iroh turned the bit of wax over again, recalling Zuko's stricken look as the candle flared in the wake of their argument. I know I can rely on you, nephew. But I think, wherever we hide, we will need shutters.

Small enough price to pay, for that glimmer of hope on Zuko's face.

That was the boy I knew, years ago. The one I thought I had lost with Lady Ursa.

How very odd, that speaking of the Avatar should bring it so close to the surface....

No. Not the Avatar. That Aang is a child, expected to do the impossible.

Only for the Avatar it was possible. Or so legends said. Even the boy himself seemed to think so.

Still. Why should that strike home with his nephew, who truly did have an impossible task...?

Oh, spirits.

His Zuko. His dear, shy nephew, who worked so hard and loved them all so fiercely, years ago. Who failed so often, but struggled onward, because he had hope.

He never believed it was impossible.

Iroh let out a quiet breath, resisting the urge to pound his head against the wall. Zuko needed his sleep.

Yet another true proverb: there is no fool like an old fool.

All this time - all this time! - he had thought Zuko's quest driven by pure, stubborn determination.

A burning need to take the cruel fate, the punishment, that had been unjustly laid on him, and force it down Ozai's throat.

I was wrong. It was never about rage.

Not rage as most knew it, at least. Not the bitter anger driven by hate. No; this was a brighter, purer flame, and all the more desperate for it.

He loves his father. And so the task must not be impossible.

And if he fails, again and again... it is not because it cannot be done. It is because he is as Ozai has always told him he is. A disappointment. A failure. No true son of the Fire Lord.

Not a punishment; not to his nephew. A gift. A poisonous, terrible gift, that Zuko had taken to his heart. For it was a gift from his father, and what else could he do?

Spirits. What do I do?

Sleep, Iroh decided sternly. You were wrong. Know you were wrong. What you told Zuko is still true: you are both tired. Rest, and see if a better answer presents itself.

And hope the spirits have no more bandits between here and Ba Sing Se.

"You're twitching," Zuko said dryly, leading Asahi down the dusty road.

Uncle Iroh blinked at him, almost innocent. "Oh? And why would two innocent traveling healers need to be alarmed, Lee?"

Right. Like he needed any extra reminders to watch his tongue, out here where anyone might be listening. Every once in a while they passed other travelers; sometimes a few weary stragglers, sometimes whole caravans.

For a hidden bay the Fire Nation's not supposed to know about, this place is awfully popular.

"You're twitching," Zuko repeated, letting his gaze flick over road, rocks, trees. "Just wait. Whatever it is, it'll get us later. When you're not expecting it."

"It has been remarkably quiet these past few days," Uncle grumbled.

"Like I said. Wait."

It had been quiet. Quiet enough, long enough, that all his screaming nerves had pretty much screamed themselves out, and were now quivering in exhausted knots while Zuko held his breath in anticipation of the next disaster.

At least I've got the teapot bluff down.

He'd had one or two false starts in the past few days, complete with nervous looks at the little firepot that seemed to flare contrary to breezes or fuel. But he'd persisted, and slowly, things seemed to fall into place. Using hot water was still hard... but it was a good hard, like a tough practice, or climbing down rough cliffs. He could handle it. Unlike Uncle, who was all but tearing gray hair out trying to get candle flames to flux into the healing fire, those few times they could practice unobserved.

He'll get it. We just need some time.

They'd have time, if Uncle was right about Ba Sing Se. And yet....

It's too easy.

Someplace they could hide. Someplace they'd be safe. Someplace no one from the Fire Nation had ever, supposedly, been able to invade - so obviously, anyone who made it inside couldn't be Fire Nation, and no one would suspect them.

Perfect. Too perfect.

It's a trap.

He didn't know how. Not yet. But he hadn't survived thirteen years in the palace and more than three scouring the world without listening to his instincts. They might be flawed and tattered and singing tension down his nerves whenever a stray lizard-bird twitched wrong, but they'd kept him alive.

Perfect and pretty equaled poison. White jade. Flutter-hornets. Azula.

But Uncle thinks it's safe.

No. Uncle hoped it was safe. He might have intelligence and reports and secret society contacts, but he'd never been there. And while Zuko knew his grasp of military strategy paled next to Azula's, he knew this: a good commander never, ever declared an area safe. Not until he'd ground-truthed it himself.

He's counting on me.

Okay. He could deal with that. Stay calm, stay back; let Uncle be the friendly face while he watched for the jaws of the trap. Then, depending on the situation, either tell Iroh what he'd found-

And hope he listens - no, he promised he would. He promised.

-Or, if everything had just dropped into Koh's lair in a hand-basket, grab Uncle and run.

Decision made, Zuko breathed a sigh of relief, murmuring endearments to Asahi when she turned her head to look at him. He had a plan. Not much of a plan, but given what usually happened to his plans....

Yu Yan archers. Typhoons. Ocean-spirits. Azula.

Given that, he'd just have to keep his eyes open and be ready to improvise.

Speaking of. "Someone thinks they're being sneaky," Zuko murmured, not looking where the brush was rustling.

"I see." Iroh smiled, gentle as a komodo-rhino about to take down an annoying little gate. "I believe we should allow him to think us fooled. For now."

Harmless travelers. Right. Damn.

Turning off the open road to reach the oddly tree-shaped rock Iroh's source had described, the retired general stopped, and cleared his throat. "Hello?"

"No names!" Shorter than Earth Kingdom average, and not at all skinny, the man who slunk out of the bushes still reminded Zuko of a weasel-mink. Without the pretty coat. "No names, I don't know you, you don't know me, I was never here- urk!"

Casually gripping the man's wrist, Zuko held him while Iroh checked the little documents their nameless contact had pressed into his hands. "They appear to be in order," Uncle said calmly.

"Of course they're in order! You don't think I'd risk my life - er, your lives - with bad papers, do you? You've got what you were promised! Let go!"

"Who are you afraid of?" Zuko asked darkly.

"Afraid? Me? Do I look afraid? Ha!" The man yanked against his grip, and blanched. "Son of a hog-monkey- er, I mean, you can let go anytime-"

"Who'd trace fake papers back to you?" Zuko said, voice low and dangerous. "Tell me!"

"N-no one! I swear!" He yanked harder, and yelped.

"You are, perhaps, unaware of the consequences of that particular hold, Master Nameless," Iroh observed thoughtfully. "Another such unwise move is likely to fracture your wrist. Which would do much damage to one of your more... lucrative sources of income."

Sweating, the forger gulped.

"Now. So that we may all avoid unpleasantness, and leave you to enrich yourself further - who is it, that you fear more than simple refugees longing for a better life?"

"The - the Dai Li," the forger stuttered. "They work for the Earth King. Or so people say. They don't leave Ba Sing Se, usually, but when they do... they're earthbenders. Cross them, and you just disappear. Or - worse."

"Worse?" Iroh asked levelly.

"I don't know. I don't know! People say - sometimes those they take, go away for a while. And when they come back, they're not them anymore. No one knows why. No one knows how! But it happens. And it's not going to happen to me!"

At Iroh's glance, Zuko let him go. "Thank you for the generous advice," Iroh said genially. "We wish you the best of fortune."

Straightening his robes, the forger sniffed. "You're going to need more than that. They don't let animals into Ba Sing Se. Not with refugees." With a last, irate glance toward Zuko, he scurried back down the road.

They don't.... Zuko swallowed hard, patting Asahi's neck when she bumped against him. "Uncle?"

Iroh sighed. "I have the name of a reputable caravan master, as well," he said plainly. "We should be able to find a representative of his near the ferries."

Oh.

Breathe. In and out. He hadn't been gutted by a sword blade. It just felt that way.

"I am sorry, nephew-"

"Let's go," Zuko said harshly, tugging on Asahi's reins. "We're wasting daylight."

He could make it to shore after he'd been blown out of his own ship. He could do this.

Besides, it wasn't like he'd had the right to expect anything else.

Silly Zuzu, Azula's voice crooned as he walked. You know nothing you love is yours to keep.

Chapter End Notes

A/N: We will see Asahi again, but it'll take several chapters.

And yes, the Star Wars reference in Chapter 6 was intentional. I couldn't resist.

Chapter 8

Chapter Notes

A/N: Nope, still don't own anything. Certainly not the dialogue from various episodes, as some of it pops up in here. (

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Never, in all my days, did I think I would be longing for a bandit attack, Iroh thought ruefully, leading their way aboard the ferry. Zuko was a silent shadow in his wake, face empty of everything but cold determination.

He'd seen that look before. Three years ago, after Zuko had read the terms of his banishment.

He did the right thing. He did the honorable thing. And again, all he has for it is loss. Iroh tried to keep his face pleasant, even as his heart ached. Zuko was forbidding enough for the both of them. And this time, I am the one who has dealt the blow.

Never mind that he had not laid a finger on his nephew. Wounds to the heart went far deeper than mere scars.

I wish he would yell at me. Spirits, I wish he would set something on fire.

Nothing. Only terse replies when he must, and silence whenever it was possible. Like a warrior with his death-wound, holding his peace so his comrades would not break and die.

There is nothing I can do, Iroh decided, heart heavy. Not here. Not now.

Well... nothing serious. But then, perhaps serious was not what his nephew needed.

Grinning to himself, Iroh plotted.

That, has to be the most ridiculous hat this side of the Western Sea, Zuko thought blankly. A lone, rough-edged thought, crashing through the numbness of where's the next attack and she's gone, it's not fair, it's never fair. He would have been just as happy if it crashed right back out again, and left him numb and bleeding.

But this was Uncle. Uncle doing something that looked completely, utterly insane. Which meant it was time to duck. Or at least start distracting like hell.

I am in no shape for this.

Didn't matter. He had to try. "Look around," Zuko managed roughly. "We're not tourists." Desperate to shut down the conversation, he raised the wooden bowl of supposed lunch to his lips-

Sniffed, fingers feeling the lukewarm heat from the brown liquid, and abruptly dumped the whole bowl over the side.

"Lee," Uncle sighed.

"I'm not spending the next week chained to a latrine," Zuko growled.

Uncle Iroh blinked then, and sniffed his own bowl. "I admit it is not pleasant...."

"It's - not the smell." Reluctantly, Zuko curled his fingers over the rim of Iroh's bowl, feeling the faint warmth above the liquid. "Something in it doesn't feel right."

With a thoughtful frown, Uncle tossed his own bowl over the railing.

"But - what-" Zuko managed.

"I have survived spoiled food before, during the war," Iroh said gravely. "Hunger is unpleasant, but not fatal. If something in the energy of that is amiss enough that you sensed it, I do not feel inclined to trust to luck."

"Huh," a low voice chuckled. "Knew the food was bad, but not that bad."

Zuko refused to flinch. He'd heard the trio of teenagers coming, but he'd hoped they'd just walk on by.

Like I'd be that lucky.

Armed teenagers. Joy. A thin, small one with red striping on pale cheeks, like a Kyoshi Warrior gone feral. A taller, silent boy with a bow. And in front, messy brown hair over sly brown eyes and a chewed stalk of dry grass....

Leader. With an attitude. Great. Just great.

"My name's Jet, and these are my freedom fighters, Smellerbee and Longshot."

Would-be guerillas. Even better. Meaning they probably knew what Fire Nation looked like. Or thought they did.

Let's hope they look for uniforms. Deliberately, Zuko looked over the lake.

"Hey," Smellerbee said.

Damn. Be polite. Keep the cover. "Hello," Zuko replied, not looking back.

"So... waterbender, huh?"

Calculating. Jet's voice was pure calculation, hidden under devilish charm. It raised all the hackles on Zuko's neck. "So?" he said coolly.

"Don't usually see that in the Earth Kingdom." Jet's voice was lazy and watchful. Waiting.

Damn it! They don't even think I'm a firebender, and we're already screwed-

"Yes, it was quite the surprise, when we discovered what was happening," Iroh stepped in smoothly. "We hear there are waterbenders in Ba Sing Se. With luck we will find one, so there will be no more... er, random mishaps."

"Did some damage, huh?" Jet smirked. "You sound like our kind of guy."

If you're into random damage, I'm not the guy you're looking for, Zuko thought, giving them a dark glance.

Either blind to the hint or deliberately ignoring it, Jet stepped closer. "Here's the deal. I hear the captain's eating like a king, while us refugees have to feed off his scraps. Doesn't seem fair, does it?"

Life's not fair, Zuko thought dryly. Armed, no adults with them, no one as sane as even Sokka in the bunch, and mad at the world. He definitely needed to put distance between himself and these idiots.

"What sort of king is he eating like?" Iroh wondered.

...Argh.

"The fat, happy kind," Jet said sardonically. "You want to help us liberate some food?"

Smug, charming, and knows how to find people's weak spots. Zuko stared over the lake, and nodded. "I'm in."

I want you where I can see you.

"I'm sorry, Uncle," Zuko said, voice low enough that none of their fellow passengers would hear him through the joyous laughter as Jet handed out food. "He thinks he knows something."

"And the best way to be certain he looks no deeper, is to allow him to think you are firmly in league with him," Iroh nodded. He'd noted the rebel's charisma as well; confined as they were with a ferry full of refugees who feared the Fire Nation, Zuko had every right to be wary. "Well. A meal was part of the passage price. We will be in the city soon, and able to shake him from our trail."

Longshot and Smellerbee neared, and he could say no more. Only smile, and grip his nephew's shoulder briefly.

We do what we must. But I am glad to see it bothers you.

And glad for a purely selfish reason, as well. His nephew's gaze had cleared, focused on the dangers of the present, rather than the pain he still suppressed. Apparently, furtive dealings did Zuko's spirits good.

Well, and why should they not? I know of many who specialize in covert missions. But has any other firebender ever infiltrated the North Pole?

Like healing, it was a dubious skill for a Fire Nation noble to claim. But unquestionably useful, so long as they remained fugitives.

I wonder. Is there any way he can put such skills to good use? Something I could encourage freely?

Something to think on, as he exchanged polite nods and dug into the bounty with his nephew and the two young rebels. A better meal than he'd had in some days, truth be told. Particularly once Zuko slipped a few tea sweets out of his sleeve when no one was watching. No longer graceful, outlines of maple leaves and cherry blossoms blurred by squishing, but still a lovely contrast to plain hot water. No tea, unfortunately. Well, one couldn't expect everything.

Food, drink... yes, we should have some conversation as well, Iroh decided. If only to keep Jet convinced waterbending was Lee's only secret. And in truth, he was curious. "So, Smellerbee. That's an unusual name for a young man."

"Maybe it's because I'm not a man. I'm a girl!" Obviously irritated, she stood and stalked off.

Oops. "Oh, now I see!" he called after her. "It's a beautiful name for a lovely young girl!"

Zuko's face didn't so much as twitch. Iroh wasn't sure if that was lack of surprise, unusual self-control, or simple teenage hunger overriding the brain to the point that his nephew wouldn't have cared if Smellerbee were a uniformed platypus-bear, so long as she didn't grab for his bowl.

Teenage firebender, Iroh reminded himself wryly, as the silent Longshot caught his young lady friend and didn't have a conversation. Hunger is most likely.

Drifting on the polar seas had been bad enough. Hunted as fugitives, only able to pause in one place long enough to gain meager supplies before prudence advised they move on... he could afford to lose the weight, but his nephew was too lean to be healthy.

Even if he were not bending, I think he may have grown an inch, Iroh thought ruefully. Late bloomers ran at least as strongly in Sozin's line as prodigies, but no one had ever convinced his brother of that. I had hoped he would take more after me than Ozai, but this is not the best timing.

Jet sat down with them, still caught up in the excitement of the crowd's adulation. "From what I heard, people eat like this every day in Ba Sing Se. I can't wait to set my eyes on that giant wall."

"It is a magnificent sight," Iroh agreed. And a terrifying one.

Jet raised a bushy brow. "So you've been there before?"

"Once," the retired general admitted. "When I was a different man." If events had been different, if he had been different....

If I had not been the Dragon of the West, would Zuko still be alive?

He doubted it. He very much doubted it. Zuko was stubborn and resilient and persevering, but the odds had been stacked too heavily against him for any young prince to survive. Much less succeed.

Now, if he could only convince Zuko of that.

"I've done some things in my past that I'm not proud of," Jet said in a low voice. "But that's why I'm going to Ba Sing Se, for a new beginning. A second chance."

"That's very noble of you," Iroh said thoughtfully. I think you even believe it. Whether or not the boy could hold to it - well. Theft from the captain was not a promising start. "I believe people can change their lives, if they want to." He looked at his nephew. "I believe in second chances."

Too late, he realized how Zuko might take that. Capturing the Avatar is not a second chance, nephew!

But he couldn't say it. Not with Jet studying them both.

"So what'd you do to a waterbender?" Zuko said levelly.

"What makes you think I've even met another waterbender?" Jet smirked.

Zuko gave him a hard, flat look.

Iroh recognized it. From mirrors. That was a general's look.

You're trying to look clever. I'm so impressed. Get your head out of your ass and start giving me straight answers before I feed you your insignia.

Of all the tricks of command he'd tried to teach his nephew, why did that one have to stick?

"Nothing you need to worry about," Jet said at last, not smiling. "She and her idiot brother and that kid.... You're more realistic than she'll ever be." He snorted. "Like the Fire Nation didn't do enough to the South Pole already. Maybe that's why they got away with it."

Iroh's eyes widened, and he couldn't help but glance at Zuko. Who had gone very, very still.

Katara.

It could be another waterbender. But Southern Tribe, with her brother? He doubted there was another bender left that far south, after the Sea Ravens had done their butcher's work.

If this young man had managed to draw that young lady's ire, he had a great deal to make up for, indeed.

Well. One could say as much for my nephew.

No, that was not fair. Prince Zuko's quest forced him to be at odds with the young waterbender, so long as she defended the Avatar. This young man, who claimed to fight for freedom - meaning, most likely, against the Fire Nation - what, exactly, could he have done?

Whatever it was, Zuko is right. We will be better off away from this boy.

Morning. No place to practice katas, not with so many people. But it was misty enough that Zuko could almost pretend to be alone, as he stood at the prow and practiced his breathing. In, and out. In. And out.

He'd lost breath control against Azula, that awful day she'd tried to lure him into chains with promises of Father's forgiveness. Lost his breath, lost his temper, lost the battle.

I'm not going to let that happen again.

He couldn't work on stance. Couldn't even run katas without fire, not with so many eyes. But he could breathe.

...Or he could, if one charismatic annoyance weren't trying to pad up behind him from his bad side.

You want people to trust you, but more than that, you want to be in charge. So you can't help twisting the knife, with little things you think people won't notice. And I bet most of them don't. I bet your little band thinks you're gold. I bet Katara liked you too, until you did something stupid.

Azula would eat you for lunch.

"You know, as soon as I saw your scar, I knew exactly who you were."

Oh, hell.

He'd kept his head when the Ocean Spirit had tried to drown him. He was not going to panic now.

A breath, and he glanced at Jet warily.

"You're an outcast, like me," Jet went on, standing beside him. "And us outcasts have to stick together. We have to watch each other's backs, because no one else will."

An offer, blatant as a dagger wrapped in silk.

Join up with me. Or don't, and leave me wondering why.

Damn it, Uncle and I never worked out what to do if someone wanted us around!

"Is there a healer on board?"

One of the crew, eyeing Jet's hook-swords narrowly as he kept a grip on a sweating refugee man.

Now what?

"Please!" the refugee blurted to the deck at large, littered with people still mostly asleep in the mist. "My wife - there's so much blood - is there anyone-?"

Jet forgotten, Zuko ran for his kit.

...I smell like blood.

Wearily, Zuko sat back away from his patient, as the husband hugged and kissed his still-pale wife with a flood of tears. "Make sure she gets all the water she wants to drink," he told the phlegmatic gray-haired aunt beside him. "Tea would be better. Boiled water. She got sick off that slop from yesterday. Wouldn't have mattered, if she hadn't been...." He groped at air, unable to find the right words.

"Torn up from the birth," the aunt nodded, cradling a small bundle of person that had slept through the whole thing. "Three weeks ago. I thought she was fine." She grimaced. "She swore she was fine."

"Fresh meat," Zuko went on tiredly. "Fish, if you're sure it's fresh. She's healed, but she needs to build her blood back up." He frowned. There was something he was forgetting, he knew it.

"Salt," Uncle Iroh said firmly, appearing in his field of vision. "Her blood is thin enough. Nursing the little one will make things worse, if she does not have enough." He smiled, and offered a steaming cup. "She's not the only one who could use some, it would seem."

"Mmph?" Zuko managed, half of it already downed. Sweet, with a little salt; where had Uncle gotten it?

"We've reached the docks." Iroh still smiled, but his eyes glanced toward the direction of the ramp. "And we appear to have drawn some attention."

...Damn.

"We're not from the Foggy Swamp!"

"Of course you're not, Mr. Lee," the customs lady said dryly, re-stamping their papers with enough red ink to make them bleed. "No one ever is."

City Guard Huojin watched the old gentleman - Mushi, if the info Amaya had gotten from certain contacts was right - whisper something into the furious teen's ear, and had to stifle a laugh. Given that sparkle of pure mischief in the genial face, that was probably go with it, Lee. Which wasn't at all what you'd expect from an Earth Kingdom refugee... but made far too much sense, given what they actually were.

Amaya's refugees always had a story to tell. These two looked to be more interesting than most.

Making his way over to the booth, he cleared his throat. "Is there a problem, Ma'am?"

"No, no problem," Mushi said swiftly, looking innocent as a pygmy puma kitten. "We were only distracted by such a rare loveliness." He turned back toward the official, smile charming as an antelope-fox. "May I just say that you're like a flower in bloom, your beauty intoxicating."

Mole over her eyebrow and all, she smiled. "You're pretty easy on the eyes yourself, handsome. Raorrr."

I'm going to die laughing. Right here, right now, Huojin snickered to himself, as the teen looked like he wanted to drop dead of pure mortification. No, keep it together, they're probably scared stiff under the bluff.

"But it doesn't get you out of the facts!" She jabbed the handle of her stamp Lee's way.

"Unlicensed healers cannot practice in Ba Sing Se! Waterbenders or not!"

Whoa, whoa - what? Huojin thought.

"She was bleeding to death!" Lee defended himself.

"And the ferry was not quite in Ba Sing Se," his older relative interposed smoothly. "Surely, now that we know the law-"

"Rules are rules! Rules maintain order. Like it or not, there has to be an investigation!"

"And hold up the line for how long?" Huojin pointed out. "Probably all day, if everyone on the ferry has to be questioned. That's an awful way to welcome good citizens trying to make a new life in our city. If they weren't docked, he didn't break the law."

She scowled, and opened her mouth-

"What he needs is a license," Huojin went on, before she could quote chapter and verse at him.

"I'm due to go off-shift soon anyway. I can escort them to Healer Amaya, and she can examine his training. I'm sure she'll summon the proper authorities if there's a problem."

"Well... I suppose that would be acceptable...."

"You are as gracious as you are lovely," Mushi smiled. "We will not forget this kindness."

"You'd better not," she said dryly, adding final entry stamps before handing the papers back.

"You're just lucky you caught me on a good day."

"Immensely fortunate," Mushi declared, bowing. The teen swallowed, but followed his lead.

Awkward bow, and he has to stop his hands from shaping the Flame, Huojin observed. Mushi can pass, but that poor kid can't have been outside the Fire Nation more than a few months.

...And he's a trained fighter. Who's already messed with the wrong firebender. Oh boy. Amaya's going to have her work cut out for her with this one. "If you'll follow me, gentlemen?"

As he escorted them onto the train, Huojin felt eyes on the back of his neck, and glanced back. Lone teenager. Hook swords. Brown eyes dark and suspicious and angry.

Hell. Hope he didn't get a look at their eyes.

Thank the Spirits Ba Sing Se's so big. Odds are, this is the last he'll ever see them.

He led them into one of the emptier cars, and sat on the outside edge of their bench, trusting his uniform to keep other passengers at bay. "I'm Guard Huojin. I hear you're travelers from far away... and that you've had a touch of heatstroke."

"What?" Lee asked warily.

"Yes, we are," Mushi plainly, relaxing. "Where are we going, really?"

"Healer Amaya's," Huojin said frankly. "We're old friends. Took me in when I was six, for a while. She's good at helping people make a clean start."

"Oh?"

"You'll see when you get there." Huojin smiled, taking those odd gold eyes. He'd seen plenty on those Amaya helped over the years, but they were always startling.

Especially Lee's. Most Fire Nation gold still had a hint of hazel in it. Lee's were paler. Purer.

And he's a waterbender?

Well. If that were true, the kid had a really good reason to run. Way better than most of those who ended up on Amaya's doorstep.

Better than the reasons you know about, Huojin reminded himself. When it's honor, you know they don't like to talk about it.

"I'm not going to tell you you're safe now," Huojin said in a low tone, as the car began to fill up with refugees. "But you got this far, and that's no small thing. I did, too, but I can't take the credit. I was six. My parents were the brave ones."

As the train left the station, Mushi raised a curious brow, but obviously refrained from asking. Lee, though-

Lee stared at him, just for an instant. As if he could stare right through Earth Kingdom green eyes to-

Shaken, Huojin looked away. Oma and Shu. What was that?

Nothing to do with Oma and Shu at all, he feared.

Loyalty. Damn loyalty.

His parents hadn't had time to teach him much about where they'd been born, but they'd taught him enough. And he'd pulled up more from Amaya's refugees. The ones who made it... and the ones who didn't. Couldn't.

He was thirty-six. Good job, loving wife, two joyous little daughters, good friends. And yet every once in a while, he got ambushed by the feeling of something missing.

"You don't have a loyal lord, Huojin," quiet Meixiang Wen had told him, one of the times he and their fellow hidden folk got together to discuss things her earthbender husband didn't want to know about. "Some of us have, and left them; some of us were told to run. You've never had the choice, or the order." She'd had to stop, then, and look at him with a mother's worry. "I hope you can bear it. Most of my children are all earth, but Jinhai...."

Yeah. The boy was game enough, and cheery, but definitely took after his mother in more than build. Meixiang's other children hadn't needed Amaya's help to hide. Jinhai had.

Just like these two would.

Why does this kid get to me?

They hit the Lower Ring before he could puzzle it out. The train stopped, and he rose, brusquely gesturing for them to precede him. Have to make this look official.

Besides, twitchy as Lee was, he sure didn't want the kid behind him in a closed space.

He could have found his way to Amaya's clinic blindfolded. Not the best part of the Lower Ring, sure, but far from the worst. And not much to look at on the outside. But looks were deceiving. Most people didn't have their own private well. Amaya did, thanks to some of her grateful earthbending patients working together to dig down to pure, fresh water.

That wasn't all they'd dug. But so far, even the Dai Li seemed to believe Amaya's underground hidey-holes were just esoteric treatment rooms, good for compounding light-sensitive medicines and treating soldiers whose nerves had been shattered by too much time on the Wall.

Let's hope it stays that way.

Huojin knocked on the clinic door, and ushered them in without bothering to listen for an answer. "I found them, Amaya."

"Thank you, my friend." Graceful in a lightweight, long-sleeved indigo dress, the graying Water Tribe woman stroked a last bit of glowing water along what had been a carpenter's broken arm. "Choose your next tavern game more carefully. Wrestling with earthbenders never ends well."

"But he was such a skinny guy!" her patient started to complain. Caught her look, and snorted. "Sure. Don't mind the paying client. Charity comes first."

Lee bristled, eyes narrowed, mouth a thin line as Mushi put a hand on his arm.

Great. Fire Nation temper, in spades. "This is official Guard business," Huojin said levelly. "Mister...?"

The man forced a smile. "Actually, I was just leaving. Sir."

"I'm sure you were."

"You enjoyed that," Amaya chuckled ruefully, after the man had scurried out.

"When you've got a temper, use it for a good cause," Huojin shrugged. "Besides. You've had a lot of charity cases this year. We don't want people connecting the dots."

"We're not-" But Lee's burst of temper died half-formed, as the teen looked between them, good eye widening. "We're... not the only ones, are we?"

"I suspected as much," Mushi said thoughtfully. "Interesting."

"And something better not spoken of here," Amaya said politely. "Come with me."

She led the way underground, stone steps twisting and turning so none of the lower chambers were visible from above, and even sound barely carried. Huojin brought up the rear, quietly ready for anything. Amaya's help was effective, but sometimes - traumatic.

Hope the kid's not a runner, Huojin thought practically, standing where he could move between them and their gear as Amaya charmed them into putting it down. Normally, he wouldn't take a kid Lee's age with dao seriously. Teenagers generally didn't know how to use one sword well enough to bother him, much less dual blades.

Normally. But this kid had made it all the way from the Fire Nation to Ba Sing Se. He wouldn't be here if he couldn't use what he was carrying.

Lantern-light glowed over Amaya's sober face as she gestured for her guests to sit in simple wooden chairs, then sank into her own. "I don't know your names," she began simply. "With luck, I never will. You are Lee and Mushi. And there is a reason for that."

"The Dai Li, or Azulon's list?" Mushi asked soberly.

"Azulon's what?" Lee asked, uncertain.

"You would not have heard; our family never earned such unpleasant attention," Mushi said gravely. "Let us say, it is known the Fire Lords keep lists of those to be dealt with permanently. Yet what is less known is that some seem added with no act of treason or disfavor to their name. And, I have heard, some few of those have not been found. Alive or dead." He raised a questioning brow at Amaya.

"The Fire Lord has no power here. But the Dai Li..." Amaya inclined her head. "Whatever you know, is likely wrong. They are skilled earthbenders, swift and silent. They protect their city, far more than its walls could ever do. And they protect it from itself... by silencing all talk of the war within these walls." She hesitated, blue eyes full of sorrow. "I've tried to help some of those they have taken. What they do to people, to their very spirits... I was Northern Water Tribe. I know what the Fire Nation tried to do to my people, eighty-five years ago. But no one deserves that." She looked at them again, gaze alight with fierce determination. "And you are Fire Nation. You are the war. If they find you, even if they let you live... you wouldn't be yourselves anymore."

"We are not the war, Lady Amaya," Mushi said plainly. "I will not lie to you; I was a soldier, once. But that was many years ago. And my nephew is innocent."

"Uncle!"

"Well, you are. Technically." Laughing gold eyes turned serious. "If this is so, Lady Amaya, then I thank you for your truthfulness. Allow us to find shelter for the night, and we will trouble you no more."

"Planning to run again?" Huojin put in.

"We don't have a choice." Lee's voice was grim. "I knew this was a trap."

"And in a funny way, that's what makes this so safe." Huojin shrugged, eyes sober. "I told you, she took me in. After she found me." Spirits, I don't want to say this. But - the kid looks like hell. If they run again, they're not going to make it. "After the Dai Li caught my parents."

Twin golden gazes burned into him. "You were born of the Fire Nation?" Mushi asked, thoughtful.

"In the colonies," Huojin nodded. "If you want to make it here, you can. Just keep your heads down, and let Amaya help you."

Mushi inclined his head, and looked back toward Amaya. "How?"

"I can't tell you, until I'm sure the Dai Li will never know," the healer said plainly. "All I can do, is ask you to trust me."

"A grave request," Mushi said quietly. And nodded. "What must we do?"

"Uncle, you can't!" Lee protested.

"Sometimes, one must take a leap of faith." Mushi gripped his nephew's shoulder gently, and regarded Amaya with a level gold gaze. "Shall we begin?"

Faith, right, Huojin thought wryly. But you're still giving the kid a chance to run if things go wrong. Spirits. What had these two been through, to have that level of unthinking trust in each other?

They got here. Whatever it was, it was bad.

Amaya stood, and coaxed a ball of water from a pitcher with a wave of her hand. Kneaded it with her fingers, until only pure water remained. "Close your eyes. This is a delicate technique."

Huojin made himself stay calm and steady as Amaya cupped Mushi's brow in glowing hands. It'd been years, but he still remembered how it had felt, cool water seeping into every nook and cranny of self-

And carefully, gently, lifting a paper-thin layer of it out and away. Changed.

This is Huojin, had been the not-quite-words in his mind. Let him be your sword and shield. An innocent citizen of the Earth Kingdom. Let him breathe. Let him be.

He'd worn Huojin as a second skin so long, it was hard to remember he'd ever been anyone else. This was home. These were his people.

But the first few days - it's hard. I hope Mushi is as level-headed as he looks.

Amaya lifted her hands away, and Mushi shivered slightly. "A most curious technique," he mused, eyes still closed. Frowned slightly; lifted a hand and let it fall, in a sway of motion that flowed from arm to arm. "Ah. Not a blockage. The energies are merely a bit unsettled."

"You can sense that?" Amaya's brows climbed. "It's the influence of water. It will calm within a day or so, as your chi adapts."

"Hmm. And what does that mean, precisely?"

Huojin kept a frown off his face. Amaya didn't usually explain this part while they still had somebody untreated in the room.

She's trying to calm the kid down. Hope it works.

"It means what it means," Amaya said simply. "Healing touches the spirit as well as the body. I ask water to accept you. To protect you. And I ask your energies to accept it." She smiled, looking into memory. "I met an... interesting teacher, on my journey from the North. I never thought I would use his gift to help those of the Fire Nation. But you're running from the war. How can I not help heal those sick of all this death?"

Mushi inclined his head. "We are grateful for your care." He blinked, finally, and looked at Lee. "Nephew-"

The kid exploded.

Huojin had expected a dash for the stairs; a grab for the dao. Spirits, he'd even - a little - expected slack-jawed shock. Though not really, Lee was wound too tight and balanced on his feet too well to let bad situations paralyze him for even an instant.

He did not expect the sizzling arc of flame that snapped straight at Amaya's head.

Oma and Shu. He's a firebender!

Huojin grabbed for him anyway. He was taller than the kid. Older. Stronger. And pin most bender's arms, they were done for. Granted, he was going to end up with bruises; the kid was mad as a wet pygmy puma and wanted to kill something-

He was never able to work out exactly what happened next. Somewhere in there was a head-butt and an elbow-jab and a hook of an ankle around his knee to hit a spot that made his leg collapse like flicked tiles, and - Koh's lair, the kid could kick fire with his feet-!

...Ow.

But he'd held on just long enough, and Mushi moved in with a tricky series of strikes that kept Lee busy for a few seconds-

Just long enough for Amaya's shirshu dart to kick in. Gasping, the kid went limp.

Not letting go, Mushi glanced back at the healer. "Do you wish to tell me why my nephew tried to kill you?"

"Tried to kill her?" Huojin muttered under his breath, getting to shaky feet. Damn, Lee fought dirty.

"If my nephew had meant to harm you, Huojin, you would already be dead," Mushi said bluntly.

Say what? Ex-soldier, yes. He could believe Mushi had trained Lee to fight. But to be sure he would kill....

Oh, hell. Lee's... but even the Fire Nation doesn't put kids on the front line! What happened to him?

"Amaya was his only target," Mushi went on. "Why?"

Sighing, she swept a ball of water into a frozen sheet in her hands, making a rough mirror. "This is why."

Mushi looked, and went very still.

Remember what that's like, too, Huojin thought, sympathy outweighing even shock and bruises. The first time you looked, really looked, and saw green instead of gold.... Feels like the world went tilt.

Some people screamed. Others cried. Most, Amaya had to sedate to sleep it out; one reason she had shirshu darts on hand.

Mushi? Tough as steel. He only looked, and let out a slow breath. "I see." He knelt then, and cradled the silent teen close. "Work swiftly. My nephew has been struck by a shirshu before. He has built up some resistance. And the inner fire can be used to rid oneself of poisons, if one is determined. I have no doubt he is attempting that as we speak."

"No." Weak; almost soundless from the venom. But clear. "Don't do this."

"This is our best chance, nephew." Green held gold, with all a father's worry. "It does not hurt-

"I can't. I won't! I'm not a traitor!"

Setting his jaw, Huojin swore silently. Spirits. The kid is screwed.

Not just Fire Nation, firebender. The loyalty that just tweaked Huojin, or made someone like Meixiang scared and sad, was part of this kid's life. Literally.

Fire Nation traitors died. Amaya tried, but some of her refugees couldn't make it. Not, didn't want to. Couldn't. A firebender....

"It is not treachery to live, nephew!" Mushi held on tight. "I could order you, as your teacher. I could command, as your elder. But I beg this of you! Live. Live, and make your own destiny!" His voice dropped. "I need you, nephew. I do not think I can survive the loss of another son."

"Thought she'd killed you. Thought-" Lee's eyes slipped closed, tears running from the good one. "...Do it."

Water in hand, Amaya held back. "You're a firebender. Water is your opposite. This could kill you!"

"It did not kill me," Mushi said bluntly.

Two firebenders? Huojin thought, stunned. How? Why?

"And what pursues my nephew will be his death, if you cannot aid us. We have no choice." Mushi laid a hand against the scarred cheek. "Do not fight. Flow with it. Let it carry you. Remember what you told me of the turtle-seals. You found a path then. Find one now." Looking at Amaya, he nodded.

Face pale and drawn, she laid glowing hands on Lee's head. Huojin held his breath, seeing her hope, her determination-

And her utter despair, as Lee's heart stopped.

A/N: Okay, so the whole "spiritual metamorphosis" idea in canon bugged me. Especially given the results in Crossroads of Destiny. I have something different in mind. Very different.

...Hey, Aang can't be the only person who ever got Really, Really Lost at sea. (Insert Evil Writer Grin here.)

And I have to admit this particular bunny has bugged me ever since my brain latched onto the whole "the Avatar is the only person who can master all four elements". (

Chapter 9

Dark.

Zuko coughed, and rolled over, staring blearily up at a sky full of stars. No sign of the Crown or the Wheel among the constellations; couldn't be too far north or south, then. But I'm not in Ba Sing Se anymore. Am I?

Uneasy, he summoned a flame for a look around-

Nothing.

"That won't work here, you know."

That voice. He knew that voice, and that face, as the young man in a Fire Nation uniform stepped out of the shadows of a tree. But it wasn't possible.

"It's been a while, cousin."

The voice, and the smile. So much like Uncle's.

He was crying as he hit outstretched arms, and for once - just once - he didn't care at all. "Lu Ten...."

"It's okay. It's okay, Zuko. I've got you. I won't let you fall."

Lu Ten let him cry himself out, rocking him gently. Waited until his breath hitched, and Zuko scrubbed his tears away. "How is he?" Lu Ten asked quietly.

Uncle. "He's okay. He misses you." Zuko swallowed hard. "He's going to be so angry at me. I promised to stay, I tried...." And I failed. Again.

"Zuko!" Lu Ten gripped his shoulders. "Calm down. You're not dead yet."

"But-"

"You're here, yes. But you're not dead."

The Spirit World? Doesn't make sense.

Uncle. It should be Uncle here, Iroh would understand why the world had gone crazy....

Iroh should get to see Lu Ten. Not him.

"Zuko. Focus." Lu Ten bent a quiet smile his way. "Trust me, it's not your fault things turned out like this. You're stubborn; it runs in the family. You'll find a way out."

Here. Just where is-? Zuko swallowed, seeing the tree, the hill, the great wall in the distance. "This is your grave."

"Well, it's convenient. We're not tied to them... but it makes some things simpler." Lu Ten glanced around. "We need to get you back, and I don't think I can do it alone." Gold eyes fixed on his. "Do you know anyone else here who would help you?"

"Here?" Zuko managed. "I know a kamui who wants to tear my throat out, but-" He caught that hint of a smirk, not nearly as subtle as Uncle's. "You knew!"

"I did get to see that," Lu Ten admitted, grinning. "You two? Were fantastic." He ruffled Zuko's hair. "Who'd have thought the kid who was always tripping over himself could get that good? And what a show! Fire, drama, vengeance!" He winked. "And on top of all that, I got to hang out with a lovely girl."

"Ping," Zuko breathed. "Ping Lu Yu."

The world shifted.

And they were walking beside a cairn of rocks, where an Earth Kingdom girl barely his age sat singing to a cooing, gold-eyed infant.

She looked up at them, and smiled. "Lu Ten!" Her smile shifted, more bittersweet. "Hello, Lee."

He sat down beside her. It seemed like the right thing to do. "...I'm sorry."

"It wasn't your fault." Her smile was pretty, but sad. "Not everything is, you know."

"I wish - I wish I could have been there," Zuko blurted out. "I wish I could have helped."

"You saved my mother," Ping said plainly. "You saved Asahi. The world is broken, but you've never stopped trying. That's brave, Lee. It matters."

"My name's not-"

"Isn't it?" She touched his lips for silence, and smiled past him at Lu Ten. "So. Someone's interfering?"

"Heavy-handed. But they probably figured this was the only shot they'd get," Lu Ten said wryly.

"Why? I'm not the Avatar!" Zuko growled. "Why do the spirits want to tamper with my life? Isn't it bad enough already- Why are you laughing?"

Still snickering, Lu Ten shook his head. "Zuko. You give spirits a headache."

"What?"

"Sozin broke part of the world, and we've been paying for it ever since," Lu Ten said seriously. "He twisted destinies, and so ours have been twisted. And a lot of spirits were satisfied with that. They don't... really get humans, a lot of them. So long as we suffer, they think they've fixed the problem. And they don't understand why it keeps getting worse." He smiled. "But you? You fight destiny. They throw something at you, it bounces off. Or you cut your way through it. Or it does stick, and you keep going anyway, until you walk it into the ground begging for mercy. You're Fire Nation. You don't quit."

He looked about then, apparently considering something. "Sometimes you have to go back to go forward. We have Fire, and Earth." Gold eyes met his, sober again. "Who do you know in the Water Tribes?"

No one I'd want to meet here. Zuko had fought Water Tribe warriors, before he'd ever visited Katara's little village. North or South, they didn't care if his ship wasn't part of the war. It was Fire Nation, and that was all that mattered.

He'd fought, and he'd killed. His men deserved no less.

"There's no one who would help you?" Lu Ten said quietly. "No one who ever has?"

Katara.

Stones blurred into ice and snow.

This doesn't look good.

Not the small, igloo and tent village he remembered. This was a town; the ruins of one, still smoldering, once safe behind carved walls of ice. Not as grand as the North Pole, but it didn't look anything like where he'd found Sokka. And the Avatar.

"It wouldn't." A woman's voice, forbidding as an ice cliff. "You destroyed this place long ago."

He spun around, looking for the voice's owner. "I've never been here."

Blue and white furs stepped out of blowing snow. A dark-haired Water Tribe woman, about his mother's age, with pale blue eyes relentless as winter. "The Fire Nation was," she said coldly. "And you are the Fire Nation. Aren't you, Prince Zuko?"

My throne. My country. My honor.

And yet.... "I didn't do this."

"There are many things you haven't done." Blue eyes flashed. "What have you done, besides hunt my children across the very world? You kill and burn and destroy; nothing stops you from getting what you want! Nothing but my children, who put themselves between the Avatar and harm. What makes you different from the rest of your murdering kind? What gives you the right to ask anything of me?"

Zuko stiffened, and glared right back. "Nothing."

"Cousin," Lu Ten murmured.

Zuko shook his head. This is my fight. "If I hadn't hunted them, Zhao would have. Without anyone interfering. If I hadn't chased them - and I don't want to kill them, no matter how annoying your son is - someone would have wiped them out of the world with a fireblast months ago." Gold eyes narrowed. "But you don't care what I haven't done."

"And I thought you were going to try to convince me." The tilt of her head was so familiar, he half-expected to be buried in ice.

I know you, Zuko realized. I know enough. "I don't have to convince you."

"A prince's arrogance." She gave him a dark look. "I'm not surprised."

"You're Katara's mother." It's not arrogance. Not if you're right. "She does what's right. Even when it's hard. Even when she hates you." He met her glare for glare. "I'm not supposed to be here."

"No. You're not." The cold wind died, and she looked him up and down. "But it won't help. I know what you're trying-"

You're ahead of me, then. Spirits!

"-You're one short. Who are you going to find?"

Fire. Earth. Water. Air. Zuko swallowed, and shook his head. "I don't know."

"It's not an easy question," Lu Ten allowed. "But the past isn't as far away as people think. Not when there are those who still remember."

If we'd known each other back then....

"Kuzon," Zuko breathed. "Kuzon of Byakko. He'd know somebody." He glanced at Lu Ten. "Where can I find him?"

"I can't tell you."

Laughter in gold eyes. Faint and rueful, but definitely laughter. "Can't, or won't?" Zuko demanded.

"Both," Lu Ten admitted. "I already told you; you're not dead. Some things, you just can't know."

So close. So close, and it was all going to fall apart. Like everything else he tried fell apart.

No. I am not going to die on Uncle. Not here. Not this way.

Reading the constellations above, he started walking north.

"Zuko?" Lu Ten, beside him easily as breathing.

"You were at Ba Sing Se. Ping was at her cairn. Katara's mother was at her grave." Knuckles white, he headed for the ocean. "I'm going to the Southern Air Temple." Even if I have to swim.

Ice-mist blurred, and he was standing on a windswept mountainside.

Lu Ten's fingers brushed his hair, faint as a breath of wind. "This is as far as we can take you," he murmured. "Without someone to search for, you have to get there on your own."

Wind blew, and he was gone.

"Don't worry," Zuko muttered. "I'm used to it."

Eyes picking a way over sheer rock, he started climbing.

No gear. No backup. No plan.

Not like it was the first time.

For a world of spirits, it felt real enough. Rocks tore at him. Air got thinner, biting at his lungs. Muscles trembled and weakened, pushed to their limits.

How did anyone ever live up here?

But every time he thought he'd made real progress up the slopes, the cliff fell away up, in an arc even the Avatar's lemur couldn't have climbed. Which was not like real mountains. At all.

Right. Not like spirits have to play fair.

Thunder rumbled, as if the sky itself smirked at him.

Of. Course.

He'd seen storms sweep up the mountains at home, he knew how fast they moved. It was still impossible. One moment, only the down-blast of wind. The next-

A flood of rain, weakening holds already slipping from torn fingers. Howling wind, prying his body away from ragged stone. Thunder cracked, lightning shattering a cliff near enough to shower him with stones.

"Is that all you've got?"

The storm darkened. Thickened, lightning flashing from cloud-top to cloud-top like the sky cracking its knuckles.

"Why stop there?" Digging his fingers into bare cracks, Zuko glared at the sky. "You've always thrown everything you could at me! Well, I can take it! Come on! Strike me! You've never held back before!"

The storm howled. Stones gave way, he was slipping-

Worn fingers caught his, and pulled.

"Gently, my young friend. You've had a busy day."

He sounded like Aang. Sort of. If Aang had made it to eighty and had some sense knocked into him. Zuko blinked, and looked up-

A vaulted ceiling. No storm in sight. But we were just- Spirit World. Doesn't have to make sense.

Daring, he looked at his rescuer. Shaved head, long white mustaches, yellow and orange robe... airbender tattoos.

"A very long day," the monk chuckled softly. "But here you are. With love, compassion, and honor."

Zuko stared. Turned, and looked.

Behind him, Lu Ten winked back, one arm wrapped around Ping's shoulders. Beside them, the Water Tribe woman rolled her eyes.

Unsettled, Zuko looked back at the airbender, in time to see one white brow go up in curiosity. "Friends and allies are the greatest of treasures," the monk said plainly. "What more could you need?"

"Truth," Zuko blurted out. "How do I get out of here? Why did I end up here in the first place?" He swallowed, mouth dry. "Why aren't you angry with me?"

"Should I be?" Under the mildness, gray eyes were sharp. "Have you broken your promise?"

Which one? "I don't think so," Zuko said warily.

"No, you have not," the monk nodded in satisfaction. "And as I recall, you never promised to be gentle. 'Drag him home by the scruff of the neck and make him apologize for scaring us like that', I believe you said."

What? "You're confusing me with someone else."

"That is possible," the airbender nodded. "Many things are possible. Even promises that last a lifetime, and beyond." A knowing wink. "Sometimes the spirits remember those. When it is to their advantage."

"You should play Pai Sho with Uncle," Zuko muttered. "I don't need koans. I need answers!"

"Ah. But to find your answers, first you must find the right questions." The monk smiled, waving off hints of imminent explosion. "But I forget how much need fire has for haste. I do not hate you. I would even say that I am greatly in your debt. I may have taught Aang to master air, but I also loved him. And some things, one who loves as a father cannot easily teach a young son. That the world can be cruel. That people may hate, without cause or reason. That evil can come in friendly guise." He met Zuko's gaze, stern as the mountains. "That even one who seems your most fearsome enemy, may act with honor, and justice."

Zuko stiffened, but held his ground. "I did what I had to."

"And that is a truth my young pupil had not faced," the monk said evenly. "It was not a kind lesson, nor one easy to watch. But I love Aang too much to deny that he needed it." White-wreathed lips quirked in a smile. "You may have detected a bit of... flightiness, in the boy."

"Never would have noticed," Zuko deadpanned.

The monk broke up in laughter. "I see your sense of humor hasn't changed!"

"I'm not who you think I am," Zuko insisted. "I don't know you!"

"Oh? Then it would seem my manners are lacking." He bowed. "I am Gyatso."

This is a bad idea. A really, really bad idea. But Zuko forced himself to return the bow. "My name is Zuko. Son of Ursa, and Fire Lord Ozai." And this is the end.

"Nephew of Iroh, and grandson of Azulon, among others," Gyatso nodded. "A fact someone has taken shameless advantage of, I think."

Moonlight shone through the vaulted hall, and she was there. "So he found you."

"Did you think he wouldn't?" the Water Tribe woman said dryly. "He's Fire Nation. They finish what they start." A bittersweet smile. "Or they try to."

"It was a necessary risk." The white-robed princess almost touched the floor, white hair flowing like water. "Your uncle asked a question. There was division on the answer. It could not be decided. It is still undecided. The Avatar is human as well as spirit. He will do what he will do." She floated closer. "But you have acted to restore the balance. Even when you could have passed by. And so you have earned my answer."

Glowing fingers touched his forehead, and the ocean dragged him down.

This cannot be happening.

Iroh was frozen on the floor, heart like stone within him as Amaya frantically tried to revive the boy in his arms. Mushi wrapped around his self like a sheath of cool silk, but he could not care. This could not be happening. Not again. They'd come so far. Tried so hard. The world could not be so cruel, not twice-

Zuko spasmed in his arms, coughing up water.

What in the world?

Questions later. He helped the boy twist, supported him as Zuko choked out enough liquid to drown an ostrich-horse. Much less an underfed teenager.

"Tui and La!" Amaya breathed, blue eyes round. "How...?"

"Tui and La," Iroh said grimly, "indeed." Thumped Zuko hard on the back, helping him clear the last froth out. He could see the faint glow fading from the water as it lingered on the floor. "My nephew seems to attract the spirits' attention. And not in a pleasant way." He lowered his voice. "Lee?"

"Yue said... you asked a question." Zuko breathed harshly, ragged as if he'd been dragged up from deep water. "Not sure... I can live through another answer, Uncle...."

"Yue?" Iroh frowned darkly, and briefly entertained the notion of a koi-fish dinner. That Zuko's life would never be easy, he could accept. That a spirit would strike his nephew to get at him - that went beyond even the spirits' stern justice, into cruelty.

Wait, he reminded himself sternly, as Amaya ran her hands over his nephew to heal the inexplicable marks of drowning in deep water. The spirits' messages are not always clear. Wait, and see what occurs.

"Ping thinks Lu Ten's cute...."

Iroh blinked. Shook his head, to clear his ears. He couldn't have heard what he thought he'd just heard. Could he? "Nephew?"

"...Don't go."

"I am right here," Iroh said gently, as Zuko's grip slipped into unconsciousness. "I will not leave you." Soberly, he looked at Amaya.

"He's resting," the healer said as she stood, still shaken. "This has never happened before, I-" She cut herself off, and bent to feel Zuko's forehead. "And now he has a fever. I don't know why!"

"It is not a physical illness, I think." Iroh frowned at the ghostly dragons entwined around his nephew, snapping and snarling; a larger red, and a smaller, younger moon-white. Somehow, he wasn't surprised. He might be handling the not-quite-other that was Mushi, but he was older, more stable. He knew who he was, and what he wanted. Zuko was still trying to find out.

Reaching over, he tapped on misty scales. "Stop that at once, both of you."

Startled, they looked at him.

"Fight on, and one of you may win," Iroh said bluntly. "But he will have lost something precious to him. To all of us. Strive together, instead. Lean on each other. Learn from each other. You are not enemies. You are my beloved nephew. You always will be."

Abashed, the red dragon licked a wound on the white. Gold eyes closed, and they faded.

"I'm going to hate myself for asking," Huojin said reluctantly, "but - what just happened?"

"Lady Amaya's healing does touch the spirit," Iroh said frankly. "And my nephew was already divided against himself. I merely needed to remind him of the greater whole." He raised a gray brow. "That was the fever. As for the water - I have a tale you may wish to hear." He paused. "And you may not wish to be sober."

Luli's going to give me a Look when I get home, Huojin thought ruefully, cradling a cup of tea in his hands as he pictured his wife's cheerful exasperation. Not that she'd be too angry; a Guard's hours were never straight from the clock, and the midnight-to-morning shift was one of the worst. She knew that, and they made it work.

Besides. The hair still hadn't settled back down on his neck since Lee'd... drowned, back down there in the basement. If some kind of trouble had just moved into the Lower Ring, he had to know about it.

Tucking Lee under a blanket on a borrowed futon, Mushi drew the screen closed around his nephew, shutting him into a corner of Amaya's small dining room. Sighed, and picked up his cup of tea. "Thank you, Lady Amaya."

"Amaya," the healer said plainly. "I have a feeling we may be seeing much of each other." She sipped her cup. "I've never met another bender who could sense the spirits at work."

"It was an unexpected gift," Mushi said humbly. "And not always a welcome one. But we may be meeting for more than that." Crossing to a wall sconce, he pinched an oil-lamp alight, and brought it back to the table with him. "I believe my nephew left you somewhat bruised."

"Don't worry about it, I've had worse...." Words died in Huojin's throat, as Mushi moved his hands about the flame-

And fire changed.

Hands wreathed in burning green, Mushi bent to run fire over his aching knee. Warmth washed through the joint, washing pain away.

Sparks dying around his hands, Mushi straightened. "Lee is much better at this than I am." He regarded them both. "My nephew is not a waterbender. But he is a healer."

A healer. A firebender is a healer? Huojin thought, stunned.

Two firebenders. And how had firebenders managed to flee their nation, and survive?

Amaya looked as if she wished her tea had been spiked. "Perhaps you should start from the beginning."

Mushi inclined his head. "I have not been to war in many years, true. But - forgive me, Lady Amaya - it was known that I studied waterbenders. So when Admiral Zhao decided to invade the North Pole, where the Avatar had taken shelter... let us say, I was invited to come along."

"My tribe," Amaya whispered, pale.

"The Avatar?" Huojin got out. And didn't care if his voice squeaked. The Avatar was a myth, a story for children. No one had seen him. No one had seen him for a hundred years.

"Yes," Mushi nodded. Bent a look of warm understanding on Amaya. "They took losses, but they survived. Zhao... overreached himself. He invaded, and did a great deal of damage, but his goal was more proud than that. More proud, and more evil." He drew a breath. "You may have noticed, when the moon went dark."

"Spirits." Amaya's hand pressed over her breast. "Tui and La...."

"Zhao found their mortal forms, and struck," Mushi said heavily. "I could not stop him, not in time. But the Moon had given some of her life to Princess Yue... and that brave girl, gave it back." He shook his head. "And the Avatar, together with the outraged Ocean, destroyed the entire Fire Navy fleet." A wry smile. "Lee and I spent three very long weeks on a raft, praying we would reach land somewhere safe."

If he hadn't already been sitting down, Huojin had a feeling he would have become forcibly reacquainted with Amaya's floor. Spirits. Spirits getting killed. The Avatar. A whole fleet sunk. That was- He shook his head violently, and concentrated on details. "Lee's too young to be a soldier."

"He is," Mushi agreed. "I snuck him on board. It was not safe for him to remain where we had been. Not that it was much safer for him with me," he allowed. "The Ocean Spirit appears to have very poor aim. When it took Zhao - well, I am grateful Lee is dedicated to his training. He ducked."

"Ducked," Huojin repeated numbly.

"I did mention some spirits are not fond of my nephew?"

"...Right." Sure, he knew about the small kamuiy that appeared in Ba Sing Se; the item-spirits, the two-tailed cat-owls, the other small creatures of mischief. But the Ocean and the Moon? When, exactly, had the world stopped making sense?

When you saw a teenager drown on dry land.

"In any event, we did reach territory held by the Fire Nation," Mushi went on. "We thought we had found safety. We were, unfortunately, mistaken." He paused a moment, obviously choosing his words. "You do not wish to know our names. That is likely wise. But I will tell you that for my actions against Zhao, I have been declared a traitor to the Dragon Throne, and Lee with me." Another pause. "And did they know what we are capable of, what Lee found himself capable of in our flight, there would be nowhere in the world we could hide."

"Because you can heal?" Huojin shook his head, appalled. He didn't hate his own people, he didn't, but the Fire Lord- spirits.

"Because of how they heal." Amaya regarded Mushi with interest. "You are not like other firebenders."

"The teachings of Fire Lords Sozin and Azulon are that fire comes from the darker emotions," Mushi said seriously. "Hate. Pain. Anger. All things that have twisted our nation, and our spirits. But to heal, one must care. And with that caring, one learns the fire can come from compassion. Love. Even righteous fury, that will defend the innocent to the death. True firebending, the teaching of the dragons, comes from life itself. What we can do, what we are... our very existence proves the Fire Lord is wrong."

"And to defy the will of the Fire Lord, is treason," Huojin finished for him.

"Even so."

"So...." Spirits, there was no polite way to say this. "Why aren't you dead?"

Mushi smiled wryly. "I was under the command of Fire Lord Azulon. After he died... you left the colonies at six? Then perhaps you do not know it is customary for those of noble blood to pay formal visits to the new Fire Lord, and assure him of their loyalty." He chuckled. "As my brother's loyalty is beyond question, Fire Lord Ozai neglected to see that I appeared."

There was more to it than that, Huojin could feel it. But I don't think I need to know.

Still. There was something Mushi was leaving out that he did need to know. If his stunned brain could just focus on what.

"You've kidnapped the boy from his father," Amaya said levelly.

Ah. Yeah. That would be it.

"In a way, yes," Mushi admitted. Paused again; not in the calculated manner of a man choosing his words, but the silent ache of looking into painful memory. "Three years ago, my brother declared Lee a failure, and a disgrace. He has traveled with me ever since. Much as it pains me to say, the only reason my brother would care that Lee is with me, is that I am between the boy and those who wish him harm."

Huojin recoiled. "His own father?"

"The power of our nobles rests not merely on blood, but on bending," Mushi said seriously. "Most firebenders show their first sparks by four; five at the latest. Six is very late." A quiet sigh. "Lee did not bend a flame until he was eight."

"Not good?" Huojin asked Amaya. He might be Fire Nation by blood, but she knew bending.

"The Northern Tribe counts blood more than bending in its politics," she said, with a trace of old bitterness. "But no. It isn't. Four years, Huojin. Imagine a proud man, a proud firebender, who lives through four years of having his heir considered useless by those in power. Four years of whispers and veiled threats, by all the courtiers around him." She hugged herself, as if feeling a chill off polar ice. "I'm not the first woman of the tribe to flee the power games. I doubt I'll be the last." Forcing her arms straight, she glanced at Mushi. "But if Lee is your brother's heir...."

"There is another child."

"Of course." Amaya sighed, bitterness turning sad. "A stronger bender."

"That, I would not be so certain of," Mushi said thoughtfully. "Lee has always struggled with his bending, yes. He has spent years, learning moves others soar through easily. Only time, dedication, and unerring practice, has given him the skill he now possesses." Mushi paused. "In Sozin's style."

Huojin looked between them, as green met blue. There was something being said beyond their words. He wasn't sure he wanted to know what.

Amaya hmped. "I haven't forgiven him for trying to kill me, yet."

"I do not ask that you do," Mushi said seriously. And waited.

Minutes passed, and Amaya finally sighed. "A healer. And he can pass as a waterbender?"

"After a fashion," Mushi nodded. "It is more difficult to wring fire's strength from hot water, but Lee can do it."

"From hot-" Amaya's jaw dropped. Blue eyes darted toward the screen. "He can do that?"

"He can." Mushi smiled. "He thought of it when a man's life rested in our hands, and we dared not betray ourselves."

"He thought of it." Her voice was hushed, amazed. "Does he know?"

"I have been afraid to tell him," Mushi said quietly. "My brother's claim that Lee is a failure was very... convincing."

"Not a bender," Huojin pointed out, trying to sort out the sudden tension in the air.

"Huojin." Amaya shook her head, still stunned. "It would be as if - as if I bent water out of lava. It exists. It is possible. But to do it...."

"I had feared it might be only an uncle's kind eyes," Mushi mused. "Thank you for the confirmation, Lady Amaya."

Huojin eyed the screen himself. "You mean, he's a lot stronger than his father knows."

"Strength has nothing to do with it," Amaya said firmly. "Lee has imagination. Will. Determination." Blue eyes all but glowed. "Not one bender in a hundred, not one in a thousand, has that tenacity."

Mushi smiled.

"You," Amaya said, and it was almost a chuckle, "are a sly, conniving, scheming old firebender."

Mushi almost looked innocent.

"A healing firebender." Amaya did laugh, now. "Training him will be interesting."

Huojin checked that he was still sitting down. "You want to train him?"

"If Luli tripped on a piece of jade rough abandoned in the mud," Amaya said wryly, "wouldn't she take it home, and wash it, and see what might be carved from it?" The healer smiled at him.

"You're going to be late."

Well, yes. "You're sure you'll be-?"

"We'll be fine," Amaya said firmly. "Thank you for your help, my friend."

Which was an unmistakable see you later, don't worry about it. Huojin nodded, and made his farewells.

And made a mental note to swing by the clinic again in a day or so. Just in case.

I have a bad feeling about this.

Dawn.

Zuko scrunched his eyes back shut, wrinkling his nose. He hadn't felt less inclined to move since....

"I'm tired."

Up almost two days straight. Half-drowned following turtle-seals into an impenetrable fortress. Fighting his way past a suddenly master-level waterbender, dragging the Avatar through a collapsing ice sheet and a blizzard, getting buried by said waterbender again....

And finally, fighting for his life against a master firebender who utterly, sincerely wanted nothing more than him dead.

Yeah. He'd been tired.

I hurt everywhere.

Not a physical ache. More a trembling exhaustion of energies, as if he'd been clinging to one spar in a typhoon, and had been pulled in just before he slipped under the waves.

Get up. Get moving. Get to sunlight.

Quiet confusion, then caution, flickered through his mind. Which was crazy, he was a firebender, he needed the sun-

Lee is Earth Kingdom, and Water. Don't rush. Get there, but don't make it obvious.

A whisper. A nudge. Like the times Uncle's voice seemed to pop up in his head, when he was about to do something really stupid. It was weird.

Sunlight. Now.

He'd marked the exits from Amaya's clinic automatically, just as he did going into any unknown territory. The street was not an option. But that sliding screen, over there - that seemed promising.

He slid back wood and paper, and breathed in green. A water garden.

No turtle-ducks. None of the giant lotuses he'd seen in some nobles' displays. A fair-sized pond, water burbling up at one end with a chuckling clarity that spoke of a source somewhere far below, trickling out the far side into a neat herb garden. Cattails, blooming iris, and yellow water-lilies spread from rocky edges to deep water, and iridescent fish no longer than his little finger ducked under leafy cover.

Molly-guppies. Wild, and some of the fancy breeds.

...How do I know that?

Ba Sing Se, that whisper nudged him again. You know, like you know where the Rings are. When curfew is. How to get down to the docks without people asking too many questions.

Lee. That whisper was Lee.

What did she do to me?

Focus. Sit in the strengthening sunlight. Breathe.

It was like dropping a lit candle into a gaping chasm. Warm, and welcome... but spirits, he felt so empty.

Firebenders rise with the sun. Be patient. She almost killed you. Just keep breathing.

A few minutes, and Uncle sat down beside him with a happy sigh. "I am feeling a bit chilled myself. Amaya believes it will pass soon."

"I just want to soak. For days." Zuko breathed more deeply, testing the flicker of fire inside him. Still a pale shadow of what it should be, but growing stronger. "It was like everything washed away." Another breath. "Almost everything."

"But you are well?" Uncle's voice was calm, with only shadowy overtones of hunting down a certain waterbender with malice aforethought if he were not.

"Coals in a firepot. I just need to dry things out inside...." Zuko grimaced, and pinched the bridge of his nose. "I'm not making sense."

"I believe you are entitled," Iroh said tolerantly. "Dealing with spirits is always unsettling." He paused. "Nephew? You have not looked at me today."

"I'm afraid," Zuko whispered.

"Of what you will see?"

Zuko swallowed. "Of what you will." Who am I, Uncle? Who?

"I see my beloved nephew," Iroh said quietly. "Prince Zuko. Son of Ursa, and Fire Lord Ozai. Your eyes cannot change that." Uncle's hand rested on his shoulder. "And I see Lee, whom I have grown to know and rely on through our travels." He chuckled. "But perhaps I am greedy, wanting to have you both."

"How do you always know what to say?" Zuko wondered, feeling the words just as warming as the sun. "I never know what to say."

"Some things come with time." He could hear the smile in Iroh's voice. "Be patient. You are still young."

I don't want to be patient! I want-

That thought seemed to tangle itself up like a pygmy puma kitten in a ball of yarn, hissing and spitting and somehow utterly ridiculous. He might want his honor back, but Lee flung up glimpses of arrogant, uniformed Earth Kingdom generals, who didn't care what the Dai Li did so long as they kept order in Ba Sing Se.

It's not like that! I have a reason. A good reason.

The whispers seemed to ripple, confused.

If I don't have my honor, I can't be Father's heir. If I'm not - Azula is.

His people. Oh spirits, the things she'd do to his people. And to the world.

Earth and Water. Stay hidden. Deflect your opponent.

He couldn't argue with that. The chances of Aang defeating the Fire Lord any time soon ranged between slim and none. Meaning it didn't matter if Azula thought she had a lock on the throne. Uncle was right. Right now, he had to focus on staying alive.

Uncle.

He lunged, knowing his target would never expect it.

Strong arms caught him regardless, gently returning his fierce embrace. "Zuko?"

Family. He had to laugh, ruefully, as all the loose pieces inside seemed to fall into place. "I think something went wrong, Uncle. We're supposed to be Earth. Tradition. Enduring." He made himself look into green without flinching. This was Uncle. And somehow, that made everything all right. "I think Lee is Water."

Iroh's brows went up, but he smiled back. And if it was a bit wry, Zuko couldn't blame him. "Perhaps that will be to our advantage, nephew. It does us no harm for those around us to see you as foreign. So long as they do not see what you are." He hesitated. "Is it difficult?"

"It's different." Zuko pulled back, just far enough to rub his eyebrow. "It's like a flood washed everything out of your house, and you have to find things, and put them back." He had to look away. "What if I don't do it right?"

"Right?" Iroh asked quietly. "Or the same? I am not as I was, before the siege of Ba Sing Se. It is all right to change, nephew. To grow. So long as you remain rooted in your true self."

"I think I already did," Zuko said quietly. Looked up. "I put you back first."

Green eyes widened. "Nephew?"

"When she struck you down...." Zuko had to stop, and breathe. "If she's doing what Father wants - then I don't want it anymore."

Iroh drew in a startled breath.

"I was ordered to capture the Avatar. And I will! Alive. He needs to be stopped. Anyone who can do... what he did to the fleet... he has to be stopped." Zuko clenched his fists, trying to still their trembling. I'm not a traitor. "But I won't sacrifice my people to do it. And I won't let her sacrifice them." Calm. Just... be calm. "You're my uncle. I won't let that happen to you again. I won't." Stay calm. Think. "I know - I have a hard time with my temper. But I'm going to try. To bank the flame. To think." She's an obstacle. With a lot more firepower. "She expects me to attack like a firebender. Straight on, for the kill. If I can go around her, deflect her...." Words failed him, and he shrugged.

"It is a place to start," Iroh nodded, and stood. "Lady Amaya says we have a little time yet, before any patients should arrive. And that we are quite unobserved."

Even drained, Zuko's heart leapt. He scrambled to his feet. "We can practice?"

"Gently," Iroh advised. "The chi of water is still disturbing our own."

That was fine. He didn't feel up to much beyond candle-lighting. But still. "We can practice."

Iroh winked, and shifted into stance.

Zuko matched him, half a joyous heartbeat behind.

Breakfast, a few good cups of tea, and one nephew safely ensconced in Amaya's garden with a healing scroll and orders to soak up sunlight. That tended to, Iroh caught Amaya between patients.

"We must talk."

"You said you were going out to look for work." Amaya's tone was mild, but one dark brow arched in curiosity.

"And I will," Iroh affirmed. "This will not take long, I hope." He frowned. "How much of what you have... shaped, in my nephew, is real?"

"Almost all of it," the healer said simply. "The mask uses pieces of your self, and reshapes them as if they were formed in the Earth Kingdom-"

"My nephew seems convinced Lee is Water Tribe."

Amaya halted in mid-thought. Blinked, and slowly nodded. "I believe that does make sense."

"Does it?"

"I checked some of my scrolls yesterday," the healer informed him. "I was searching for anything that might explain what happened. I didn't find it, but I found something else. Something I'd nearly forgotten." She gave him a sober look. "He was given that scar by someone he trusted."

Iroh winced. Which, he knew, was answer enough.

"It's not directly on one of the chakras, but a blow there, where so many of the body's channels come together, with a massive force of chi behind it... If that wound had been dealt by a waterbender, I would have a patient with no will, no desire to live. An empty shell, who would want - nothing."

Iroh straightened, the dreadful meaning sinking home. "One whose inner fire had been extinguished."

Amaya inclined her head. "Just so."

"So my nephew-"

"Has survived surprisingly well," the healer stated. "You must care for him deeply, for him to have even been able to sip that comfort." She glanced toward the screens blocking off the garden. "He's had years of drought. Whatever happened... I don't know if it was the spirits, or simply being that close to death. The scar is there. But the energies it blocked are beginning to flow again."

"Love, and family, and the ability to adapt," Iroh murmured. Considered all that, and paled.

"I would think this would be a good thing, Mushi," Amaya said with some asperity.

"In any other, I would agree," Iroh admitted. "But this is my nephew. If there is any way trouble can find him, it will."

Zuko sighed, and shaded his eyes, as the chi meridians marked on the scroll seemed to swim in his vision. Sunlight might be filling the emptiness inside drop by golden drop, but the rest of him didn't seem inclined to tolerate it as well. Not today.

Looking away from the brightness, he saw a cat-claw of white hanging in blue sky. And tensed.

Yue.

Or La, if he meant to invoke the Moon-spirit formally. Which he didn't.

But it was hard to look away.

Grimacing, Zuko set the scroll safely down on the portable writing tray, and walked over to the pond. He needed a distraction.

Then again, reading itself would probably be going fine, if practice hadn't been one long series of distractions.

His movements had been right. One advantage of having had to drill the basics into his very bones. He didn't forget. But the flow of his energies had been - off. Odd.

Amaya says it'll settle. Be patient.

On top of that, something just kept tugging at his concentration. Not Lee. At least, he didn't think it was Lee. Lee was a nudge, a whisper. Whatever was bothering him was more - directional. Like the push of storm winds. The shift of a ship in waves.

Push, and pull.

It was annoying.

He crouched by the water, watching multicolored bodies flicker in and out of the sunlight. Wasn't too different from sitting on a dock, watching sealife circle and dance as the tides lapped at them. No salt, though. Breathing didn't seem quite the same without it.

You lived on dry land until you were thirteen, Zuko growled at himself. You can't actually miss sailing around the world chasing rumors and myths.

No. Not really. But the ship had been predictable. Train, hunt for a myth, deal with a crew that wanted to be there only slightly less than he did. Stable. Sane. No spirits, no Avatar, no bounty on their heads.

Until he'd spied an impossible light at the South Pole, and everything had gone catastrophically downhill from there.

If I'd caught him then, if I'd held him then - we wouldn't be in this mess.

Sighing, Zuko skimmed his fingers across the pond's surface. The past was past. He had to deal with what was, not long to chase an airbender who'd never so much as touched water....

His hand lifted, and a thin arc of water lifted with it.

What the-?

Splashed away and was gone, as a quick roll took him yards away from the pool. It wasn't glowing, and it hadn't been a hand - but there were fish in there. You could never be sure.

Flipping to his feet in a ready stance, Zuko eyed the pond suspiciously, ready to sear it out of existence if he had to. If he even could, with spirits involved.

Nothing. Just the quiet murmur of water.

"Lee?" Amaya stepped quietly into view on the garden path. "I'm breaking for lunch, if you'll join me. How far did you-" She eyed him, and his stance, with bemused worry. "Did something happen?"

"Do you have spirits in your water?" Zuko asked tersely.

"Not to my knowledge." The healer gave him a patient smile. "A little paranoid, are you?"

"Only because things are out to get me."

"You make tea?" Huojin muttered under his breath, too low for the higher-ranking guard with him to hear. Not that Officer Yaozu probably would have noticed, bent on getting a steaming cup before they headed out way too early on evening duty, but better safe than sorry.

They're shuffling guards around all over tonight, Huojin thought. Guess they need some extra security up in the Upper Ring. Wonder what's going on?

Not that it really mattered, so long as it stayed in the Upper Ring. Not his neighborhood, not his problem. Poking around up there was a quick way to bump into the Dai Li, and that was a pleasure he'd just as soon forgo. Unlike tea.

"I do," Mushi smiled at him, gesturing the pair of them to empty seats. "It is one of my life's quieter pleasures." He chuckled. "And here comes one slightly louder."

Huojin raised an eyebrow as Lee walked through the door, feeling a wash of interest and relief. The kid looked frazzled at the edges, short hair sticking up everywhere and ink staining his hands and one sleeve. But that was a heck of a lot better than lying half-drowned on Amaya's futon.

"Well?" Mushi asked.

"...I've got an apprentice's license," Lee admitted, taking out the thin sheaf of papers long enough for Mushi to beam at it, before tucking it back under his robe.

"Ah, very good! Tea?"

Lee gave him a skeptical look. "Steamed leaf juice?"

"How can one of my own family say such a thing?" Shaking his head, Mushi poured Yaozu's tea.

The officer picked it up - then took a second breath, sipping it slowly, and sighed. "This is the best tea in the city!"

"The secret ingredient," Mushi said expansively, "is love."

He walked back toward the back of the shop, as Lee stifled a groan.

Huojin chuckled, remembering too well what it was like to be a proud sixteen. "Don't worry. When you get to be his age, you can embarrass your nephews, too."

Lee blinked, and all the color drained from his face.

What'd I-? Oh. "Another child," right. Still. Even if Dad likes your sibling better, why do you look like you'd rather face down a charging dillo-lion?

The shop door slammed open.

"I'm tired of waiting!" The angry teen refugee from the other day, sheathed hook swords glinting in the shop's lights as he pointed toward Lee and Mushi. "These two men are firebenders!"

Oh, hell.

You bastard.

The world seemed to shimmer through a watery haze as Jet unsheathed his swords. Zuko deliberately kept his fists from clenching. No swords, no way he could take on someone quick as Jet with just bare hands - damn trained reflexes. Let his hands even start to close, training would kick in and he'd firebend right there, in reflexive self-defense. Which would get them both killed.

Damn you! We didn't do anything to you. Why?

"I know they're firebenders!" Jet growled. "I saw the old man heating his tea!"

The ferry. Damn it.

"He works in a tea shop," Huojin's fellow guard pointed out dryly.

Right. Stay quiet, Zuko told himself. Let other people talk Jet down. Spirits knew he was in no shape to do it, not after a day spent studying and then answering Amaya's exhaustive questions on what he could and couldn't do for a patient. She'd marked his triage judgment as fairly educated, his knowledge of wound care as decent, and his healing bending as remarkably good for someone working mostly on instinct. He might have been proud of that, if he hadn't been so exhausted.

And twitchy. Definitely twitchy. Ever since the pond. Worse since the sun went down. A lot worse.

Push, and pull.

It was driving him crazy.

And Jet wasn't helping. "He's a firebender, I'm telling you!" the rebel insisted.

The officer looked less than impressed, as Huojin rose to back him. "Drop your swords, boy. Nice and easy."

"You'll have to defend yourself," Jet said, grim and smug at once. "Then everyone will know. Go ahead, show them what you can-"

Pushing and pulling and damn it, he couldn't just stand here! Why couldn't you just leave us alone?

Porcelain clattered like an earthquake, and three cups' worth of tea suddenly hurled itself at Jet's face.

What the...?

"Firebender?" Huojin drawled in the sudden silence. "Looks more like teabender to me."

Please let Uncle keep a straight face, Zuko prayed. "That's my uncle you're calling a firebender. Are you out of your mind?"

"I saw-"

"I don't know what you saw. I don't care." Zuko took the last step he needed to near Huojin's incautious, dao-armed associate. "See this!"

Pull the blades. Separate. Move.

And the fight was on.

Iroh clapped a hand to his forehead as more furnishings fell victim to the duel. Ordinarily, he wouldn't worry about Zuko; rested and ready, his nephew could put most fighters of Jet's level down in less than a minute. Tired as he was, though, with his chi still upset from Amaya's waterbending... this could get tricky.

How in the world did my nephew fling tea?

"Serve the tea pretty hot here, huh?" Huojin muttered, watching for any opening to separate the battling youngsters.

"So we do," Iroh agreed after a moment's shock. Of course. We can move fire. Tales say dragon's children could even bend lava, and that is fiery earth. Fiery water... well, well.

And wouldn't that be a most unpleasant surprise, for anyone who trapped his nephew on terrain that should favor waterbenders? He could already see some tactical advantages-

Crash.

...Oh dear. Perhaps it was just as well Zuko was not working here. That had been the front door.

Damn. He's better than I thought, Zuko realized, dao locked with Jet's swords. Between that, and exhaustion, and not wanting to kill the idiot....

I could be in trouble.

"You must be getting tired of using those swords," Jet taunted. "Why don't you back off and let the old man fry me?"

Because I'm not stupid. Because my uncle is worth ten of you, and a pygmy puma thrown in on top. Because you're so wrapped up in needing to hurt someone you'd go after innocent strangers, if you thought they were Fire Nation.

No wonder Katara hates you.

"Please, son, you're confused!" Iroh called out from the doorway. "You don't know what you're doing!"

No, Uncle. He does. That's the problem.

In more ways than one. This was not going well.

No more kid gloves.

Breathe and focus and channel inner fire into a quick burst of speed, pinning one hook-sword down, turn and advance and strike-

...I cannot believe he ducked.

At least he'd killed the damn wheat straw.

Someone needs to teach that kid that regular people don't kill their problems, Huojin thought acidly, ignoring Yaozu's sputtering over his borrowed swords as he tried to figure out a way to get between two desperate fighters without killing either of them. At least, Lee was desperate. The other refugee was riding such an avalanche of hate and fury, he wouldn't care if someone cut his hands off so long as he could spew his venom.

"You see that?" the troublemaker snarled, balancing on the edge of a well. "The Fire Nation is trying to silence me-"

Grinning suddenly, Huojin dashed back inside.

Let's just hope the owner- yes!

Grabbing what he sought, he ran back out toward the fight. Think fast, kid. Before someone wonders why a waterbender's not taking advantage of a well. "Lee!"

Damn, he's behind me, I can't-

"Lee!"

Hot and near and pulling-

Spinning, he let his free hand arc out, and pushed.

A kettle's worth of hot tea hit Jet with the force of a fireball, blasting him down.

Step in, disarm, finish- no!

Foot still on Jet's wrist, Zuko stopped the dao an inch from the teen's throat.

"Good, hold him there," Huojin said briskly, moving in with iron bindings as Jet wheezed, trying to get his breath back. Left wrist secure, the guard motioned Zuko back, and yanked Jet up enough to catch the teen's bruised wrist behind him in the cuffs. "You're under arrest, young man." Green eyes cut back at Zuko. "Drop the sword. Now."

Breathing hard, Zuko nodded, and laid the blade down. Out of reach of Jet's feet. He'd trained hard to be capable of fighting even when captured. No way was he going to assume the freedom fighter hadn't picked up a few tricks.

"Me?" Jet sputtered, dripping. "They're Fire Nation!"

"No, we're not!" Zuko let some of the fury and frustration pour into his voice. "You moron! You said you wanted a fresh start! Well, so did I! But if it's the only way to get an idiot like you to stop attacking my uncle... damn it, my mother was from the Great Foggy Swamp!"

Dead silence in the street. He could feel the onlookers staring, aghast.

Tea dragging wild brown hair into a soggy mass, Jet blinked at him. "You've got to be kidding me."

"Do I look like I'm kidding?"

Jet didn't resist as Huojin hauled him to his feet, face scrunched up in horrified disgust. "You're - you eat bugs!"

"You have never had fried silkworms? Deprived child." Iroh gave Jet a stern look. "Lee's mother was far more civilized and honorable than most people I have met anywhere. I will thank you not to insult the memory of my brother's wife."

Foggy Swamp?"

Zuko flung up empty hands, disgusted. "Now do you see why we didn't tell you?"

Jet seemed to slump against his bonds. "No wonder you're so sneaky...."

It's working? Zuko glanced at the crowd, looking for traces of disbelief. I can't believe it's working... uh-oh.

He didn't need Lee's shiver to recognize the pair of Dai Li walking through the crowd. Even if the uniforms hadn't been a giveaway, the way onlookers melted out of their path would have shouted they were trouble. "Is there a problem?" one said levelly.

"I'll say there's a problem!" The teashop owner jabbed a finger toward Jet. "This young man wrecked my teashop, and assaulted one of my employees!"

"Mistaken identity," Huojin said dryly. "We've got it sorted out now." His voice hardened. "Right?"

"I didn't think-" Jet started.

"You got that right." Huojin gave the Dai Li a professional smile. "Thanks for the assistance. But everything seems to be under control now." He glanced at his fellow officer respectfully. "Right, sir?"

"Boy's getting off easy," the officer grumbled. "Attacking the finest tea-maker in the city!"

"Oh ho ho," Iroh chuckled. "That's very sweet."

Zuko wasn't sure whether to laugh or groan. The Dragon of the West, a tea-maker....

Two leaves in the forest. We're just simple refugees. If Uncle's happy with what he's doing while we're resting - well, don't screw it up.

Zuko tried, very hard, not to glance back at the wreck he and Jet had made of the teashop. ...Any more than you already have.

Apparently he hadn't done too badly, because the Dai Li were moving off. Though not without a considering look his way.

Lee. Be Lee.

He leaned on that whisper, and gulped air, without any touch of breath control. Shook a little, like a new recruit, now that the battle-rush was fading. Drew closer to his uncle, who was all a frightened refugee had in the world.

They turned and left, and now he really did want to fall down.

Later, Zuko promised himself. And hid a vindictive grin, as the officer reclaimed his dao and started hauling Jet off, abusing his prisoner's ears every step of the way.

"Gentlemen?" Huojin raised a brow at the pair of them. "If you'll step over here a moment, I have few more questions."

"He should get off with a warning, this time," Huojin said in an undertone after they complied. "Which is just as well for all of us. The Dai Li don't usually bother questioning random troublemakers before they deal with them, but better safe than sorry." Concern swept off his face, giving way to exasperated anger. "Lee, just what the hell did you think you were doing?"

"He attacked my uncle!" Zuko protested.

"I'm not helpless bare-handed, you know," Iroh said patiently. "I would have been fine-"

"If somebody recognized your form?"

That stopped Uncle cold.

"Damn," Huojin groaned. Looked at Iroh with rueful sympathy. "I hate to say it, but he's got a point. We do get soldiers off the Outer Wall down here. A few of them have been close enough to the action to notice things." Another green-eyed glare Zuko's way. "Still. We were right there. Let us handle it. That's what the Guard is for."

Confused, Zuko glanced at Iroh. Who started to speak, stopped, and finally shook his head. "It seems we are both unaware of customs that may prevail in the larger cities of the Earth Kingdom," Iroh said thoughtfully. "If you would be so kind as to inform us how the Guard functions in Ba Sing Se? So we may avoid any other misunderstandings."

"We're like the Guard everywhere, I think," Huojin said wryly. "We enforce the laws. Investigate petty thefts. Keep people from killing each other?"

"You do?" Zuko said, even more confused.

This time, it was Huojin who hesitated. Looked at him. Looked back at Iroh. "Is he serious?"

"My nephew is rarely not serious," Iroh said bluntly. "We are not accustomed to such protections being extended to everyone." He paused, choosing his words. "Some might say that those in our unpleasant position do not deserve our lives, if we cannot fight to keep them." He shrugged. "Besides the obvious - I believe I was twenty, when I encountered my first assassin outside the shelter of my clan. Lee... has not had such fortune."

Huojin stared at him. Turned a disbelieving gaze on Zuko.

"What?" Zuko said crossly. The fight was over, he was tired, and no matter how low they kept their voices, there were far too many eyes on them.

And he knew that look on the guard's face. Knew it, and drew in a hiss of breath. "Don't ever pity me," he bit out, low and angry. "If I were better, they wouldn't dare come." If I were better. If

Father loved me. Zhao would never have dared if he'd- if I'd-

Fists clenched, cold, he turned away. "You need anything else?"

"...Let me talk to your uncle for a minute."

Huojin barely waited for Lee to get out of earshot before facing Mushi head on. "Assassins?" he hissed, barely above a whisper. "And what the hell's the obvious?"

Mushi gave him a skeptical brow. "I believe you know, if you will think on it."

Agni Kai. Oh. Hell.

Firebenders. Benders who had the right to challenge, or be challenged, when two of them went head-to-head. Duels that could be to wounding, or death.

Damn. Never really thought about that. Our people here, they're just people. Most of them never wanted to hurt anyone in their lives. But firebenders... they're trained to kill. All of them.

"Right. Stupid question," Huojin managed, voice unsteady. "But - assassins?"

"I told you it was not safe for Lee to remain behind." Mushi weighed him in his gaze, and sighed. "Specifically, because he had just survived an attempt arranged by Admiral Zhao. The man could not be allowed to learn he had failed."

You got drafted as an adviser to the man who tried to kill your nephew. And you snuck him onto the Admiral's own invasion ship, and got away with it. Who are you? "He's sixteen," Huojin protested.

"The war does not care. The spirits do not care. His father does not care." Mushi gave him a sad smile. "Thank you for your assistance. It was most clever, and timely. Now, I think your Officer Yaozu is waiting." He inclined his head. "Do not worry. I will see that Lee rests. He's much more civilized, after a good night's sleep."

Civilized, Huojin thought numbly, heading off to join Yaozu and his sullen prisoner. Oma and Shu. How could anybody call a land where that happens to kids civilized?

Only it didn't happen to kids, from what he'd heard. Not ordinary ones. Not even ordinary firebenders. Fire Nation politics were vicious, true, but the nobles who earned admiral's rank didn't try to assassinate people who couldn't possibly be a threat-

Oh, Agni. Huojin almost tripped over a cobble left awry after some random earthbender had played with the street. A dozen little facts Mushi had dropped fell into place, and the pattern was something he should have seen a mile away. His brother is unquestionably loyal to the Fire Lord? They're not just nobles. They're great names!

The highest class in the nation, beyond the royal family itself. Warriors. Firebenders of unparalleled power. And - yes - targets of assassins, when court politics turned nastier than usual. Down to the children.

Meaning the reason Lee acted like he expected people were trying to kill him... was that he expected people to try to kill him.

And they're hiding here, in Ba Sing Se. As commoners. They're not just desperate. They're clueless.

Grimacing, Huojin ran through his likely patrol duties in his head. No help for it, he wouldn't be able to drop by the clinic until late. And this wasn't the kind of thing he could tell Amaya in a note.

"Where are you taking me?" Jet growled, defiance back now that Lee and Mushi were out of sight.

"Headquarters," Huojin said loudly, noting the pair of ragged teens slinking through the night crowds after them. "Lucky for you. Let me tell you a little about the Dai Li...."

Chapter 10

Chapter Notes

By Inkgirl: I am so freaking sorry for the long delay. It seems to me that real life is actually trying to not give me one free minute. Welp. Okay, just to warn you: I will still try to update as often as possible but it may take its time. Most likely right now is once a week. I hope it gets better soon, but right now, this is sadly one of my minor projects, but as soon as I work the mayor one out, you will get updates more often.
Edit: I actually wanted to post this yesterday, I had a whole hour of work in front of me and then (I have no idea how) half of it got deleted. Half of it means around twenty pages. I safed the rest because I was out of time and am doing the deleted part now.

By Vathara: A/N: To anyone who thinks Zuko's met too many nice people lately... remember first, they don't know who he is. Second, some of these people may be Iroh's White Lotus contacts. Third, people in Ba Sing Se go to great lengths to avoid trouble. (Dai Li for troublemakers, anyone?) And finally, remember Zuko's usual luck. When things do go wrong, they're going to go wrong catastrophically.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

"So." Safely ensconced in their new apartment, Iroh poured hot water into a cup in front of his nephew. No point in wasting good tea on an experiment. "Can you show me again?"

Gentle words, that he hoped sounded casual, instead of carefully chosen. Zuko had fought so hard, so long, to master Sozin's style. To bend fire as others claimed it should be bent. Learning to follow his own instincts and experiment now - it was a delicate, delicate task.

He tried, and failed, so many times. And with Azula, and my brother... it was never safe to fail.

Yet without failure, how can we discover anything new? And this is new. Or, perhaps, very old.

"I'm not sure," Zuko admitted. "I just - got angry." Biting his lip in concentration, he touched steaming water, and slowly lifted his hand.

Thin and sparkling, a strand of water clung to his fingertip.

Holding his breath, Iroh watched.

Water collapsed back into the cup, and Zuko hissed in frustration. Frowned. Held himself still, and deliberately breathed out, slow and easy. Dipped his fingers in a scooping motion, as if gathering a handful of flames.

A globe of water shimmered in his palm, still steaming.

He's done it. Iroh breathed freely again, spirit soaring. "Magnificent."

"It's just a little water, Uncle."

"And an acorn is only a small nut," Iroh smiled. "You have proved it can be done. We will build on that." His smile turned rueful. "Tomorrow. We have both had a busy day."

Zuko tipped the globe back into his cup, staring at his dry palm. "I look like a waterbender."

"It might be best not to do that in front of the Fire Sages, true," Iroh admitted. Both the Fire Lord and the Fire Lord's heir were children of fire. No other element would suffice. "But I doubt any of them are here. And think, nephew. Now, if you carry a waterskin, you can bend anywhere in Ba Sing Se. Without betraying yourself." He chuckled. "And as to that - you told our story perfectly."

Zuko reddened, and ducked his head. "I didn't think it would work."

"Under other circumstances, it likely would not have," Iroh said bluntly. "You are a very poor liar, Prince Zuko. Which is nothing to be ashamed of." It was inconvenient, yes. Nearly fatal, given the viper-scorpion's nest Azulon and Ozai had made of the court and the military. But not shameful. "You were angry and upset, and clearly worried for my life. And those about us had every reason to wish Jet wrong, and these walls safe from even the thought of the Fire Nation."

"You mean, I didn't fool them," Zuko said grimly.

"But you did choose the right words, to allow them to fool themselves," Iroh said with great satisfaction. "It was well done." He laughed again, softly. "But take pity on your poor, elderly uncle, and do not scare me that way again."

Standing, Zuko snorted at poor and elderly. But gave him a faint, tentative smile. "I'll try."

"Ah." Iroh's eyes danced. "So you mean to find some entirely new way to terrify your uncle to death?"

"Uncle Iroh!" Zuko sputtered.

Chuckling, Iroh stood, and opened his arms.

And almost immediately regretted it, as Zuko froze in place. Too much, too soon, Iroh berated himself. He is tired, but not as unbalanced toward water as he was this morning. I cannot expect-

Gingerly, Zuko met him halfway, and hugged him back.

Felling the body in his arms tremble, Iroh frowned. "What is wrong?"

"It hurts. Inside."

Iroh stiffened. "I never intended-"

"Don't. Don't let go."

Interesting. And given what Amaya had told him, of the wound to his nephew's spirit.... Iroh held on. Firmly, but not so tight Zuko could not pull free, if he wished. "If it hurts, do not take more than you can bear."

"It's a good pain." Zuko's voice was low, just above a whisper. "Like stretching a scar." A few more moments, and he had to retreat. "I'm sorry, I'm trying...."

"No more than you can bear," Iroh said firmly. Gripped his nephew's shoulder. "I can wait. I trust you. And I know you care."

Green eyes glinted at him, fierce as gold. "I'm not going to give up, Uncle."

"I know you will not," Iroh nodded. Which is part of what worries me.

One step at a time, the retired general reminded himself, preparing for bed. We are here, fed, housed, and relatively safe. And I will be more careful with my bending.

No need to force Zuko to break his word, after all. He only needed to delay the pursuit, until summer was over. Which should be easy enough. The Avatar had a flying bison, and aid from hopeful people throughout the Earth Kingdom. Surely, now that he had found young Toph, he could hide among the mountains no Fire Nation troops would have reason to venture up, and safely learn earthbending. Why should any of them come to a city bearing the focus of Fire Nation assaults?

Outside his window, Iroh glimpsed the moon.

...Why do I even ask?

Moonlight itched at him, and Zuko buried his head in his pillow. Pushing and pulling and damn it, he knew there wasn't a drop of hot water left in the apartment! Why couldn't he sleep?

I need some air.

Pulling on a robe, Zuko slipped out the window and climbed up to the tiled roof. The moon danced in and out of spring clouds, shadows turning footing uncertain. But he was used to that.

The wind is worth it.

He'd always loved the wind, even though Fire Nation ships didn't need it. The wind told you about places you'd never been, lands you might never see. If you knew how to listen.

Leaning on the roof cistern, Zuko closed his eyes.

Murmurs of people, faded by distance. Music somewhere west of here; no tsungi horns, and the rhythm was different, but it was definitely supposed to be music. A drift of green and earthy scents grown too familiar over the past month; farms, inside the Outer Wall.

You'd never know there was a war out there.

Wind shifted, bringing faint cries of lake-gulls chasing schools of fish in the moonlight. Something tickled his hand, and Zuko snatched-

And blinked. Bison fur.

A few, thin strands. Not freshly shed, if the past few months had taught him anything. Spring fur, not winter - though length was a little hard to judge. Half the strands had been melted back, tips charred from white to smoke-brown.

You idiot.

He couldn't think. He couldn't breathe.

I warned you. I told you! She does what Father asks - she does everything perfectly, even if it means killing....

No.

Kneeling, Zuko pressed his head against the night-cool ceramic of the cistern, forcing panicked thoughts into rough order. No. The Avatar couldn't be dead. Not just because he desperately needed Aang to be alive. Because if the Avatar were dead, Fire Lord Ozai would have announced the Fire Nation's triumph to the skies.

And Ba Sing Se would be falling, even now.

Which obviously wasn't happening. So the Avatar was alive. He had to believe that.

Panic receding, Zuko let out a slow breath, and braced his hands on top of the cistern to stand again. Don't scare me like that again, Aang.

Aang. He'd thought of the Avatar as Aang.

And he could feel the water under his hands, separated from him only by thick, fire-hardened earth. No fluttering almost-heartbeat of fire, like the steaming brew in Uncle's teapot. Just pushing, and pulling. Waiting. Aching at him.

Trying not to think, Zuko swept an arm out, hand open.

Like the moon, like the tides; like Katara facing me, angry and lethal as a host of blades....

Pulled it back.

Water erupted.

Reflexes seized hold even through shock; he skipped back, feet not even damp. Water curled on itself, following-

Stop!

The wave halted, rippling in time to his trembling, out-flung hand.

...I can feel it.

Not a warmth; not a heartbeat. Not like fire. This was the flow of blood in his veins, the ripple of a stream over his fingers. The heady rush of turning a ship into the teeth of a storm, knowing it'd take everything he had to survive - and knowing he could.

The ache inside was easing, and that was the most frightening thing of all. Other benders might be too young to remember. He hadn't been.

Eight, and there was something I needed, and I couldn't - I couldn't figure it out. It was like being hungry and thirsty and drowning, and I couldn't get air. And I wasn't cold, but it was like cold, I had to get close to the fire, I needed it....

He'd needed fire then. Like he'd needed water now.

Terrified, he snapped his left hand out, fire blazing to life in his palm even as the wave collapsed.

Oh yeah. Real smart. Idiot!

He snuffed it, relieved despite his mortification at breaking cover. Whatever was wrong with him, his firebending was still intact.

It doesn't feel wrong. Just - like bending.

Crouching, Zuko ran a hand over wet tiles, fingertips not quite touching the roof.

Water beaded up in the moonlight, and followed.

Oh, Agni.

He should be panicking. He knew it. But rage and panic and fear for Uncle's life had seared through him so many times the past few days... there just wasn't anything left. All he felt was numb.

I can never go home again.

Oh, but it was worse than that. So very much worse.

"So this is your answer," Zuko whispered to the spirit shining overhead. "The Fire Nation destroyed the Air Nomads, and now you'll destroy us." A tear slipped down his cheek; he wiped it away. "That's what's going to happen. My father only has two heirs. And Azula's insane." Another tear; he let it fall. "When he dies, she'll inherit. And I know what she'll do. You think the war is bad now? Just wait.

"And if she doesn't inherit-" Zuko swallowed hard. "Firebenders are loyal. We need it. If there's no Fire Lord, my people will tear each other apart. We won't be able to stop. And once our defenses are down, once we're at each others' throats in a civil war..." He could see it, clear as daybreak. Water Tribe ships sailing into the Fire Nation's deepest harbors. Ramps falling, unleashing earthbenders in a roar of steel and stone.

Zuko's fists clenched, and he stared up at the moon through a veil of tears. "Great plan." And he bowed, formally, vanquished to victor.

Then straightened, and glared defiance back at silver. "But we're not Air Nomads. We'll fight. We'll live." He swallowed tears. "I'm going to save them. As many as I can."

I'm going to learn what Amaya does. All of it. And then-

And then, what? Hide frightened refugees all through the Earth Kingdom? They'd be found. Hunted down. Killed.

I don't know yet. Jaw set, Zuko climbed back down off the roof. But I'll think of something.

Lu Ten says I give spirits a headache. Agni, I hope he's right.

"You are ridiculously awake for this hour of morning," Amaya murmured, downing the last of her tea. And almost immediately wished she could take the words back. If Huojin was right, and she'd never had reason to doubt him yet, Lee might not know her gentle teasing for what it was.

Like a Northern chieftain's son, trying to pass as a simple Southern tribesman. It's a wonder he's managed to stay unnoticed this long.

No. Not a wonder, not given what she'd seen of Lee so far. Pure, unrelenting effort, fueled by intelligence, tenacity, and the burning desire to live that marked the best of her charges.

"Firebenders rise with the sun," Lee said, studying the scroll she'd lent him as if he hadn't noticed the snap in her voice. "Polar summers are hell. No one can sleep. Polar winters - there's good reasons not to go that way."

Amaya tried not to let herself react, storing those facts away. You've been to the poles. More than once. And you're usually surrounded by firebenders. What have you been doing?

She shouldn't want to know. She'd made it a habit, not to know about people before they came to her. But none of them had been benders.

I want to know. You've done something impossible. How?

He glanced at her warily. "I didn't think waterbenders needed to be up nights."

Hmm. You're curious too. "We don't," Amaya allowed. "I prefer to work a later day for my clients, who often must be working from dawn to twilight, with irregular times off. And for myself. I may be a master healer, but I am not the strongest waterbender by far. I take advantage of the moon, when I can, for more difficult healing."

Some of the tension eased out of Lee's shoulders. "Work around your weak points. I know."

Amaya frowned. "Your uncle thinks well of your skill."

"He's good. I'm - nowhere close." Lee didn't look up, voice quiet and steady. Not angry, as she would have expected from a young man his age, much less a young firebender. Barely even a whisper of resignation, buried in the smooth flow of fact.

We'll have to work on that.

"So if you're not usually up this early, why are you?" Now Lee glanced up, lone brow raised.

Blunt, but not suspicious. Maybe his reflexes weren't quite as hair-trigger as Huojin feared. "I need to make a house call," Amaya answered. "And I don't want them to see me coming."

...And perhaps Huojin was right after all, and a warrior's trained suspicions were merely held under iron control. Uncanny green fixed on her. Not the familiar leaf-green of blue on Fire Nation amber. A fierce, emerald blaze, eerie as the flames in the Earth King's palace. "You're expecting trouble," Lee said levelly.

Amaya caught her breath, and shook her head. "I'm not certain what I'm expecting." What is it about this boy? I faced down young Arnook, when I wasn't much older than he is now. And we all knew he was raised to be Chief someday.

Chief, yes. A leader of men in war, certainly; though they all hoped the Fire Nation had learned their lesson decades ago, and would never return. But Lee was more than that.

Fire is the element of power.

Even soaked in water's shadows, Lee burned.

"What's the situation?" the young man asked, impatience leaking into his voice.

"I would prefer not to tell you," Amaya said plainly. Raised a dark brow, before he could open his mouth. "Something is going on, and I have not been able to determine what. It could simply be a series of accidents. But there have been so many, these past months." She paused, deliberately. "It could be malice. Everything I know from my training, everything I know about these people, says that it can't be. But I could be wrong." She tapped a finger gently on the table. "I would like a pair of fresh eyes. In case friendship has clouded my judgment. Do you need to know more?"

He reddened a little, and ducked his head. "No, Master Amaya."

Amaya smiled quietly. Teenager, with the arrogance of the nobly born engrained into his bones... but Mushi had at least taught him manners. "Madam Meixiang is one of your people. She's married to Professor Tingzhe Wen, earthbender, archaeologist, and historian with Ba Sing Se University-"

"Does he know?" Lee caught her look, and glanced away. "...Sorry."

It was a reasonable question. "He knows," Amaya nodded. "Not that he cares. I don't think Tingzhe pays attention to anything that happened after Avatar Kyoshi died. Meixiang has to remind him when the children's birthdays are." She chuckled, shaking her head at one memory. "When Jinhai was born, Tingzhe's students had to drag him out of the rare scrolls section of the library! He was tracking down this piece of Fire Nation correspondence from someone else who'd been researching the Avatar. Spirits only know why. I'd thought the Fire Nation worried about living Avatars, not dead ones."

No reaction. Not so much as a twitch. In fact, it was such a careful non-reaction, she was startled.

What's that about?

"They have children?" Lee asked warily.

"Four," Amaya said, rising. I have so much I want to ask you. I wish it didn't have to wait. "They don't know their mother's history. It's safer. The rest, I'll tell you on the way."

Nice house, Zuko thought, mentally comparing it to other Earth Kingdom dwellings he'd seen. Not palatial, by any stretch of the imagination. Not even really big. But the Middle Ring definitely had the Lower beat when it came to quiet style. "Why don't you live up here?"

"Most of those who need me will never leave the Lower Ring," Amaya said quietly. "If Meixiang didn't love Tingzhe, I doubt she would have left. It's hard for your relatives, trying to fit in." Blue eyes regarded him. "Are you faring well?"

I'm wanted for dereliction of duty and treason. My sister wants me dead. And the spirits have made it so the whole Fire Nation will want me dead. How do you think I'm doing? "I'll be fine," Zuko forced out. "I still have Uncle, and...."

I'm a waterbender. Despair opened up like a black pit, hungry to swallow him. I don't have anyone.

...No. He clung to hope, the way Uncle would have wanted him to, even when caring cut him to the bone. He said he didn't hate me. Even after he thinks - after Mom-

He's Uncle. He's not going to turn me away. He won't.

If he could only be sure.

"I still have Uncle," Zuko repeated quietly. "I guess - most of the people who make it here aren't that lucky."

"Some aren't, no." Amaya frowned at him a moment longer, considering something. Shook it away, and beckoned him to follow as she knocked on the front door.

"Amaya?" A middle-aged woman, impeccably dressed despite the early hour. "Oh, I'm glad you're here... why are you here?"

"I'd like you to meet my new apprentice, Lee," Amaya said briskly. "Who's hurt?"

"Suyin," Meixiang answered, stepping aside so they could enter. "It was her turn to make breakfast. I've warned her to be careful, she's just at that awkward age...."

Zuko listened with half an ear, looking for anything out of place. Not that he'd know what was out of place in an Earth Kingdom professor's house. Something he'd reminded Amaya of on the way over.

But she'd asked. He had to try.

Suyin's the younger daughter, he recalled from Amaya's briefing. Thirteen, not a bender. The older sister, Jia, is a good bender, but tries to hide it - it's not ladylike here. Mostly her father trains her. She's in and out because she's a student at the university, along with her older brother, Min. He's sixteen, he is getting official training, and that's something Amaya's worried about. The Army would be one thing, but if the Dai Li want him as a recruit...he's mentioned it a few times, and the family's not handling it well.

And then there was Jinhai. Granted, he didn't know anything about normal families, but he remembered time he'd spent with Lu Ten. Teenagers and a six-year-old weren't always a good mix-

Zuko frowned, leaning closer to the painted screen half-folded by the entryway, blocking direct view of the stone stairs to the second floor. Were those spark-holes, half-hidden in the black of cat-owl feathers?

Pretty far from the kitchen for sparks. Even if they were using a hearth instead of that stove.

Yet his questing fingers came away with specks of soot, far below the height anyone would carry a candle.

Any adult, Zuko reminded himself. When you were six, you had to carry a candle. Which had been humiliating as hell, for one born of Sozin's line. He'd learned to get around without them whenever possible. He'd practiced sneaking through the dark, ever since-

Jinhai is six.

Suyin got burned.

Sparks where there shouldn't be.

No. Couldn't be. This was an earthbender's family.

Eyes narrowed, Zuko started searching.

"What are you looking for?"

Suyin, arm healed but dark green eyes wary as her mother and Amaya talked, Meixiang rescuing the breakfast rice from scorching. Young as she was, Suyin still gave him a considering look that oddly reminded him of Lieutenant Jee after the storm.

"I'll know it when I see it," Zuko said levelly, crouching to view the house from more of a six-year-old's height. I just hope I don't see it.

There. A patch of wall slightly paler than the rest. One regular, rectangular stripe, as if the scroll painting beside it had been moved just a little over....

Lifting painted paper aside, he stared at small, blackened fingerprints.

Damn.

"If you don't know what you're looking for, how will you know if you find it?" Suyin smiled bravely, hand on his arm. "Have you had anything to eat yet? We've got some great peanut sauce-"

"Suyin," Zuko said quietly, "where's Jinhai?"

She recovered well, he'd give her that. "Just here, a few minutes ago - he's always a pest in the kitchen, he knows he's supposed to wait until the meal's ready...." She looked into his eyes, and swallowed hard.

"He was there," Zuko went on, still quiet. "When you were burned."

"I - got distracted." She faced him squarely, a mother turtle-duck in front of her brood. "It was an accident."

You know. And if she knew about her brother, what didn't she know? "Accidents can get worse, if someone doesn't know what they're doing," Zuko said plainly. Kept his hands from trembling by an effort of will. The more people who know, the more danger we're in. But these are my people. Even if they don't know it. "Suyin. I can help."

Suyin sucked in a startled breath, and her mother's attention jerked toward them. "What's going on?" Meixiang asked.

"I would like to know that as well," Amaya said evenly. "Lee?"

"Master Amaya." Zuko didn't try to soften the grim look on his face. "We have a problem."

"Where is he?" rang down the stairs. Young, male, and ticked off.

An unintelligible groan echoed down to them. Jia, Zuko guessed, from the half-heard maledictions on idiot older brothers who didn't know when to keep their voices down.

"Don't cover for him, Jia! Not for this!" Half-shaved, university uniform thrown on, Min brandished a ribbon-tied sheaf of scrawled-on paper, now liberally splashed with fresh ink. Stones cracked under his feet as he stomped downstairs, sliding askew. "My class notes! Do you know how long it's going to take to rewrite these?"

Do you know how long it's going to take to put those steps back to rights? Zuko thought wryly, hand against his waterskin to warm it. Facing an upset earthbender without firebending and without his dao was not on his list of fun things to do today.

"Min, the stairs!" Meixiang said sharply.

"Slag the stairs! He does not get out of it this time-" Min stopped short, finally getting a good look at Zuko's face. "Who are you?"

"I'm with her," Zuko said levelly, nodding toward Amaya as he took in the temper, the way upheaved stones were tilted at odd angles instead of directional, and the lack of balanced stance. Trained, but not experienced. Just keep calm, and keep your head. He turned back to Suyin. "He's probably scared too. I know what that's like." Twice over. Somebody really hates me.

Suyin paled a little, but nodded. "What are you going to do?"

Zuko tried to smile. It probably wasn't reassuring. "First, we get the accidents to stop."

"Accidents?" Min's eyes narrowed, and he stomped toward the kitchen, a wave of one hand yanking up the trapdoor that led down to the root cellar. "All right, brat. No more nice big brother."

You're going to corner a- Oh, you idiot!

Zuko moved, quick enough to catch the trapdoor before it fell back into place. The thin layer of stone on top of wood yanked down with more than its own weight; apparently Min didn't want to be interrupted.

Exhale, and push.

Stone and wood shattered.

...Oops.

He leapt through the opening down the stairs, in time to see Min yank a tearstained, brown-haired boy out from behind pottery jars of rice.

"Let me go!" Jinhai squirmed, twisting his arm around. "I didn't mean to! I'm sorry!"

"Hiding's not going to do you any good," Min said grimly. Gripped the collar of the boy's robe, and gave it a tooth-rattling shake. "I'm going to do what Dad should have done weeks ago."

No!

Jinhai flung up hands in front of his face, and sparks flew.

Landing on the cellar floor in a crouch, Zuko swept his hands out to deflect, then pushed flattened palms down.

Every spark winked out.

Min had dropped the boy, and was backing away from him with a look of pure horror. "You - you're-"

Looking up at his older brother, Jinhai crumbled into fresh tears.

"Jerk," Zuko ground out. Stepped around Min in one fluid motion, and caught Jinhai before he could scramble away. "It's okay. Shh." He held on tight, rubbing the boy's shaking back. The way Ursa had, years ago. "Just breathe. It's going to be all right."

"Who're you?" Jinhai sniffled.

"I'm Lee," Zuko answered. "Amaya's apprentice. Let's go talk to your Mom, okay? I'm sure she wants to know everyone's all right."

"All right?" Min sputtered. "He's a- a-"

"Firebender," Suyin said bluntly. "Took you long enough to figure it out."

"You knew?"

Leaving his apparently capable ally behind to distract Min, Zuko carried Jinhai upstairs and handed him off to a pale Meixiang. With difficulty. The boy did not seem to want to let go. "He's not hurt," Zuko reported. "But he needs to learn control. Or people are going to see things Suyin can't cover up."

Jinhai buried his face in his mother's robes. "I didn't mean to."

"I know, sweetheart," Meixiang said quietly. "You haven't done anything wrong. Mommy's just... surprised." She looked between Zuko and Amaya. "He's six!"

"It happens, sometimes," Zuko shrugged. And bit back, I was eight. Prince Zuko's late firebending was still afloat in the currents of vicious noble gossip, even if it wasn't nearly as juicy as his scar. No point leaving clues around for Azula.

"How the hell did it happen at all?" Min stalked up the basement stairs, Suyin rolling her eyes in his wake.

"Min Wen, you watch your language!" Meixiang ordered. "That sort of thing may be passable among the young idiots at the university, but it is not proper in this house!"

"...Sorry, Mom." Min only looked abashed for a moment. "But how? We're citizens of Ba Sing Se! Dad's an earthbender!"

"And Mom's a refugee from the war," Suyin said bluntly. "Figure it out, Min."

Meixiang stared at her daughter. "You know?"

"Jia helped me put it together," Suyin said shyly. "You don't talk about outside much, and when you do, you always say you were from far away. You know a lot of people who look like Lee. And once things started happening around Jinhai...." She shrugged.

"But you can't be," Min said, stunned. "Not one of them."

"Good people are where you find them, Min," Amaya said calmly. "No matter what their nation. Or their element." She turned a considering look on Zuko. "You can teach him?"

"It'll take some time. Putting fires out is trickier than starting them," Zuko said honestly. "Yes. I can."

Jinhai lifted his head from his mother's embrace, just enough to give him a wide-eyed stare. "You put it out!"

"Yes, he did," Amaya smiled. Turned a serious look on Meixiang. "You should talk to your husband, and tell me what you decide. Lee is my apprentice. If he needs to train someone else as well, we'll have to work out a schedule."

"What's a firebender going to learn from a waterbender?" Min said sourly.

You've never fought another element, have you? Spirits, I hope someone trains you before you do. Or you'll be toast. "Healing," Zuko said flatly. "We don't all want to kill people. Firebenders make glass. Forge steel. They do all kinds of things that aren't the war." Though the Fire Lord's orders have taken a lot of people away from even that.

It wasn't right. It was his father's will, but - it was wrong, that other nations didn't know anything of firebenders but killing.

Min pressed his palms to his forehead, as if to hold in a splitting headache. "This is crazy."

Zuko hid a smirk. Welcome to my life.

Shutting the clinic door, Lee leaned his head against the wood, just for a moment. Sighed soundlessly, and straightened. "Is that it?"

Level voice. Ready stance. You'd never know he's had a day that would work most young men into the ground. Amaya studied her apprentice. And I don't think it's an act. He doesn't hoard his strength, no - but he spends it judiciously. Carefully. Enough to see the job done, and keep moving.

Mushi said he wasn't a soldier. But Lee had the same steely discipline she'd seen in the best earthbenders off the Outer Wall.

And something more. She narrowed her eyes, trying to pin it down. They're part of a unit. Always sure someone will be there for backup. To rescue them... or at least, avenge them. Lee's not like that.

For Lee, there is no backup.

She could still see that arc of flame snapping toward her, searing orange, before Mushi had shoved it aside in smoke and rippling hot air. But she couldn't hold onto the anger anymore. Not after he'd given her everything she asked for, all day, with people who even got on her nerves, biting back what probably would have been scathing comments as professionally as a soldier on a grim but necessary detail. Not after she'd seen him with Jinhai.

I still want to know how he broke that trapdoor. He didn't bend anything. Did he?

"There is one more thing I need your assistance with." Amaya pointed toward one of the waiting chairs. "Sit down."

"Why?" Lee asked warily, complying.

"I want to examine your eye."

Ah. White knuckles, carefully hidden up his sleeves. "It's a scar. You can't heal that."

Which was as close as he'd come to telling her to go to hell all day. So there is a teenage boy in there, Amaya thought, wryly amused. I was beginning to wonder. "The surface, no. You'll always carry that mark. But underneath it - the body tries to heal for years. Something should still be willing to bend." She gave him a frank look. "Huojin says you are skilled with the dao. He doesn't have to tell me what a wound like that likely did to your peripheral vision. Let me see if I can do anything about that."

"...What do you need me to do?"

"Sit still, and keep your eye closed. This will prickle a bit." Hand sheathed in water, Amaya touched her fingers to ridged flesh and held them still. Waiting. Fresh wounds were obvious, a swamp-muck of disruption in the body's chi that dragged at her like quicksand. Scars were more subtle. A fine grit of sand, washing under her fingertips.

There you are.

She'd never be one of the great healers; never close a mortal wound with her patient on the brink of death. But scars didn't ask for power. They asked for skill, and patience.

Bit by tiny bit, she picked at still-healing tissues, willing them to draw strength and become whole. Drove her concentration deeper, into the blood, and dug at the under-layer of the scar itself.

Sometimes you must break, in order to mend.

Delicate work. And likely more painful than a prickle. But her patient made no sound.

Leave it there.

Amaya drew her energy away from his blood, back into healing water. Passed her hand slowly over the scar, feeling grit drag at her chi as she healed the flesh anew. Held her fingers still, searching, and nodded. "That should do for tonight."

"For tonight?" Lee blinked at her as she let water glide back into a basin. "You plan to do this again."

"For at least a week. Two would be better. Slow and patient; that's the best way to handle old wounds. Remember that. No, stay there," Amaya added, before he could rise. "Sight feeds into your balance. Give yourself a little time to adjust." She gave him a patient smile. "Perhaps you could tell me exactly what you did to Meixiang's cellar door?"

"Oh." Lee reddened. "I overdid it."

"The shards of stone were a clue," Amaya said wryly. "What did you do?"

"Breathed," Lee said, deadpan. Took in her raised brow, and shifted his shoulders. "Instead of pushing it out as fire, you keep it inside. It's a little more strength, a little more speed." Another half-shrug. "It's not a big deal."

"You broke the door," Amaya pointed out.

Red deepened. "Should have known it wouldn't be as tough as iron," Lee said, eyes down. "You should see Uncle. He can just shove, gentle as a kitten-owlet pat - and they stop skidding forty feet away."

Amaya stared.

Still looking at the floor, Lee missed it. "I try not to use it too much. You don't want to depend on it. Never know when someone might take your bending away."

"Might what?" Amaya started, aghast. "Bending is a gift from the spirits!"

"Which you can't use if you can't move your chi." Lee was looking at her now, confused. "Aren't there special enforcers in Ba Sing Se? People who know how to block chi?"

"If there were, I hope I would know about it," Amaya stated, feeling faint. "Someone can take your bending away? Forever?"

Lee shook his head. "Only for a few hours. Depends on how hard they hit you."

Amaya felt ill. "And you've seen this happen."

"You could say that," Lee muttered. Hand almost touching one of the key chi meridians on his side, before he forced it back down to grip his chair.

Don't react, Amaya told herself forcefully. There could still be a reasonable explanation. "Can you describe the symptoms? I'd like to know what to look for."

"Okay...."

"Lady Amaya?" Iroh set a cup of tea down before the healer trembling in his kitchen chair. "It is a bit late for Lee to be out shopping, no matter how much I do appreciate your offer to split a roast duck."

"Curfew's not for hours yet. And that license gives him the right to be out even after it, so long as he's off to a patient or heading home." Amaya cradled the cup in her hands, as if chilled. "Mushi... your nephew was sabotaged."

Mid-sip, Iroh halted. Deliberately set his cup down. "Please explain."

"I can't believe - spirits, if that's the child your brother wants as heir, what is wrong with the man, he deserves to be flung overboard to the leopard-sharks...." Amaya stopped, and deliberately breathed out anger as a wisp of chill. "Lee's sister. She has a friend who knows this... chi-blocking?"

Ty Lee. "I know the girl you speak of, yes."

"She made this girl practice on Lee."

If porcelain had been in his hand, he would have shattered it.

"The odd thing is, he doesn't blame the girl at all," Amaya said softly. "His sister asked her to, called it necessary training, and she had to do it. Even if she didn't want to." Blue eyes beseeched him, desperate for it not to be true.

Iroh winced. "That would be so, yes. The girl could not have refused her... requests. Not without dire consequences. And this girl has six sisters to think of, all of whom would have been in peril." He forced down the anger. "How often? For how long?" How much damage did she do, that I had no chance to see?

"What kind of consequences, Mushi?" Amaya demanded. "What reason in the world could be enough for you and Lee to think it doesn't matter that she hurt him?"

"It matters," Iroh said bluntly. "It matters a great deal. But Lee would never have wished the girl's sisters to die for her defiance."

Pale, Amaya fell back in her chair. "Die." She swallowed. "Lee's sister could-"

"Kill them?" Iroh finished. "All of them? Yes. She could. She has done such things." Even traveling the world, he'd kept up on news of the royal family. His Army contacts might have cringed to pass along word of Azula's actions, but they respected him enough to tell the truth. And frankly, burning down a guard for disrespect on the very steps of the palace wasn't something that could be kept quiet. "Tell me what you mean by sabotage. Lee's sister would not have had him blocked during his training. She is far too cunning for that," he finished, half to himself.

"Not... during his official training." Amaya kept her voice quiet, even if it shook with tears. "She'd - arrange for it to happen afterwards. Not all the time. But often enough he mentioned techniques he avoids using, because if your bending is cut off in the middle of them...." Dark fingers curled on the table, tightening into unpracticed fists. "She tortured him, Mushi. Her own brother." Blue eyes glistened, angry and aching with disappointment. "And you're not even surprised."

Iroh bowed his head, accepting the rebuke. And the guilt. "I can only say that, like my brother, she is very clever at disguising the true nature of her actions," he said quietly. "I left a shy, happy boy of eight, who was just learning to bend, and was sure his father would finally come to love him. I returned to find Lee's mother gone, his sister all but acknowledged as the true heir, and Lee himself an angry eleven-year-old whose skill was...." He couldn't say it.

"Sabotaged." Amaya gripped her cup, horrified disbelief etched on her face. "How could his father let-?"

"I doubt he knew," Iroh said dryly. "My brother preferred her, yes, but to have Lee such a disgrace in skill? No. He would not permit that." He chuckled bitterly under his breath. "It explains many things. Why Lee improved so greatly after we left, for one." And why he has fought so hard to gain skill in moving unseen.

"You honestly believe a six-year-old girl could plan this?"

"Plot a course of action that would see her confirmed as heir, and Lee discarded?" Iroh said coldly. "I do. We are skilled at long-term strategies. It is in our blood. From letters Lee's mother sent me, she made this girl and her companion friends within weeks of first meeting her at school. And believe me, Lee's sister sees no need to make friends." He frowned, looking back on memory. "Though she could not have acted directly until Lee was nine. The girls of that family are not taught chi-blocks potent enough to stop a firebender until they are at least seven."

"And you're not even surprised." Anguish wracked Amaya's voice. "Tui and La, why didn't you take the boy and-" She cut herself off, hand pressed to her lips to hold back horror.

"Take a loyal firebender from his father?" Iroh said quietly. "Would that I could have." He sighed. "If I had believed we would survive the flight - yes, I should have drugged Lee years ago, and disappeared. But we would have been hunted, to the very ends of the earth. I chose a slower path. And I will not regret that. Choosing to heal instead of wage war - Lee's father would never approve. He knows that. Yet he has chosen to study with you. And that is the most hopeful sign I have had in some time." Iroh folded his hands before him, regarding her gravely. "There is a secret few know, Lady Amaya. But I believe you will use it wisely. To break one's loyalty, suddenly - that is fatal. But to wear at it, slowly, and nurture another, fiercer loyalty in its place... that can be survived. Even by a firebender."

The healer sat up straight, absorbing that. "You know this."

"I do," Iroh nodded.

"You said you were loyal to Azulon."

"I was," Iroh allowed. "Until I found myself forced to choose between the Fire Lord's orders, and the lives of the men under my command." He chuckled ruefully. "I admit, it surprised me. I had not realized how deeply we were bound to each other." He shrugged. "I was fortunate. Someone realized I was ill, and why. And did not betray me." Only later had he learned what considerable skill at Pai Sho his aide Tushirou had been hiding.

"Lee doesn't know." It was not a question.

"No," Iroh admitted quietly. "Do not tell him. Lee's choice is more difficult than it is safe for you to know. If we are fortunate, circumstances will work in our favor."

"Your nephew doesn't seem to believe in luck," Amaya pointed out.

"If fate serves us so ill, then he must make his choice because it is right," Iroh said heavily. "I will do all I can, to see he survives it." He favored her with a conspiratorial smile. "Though whatever you might do to give him ties to this life, instead of that which we left behind, would only help."

"You may be surprised." Some of the color had come back to her face, along with a glint of wicked humor. "He seems to be handling that on his own."

"Oh?" Iroh raised a curious brow.

A knock at the door. "I'm home," Zuko's voice filtered through, before he opened the door. Stepped through, wrapped meat in hand, and looked at them both. "Is something wrong?"

"Not at all." Amaya smiled, accepting her half of the duck. "I was just telling your uncle you should have a talk about Jinhai. Good night."

"Jinhai?" Iroh asked, once she was gone.

"Jinhai Wen," Zuko sighed, adding the duck to already-simmering rice and vegetables. "His father's a professor at Ba Sing Se University. And an earthbender. So are his older brother and one of his sisters. His mother's one of us."

Us. Iroh smiled as he poured more tea to go with dinner. You have always been loyal to your people. "And?"

Zuko gave him a half-smirk. "Jinhai's six. And he gets up at dawn."

He didn't quite spill his nephew's tea. But perhaps he did set the teapot down a bit hastily. "A firebender? Born in Ba Sing Se?"

"I can teach him to put fires out," Zuko said quietly. "They saw me stop him from burning his brother by accident, they know about me. They don't know about you." He set his jaw. "But I don't know if that's fair to Jinhai."

"You will be fine," Iroh said firmly. "You have a thorough grasp of your basics. Give him a firm foundation, and all else will follow." He smiled. "So my student will become a teacher. I am pleased." He had to sigh. "And worried. An earthbender, or a waterbender - they might train in secret. A firebender...."

"Sooner or later, he's going to lose his temper," Zuko agreed grimly. "I know. I can't just abandon him!"

"Of course you cannot," Iroh agreed. Though your sister would. In a heartbeat.

"He needs to get out of Ba Sing Se," Zuko muttered.

"Ah? And to where?" Iroh pointed out. "Where can a young firebender go, and be beyond the war's reach?"

"...I don't know."

"Eat," Iroh advised. "Let us enjoy this duck, and perhaps an answer will come." It was delicious. Perhaps he could convince Lady Amaya to share another, some days from now. They were a bit cheaper that way....

Be in the moment.

Bones polished clean, Iroh leaned back in his chair, while Zuko gathered up dishes and blew a surreptitious breath of steam to warm the wash-water. "A firebender, of Ba Sing Se." The retired general shook his head, amused at his own lack of foresight. "I should have considered this might be possible, once we learned of the waterbenders of the Foggy Swamp. It is within the Earth Kingdom, yet it seems they are Water Tribe. Of a sort."

"So, what? The spirits get confused in the Earth Kingdom?" Zuko's brow climbed. "Why is it strange Jinhai was born here? Plenty of firebenders are born in the colonies."

"Under the rule of the Fire Nation," Iroh said practically. "Bending is in part our spirit's way of influencing the world. And it is channeled by the philosophy of our nation. Ba Sing Se is the heart of the Earth Kingdom. Any bender born here, should be born of earth."

"For once, Uncle? Your philosophers are dead wrong," Zuko said grimly, tipping dishes into hot water.

"How so?" Iroh eyed his nephew, curious.

"I mean, if it was just your philosophy, how could anybody be the Avatar?" Zuko said quickly. "He has to be born in one of the four nations."

"True," Iroh allowed. Though that was not what you were thinking of. He frowned. "But I have never heard of two elements being born in the same family...." He hesitated, an old rumor drifting out of memory. "Kyoshi Island."

"They have a lot of blue eyes," Zuko recalled, arms crossed as he waited for the dishes to soak. "The Southern Water Tribe trades there a lot, right?"

"For centuries. And the island is neither fully of the Earth Kingdom, nor of Water Tribe territory," Iroh said thoughtfully. "In the past, both earthbenders and waterbenders have called it home."

"Ba Sing Se takes in everyone, as long as you keep your head down and don't cause trouble." Zuko's eyes narrowed. "That's not what you said earth is like."

"No," Iroh said darkly. "Earth is diverse. Strong. Not rigid. Not punishing." He breathed in steam from his teacup. "So they have bought their safety with their ideals, and lost themselves."

"Because there's more than one element born here? Kyoshi Island didn't give up who they were," Zuko objected.

"That is true," Iroh murmured, struck by the fierce glitter of green eyes. Like dragon's fire. "Nor has Lady Amaya. Nor have we. To hide in the face of overwhelming force, is not to give up. It is adaptability. Perseverance. Will." He chuckled, dryly amused. "Water, earth, and fire."

"It's not funny," Zuko said grimly. "If any element can be born here...."

"Jinhai will not be the last." Iroh nodded, troubled. "And those of our people who believe themselves safely hidden, are not." He paused, seeing a sudden misery in the slump of his nephew's shoulders. "Zuko?"

"Not any element," Zuko said quietly. "There's no freedom."

And without that, air could never rest within a spirit. "No," Iroh agreed sadly. "Not here...."

Green met green, eyes widening. "Somewhere else," Zuko breathed.

Iroh raised a brow, silently encouraging his nephew to go on. If Zuko's thoughts had followed the same path as his - it would not be following Ozai's will.

And yet, the Fire Lord has not ordered that Zuko could not do it, Iroh thought wryly. And it would help our people.

Tread carefully, nephew. Please. You walk between your loyalties, even now.

"What if there were somewhere else to go?" Zuko said slowly. "Somewhere - not safe, nowhere's safe. But free. For everyone."

"Such a place does not exist," Iroh stated. And paused, for one heartbeat. "Yet."

"That would be...." Zuko swallowed dryly. "A lot to pull off," he whispered.

"Hmm." Iroh stroked his beard, keeping his expression merely thoughtful. "You are trained in the movement of troops, Prince Zuko."

"Yes, but this is-"

"And in building field encampments, and evacuations in the face of hostile forces."

"Yes, but Uncle-"

"And in what is required both to build a new colony, and see that it flourishes." Iroh gave him a knowing smile.

Zuko winced. "You know what happened with Azula."

"I know that we had relatively little time to plan, and serious disadvantages entering the fight," Iroh said plainly. "Yet you accomplished your goal. We lived, and the Avatar survived, and Azula does not yet have him."

"I almost lost you!"

"Then we will need to plan more carefully, this time," Iroh said firmly. "Now. What is the first piece of intelligence you need to construct such a plan?"

Zuko bowed his head, thinking. "A location," he said at last; uncertain, as if he couldn't believe he was saying it. "What we need to get there, how we get there, what we'll need when we reach it - all of that's going to depend on where."

"Consider that I may have some possibilities in mind," Iroh said mildly.

Zuko's eyes widened. "You do?"

Iroh beamed.

Make a place to go.

Sitting in his room with a pitcher of water, Zuko lifted a hand, and let it fall, studying how water rose and fell with it. It was easier and harder than fire. Easier to move; it wanted to move, even trapped in a pitcher. Push and pull and change was part of what it was.

But if moving it was easy, knowing when you were moving it wasn't. Fire was a sword in his hands. Water was - damn, Uncle could always find the right words, why couldn't he?

Frustration curled his hand in a snap of motion. Water twisted with it, over and over, the curl tightening until it collapsed in on itself and splashed back into the pitcher.

Like a net for an octopus.

Staring at rippling water, Zuko considered that thought. Three years on a ship. He'd caught his own baitfish plenty of times. Using a net... and a flow of motion, that echoed what he'd seen of Katara's bending.

See your target. He marked a spot in midair. Arrange the folds. One hand to grip gently, the other poised to fling-

Coolness swept over his skin, and he almost dropped it all.

Hold! Don't look at - at the net. Look at the target. Just hold. And wait.

All the while feeling hands that were and weren't wet. Spirits, this was weird.

And throw. With the little half-twist at the end that took forever to master, just enough torque to fling weighted edges wide over the unsuspecting school-

Water snapped around air like a jeweled flytrap, dragging a clear bubble back with a tug of his hands.

It worked? Incredulous, Zuko cupped the bubble in one hand, and poked it with a finger. Wet, and then dry; he'd caught his target, even if it had only been-

Splash.

Wiping droplets off his face, Zuko sighed. And started carefully sweeping his hands to gather the puddle off the floor. This is going to take some work.

An hour later, he guided a globe of dirty water into the sink, and let it flow away. Crept back into his own room, silently sliding the screen closed, and collapsed.

Got it. I think.

Water was different. Slower. Not as sharp as the motions you had to make with fire.

Like trying to write backwards.

His eyes snapped open in the darkness. Backwards? Or left-handed?

The rhythm's different. Push and pull, not a heartbeat. But they both flow. Water, and the fire outside.

I can do this.

And if he could make waterbending work... then maybe, just maybe, Uncle wasn't chasing flying pigs after all.

Don't try to find a place for our people. There isn't one. Anywhere.

So we have to make one.

Oh boy. This was going to be a lot more complicated than ambushing Azula and living to tell about it.

I need to make notes. A lot of notes.

...Starting tomorrow.

He was asleep almost before he finished pulling the covers up.

Chapter End Notes

By Vathara: A/N: Some of you have asked about Sozin's style of firebending, and why Zuko has such a problem with it. Here's a few plotoles for your enjoyment. Warning, some of these are spoilers....

At one point in the Avatar canon, we see an unnamed Fire Nation Avatar, in the past, summoning volcanoes to erupt. Which implies he could stop them, one hopes. We also see Kyoshi work with lava when she splits Kyoshi Island off from the mainland.

And yet Roku not only doesn't know his island is going to erupt, he gets killed by it.

Sometime between Kyoshi and Roku, a critical part of firebending must have been lost.

Combine that with the creators' statement that "Fire Lord" used to mean just the head Fire Sage. But by Sozin's time it obviously doesn't; he's the crown prince, and it's hereditary. And, when he's helping Roku with the volcano, he does not bend the lava - he bends the heat out of it to cool it.

Add to that the fact that Kyoshi created the Dai Li. And that she was Avatar for over two centuries. What else did she do?

Some answers will turn up in later chapters. To put it shortly - in this AU, the "darkest day in Fire Nation history" was during an eclipse. But the eclipse itself was the least of their problems.

As for why Zuko has problems? Remember what Iroh said a few chapters back. Zuko handles energy in a way most firebenders just don't. Not for a very long time.

Chapter 11

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Finally, back on a sane schedule, Huojin thought cheerfully, striding up Amaya's clinic steps. Not that he was really happy to be bringing her this news, but getting back to his regular shift was a relief for the whole family-

Rock-gloves darkened by early morning shadows, a Dai Li agent was knocking on Amaya's door.

Don't panic!

A practiced thought; just enough to keep his reaction to the flinch of an honest man, given the excitement these past few days.

Stay calm, Huojin reminded himself, nodding to the earthbender with polite wariness. A tall, lean-faced man; the uniform made it hard to say for certain, but Huojin thought he was more wiry than heavy-boned. If they knew anything, there wouldn't be just one.

Unless the rest of them are just burrowed out of sight....

He loved his city, he truly did. But every now and then, when the paranoia spawned by what he was seemed to grab him by the throat-

I wish there were something better. Somewhere to be free.

Lee opened the door, and vague wishes flew right out of Huojin's head. Oh, Agni. This is not good.

"Can we help you?" Lee said levelly.

"I am here for Healer Amaya," the agent said formally, not even blinking at the scar.

"That makes two of us," Huojin put in, almost as formal. "We've had a report of a potential plague on the docks. Something in from Omashu. We need to track it down and head it off, quick."

The agent looked unhappy, but still willing to argue. "The patient is at the palace."

"I'll tell her," Lee stated. And closed the door in their faces.

I don't know whether to laugh or cry, Huojin thought, frozen. Though the look on the Dai Li's face was priceless.

A minute, and Amaya opened the door. "Human or animal?" she asked the agent briskly.

The agent shifted slightly. Maybe he was sweating? Not likely. "We were requested to bring you with all due speed."

"Is it that bear again?"

Under the tasseled hat, the man actually looked a little sheepish. "It's important to the Earth King-"

"Lee. Pack your kit."

"Me?" The young firebender looked more inclined to bolt right back to the docks. Huojin couldn't blame him.

"He has more experience with animals than humans, at the moment," Amaya said frankly, gripping Lee's shoulder and turning the reluctant teen back inside. "Chest of animal treatment scrolls, third drawer down, red ribbon." She glanced back at the agent as Lee retreated. "I have no doubt he can handle the situation until I've finished assisting the city."

The agent inclined his head. Straightened, and started, as Lee reappeared. "What are you doing with a firepot?"

Packed kit in one hand, Lee touched the strap holding both waterskin and firepot slung over his shoulder. "Animals don't always understand that you're trying to help. Warm water doesn't startle them so much. And sometimes you want hot water to clean things out, before you try to heal them."

Good answer. Huojin tried not to look too relieved. He should have known the kid would have a cover story ready. They'd gotten here, hadn't they?

"Lee was on the road quite some time," Amaya said with honest affection. "He's come across a few techniques they didn't teach at the North Pole." She rested a hand on his shoulder, and nodded. "You'll do fine."

Huojin watched them head down the street to a waiting carriage. Sighed, and followed Amaya back inside to collect her own kit. "Are you sure that's a good idea?"

"He knows what not to say, and he knows his uncle's life depends on his ability to pass as Lee, the waterbending healer," Amaya said quietly. "He's sword-steel, Huojin. He won't break."

"I thought he was rough jade," Huojin quipped.

"That, too." Stuffing a few last packets of herbs into her bag, Amaya smiled at him. "You should have seen him with Jinhai. He may look merciless, but there's a kind heart under all the scars." Her smile faded, chased away by worry. "Huojin. Normally I would keep this quiet for the family, but if something goes wrong, you may need to know. Jinhai needs training. Lee and Mushi's kind of training." She shook her head. "I only hope Meixiang and Tingzhe agree to let Lee help."

For a moment, it felt like all the air had been sucked out of his lungs. "The accidents," Huojin managed. "The burns. The fires."

"Apparently, a sequence of events that is not uncommon," Amaya said dryly. "Lee advised that they put sand buckets in every room. And ban Jinhai from going near the stove until he gets more control." She arched a brow. "He was also insistent that Jinhai get as much sunlight as possible. I know waterbenders are stronger when the moon shines, but Lee says firebenders need the sun. That without it, they - starve. They get desperate."

"Yeah?" Huojin ventured.

"He carefully avoided saying how desperate."

Ah. True. Lee was, apparently, justifiably paranoid. He would have kept that to himself, just on "don't want to give people an opening" principles. Huojin let out a slow breath, bringing up old memories and things he'd learned from other refugees. "Insane covers it," he said bluntly. "Too long, and they can die. It's like the prison barges you hear about for earthbenders, out at sea. If there's none of your element around-"

"Something in your spirit dies," Amaya finished. And picked up her kit. "Shall we?"

Outside, Huojin led their way through twisting streets toward the docks. "You seem pretty forgiving toward a kid who - well."

"Would you blame someone for striking you, if he were delirious in fever?"

Huojin frowned. "He wasn't sick."

"Yes, he was," Amaya said sadly. "He still is. Though he's healed a great deal, even in these few days. That scar didn't just burn his flesh, Huojin. It burned his spirit. He's been hanging onto humanity by his fingertips, and it seemed as if I had taken away the last person he loved in the world. I would be far more worried if he hadn't attacked me."

The guard squinted, trying to follow a healer's twisty logic. "Because that would mean he stopped fighting."

"Yes." She chuckled ruefully. "Though I'm beginning to think Lee simply refuses to recognize that giving up is an option."

"Scary kid," Huojin muttered.

"Yes. He is."

The thoughtfulness of that tone prickled the hairs on the back of his neck all over again. "Did something happen?"

"It's not what happened that worries me," Amaya said carefully. "It's what Lee said about it later. You've traded stories with people who've served on the Wall."

Not a question. Exactly. "In quiet corners, sure," Huojin said frankly. Often with a few drinks on hand, and a friendly bartender who understood some bloody stories weren't enough reason to call the Dai Li. A lot of Wall veterans ended up joining the Guard, after years or injuries slowed them down. "You've treated plenty of them."

"Yes. But apparently they never wanted to burden a healer with the thought that some of their opponents seemed - inhuman. Too strong. Too fast." She arched a brow at him.

"I've heard some stories," Huojin admitted, after a moment to check no tasseled hats were in sight. "Not the average soldiers, but when imperial firebenders come out to play.... Some of them supposedly dodge arrows. Others kick rocks out of the way, even when a bender's still moving them. Crazy stuff like that-" He cut himself off, swords flashing in a teashop in his memory.

Jet was fresh. Lee was exhausted.

Yet Lee had kept up anyway, blow for blow. And that blazingly swift slice, that should have ended the fight permanently if Jet wasn't half circus acrobat.... Oh, Agni.

He blew out a breath. "What'd you hear about?"

"An oak cellar door with a granite cover, shattered in one shove," Amaya said frankly.

"Um." And what, exactly, did you say to that?

"As I said, it was the reaction that was interesting," Amaya observed. "Apparently? It wasn't a big deal."

"Really," Huojin said warily.

"In part, or so the story went, because someone who was really skilled, could simply shove, and send a person skidding over ten yards away."

"Someone?" Huojin winced. Mushi.

"Have you ever heard a rumor like that?"

"No," Huojin said honestly. "No, I haven't." He grimaced. "Though from what I have heard, a lot of people didn't come back, six years ago. And it makes sense to guess those people... well. Maybe they saw a lot more than people just on the Wall."

Amaya nodded.

"I told you who I think they are." Huojin kept his voice down, covered by the morning crowds. "I guess I should have thought it through myself." Oh, Agni. We've got a pair of great name, imperial firebenders on our hands. Now what do we do?

"Well," Amaya reflected, "it's good to have a frame of reference, to determine exactly what Lee means when he says his skills are passable."

Urk. Huojin tried not to shiver. Passable as a healer's apprentice was one thing. Passable as an imperial firebender? A whole other kettle of catfish-eels.

Ba Sing Se soldiers never take them one on one. Not even our earthbenders. They use three on one odds, at least. Even then, you're going to lose people. Huojin muffled a groan. Oma and Shu, what'd I do to deserve this?

Well. At least now he knew why Mushi was convinced Lee hadn't tried to kill him. "What are we going to do?"

"Do?" Mischief sparkled in blue eyes. "I think they've handled things quite well so far. Don't you?"

"Well, yes, but-"

"They're looking for a place to rest," Amaya said softly. Narrowed her eyes at him. "They're not walking weapons, Huojin. They're people."

People and walking weapons, Huojin thought unhappily. Not that he thought they meant to start anything. That pair wouldn't have gotten this far if they let their tempers lead the way. Even Lee. The kid might bristle like a porcupine-pig, but he hadn't so much as raised a hand until someone threatened his uncle.

But if anything did get started, those two would finish it. Permanently.

I should have let the Dai Li have Jet.

Bad thought. Try not to go there. Done was done, and he'd just have to hope Fire Nation honor was everything his people said it was. Mushi had said they were looking for a fresh start-

No. No, he said they had no choice. Someone wants Lee dead... hell, if they've been declared traitors to the Dragon Throne, the whole Fire Nation wants them dead.

Big difference. Huge.

"So exactly what sort of plague are we looking for?" Amaya asked.

Think about them later, Huojin told himself. "Not sure. You ever hear of something called pentapox?"

Glad he was light on his feet, Zuko whipped back around the corner, out of sight of the open doorway. "What the heck is that?"

Under the formally calm mask, the Dai Li agent looked mildly amused. "It's a bear."

"That is not a platypus-bear."

A hint of humor glimmered in green eyes. "No, it isn't."

"Or a skunk-bear. Or a gopher-bear. Or even a polar bear."

The agent actually raised an eyebrow at him. "Where did you see a polar bear?"

"...The Water Tribes bring pelts into ports, sometimes." Which was true. No need to mention one of the white monsters had tried to eat him once.

"Hmm." The Dai Li gave him a slight smile. "Weirdest thing you ever saw, huh?"

Zuko stood there a moment, bits of the past few months flashing through his mind. The Avatar, eyes and tattoos glowing, rising in a waterspout that swept his men from the decks. The Fire Nation fleet, destroyed by a giant watery monster. His uncle, stripped to a loincloth, swinging chains to fight off earthbenders.

...Spirits, was he never going to get that sight out of his head?

"No," Zuko managed at last. "Not really." Ignoring the man's curious look, he opened Amaya's scroll again, reading carefully. Take it slow. Get it right the first time. Rolling the scroll back up, he stalked through the door.

"You're not Amaya." Patting the groaning bear, a young, bespectacled man in glasses and ornate Earth Kingdom green looked him over, puzzled. "You may bow, now."

I may what?!?

But he could feel the Dai Li's eyes boring into him, so Zuko throttled his temper and knelt along with the agent. At least it wasn't a full prostration. He'd be damned if he'd do that ever again.

"We are your majesty's humble servants," the agent said smoothly, as if he hadn't just tried to glare a hole through Zuko's head.

"Yes, yes, I know. But where's Amaya? Bosco's feeling so awful."

The bear groaned, like a massively oversized toddler with a tummy-ache.

"Master Amaya had a healing emergency with the Guard, your majesty," Zuko said, trying not to stumble over the odd address. There weren't any kings in the Fire Nation. Hadn't ever been. Unless you counted some of the waegu kings and queens centuries back, and no honorable great name would ever count a pirate as noble blood. "I'm her apprentice, Lee."

"Someone's hurt?" Narrow eyes widened behind glass, concerned. "I hope it's not serious."

"She's trying to make sure it's not," Zuko managed, trying to buy time to think. This is a city. A huge city. People get hurt all the time just by accident.

And one of the people who do it on purpose is kneeling right next to me.

Yet there wasn't a sliver of the glass-sharp precision Azula's voice would have had, saying the same words. Not a hint of the sadistic smirk his sister would have worn, knowing a peasant was at her nonexistent mercy. And knowing they knew it, too.

No. The man honestly seemed worried. In a distracted, optimistic way that reminded him all too much of one particular hyperactive airbender.

Why do I feel like there are two adults in this room - and I'm one of them?

Head down. Mouth shut. Things were wrong here, in a way he couldn't pin down. Better to keep his eyes open, and see what happened next.

"Well, don't just stand there. Come and give Bosco a hand!" the Earth King said cheerfully. "Don't worry; he's an excellent judge of character."

The bear growled.

...I am so dead.

"She sent someone else?" Long Feng, Grand Secretariat of Ba Sing Se and self-made power behind the throne, frowned at the report. At the information, not the agent, Quan; he had his Dai Li's unswerving loyalty for a reason. "I thought we knew of all the waterbenders in Ba Sing Se." Not that there were many, besides Healer Amaya and the Avatar's young teacher. Most of the rest were minor fishing flotsam washed up on Ba Sing Se's docks, and they tended to stay there. Amaya might never have had official combat training, thanks to the North Pole's restrictive customs, but her refusal of her family's chosen betrothal had apparently come with an inventive streak. One she tended to use on anyone who threatened to, as they'd put it, drag her back North where she belonged.

"The boy's new," Quan informed him, leaning against the wall where he'd bent a rock-tunnel to listen in on the Earth King. "Lee; no family name known. We're tracking his records now. Half Foggy Swamp, from one of the reports."

Mixed blood. Hmm. That was never predictable. Look at Kyoshi Island, jealously guarding their neutrality for almost a century, before that improbable contingent of warrior women had shown up at Full Moon Bay. At least the Fire Nation colonies forced order on their half-blooded spawn. Even if it was the enemy's order.

"But you can tell he's met a firebender," Quan went on, gesturing toward his left eye.

Scarred, then. And still alive to tell about it? Interesting. "How did he explain that to the Earth King?" Not that he expected Amaya would send someone suicidal enough to tell Kuei about the war, but you could never be too sure.

"He didn't," Quan said wryly.

"Really." Long Feng arched an elegant brow. "And?" Usually, his agents didn't wait to offer pertinent details.

A wry delight danced in Quan's eyes. "You might want to listen to this, sir." A wave of his hand opened the listening hole a little wider, just enough for both of them to hear.

"Grrgh! Arrgh!" Bosco snarled.

"Really, I don't think-" Kuei started.

"Sit! Down!" an unfamiliar teenage voice snapped, obviously out of patience.

"Graargh!"

"That means you, too!"

"Grr? Eeep!"

The next sounds were horrendously unpleasant, and reminded Long Feng of an earthbender's attempt to unclog a storm drain gone horribly, horribly wrong.

"Grrr-yipe!"

"Eww...." Kuei's voice faded, and cloth swished.

"You could have let him drop," the teenager grumbled.

"Drop his majesty?" Dai Li agent Shirong's voice held stifled laughter. Which turned to a gasping cough. "Ugh... Lee, what is that thing?"

Something squelched, and rattled. "Earring. I think. Big one. Made to look like grapes," Lee got out, with the breathless tone of someone trying not to breathe through his nose. "Jade and amethyst, maybe...."

"Hey... we had a report on that going missing!"

"Well," Lee gasped, "you've got it. Soon as someone cleans it up. Boils it, maybe." Another ragged breath. "You idiot! This isn't food!"

"Growf?"

"So. That's it." Lee breathed shallowly. "One sore gut, courtesy of eating rocks." He groaned. "Anything else?"

"I'll send in some help," the agent said kindly. "With a bathing robe, so you can get cleaned off."

"Thanks," the teenager said fervently. And gulped. "Hurry?"

"On my way."

Long Feng closed the hole with a practiced clench of his fist, and traded a speaking glance with Quan. "Shirong seems to like him." Given Shirong was one of their more skilled recruiters, when not attending to his other duties, that was... interesting.

"I'll put a rush on the report, sir," Quan nodded.

"Make sure he's not chased out of the bath too soon," Long Feng said dryly. "From the sound of that, we'll all appreciate it."

Hot water. Holding his breath, Zuko submerged completely, feeling clean warmth sink all the way into his bones. This was his third change of water, and he was finally beginning to feel like he could face food again.

The stone tub vibrated. "Don't drown in there."

Reluctantly, Zuko surfaced. And looked into startled green eyes.

Oops.

In a place that claimed there was no war, letting others see his scars probably wasn't... wise. Or conducive to survival.

"Apprentice healer?" the Dai Li agent said neutrally, politely turning his back.

Wrapping a towel around himself, Zuko tried to stay calm. "My mother didn't have time to teach me much before she was - gone. Uncle couldn't help. And Master Amaya's the first waterbender I've met who didn't try to skewer me with ice." Careful. You're a lousy liar. Stick to Amaya's story. Tell little bits, and let him put them together.

Turning toward him, the agent studied him for a long, thoughtful minute. "I can see why." Reaching out, a rock glove brushed the air near damp black hair. "Let that grow out enough for a topknot, and you could pass."

Getting out of warm water, Zuko shivered. "Don't even joke about that."

"Wasn't joking. It's always good to have another boulder to throw." He stepped back, and nodded. "I'm Shirong. I think we may be seeing more of each other." A deliberate pause. "When you check on the bear again."

Not quite a threat. I think.

"The clothes are yours. Call them recompense for the... unpleasantness." A wry look. "Someone will be here shortly with Healer Amaya's fee. They'll escort you out."

A rumble of stone, and he was gone.

Clothes?

On a table were his brown robes, freshly washed but still too wet to wear. Beside them, just far enough away that they wouldn't get damp, were another set. Not fancy; a bit of embroidery at collar and hems to add interest to durable fabric. About Middle Ring respectable, given what he'd seen around the Wen house.

Green. Argh.

Browns might be typically Earth Kingdom, but they weren't too far off the dark tones found in Fire Nation uniforms. It didn't seem right to be wearing green. Even a dark green. So dark it was almost the color of Dai Li uniforms....

Okay. Spooked now.

Nerves yelping or not, he was not going to be caught half-dressed by whoever was coming.

Green it is.

Dressing quickly, Zuko wrapped the outer robe around him. And paused, one hand pulling up a sleeve. Something's not right.

Another careful rub of fabric between his fingers, and he was sure. There's something in the hem of these.

No time to worry about it now. He wrapped and tied his sash, just as the door opened.

Amaya sat across from her friend and longtime patient, wishing she had Mushi's touch with tea. Her ginseng was bracing, but far from soothing. "I realize this must be a shock-"

"Finding out Avatar Kyoshi created the Dai Li, that was a shock," the graying professor said gruffly. "Having one of my brightest students disappear just before he was qualified to teach for an indiscreet comment on current politics, that was a shock. This? This is a disaster. "

"It's not Jinhai's fault," Amaya stated firmly.

"Try telling that to Min," Tingzhe Wen said tartly. "He's seeing his chances of joining the most elite earthbenders go up in flames. Literally." The professor stared into his cup. "Where did I go wrong, Amaya? I tried to raise my children to be honest, and upright, and to know how to use the minds the spirits gave them. And all Min wants to do is join those silencing us all." His lip curled. "For an earthbender, perhaps he's the one with too much of his mother in him."

Amaya's eyes narrowed.

Yet even as he said it, Tingzhe looked stricken. "Oma and Shu, I didn't mean-"

"I know," the healer said levelly. Better this poison came out of his system now, with her, than in a fight with Meixiang. "You've heard some of my stories of the Northern Water Tribe. Meixiang's people don't have a monopoly on the lust for power. Spirits, if they did, there would be no Dai Li." She softened her voice, using the matter-of-fact tone a fellow teacher would respond to. "But in a way, you are right, as well. Min has always had a drive to be the best. And everyone knows the Dai Li are the best. And he's sixteen. His family has always been there for him. He doesn't realize his choices could truly threaten the people he cares about."

"And this boy you want to teach Jinhai?" Tingzhe said pointedly. "Isn't he sixteen?"

"Lee is different," Amaya replied. "He's learned some very hard lessons. He's lost most of his family, and almost died himself. That changes you." She smiled. "Sixteen, yes, and he does have a temper, but Lee is far more grownup than most people I've met."

Slam!

Damp hair wild, dressed in green when she'd sent him off in brown, Lee stalked in with a bundle of damp clothing and a look that had probably sent innocent passersby and no few would-be muggers running in terror. "I want to forget today ever happened. "

"What was wrong with him?" Amaya asked warily.

"Note six," Lee growled, handing over her scrolls and a bag of coin-strings.

"Oh dear." That particular personal note on the chi chart being to the effect that Bosco could and would try to eat anything that vaguely tasted like food. She still didn't know how he'd managed to swallow a soup ladle without anyone noticing, and she wasn't inclined to find out.

"That? Was disgusting," Lee said faintly, gripping the bridge of his nose to hold back a stress headache. A very practical maneuver; she'd used it herself, often.

He does it without even thinking. Does he ever relax?

"I don't ever want to do that again, but they said someone was going to have to check on the bear, and...." Lee ground to a halt, taking in her startled guest. "You must be Professor Tingzhe Wen."

"I must, eh?" The earthbender looked Lee up and down, as if studying an essay about to be splashed with red ink.

A shadow of a smile passed over Lee's face. "Jinhai looks a lot like you."

Tingzhe leaned back in his chair, a hint of interest in hazel eyes. "That's not something I hear often."

"You don't? Oh. Because of the eyes, and...." Lee ducked his head a little. "It's the way he looks when he's trying to figure you out. You can see him thinking it over, and... sorry. I'm not real good with people."

Better than you think, Amaya considered, pleasantly surprised. Tingzhe had come in prepared for a fight, and all her efforts had barely brought him down to a simmer. Lee's simple words, a firebender affirming that Jinhai was Tingzhe's son first, and anything else only after that....

Charming people are a copper a dozen, and worth even less. You, and your uncle under the scheming... you're sincere. That's rare.

...Damn, the time. "People will be in for appointments soon," Amaya said, rising. "The two of you should take this discussion into the garden."

Tingzhe nodded, standing.

Lee hesitated. "Master Amaya. That official matter?"

You don't mention plague, because you don't want people to panic if it's not true. Smart boy.

"Completely groundless," Amaya assured him. And couldn't help but smirk. "Apparently someone played a nasty practical joke on the Fire Nation forces occupying Omashu. One that let them evacuate the entire city." She crossed her arms, imagining the chagrin when that army found out they'd been had. "I'd like to meet this Sokka of the Southern Water Tribe. He must be a wise, skilled warrior-"

Lee made a choking noise.

She eyed him.

"...Nothing, patients, I'll just-"

"You've met him." Tingzhe gave Lee a considering glance. "And if I know young men, you came off the worst." He tched. "I know it's difficult to accept at your age, but there's nothing wrong with losing to a more experienced man-

"He's fifteen! "

Dead silence.

Lee kept his hands from clenching with an effort. "Fifteen, and he's a moron, with flashes of tactical brilliance. The moron part would have gotten him killed a long time ago, except for one small detail. He's traveling with the Avatar. " Her apprentice let out a breath, visibly forcing himself to calm down. "So you're right. I fought him. And I lost." Lee bowed to her, jaw set. "Master. I need a little air."

"Go," she said, troubled. Keeping just enough of an eye on him to be sure he headed into the garden, and not back out on the street with unsuspecting passersby. Waited long enough for him to get out of earshot, and whistled. "Well. I certainly didn't expect that." Either he met Sokka traveling... or I was right, and he has been to the poles. Both of them.

Staring at the screens to the garden, the professor blinked, and glanced at her. "It explains a great deal of the prickliness. It's one thing to lose fairly. To lose because your opponent brought his own army along, that's quite another matter. Especially to an honorable young man."

"His uncle swears Lee wasn't part of the war," Amaya protested. Even if he was trained for it.

"My dear healer, we're all part of the war," Tingzhe said dryly. "He may not have been a soldier, but if a Water Tribe boy ended up in the same town with your apprentice - your people have a long history of attacking enemies first."

Amaya frowned, uncertain how to take that. "So who do you believe was at fault?"

"How should I know? I wasn't there," Tingzhe stated gruffly. And frowned. "He has some very interesting turns of phrase, your Lee. If he wasn't in the army, he certainly received a military education. Though I imagine that's true of most firebenders, these days." He stood there a long moment, thinking. "I haven't made up my mind. Not yet. But I would like to speak with him. If you believe he'll calm down any time soon?"

"He's probably calm now," Amaya sighed. "Or at least controlled. He's good at that." Too good, I think.

"Hmm." Tingzhe gave her a dry smile. "Well then. Time to face the dragon."

He's a very small dragon.

Approaching quietly, Tingzhe took a moment to study the young man seated on the ground, trailing his fingers in Amaya's pond. Really, it was a wonder he'd managed to pass unnoticed this long. The fine, lean features, the pale skin... add a topknot, change green eyes and robe to gold and red, and he'd be any young great name right out of the classical scrolls.

A testament to how much people simply don't see, I imagine.

"Eleven," Lee said quietly. "I counted them all. Three times." He looked at the water, obviously seeing... somewhere else. "That's how many of our men we pulled out of the water, after they were gone. The water that was ice, on the deck... and the water that wasn't, overboard." He shook his head, slowly. "The spearmen Katara froze got lucky. Once we broke them out, they just needed some hot drinks. But by the time we got the ship out of the iceberg and turned around for the ones the Avatar swept overboard... it was so close. Too close." He swallowed dryly. "I had to count. I didn't know all their names. That water's so cold.... "

Cold, and dark. The two most sure ways to kill a firebender. Decided, Tingzhe sat down. "And that's how you met Sokka?"

"I don't expect you to understand." Lee still wouldn't look at him. "The Fire Lord has declared the Avatar an enemy of the Fire Nation. We had to investigate. We didn't hurt anyone!" He yanked his fingers out of the water, drops rising off as steam. "We scared people. We threatened women and children. I'm not proud of that. The Avatar promised to go with us, and - our commander promised not to hurt anyone. We left. " A deep breath. "And then Sokka and his waterbending sister decided to land a ten-ton flying monster on our ship, and everything went to hell."

The professor kept silent, using decades of a life of reason and logic to work his way past his first, emotional reactions. Shock wouldn't help anyone. Neither would anger at a young man who'd been doing... well, what quite a few of his countrymen apparently thought was the reasonable thing to do. "I understand that the Fire Nation sets a high value on honor," Tingzhe said levelly. "If your commander did offer a prisoner reasonable parole, and he broke it, even with outside instigation... yes, from what I've read of your history, that's a grave insult indeed." He regarded the young man carefully. "What truly surprises me is that you're more upset about the casualties."

Lee shrugged, as if it didn't matter what he thought. "Sokka's dangerous. He turns things loose, and he doesn't think. He gets out of things because he's lucky, not because he's trained. His sister's a master waterbender, and his friend is the Avatar, so he's got a lot of luck on his side. And spirits." Closing his eyes, Lee hugged his knees to his chest. "Ask Master Amaya about the North Pole. I don't want to think about it."

A century of war, your nation has unleashed on mine. His students might joke that he still lived in the reign of the forty-sixth Earth King, but Tingzhe was perfectly well aware of the war. There just wasn't anything he could do about it, save help his people remember their past, so they would have hope of a better future. I should feel pleased at the Avatar's retribution.

But this wasn't the Fire Lord. This was a scarred young man who'd seen as much horror as any veteran on the Wall. Who'd fled the war, just as Meixiang had.

Stop stalling, Tingzhe told himself firmly. You already know what you've decided. "My wife says you want to teach Jinhai to put fires out."

"It's the first thing my mother taught me." Lee uncurled to look at him, green eyes bright and serious as fire. "My sister - there were a lot of benders around, and... you don't want two benders flaring the same flame. It's harder than starting a fire, but it makes things safer. Less scary." Lee's glance slid sideways; returned, determined. "He'll always be yours first, you know. Uncle says other nations aren't bound by loyalty the same way we are. Not in their spirits. Jinhai's a firebender, and you're his parents, and he loves you. No matter what I teach him, he'll always look to you first. Always."

Tingzhe tried not to start, recognizing the archaic phrase from one of the old letters he'd recently found in the university's collection.

"Who do you look to, dragon-born?"

"I am cast upon the waves, for my clan is fled, and our stronghold ashes."

"Who would you look to, dragon-born?"

"I seek a great name, one worthy of my blade and fire."

-Or so the story goes, the letter went on. Which should have clued in the hapless oni that all he was going to get was coin-hire, not loyalty, and when the clan regrouped, he'd be ogre flambé. But that's folktales for you. And now you're chasing folktales in Ba Sing Se. Father, please be careful. I know you promised your friend, but your clan needs you too.

A few days' research hadn't been enough to track down what Lady Kotone's father had promised, but given a letter written only decades ago had been tucked into scrolls on Avatar Yangchen, the last Air Nomad Avatar... well.

Perhaps it's better not to mention that Avatar Aang visited the university only a few days ago. Body or pride, sometimes the best medicine is time. "I'll speak with Amaya about a good time for you to come," Tingzhe said bluntly.

"Can you be there?"

Given he'd been about to put his foot down on just that, the professor arched a foreboding brow.

"Fire and earth aren't as different as people think," Lee explained. "The stances aren't the same, and we spend a lot more time in the air. But if you watch, you'll see... things in common." He let out a breath, and nodded, determined. "So if something goes wrong, and the Dai Li catch me - you'll know where to start to help Jinhai teach himself."

Tingzhe scowled at him. "You will not get caught. Not if you're careful."

"I'm careful," Lee said dryly. "Things just happen around me. No matter what I plan. So it's better if you know. Besides, Madam Wen might want to brush up on her forms, too."

"My wife," Tingzhe said with deliberate calm, "is not a firebender."

"I know that," Lee said, obviously puzzled.

"So why would you think she knows any firebending forms?" Tingzhe went on, eyeing him as he would any student who hadn't done the assigned reading.

"Because everyone does?" Lee said, exasperated. "The ones for self-defense?" The young man looked suddenly thoughtful. "Unless she's like Huojin, mostly raised here...."

"No... you really do teach your women to fight?" Tingzhe shook his head, years of study suddenly tilted awry. "I've read references to women warriors, but I thought they were - well, myths. Like Wan Shi Tong, or the Blue Spirit. No one's ever seen one."

"Oh, that's going to change," Lee muttered. Gave him an incredulous look. "Kyoshi Island teaches women to fight."

"That may be true," the professor admitted, "but everyone knows they're a few stones short of a mountain."

Lee stared at him, as if he'd suggested walking into the midst of a pit of viper-hornets. "Suyin and Jia don't know how to fight?"

"Jia's a skilled earthbender," Tingzhe said impatiently. "I'm certain that if she had the misfortune to deal with a rude young man, she could lock him up neatly until the guard arrived-

Lee buried his face in his hands.

"Young man, what is the matter with you?"

Lee shook his head, and looked up. "And what about Suyin? Or what if it's not a rude young man Jia has to deal with? What if it's Dai Li?"

Tingzhe gaped at him, aghast. "You can't fight the Dai Li!"

"Never give up without a fight." Fiery green bored into him. "If you want me to train Jinhai - then I train Suyin, too."

"She's not even a bender!"

"Some of the most dangerous people in the world aren't benders," Lee said impatiently. "Master Piandao defeated a hundred soldiers single-handed!"

"Who?"

Lee started to speak, and stopped. "Just - someone I heard of. Years ago." He folded his hands, straightening; equal to equal. "Please consider it. We can't always be there to protect the people we care about. The best thing we can do is teach them to protect themselves."

"I'll talk to Healer Amaya," Tingzhe said finally. "It's been very... interesting, to speak with you." He inclined his head, and Lee bowed.

The very picture of a polite young man, the professor thought, leaving. But when you truly care about something, when that inner fire flares... only a blind man can't see what you are.

What is a great name's son doing in Ba Sing Se?

Chapter End Notes

A/N by Vathara:

Waegu - Korean, "brigands from Wa", i.e. Japan. Came into Japanese as wako. Basically, pirates.

About Huojin's reaction to figuring out two imperial firebenders are on his hands - put it in context. You're a regular U.S. cop on the beat. You're armed, and so, legally, are a fair amount of your fellow citizens. (Let's not worry about the differences between steel and bending, at the moment.)

And then you find out two newcomers to the neighborhood have a Sherman tank parked in their backyard.

Yeah.

Of course, it's actually worse than Huojin thinks. Canon, we've seen Iroh and Zuko flatten about two dozen imperial firebenders... after drifting in the polar ocean for three weeks, injured, hungry, and fending off sea vultures. And who knows what else.

Huojin's probably better off not knowing that....

Chapter 12

Click.

"Huh."

A whisper of thread and cloth. Another soft, almost inaudible click. "Uncle," Zuko said thoughtfully, "you might want to look at this."

Evening tea in hand, Iroh moved to see what his nephew was doing, sitting cross-legged on the floor with scissors and a bowl and... his new green robes, from which he had carefully pulled out the threads binding the hems. Oh dear.

Click.

Frowning, Iroh crouched to reach into the bowl, pressing a fingertip down to pick up one of the tiny stone beads. Gray, mostly quartz, no bigger than a millet grain... and one of many Zuko was picking out of the robe's inner hems. "And this was given to you by a Dai Li."

"I can think of a lot of things they could do to someone wearing these, and I don't like any of them," Zuko said grimly, picking out another bead. Click.

"Interesting," Iroh murmured, considering the potential motives behind such a perilous gift. Serious harm seemed possible, but unlikely; the amount of stone was small, and even an earthbender who knew they were there would be hard-pressed to pull them together swiftly enough to draw blood. They could tangle and bind, certainly, hampering an unwary wearer, but the trap was not as lethal as it first appeared-

Iroh's eyebrows arched in surprise, as an unlikely possibility occurred to him. "We must mend these tonight, after you have finished," the retired general said thoughtfully. "You should wear this, when you are called to check the bear again."

Zuko frowned, teasing out more stone. "They'll ask for Amaya."

"I believe they will ask for you."

Zuko stared at the bead in his hand, then at him. "This is some kind of test?"

"It may be."

"I stuck to the story," Zuko whispered, face ashen.

"There are some things you cannot hide. And they have nothing to do with that scar," Iroh added sharply, as his nephew's hand crept toward his face. Spirits, how do I say this? My brother decreed you useless, and you have no idea how wrong he was. "You have habits of caution most your age lack. You move in a balanced stance. You determine where in a room you are, and how you might best leave it if violence erupts. And while most within these walls are civilians, with no knowledge of what it is they see-

"The Dai Li aren't most." Zuko swallowed, and deliberately dropped the latest bead into the bowl. "It'd look worse if I showed up with these still there, wouldn't it?"

"For one they suspect has a warrior's training? Yes. It would."

"Jet," Zuko snarled, almost a curse.

"It is likely someone made note of that fight." Iroh stroked his beard, thinking. "Keep to our story. Your mother was Foggy Swamp, and we have traveled for years, mostly on the western coast. If this Shirong has already noted you can pass for Fire Nation, he may draw his own conclusions."

Zuko went from pale to red, shaking. "My parents were married!"

"And there is no reason to claim they were not," Iroh said calmly. "Sozin's forces were in the Earth Kingdom decades before I was born. If we are pressed, if there is no way to escape without some explanation - then admit you suspect one of your grandparents was a colonial. But insist the family has never spoken of such things. Which is fact, and will help the tale ring true."

His nephew looked down, fury fading. "I didn't intend to get us in trouble."

Iroh smiled, and rested a hand on his shoulder. "You cannot help being who you are, Prince Zuko. I do not think they believe you are an enemy."

"Then why-?"

"I do not yet know," Iroh said truthfully. Though he had suspicions. None of which quite made sense, given the Dai Li knew his nephew was not an earthbender. "Lean on Lee. Be wary, but calm, when they speak with you. You have done nothing wrong." He lowered himself to the floor, eyeing the opened hem. "Let us see how swiftly we can clear this trap."

Gather, and throw.

Water snapped closed around the candle, flickering flame trapped in a bubble of air. Letting out a slow breath, Zuko held the trailing strand of the water-net in his right hand. Carefully, concentrating, brought the main strand over with his left, and gingerly slipped it free. And tried, yet again, to do the impossible.

Water yields and changes. Use a light grip. Steady....

Reaching out with his left hand, he sought fierce determination. And pushed - slowly - down.

Inside the smoke-darkened bubble, the flame sank into a bare glow around the wick.

Two kinds of energy. Ow, my head.

No. He wasn't going to quit. Not yet.

Zuko reeled in the net, setting the candle down on the floor in front of him. This was where it had gone wrong a dozen times before....

Gentle movements. Like stroking fire-lilies.

Water curled back like petals, exposing the red-glowing wick. He held it to just that glow, despite the rush of fresh air. Three, two, one....

And released.

The candle flared back into life, casting golden glints across water still curled around wax.

...I did it.

Water wavered, threatening to fall.

Don't jump! It's not fire. Move smoothly. Call it.

A curl of his fingers, and water coalesced into a globe in his palm. Zuko smiled thinly, and tipped it back into the pitcher.

Then collapsed backward onto the floor of his room, stifling tired giggles. I did it!

Granted, compared to what he'd seen at the North Pole, it was about as impressive as one sparkler in the midst of a festival fireworks display. But it'd worked.

Uncle always said, if you don't know what you're doing, start small.

I wish I could tell him.

Head against wood, Zuko winced. He had to tell Iroh. Granted, they were working on the evacuation plan together, but he'd be surprised if there weren't half a dozen aspects of it the retired general had thought of and he hadn't, yet. Things that might hinge on them both being firebenders of Sozin's blood.

I have to tell him. I just - can't. Not yet.

...I'm ashamed.

Shame. Inner turmoil. Part of what Uncle thought kept him from the calm needed for lightning.

I'm ashamed to be a waterbender.

Why am I ashamed? I didn't ask for this! I didn't want it! The spirits just decided to screw with me, like they have all my life-

Because we're Sozin's children.

Sozin the hero. Sozin the conqueror. Sozin, who'd instigated a bloody massacre whose extent made Zuko sick. It was one thing to walk in the Western Air Temple a century after the bloodshed had ended. Another to have met Aang, to have hunted him across the world, and slowly realize there had once been thousands of airbenders just like him, soaring between the four corners of the earth.

How could he? How could anyone?

Zuko shivered and sat up, faintly nauseous. Just thinking about how they'd died - men, women, and children - it made him feel... ashamed.

I'm ashamed to be Sozin's heir. I'm ashamed not to be Sozin's heir.

I'm confused.

It hurts.

It ached inside, like being trapped under ice without air. His thoughts were scattered as feathers in the wind, he didn't know what to do, it wasn't fair-!

"Prince Zuko." Iroh's voice; one of many long-ago lessons. "If you are lost in the wilderness, the first thing you must do is sit down."

Sit down. Calm down. Breathe.

The candle-flame breathed with him.

"What do you have, and what do you need?"

What he had? Was impossible-

Focus, damn it!

What he had was himself, and Uncle, and an as-yet unknown possible amount of help from the rest of the hidden folk in Ba Sing Se. What he needed-

I want to save my people.

Nice goal. Very pretty. Just the kind of thing the Avatar would get behind, if they were anybody but Fire Nation.

Aang is an idealistic idiot. What do you need, that you can do? Survival. Focus on the basics.

Breathe. Feel the heartbeat of the flame....

I need someplace some of my people can survive.

All right. Assuming he and Uncle pulled off a miracle and outwitted the spirits long enough to make this work, some would survive. Though it wouldn't be the Fire Nation he'd grown up in.

In the Fire Nation, Jinhai could be challenged to an Agni Kai at thirteen. I don't want that to happen. It's... wrong.

Don't think about it.

So. One small band of exiles to keep the fire alive. What would stop Earth and Water from just rolling right over them?

We'll need fortifications. And we'll have to be smart about them. Metal if we can get it. Wood if we can't. Tremor-sensors, to detect earthbenders making tunnels. Having other elements on our side would help, a lot. If the Wen family comes - earthbenders would let us build multiple lines of defense. We could even build walls meant to come down.

Breathing and flame were steady. Good.

So. How does being a waterbender affect the plan?

Assuming the people he was trying to help didn't mind waterbenders... they knew Amaya. It shouldn't be a problem. If he was trained, if he had the courage to tell Amaya and ask for her help, it could even be an asset. Diverting water made a lot of things easier. Healing would save lives.

One down. Zuko glanced at the candle, making sure nothing flammable was within yards. Now. Think. Does it matter if you're of Sozin's line? Does it matter for the plan?

Flames burst up a foot, before he could damp them again. It hurt.

Gripping his knees, Zuko fought the anger and grief and bewilderment back down. Like it or not, true or not, he and Iroh had both been declared traitors to the Dragon Throne. It didn't matter who they were. Not anymore.

Anyone who comes, is going to come because they want to. Not because they're loyal to us.

Which would be the case with anyone who showed up later, as well. And Uncle seemed convinced people would show up.

Think about that. Zuko frowned. The hidden folk here - they ran. And they made it. But they're hiding.

We wouldn't be hiding. We're not going to be sending up fireworks, but we won't be hiding.

If people know there's somewhere else to go, if they get the idea that you can make somewhere else to go....

What would happen, if Ozai died, and some of the great names just didn't confirm their loyalty to Azula?

You'd have to have guts to pull it off. You'd have to have power, and a fortified domain, and loyal people.

There were places like that in the Fire Nation. Some of the smaller, more out of the way islands, who contributed men and weapons to the war but otherwise mostly kept to themselves. Just the kind of places that'd be most likely to survive an angry world's retribution.

If we can pull this off, we won't be alone.

None of that needed him to be Prince Zuko, son of Ozai, grandson of Azulon. They'd have a plan. Those they were trying to rescue would think it was a good idea, or they wouldn't. That was it.

He had to put his head down and just breathe. The room kept trying to spin.

It doesn't matter who I am. If the plan is good, it doesn't matter if I'm crown prince, or just... just Lee, the refugee.

Only it did matter. And not just to him.

I'm not Lee. I wish I was. Lee doesn't have orders.

Still. The Avatar wasn't here.

And if he's smart, he never will be. The army keeps attacking this place, he'd be an idiot to come here when he hasn't mastered all four elements yet....

Oh. Wait.

Zuko sighed, gripping the bridge of his nose. He's an idiot, but Katara's got some sense. And Toph sounds pretty solid, from what Uncle said. He won't be here.

And given that going after three master benders on his own - plus one idiot with a boomerang - was a quick way to get himself dropped in a bloodied heap somewhere... and given Azula was probably following the whole idealistic bunch like a vulture-wasp on a corpse-scent... no.

He was loyal. He was. But Azula wanted him dead, and he was not going to hand himself over gift-wrapped.

So. Simple enough. So long as he was in Ba Sing Se, he'd do what he could for his people. The Avatar would just have to wait.

I chased ghosts for almost three years. At least now, I know he's real.

A real headache. Which he was not going to think about any more tonight. He had work in the morning.

Maybe they'll forget about the bear....

Morning singing through his veins as he stood in the luxurious kennel, Zuko eyed the bear in the ridiculous green jacket and hat.

Bosco eyed him back. Shifted restlessly, muzzle starting to wrinkle in a snarl-

"Sit."

"Growf?" Blinking innocently, Bosco sat, as if it'd been his idea all along.

Hot water wrapped around his hands, Zuko ran his fingers over brown fur, paying special attention to the generous gut. So far, everything seemed to be fine. A few knots twinged at him, recalling other unwise meals. He melted those, as much as they'd let him.

Be thorough. Maybe you won't have to come back.

"It's amazing how he listens to you," the Earth King said cheerfully. "Not even one playful little nip!"

Brown bear eyes peered Zuko's way, tongue slurping in anticipation of just such a nip.

Zuko glared.

The tongue slipped back inside the mouth, as if sucked up through a straw.

Right. Behave. Or else. "You really shouldn't let him bite people."

"Muzzle his natural protective instincts?" the king said, aghast. "He's my friend!"

Your friend has enough teeth and claws to make the Unagi think twice. One of these days, somebody's going to regret that. Zuko stifled a sigh. "If we let ostrich-horses follow their natural instincts, they'd bolt every time a komodo-rhino came onto the field."

"Why would that ever be a problem?" the Earth King asked, puzzled. "Komodo-rhinos live in the Fire Nation."

"Right," Zuko said uneasily, aware of listening ears. "But what if-" Damn, what do I say, Azula would know what to say, she got Ty Lee to believe in her- oh. "What about traveling circuses?" he blurted out.

...Oh yeah. That really sounds plausible. Good going.

"Traveling circuses?" the Earth King said skeptically.

"Well, they have animal acts, and...." As brown brows climbed higher, Zuko sighed. "Never mind.

He's fine. Just don't let him eat anything else that's not food."

"Animal acts." The Earth King chuckled. "You're a strange young man."

You have no idea.

"Well, you may go."

"Your majesty," Zuko managed stiffly, kneeling. And retreated, as fast as was politely possible.

Hate this, hate this, hope I never have to do it again-

A green-uniformed figure fell in silently beside him. "Circuses?" Shirong said, amused.

"It could happen," Zuko said defensively. Braced himself with Lee, trying to think and act like a typical refugee.

A refugee they know can use dao. Oh, this is going to be fun.

Shirong kept walking beside the young man, enjoying the unexpected silence. Lee didn't try to explain or defend himself. He'd just offered a possible, if not very plausible, explanation - and let it drop.

Interesting young man.

Half Foggy Swamp, according to the report on the teashop brawl. Which wasn't in his official papers. But then, it seemed likely there was quite a bit about Lee, and his uncle, that wasn't in their papers.

Original hometown listed as Taku. Right.

Taku wasn't there anymore. Nothing really was, except a half-mad herbalist and that damned Pohuai Stronghold with its thrice-damned Yu Yan. Which made it the perfect place to base papers for people trying to hide something... well, possibly even worse than kin in the Foggy Swamp.

He really does have their looks. Poor kid.

Could come in handy, though. As could the waterbending. Especially given the special situation they had in the Upper Ring.

Avatar Kyoshi left us prepared to deal with any element. But that isn't the same as having someone who can feel it.

Granted, the situation was currently under control. But you could never tell what kids that age would do. And the thought of a fourteen-year-old waterbending master loose in his city gave Shirong cold chills.

Still. Lee's not an earthbender. If we're going to make exceptions, he's got to be worth it.

Well. Time to figure out how badly Lee reacted to booby-traps. Shirong lifted gloved fingers slightly, gestured-

A small cloth bag slid out of Lee's left sleeve. The teenager caught it automatically, then stopped, and turned to hold it out to him with a bow. "I didn't break any. They looked like they took time to make."

Startled, Shirong took it, and gestured more openly. Tiny as they were, any lone bead should still respond.

Nothing. Not a whisper of earth from collar or hems. "You found them."

Lee's lone brow lifted. "Wasn't I supposed to?"

Shirong weighed the young man in his gaze, and smiled wryly. "Come with me."

He led them through walls and corridors, into one of the small rock rooms his fellow agents used for private conversations. Set the pouch down on a low table, where a long bag already rested. "How did you find them?"

"I noticed the color." Lee's face was serious, but a little quiet pride warred with the wariness in his gaze. "Then I felt something in the hem. So when I got home, I checked." He rubbed cloth between his fingers. "Water... you have to feel what you're doing. I haven't had a lot of practice, but I know that much."

And you're still not asking why, Shirong noted. You want to. I can see how badly you want to. But you know enough to be wary of us. So you're waiting, no matter how hard it is.

Wary, but not afraid. Interesting. "I'm surprised someone with your sword-skills wants to be a healer."

"Master Amaya is a good teacher," Lee said levelly. "I can waterbend. I can't get away from that. I have to learn how to control it." A sardonic snort. "Or every teashop in Ba Sing Se's going to throw me out. And my uncle loves tea."

Observant, good blade skills, and sarcastic understatement. My, my. "I'm told women from the Northern Water Tribe aren't taught combative waterbending," Shirong said levelly, taking a blue-capped scroll tube out of the bag. "That seems like a shame."

Lee stood still as ice. Only his eyes burned, green flame in a pale face.

I thought so. You're a fighter. You know what this is. And you want it. Shirong kept his gaze locked on the teenager's. You want it, but you know there's going to be a price. And some prices are too high. You're not one to be trapped that way, are you? If what I ask is too much, if you believe it will lead to more than your soul can bear - you'll walk right out that door.

Good. Good. Weak-spirited benders had no place in the Dai Li. They might be fit enough for the Outer Wall, where all they faced were human enemies. Inside the walls, where dissent and restless spirits roamed... you couldn't send a man ruled by his own desires up against a kamuiy. It'd be a slaughter. "Do you love this city, Lee?"

"I've only been here a few days," the teenager said quietly. Still looking at him, and not the scroll.

"But you have people you care about here," Shirong said evenly. "People you want to protect." He raised a hand for patience as the boy took a dangerous step back. "That's not a threat. I don't know who's tried to kill you in the past, besides that young idiot Jet, but I would never threaten your uncle. Family is important. Why else would we fight? Honor? Pride?" The agent shook his head. "Leave those to young fools who don't know any better. You know what's important. You protected your family, and you left a young idiot alive to learn from his mistakes." He had to chuckle. "Not only that, you made it so glaringly obvious he was wrong, he may just settle down and become a decent citizen. Which would be best for everyone."

Lee let out a slow breath, still wary as an alley pygmy puma. "What do you want?"

"Want? I want those with the power to protect this city to have the skills they need as well."
Shirong held out the scroll. "This is a loan, not a gift. I'm going to need it back."

Lee's hand closed around it; firmly, but not too tight. "I'll show this to Master Amaya, and ask if she considers this appropriate to learn." Tucking the scroll into his kit, he bowed formally.

"You do that," Shirong said lightly, returning the bow. Escorted the young man back to the main corridors, and silently perched on a handy wall to watch him leave.

Not long after, quiet feet stopped underneath him. "Well?" Long Feng said dryly.

Smirking, Shirong dropped the bag of beads into his hands.

Long Feng hefted the rustling cloth, puzzled. Brought it near his ear, shook it, and jerked his head up to eye Shirong in amazement.

"Every. Last. One," Shirong said, with great satisfaction.

His leader frowned. "Even a skilled earthbender-"

"Could apparently learn something from paranoid fingers," Shirong shrugged.

"Hmm." The Grand Secretariat nodded. "What did you promise him?"

"Nothing."

Long Feng arched a brow.

"That boy's dealt with manipulators before, sir. Dangerous ones. One hint of a snare, he'll be gone."

"He's inside the Impenetrable City," Long Feng said dryly. "Where would he go?"

"He'd think of something." Shirong shifted against the wall, thinking. "You don't promise an abandoned pygmy puma, sir. You leave out food, and you leave the window open. And you wait."

"We have dozens of eager candidates," Long Feng said levelly. "Why should we wait for this one?"

"Besides the reasons you outlined before, sir?" Waterbender. Earth Kingdom native. Already trained to be dangerous. Known family here, so it's in his interests to cooperate. "He's not eager. Which means when he is convinced, he'll stay that way. He's inventive, tenacious, and thorough. And he knows how to discipline himself. Even when it's something he wants very badly."

Long Feng stood still, eyes half-closed as he considered that. Nodded once. "I assume by wait, you mean that your efforts with him will not conflict with your other duties?"

"It's unlikely they would." Shirong glanced down. "Did a report come in I should be aware of?"

"No." But Long Feng still frowned. "They claim to have been wandering for some time. If this boy is the quality we need - why hasn't the army found him before now?"

"His uncle," Shirong said levelly. "Who else is going to look after an old man with no family? I doubt Jet's the first one to attack them."

"Hmm." The Grand Secretariat nodded. "Carry on."

The Dai Li are trying to recruit me. Heading through the busy streets of the Middle Ring's early afternoon for Jinhai's first lesson, Zuko tried - again - to make sense out of the situation. He'd seen politics and negotiations played out for as long as he'd been old enough to remember. Shirong was subtle; a lot more like Lieutenant Jee, or even Uncle, than a blustering weasel-snake like Zhao. But not subtle enough. He knew what had just happened.

It just didn't make sense.

The Dai Li are trying to... oh, hell. Tell Uncle - tell Amaya! - and try not to think about it. A refugee wouldn't know what just happened. Right?

He didn't know. Which was sobering and scary at once. How could people spend their whole lives not knowing the deadly dance of lords and courts?

How can I pass for normal, when I don't even know what it is?

At least one good thing had come out of the whole mess. Uncle was right. They didn't think he was Fire Nation. Shirong would never have offered that scroll to an enemy....

I'm being followed.

Zuko had grown up in cities before he'd been cast out into the wilds of the world. He knew this game.

First, match the crowd's pace.

Sometimes that was enough to throw off an unskilled pursuer. Blending with dozens of other people turned a clear target into one beast in a komodo-rhino stampede. If his tail hadn't marked him, specifically-

He has. Zuko glanced subtly back to catch the ripple in the crowd as someone forced their way around a knot of happily chatting wives out to market. The people between them hid who he sought, but from their glances of disapproval, and startled fear....

Male. Probably younger than they are. Probably armed.

...Oh, hell.

Ahead, the odd flutter of a noodle-shop curtain caught Zuko's eye. No one had just passed through, and the breeze from the street shouldn't push that way, which meant the breeze had to come from somewhere else- yes!

Speeding up, Zuko smiled and fell in beside another knot of women bent on acquiring dry noodles for tonight's dinner. Politely worked his way around the edge of colorful dresses as they stopped for a last-minute discussion on the merits of northern winter wheat versus southern summer. Hovered on the far side of a stately elderly matron, head down as if he wouldn't even think of cutting ahead of his elders.

And vanished down the tiny alley just beside the shop.

Hurry; any minute he'll realize you're not with them....

The alley was almost skinny enough to climb like a rock chimney. Unsure exactly how resilient his waterskin was, Zuko resisted the temptation, fingers and boots finding holds on the shop's earthbent stone wall. One floor, two, three - roof!

He swung up onto umber clay tiles, quiet feet careful not to dislodge any that might be less than securely fastened. Crept into the best shadows he could find, that would keep him hidden yet still let him look.

Even from above, the twin hook swords were unmistakable.

...Damn it.

He'd rather have been followed by Dai Li.

Not that Zuko wanted to be followed by anyone. But the Dai Li knew Amaya. They probably also knew the Wen family were long-standing patients. If her apprentice visited - well, what was odd about that?

But if Jet saw Meixiang, or Jinhai....

He was looking for Fire Nation on a secret ferry. Why wouldn't he look for them here?

Jinhai had just started bending. If Jet frightened him - there would be sparks, count on it.

I'm not going to let that happen.

Right. He'd just sneak away, circle around, leave Jet fuming in the street....

No.

Not just his own hot temper. Lee, bristling like a porcupine-boar.

I'm Amaya's apprentice. I have every right to be walking these streets. He's the one who should be skulking, not me!

Not the most cautious reaction. But sometimes the cautious plan wasn't the smart one.

I'm Lee. Amaya's apprentice. An Earth Kingdom waterbender. And I've done nothing wrong.

I have to act like it.

Okay. Act like an outraged, innocent teenager. But Jet was armed.

He's never lived in cities, Zuko thought. If you're not a great name, you don't go armed unless you're looking for trouble-

Water sloshed as he leaned back in shadow, and Zuko froze. I am armed.

Think it through. If you heat up the water you can firebend it, but if he still thinks we're Fire Nation, you don't want to do that. Meaning you're stuck with something you can barely use- he's coming!

Country-bred or not, it looked like Jet had finally spotted the alley. Fists clenched, he stalked in.

Loosening the cap on his water-skin, Zuko beckoned coolness around his hands. For a moment he thought the angry teenager would walk on by. But wherever he'd come from, Jet must have had some experience tracking; the freedom fighter glanced at the wall, and stiffened-

Throw!

Water snapped dead on target. Zuko yanked, and leather tore.

Clutching still-sheathed hooked swords, Zuko glared down at Jet. "Why are you following me?"

Chewing on yet another wheat straw, Jet glared back. "Maybe you didn't notice, but it's a free city."

That? Is so many kinds of wrong. "Fine." Water back in its skin, Zuko shook the swords. "Good luck ever finding these again."

"Yeah, why not?" Jet said darkly. "You kill and burn and murder, why not steal, too?"

"You're still-" Zuko swore under his breath, fighting the temptation to shower sparks. Bad idea. "Are you blind? I'm a waterbender!"

"Your uncle's not." Brown eyes narrowed at him. "I know what he is."

Must not kill idiot. "I already told you-"

"Your mother was from Foggy Swamp?" Jet said contemptuously. "His brother's wife? If he even is your uncle. Though I guess that's not a lie, no way would a firebender pick up some orphan who looks like the losing side of a fire duel...."

Will. Not. Kill him. The world shimmered in a red haze. He wanted to break something. Lots of things. Preferably Jet's bones-

There was a smirk tugging at Jet's mouth, as he subtly shifted stance.

He's waiting for me to come down there.

I don't think so.

The rage didn't fade. If anything, it burned hotter. But he was a firebender. He could hold fire in his bare hands, if he wanted. And he would hold his temper. Now. "You make me sick."

Jet's smirk slipped.

"A fresh start, you said. A second chance. And you want to harass an old man who works in a tea shop?" Zuko's eyes narrowed. "What kind of freedom fighter picks on civilians? There's a whole wall that needs people on it, protecting it! Protecting the innocent people trying to survive here! You want to fight the Fire Nation?" He jabbed a finger toward the Outer Wall, looming far in the distance. "Go fight out there!"

"And let a happy little traitor's family slip away?" Jet taunted, muscles tensing to spring and climb the wall. "I don't think-"

"Don't. Ever. Call my uncle a traitor again."

Eyes suddenly wary, Jet backed up a step, almost to the opposite wall.

Zuko forced himself to breathe, water curling around his hand like octopus tentacles. I didn't call...

never mind. Use the anger. Don't let it use you. "That's what this is all about, isn't it? I still have a family. And you don't. You bastard."

"What would you know about it?" Jet flung up at him. "You've never lost anything to those Fire Nation-"

"What the hell makes you think that?" Don't kill him. Amaya will be disappointed if you kill him. "I lost my parents!" Mother gone; a father that only wanted him disgraced or dead. "I lost my sister!" Maybe Azula had never been anything but evil, he didn't know. But losing Mom had sent her spiraling into Ozai's approval, and there was nothing he could do to stop it. "I lost everything I had!" My honor. My country. My throne.

Breathe. Move the water. Don't make it steam.

"I lost everything," Zuko said, more quietly. "Except my uncle. And you want to hurt him, too?" He stared down, pinning the brown gaze with his own. "Let me tell you something about the Water Tribes, Jet. The most important thing there is, is family. And Uncle is mine."

Jet's eyes shifted to dancing water. "Sure, bend your way out of trouble. You can't take me in a fair fight. And you know it."

Zuko let himself smirk, fire still blazing in his veins. "That's not going to work," he said, almost kindly. "I told you. Family. That means I don't have to fight fair." His smirk deepened, showed a faint glint of teeth. "I don't have to fight at all."

Jet was back against the wall, now, face slowly paling as his shoulders pressed against stone.

"Stay away from me," Zuko said, voice deadly quiet. "Stay away from my uncle." Water snaking back into the skin, he turned, and headed across the roof, leaving the swords behind.

"Or what?" Jet hurled defiantly after him.

Snorting, Zuko stepped into a blind spot formed by a chimney and a flapping line of laundry, and vanished. You're not stupid. You figure it out.

Though he wasn't quite sure about the not stupid part. For a guy who thought they were murdering Fire Nation scum, Jet seemed to be risking a lot on the assumption they'd behave like civilized people.

Maybe he'll think it through. Maybe.

For now, he'd lost the angry teen. Time to put that to good use.

A firebender. Waiting inside the front door, Suyin picked nervously at her cuffs. Lee's a real firebender. And he's going to help.

She wasn't quite sure how to feel about that. On the one hand, the relief was strong enough to knock her silly. She wasn't going to be alone anymore, trying to keep fires from flaring and sparks from flying. Not that she'd been totally alone, but Jia was so busy with her classes and her friends and her bending... and keeping Min from poking his nose in. Which had been a lot of help. Really.

On the other hand, some boy she didn't know was going to be teaching her little brother. Sure, Amaya vouched for him, and he'd acted a lot less blue-nosed monkey "ooh, ooh, ooh," than Min did, but what did she really know about him? Besides the fact that he was a firebender... and he wanted her to train, too.

I'm not even a bender!

None of them had overheard what Mom and Dad said to each other, after "Professor" Dad came back from Amaya's clinic. But you could hear the tone. Some of it was angry, and some surprised, and there had been this one odd thump right in the middle of it all.

And her Dad had wandered out of the bedroom rubbing his head and looking very thoughtful. Wrong period artifact in the dig thoughtful. And Mom had come out just a little after, looking oddly sheepish and amused all at once. With her clothes a little disheveled. And not that way.

After which Dad had asked her, very seriously, if she would take that first lesson with Jinhai. Just to see what she thought.

Well. What she thought was that Min had come within a pinprick of exploding, when he'd found out Jinhai's first lesson was going to be while he was off at class. As if Dad and Mom couldn't handle one teenager, firebender or not.

At least Jia had been sane about the whole thing, asking Suyin to pick up any tidbits she'd miss while she was off at poetry class.

Though I'm not sure I can find out everything she wants to know, Suyin thought doubtfully. I can ask about family, sure, and what it's like working with Amaya, but some of the other stuff-

There was a knock at the door. Heart in her throat, Suyin peeked through the peephole.

Green. Scary green. Almost Dai Li, but there's no hat-

Lee looked up, and she felt a rush of relief. And tried not to look at the scar.

"Can I come in?"

"Y-yes, hold on...." She fumbled the door open, swallowing. Shut it after he'd silently stepped inside. "Um, we thought - the basement?" She filled her lungs, and called upstairs. "Mom, Dad! Lee's here!"

Suyin glanced back in time to see Lee take his hands away from his ears. "You're going to do fine on the breathing lessons," he said dryly.

"Thanks?" Was that a compliment? Didn't sound like one. But it didn't sound mean, either. Weird.

Her parents came down with Jinhai between them, and Suyin saw the moment Jinhai saw Lee. Her little brother just lit up, eyes wide and bright and hopeful as if Mom had come home after a long day dealing with other professors' wives.

Lee caught the flying little boy as he was hugged, looking stunned as if he'd just been slugged. "Is something wrong?"

"You came! You really came!" Jinhai pulled back enough to look up, bright green eyes doubtful as he chewed on his lip. "You kind of felt like a spirit-story. I didn't know if you were really real."

"I'm real," Lee said quietly. Looked up at her parents. "Professor. Madam."

"Downstairs would be wise," her father said plainly. "Shall we?"

Suyin pulled the new cellar door shut after them, wondering how long this one would last. And just what Lee had done, to break rock the way she'd thought only an earthbender could. That would be so cool....

Keep dreaming. Not a bender, remember? Suyin sat down by the old futon her mother had dragged into the cellar. Just listen, and pay attention. It's not like you're going to get anything out of this except a way to help Jinhai....

"The first thing you need to know," Lee interrupted her thoughts, setting up a semicircle of five unlit candles in front of where he sat, "is that everybody has chi, and everybody can learn to move it."

Wait. What?

"Chi's what Amaya uses to fix people, right?" Jinhai bounced as Lee sat him down.

"Yes," Lee nodded. "It's what all benders use to affect their element. And fighters use it, too. Though I guess a lot of them here don't know that's what they're doing. A warrior who does know is an incredible fighter. Years ago, Master Piandao of Shu Jing resigned from the army and retired. Somebody decided they wanted him back, and they sent a hundred soldiers to convince him. He defeated them all." Lee had a slight, wry smile as he looked at her parents. "He's a swordsman. Not a bender."

"And you've actually met this legend?" her father said doubtfully.

"I did," Lee acknowledged. "A long time ago." The teenager looked down, smile rueful. "I kind of hope he doesn't remember. I was a little brat." He poked Jinhai gently in the shoulder. "Even younger than you."

Jinhai eyed him. "I'm not a brat!"

"You sure? I was at your age." Lee shrugged. "Just remember, everybody has chi. People who aren't benders have to work hard to learn to move it, but they can. And that's how you learn to-" Lee glanced at her parents again, and colored slightly. "Sorry. I thought the door was stronger than that."

"Wow!" Jinhai breathed.

Suyin picked her jaw up off the floor. "I - could learn to do that?"

"If you practice." Lee nodded. "It takes years. I've been training since I was four."

"Four? We don't start self-defense in school until-" Meixiang froze suddenly, eyes wide. "...My lord."

"No!" Lee's unscarred eye was almost as wide, and his face paled. "No, please. I'm no one's lord." He looked down, dark hair not long enough to hide pain. "Not anymore."

Lord? Suyin thought, aghast. Lee's a noble? He wasn't anything like the snooty brats from the Upper Ring. She'd met enough to know.

"Mommy?" Jinhai looked between them, worried.

"It's complicated, love." Meixiang smiled at him. "But if you're ever in trouble and you can't find us - find Lee. He'll look after you. That's what families like his do."

Lee swallowed dryly. "I am honored by your trust."

"I'm going to have to talk with Huojin," Meixiang said ruefully. "He's probably jumpy as a rabbiroo, with no idea why."

"Huh?" Lee said, confused.

"Later," she said firmly. Made a shooing motion. "Go on."

"Okay," Lee said warily. Looked at Suyin and Jinhai, drawing them in with his gaze. "Meditation teaches concentration and focus. And in firebending, chi comes from the breath. So we're going to start with a breathing meditation."

"We're going to breathe?" Jinhai said, dismayed. "I do that all the time!"

"Oh really?" Lee gave him a wink, and pinched a candle wick-

It puffed into flame.

Suyin held onto her jaw this time, as Lee pinched the rest of the candles alight. They were small flames. Ordinary, compared to the whispered horror stories of fireballs that could take a man's face off, or flame-daggers that seared armor and heart to the same black char. But the casual way he'd done it....

Like Dad, skating aside just enough dirt to uncover a site layer. Just - precise.

Lee sat up straight, in a formal meditative pose. Not too different from the ones she'd seen her father use, though Lee's hands rested on his knees instead of clasped together in front of him. "Can you breathe like this?" Slow and steady, Lee breathed in through his nose, and out through his mouth. Quietly. Almost soundlessly.

And the flames breathed with him.

"So... where's my candle?" Jinhai asked.

If she weren't focused on breathing, Suyin would have smacked herself in the forehead.

"You get one when your parents and I say you're ready," Lee said levelly. "Breathe. No, sit up more. Straight. Your mind's busy a lot, and that makes you more nervous, which is not good for fire. We're trying to calm everything down. In through your nose, out through your mouth...."

It was the most exhausting fifteen minutes Suyin had ever breathed. She wasn't sure what was more impressive; that Lee kept nudging Jinhai back to work without ever losing his temper-

Or that the candles never wavered, keeping Lee's rhythm.

"This is hard," Jinhai complained, breathless.

"Yes, it is." A swift exhalation, and all the candles went out at once. "Ask your father what it takes to learn earthbending as well as he has. This is hard. And it takes time to learn." Lee stood and stretched, then dropped back into a crouch to look Jinhai in the eye. "But you want to make sure no one gets burned again, right?"

"...Yeah." Jinhai stretched out his legs, and slid a glance at Lee's face, curious and a little scared. "Is that what happened to you?"

For a moment, Lee went very still. Let out a slow, controlled breath. "That's... complicated. Grownup stuff." He looked into the distance, seeing somewhere else. "Firebenders can get focused on a goal and not think things through. Sometimes that's a good thing. A lot of times, though, it can get you in really big trouble." Lee smiled wryly. "That's one of the reasons we meditate. So you can clear all the noise out of your head, and think. Because fire doesn't want to think. It attacks. It burns. It's never patient. So you have to think twice as hard, to stay out of trouble." His smile gentled. "That's one of the reasons we love our parents so much. If the fire gets too hot, they pick us up by the scruff of the neck and haul us back."

"Because firebenders are bad," Jinhai whispered, eyes downcast.

"Who told you-?" Lee's eyes went hard for a moment. He shook it off. Traded a glance with Suyin's parents, who looked both angry and stricken, Meixiang's hand covering her mouth.

"You're not bad," Suyin said firmly. "You're my little brother. You just don't know what you're doing yet. Remember Mom's stories about Min on the roof when he was little? He got up there and started bending the tiles all over the place. It took Dad hours to put everything back."

"But he was scared of me." Jinhai's eyes were wet; she could see him holding back a snuffle.

"I don't like boulders flying my way, either," Lee said dryly. "He'll learn to live with it."

Jinhai did snuffle, and Suyin held back a sigh. Sure, her little brother had reasons to be upset, but this wasn't going to help!

"Want to see something neat?" Lee offered, pinching a candle back to life. "You know, there's a reason Amaya's teaching me."

Halfway to crying, Jinhai looked at him suspiciously. Blinked, and almost backed into Suyin, as Lee's circling hands blazed candle-flame to gold and green that wreathed his hands like-

Like Amaya's water, Suyin realized, stunned.

"You can touch this," Lee said quietly, glancing at them both. "It doesn't burn."

Spellbound, she reached out with Jinhai.

It was warm.

It tickled a little, like Amaya's water; poking at her to see if anything needed fixing. Beyond that it didn't feel like anything, except snuggling up in blankets on a cold morning. Just - warm. "You're a healer," Suyin blurted out. "How? I never heard of-" She cut herself off, not wanting to fill Jinhai's ears with what she had heard.

"My mother had a secret," Lee admitted. "I didn't figure it out until a few weeks ago." He let the fire flicker back to the candle, fading to ordinary hot yellow. "Fire's not bad, Jinhai. It's what you do with it that matters." He stood, and waved them both up. "Now, we work on falling."

Professor Tingzhe coughed quietly. "I believe you were going to cover dousing fire?"

"I am," Lee stated. "It's connected. You shift how you fall, so you don't get hurt. And that's part of how you shift a flame's energy, so it goes out."

"A bit counterintuitive," Tingzhe mused. "I'm used to impact being used to break things... though I suppose this would be breaking a fire's energies." He inclined his head.

Lee nodded back, and glanced at the two younger children. "Like this. Watch." Quick as that, he tipped over onto the futon, landing with a soft thump before he curled back onto his feet, light as a cat-owl. "See?"

Jinhai stared. "Erk?" Suyin managed.

"Don't worry. I'm here to catch you."

Over and over they fell, until Suyin thought she was too breathless to move. But she wasn't, quite; Lee had her fall twice more, before nodding her off the futon, and sitting Jinhai down by the candle. "Now we try the tricky part. Breathe. Feel your heartbeat." He waited for her brother's shy nod. "Reach out. Not with your hands, with your feelings. Reach for the flame. It's like a little heartbeat. Feel it?"

"Wow," Jinhai breathed.

This, I can't do, Suyin thought wistfully, watching. Had the flame flickered when Jinhai focused on it? She couldn't be sure.

"Do what I do." Lee reached out a hand, holding it flat and level. Jinhai mimicked him, glancing at Lee's calm face. "Now," Lee said quietly, "Push down. Just like pushing your fall into the futon, so it doesn't hurt. Down, and out."

"But it's alive!" Jinhai dropped his hand, horrified. "No! I won't hurt it!"

"Jinhai!" Lee's voice didn't snap, but it cut through panic like a knife. "You can always light another fire."

"B-but-"

"Fire is everywhere. Lamps. Candles. Stoves. All kinds of places. There are lots of fires. But you only have one Mom. One Dad. Jia, Min, Suyin - they can't stop a fire if it gets out of control! You can. You have to." Lee stared at her little brother, deadly serious. "I know it hurts. I know you don't want to. But that's what being responsible is. Sometimes, we have to do things we don't want to, because our family needs us." He rested a hand on Jinhai's shoulder. "Do you understand?"

"...I guess so," Jinhai whispered.

"Good. Now follow me." Lee held out his hand again. "Down... and out."

The flame flickered. Guttered. Snuffed, a wisp of gray smoke snaking upward.

Jinhai burst into tears.

"Good," Lee said firmly. Glanced up, and beckoned Meixiang over anxiously. "That's good, Jinhai. That's just what you needed to do." He backed off, letting a worried mother gather up her son and tell him how brave and smart he was. Leaned back against a cellar wall, running a shaking hand through damp black hair. "Oh, am I glad that's over...."

Suyin didn't grab Lee by the throat, but she glared hard enough to clue him in that she wanted to. "Professor" Dad was looming up behind her, and that was enough to scare any teenage boy with sense. "Why's my brother crying?"

"It hurts to stop a fire." Lee looked between them both, tired and serious. "Part of it's the bending. Your energy's in the flame, and when you start out, you can't pull it back fast enough not to hurt."

But part of it's... spirits. We love fire, Suyin. Killing it's like - like cutting yourself open. It feels wrong." He took a deep breath, let it out. "But we all learn to put fires out. We have to."

Tingzhe studied him a long moment, and nodded. "Can you come again tomorrow?"

"I already asked Master Amaya," Lee stated. "Yes."

"And it is real pain?" Tingzhe raised a gray brow.

Lee winced, and snatched the candle off the floor. "Sorry... I'm not used to being able to help - hold this?"

Startled, Suyin gripped the re-lit candle, bringing it over as Lee stroked that odd fire over Jinhai, dimming sobs to hiccups. "You know what really helps?" Lee said, fire flickering out. "We should go get some sunlight."

Chapter 13

"Is that normal?" Meixiang asked quietly.

Zuko watched Jinhai sleep in a curled lump in Meixiang's small garden, breathing easily. "Fire's not like the other elements. It comes from inside you. You have to build up your strength. My bending showed up late, too. I needed a lot of naps." Which had made him very cranky. Naps were for little kids. Thank the spirits his mother had a sense of humor.

He glanced over the faces of two worried parents, and a sister whose protective bearing reminded him so much of Lu Ten, it hurt. "One good thing about being a firebender. We don't sunburn easily." Which had been lifesaving when they'd been floating on the raft with little shelter-

"I guess that's another thing you have to watch out for," Zuko sighed. So many little details. So many ways to get caught.

And that's when someone's not looking for Fire Nation. I have to tell them.

"I meant to get here earlier," Zuko said levelly. "I wasn't, because I had to lose someone." He held up a hand. "Goes by Jet. He's about this tall. Messy brown hair, brown eyes. Hook swords. Chews on a wheat straw, all the time. He saw my uncle and I on the ferry to Ba Sing Se, and he's sure we're firebenders. Well, that Uncle is," Zuko amended. "I've pretty much got him convinced I'm a waterbender."

"How?" Suyin asked, while her parents were still sputtering.

"We were in a teashop. I hit him with a bunch of hot water," Zuko answered, sheepishly avoiding parts of the truth. "Healing means moving fire in ways most benders don't try. I can move fire inside hot water. It's kind of neat."

"Inventive," Tingzhe said, stunned, as Meixiang stared at him. "Have you tried this with anything else? Earth, perhaps?"

"Not yet," Zuko managed, shaken by the sudden possibilities. "Sand might work... it works in water because water flows, like heat...."

Air flows, too.

Agni. I've got to try it.

Just once, just once, he'd like Aang to know what it felt like to be blown through a building. A little humility would lengthen the Avatar's lifespan.

"Thank you," Zuko said, and meant it. "I'll try that. Later. But you have to watch out for this moron. He's dangerous. Uncle's been acting like an old civilian, and Jet still went after him. If he thought he knew about Jinhai...." Zuko looked Suyin in the eye, deadly serious. "He doesn't care who he hurts, to get back at the Fire Nation. Don't face him. Just run."

"But you did lose him?" Meixiang asked, visibly reining in fear with determination.

"I've had practice," Zuko admitted. "Now that I know he's still looking, I'll be more careful. I won't lead him to you." He met her gaze squarely. "Can you warn people? Huojin already knows about Jet, and I'm going to tell Amaya, but I want to make sure everyone gets word."

"I will." Meixiang inclined her head, almost a bow.

Zuko winced. "Don't do that. Please."

She eyed him, one black brow lifted. "My lord, even if you chose to leave, you can't abandon what you were born-"

"I didn't choose to leave!" Say it. Just- get it out. "I'm an exile, Meixiang. I was banished." Fists clenched, nails denting skin. No fire. Not here. "If you want a lord, look for someone with honor." I lost mine. Lost everything....

But I won't let you lose what you love. I can do that much. I will.

"You lost an Agni Kai," Meixiang said at last.

Obvious, isn't it? "I didn't even fight," Zuko got out. "How could I? He was-" my father "-someone I owed loyalty to. I couldn't."

"An Agni what?" Tingzhe asked warily.

"A fire duel," Meixiang said plainly. "We're children of dragons, Tingzhe. Sometimes the only way to settle things is with a fight."

"And the Fire Nation calls itself civilized?" her husband said incredulously. "When we have disagreements here-"

"You argue, and shout at each other, and start whispering campaigns that can go on for generations?" Meixiang said pointedly. "When an Agni Kai's over, it's over. Decided. Done. And everyone's loyalty is satisfied. You've risked your life for what you believe is right. No lord can ask for more than that." She looked back at Zuko. "But you couldn't have been more than a child."

"I was thirteen." He couldn't help but glance at Suyin. "That's old enough."

The girl swallowed dryly. "Is - is that why you're training me?"

"No," Zuko said, incredulous. How could she even think - Earth Kingdom. She doesn't know.

"That's self-defense. You have to be a firebender for an Agni Kai. Honor duels for non-benders are blade fights. I mean, you could learn swords, if you wanted to." He caught Tingzhe's stern look, and tried to shrug. "I know, spears and throwing knives are more traditional, but I'm lousy with them...."

Tingzhe's eyes darkened further. The earthbender cracked his knuckles.

"Don't threaten him just for the truth, love," Meixiang said, amused. "Dragon's children. But we don't have fangs and claws. We have to settle for steel and fire." She eyed Zuko again. "But thirteen? What happened?"

Zuko froze. I can't tell them. I can't.

He'd never told anyone about that day. Not even Uncle. And Iroh had been there.

She's got this crazy idea I'm still a lord. I can't let her believe that. We're going to make it so they can get out of the city. If she wants someone to be loyal to... she has to find someone better.

I have to tell her something.

"I should have listened to Uncle, and kept my mouth shut," Zuko said at last. "I should have stayed out of the war room. But I thought I had responsibilities to learn about... it was a bad idea." He took a breath, trying not to feel. "One of the gen- one of the commanders was planning to gain a tactical advantage by sending new recruits up against trained earthbenders. To lure them out into the open. I said we couldn't do that to our people." He would not touch the scar. "He challenged. I should have backed down. But I wasn't afraid. Not of him." Zuko tried to shrug, and failed. "I can be really, really stupid, sometimes."

"Yes, well," Tingzhe said uncomfortably. "You can't always judge a bender's skill by his looks."

"No." A bare whisper, but Zuko got it out. "No, when I turned around... it wasn't him." Don't shake. Not now. It's over. It's been over for years.

"That's dishonorable!" Meixiang's own hands were fists, white-knuckled. "Your family should have blocked the duel from proceeding! They should have protested, even to the Fire Lord's ears-"

It wasn't funny. Not even close. So why was he laughing? Laughing to the point it hurt, and he had to lean against the house wall, tears running down his face.

Don't wake up Jinhai. He shouldn't see this.

Dragging in a sobbing breath, Zuko shoved the pain back into that dark corner of his mind. "It wouldn't have worked," he managed raggedly. "The Fire Lord has a thing about respect."

Dashing away tears, he straightened. "Uncle took care of me after - after. So I didn't die. The first day I could get out of bed-" He remembered the crinkle of the decree in Azula's hands. Her smirk, knowing and cruel, as he read through the terms. Uncle's face, finding her there; a grim puzzlement that changed to cold fury as she skipped away down the hall, humming.

Don't think about it.

"Uncle went with me," Zuko said simply. "He didn't have to. He's never been banished. I'd be dead a dozen times without him." He looked at Meixiang, and shook his head. "Find someone else."

Put the pain away. Focus. Survive.

Outwardly calm, Zuko bowed to the professor. "I promised Master Amaya I'd be at the clinic for the evening hours. I'll be back tomorrow."

He headed out through the house, and didn't look back.

He looks like death warmed over.

Amaya steered her dazed apprentice out of the waiting room, past curious patients. "Where are you hurt?" she asked in an undertone.

"I'm not injured." Lee bristled at her look of disbelief; even his irritation looked weary. "Just tired. Jinhai's parents had questions. Some of them were hard to answer. I ran into Jet again, he's still after Uncle; lost him in an alley, hope he starts thinking before I have to hurt him. And - one of the people around Bosco loaned me this." Face almost blank, he handed over a blue-capped scroll.

A waterbending scroll.

"I'm not injured," he repeated flatly, as she glanced up at him. He swallowed, fingers clenching. "I can work."

I don't want to think, Amaya could all but hear the silent plea. Please, give me something to do.

"Start with Nin," she sighed. "He's managed to twist his back again. You'll work on minor healing, and you'll stop when I say."

A subdued nod. "Yes, Master Amaya."

This is going to be a long afternoon.

So this is what we've got to work with.

Disguised in civilian clothes, rock gloves tucked up his sleeves, Shirong watched the class of university earthbending students in their stone-walled practice yard. Most were fair. A few were excellent, the kind who'd end up specialists on the Wall or architects and delicate stoneworkers in the city itself. But of all the students here, only one had the drive, the killer instinct, to potentially become Dai Li.

Min Wen.

Paired against an older teenager, Min split his wall of stone with a slice of his hand and punched the fragment against his opponent. The older boy stamped another wall up in time to take the blow, but both rocks shattered.

Skill is there. And he's fast enough. We could certainly train him to our level.

But to be honest with himself - and having seen the spirits he'd seen, Shirong tried very hard to be honest with himself - it wasn't earthbending skill that worried him.

Professor Wen's son.

Problematic, right there. Tingzhe Wen certainly acted like a man still living in Avatar Kyoshi's era, but there was nothing wrong with the man's mind. He knew enough to know what he shouldn't talk about, but some of his students hadn't been so wise.

A good teacher loved his students, and Tingzhe Wen was a very good teacher. One day that might outweigh his prudence. Could Min Wen deal with being one of those who might have to make his own father disappear?

And if he can - do we want that kind of recruit?

There were other reasons to be wary of the boy. Harder for Shirong to pin down, but real nonetheless.

He's too eager.

Burning with zeal, like a flame loosed on flash-paper. If the Dai Li weren't all he'd dreamed, if the hard reality of their dirty work to keep Ba Sing Se stable fell short of what Min aspired to... who could say he wouldn't be as quick to turn that zeal toward something else?

Still. Feelings, no matter how trained and tested, weren't reason enough to deny the boy a chance. They needed new recruits. Or Quan and the Grand Secretariat wouldn't even consider Lee.

And that would be a damn shame.

Min Wen had never faced death. Lee had, and dealt it; you could see it in his eyes, whenever the young man forgot to play innocent. Yet Lee still cared about people. Even if he thought most of them were flighty and annoying.

Frankly, the Earth King was flighty and annoying. But he was the hereditary ruler of Ba Sing Se, Shirong had a duty, and that was that.

Another point in his favor. Lee understands duty.

Duty or not, Shirong would never have wanted to do that to Bosco. Lee had hesitated, examined the bear to see if there were any other way to get at the obstruction short of cutting the creature open... then grimaced, and did what had to be done.

I like him.

Shirong raised an eyebrow at that thought, turning it over carefully. He'd survived two decades in the Dai Li's ranks. You didn't last that long without paying attention to the chill down your neck that told you when spirits were about to drop the mother of all landslides on top of you.

Lee felt... warm. Strong. Safe, in the way wearing his rock gloves and working with a tested agent felt safe.

If we were backed against a wall, he'd fight.

Though all things considered, the healing was an even more critical asset. Every year the Avatar had been missing, the spirits had grown more ill-tempered; more ready to lash out at humans for the smallest infraction. That wasn't superstition, it was fact. You could track the increasing assaults in Dai Li records, the lists of people gone fey and strange-

Lee's fought a spirit.

If he'd been alone, Shirong might have indulged in a smack to the forehead. As it was he only winced, and wondered why he hadn't pinned that down before.

He was playing innocent. Pretty well, too.

But it was clear enough, once Shirong had pinned down that feeling of safety and strength. People who'd met the spirit world, who'd dealt with it - there was a presence to them. A feeling of elsewhere, that went beyond even the strength of a bender.

It's not just our uniform that frightens people.

No wonder Lee could look him in the eye without flinching. The otherness was already in him, setting him apart from those who lived quiet, ordinary lives.

You poor kid. I hope you do make it with us. You're never going to fit in with normal people again.

Though healer was a good second choice. Amaya was spirit-touched, too. No one expected a waterbending healer to be normal.

Wonder if you've figured that out yet?

If Lee hadn't, Shirong might just point it out to him. If he really wasn't interested in being Dai Li. A waterbending healer on call was no small asset.

Decided, Shirong turned his full attention back to Min as the teen almost literally crushed his next opponent under a mini-pile of rubble. Ouch.

Which was when four bruised and dusty former opponents all decided they'd had enough, and literally boxed Min in.

Tch, tch. You forgot the top.

A fact Min made swift use of, soaring up on a spike of earth before kicking the four walls back to their creators. But now more students were advancing, plus one of the instructors....

Grinning, Shirong leaned back to watch the show.

Dad's in his study, Min's still eating dust at school, Jia's got Jinhai on pain of no nights out with her girlfriends if she lets him down here while Mom's cooking. Best chance I'm going to get.

"Mom?" Suyin said quietly, standing at the edge of the kitchen as her mother chopped vegetables. "What did Lee mean about finding another lord?"

It was the best question she could think of. The only one, about that whole awful scene in the garden, that wouldn't just get a "you're too young to know" from her parents. She hoped.

Meixiang looked at her sadly, the way she'd looked after Lee had fled. Her brows drew down, and she nodded, determined. "Would you peel the potato-chokes?"

"Yes, ma'am," Suyin said hurriedly, picking up a bristle-brush to scrub the pot of tubers. Studying each before it went under her brush, putting aside three that had enough sprouts to be worth planting. 'Choke flowers were pretty, and fresh young tubers in the fall, with a little butter, were about the best breakfast ever.

"I don't want to tell Jinhai about this until he's older," her mother began. "He can keep training a secret, I hope, but stories of spirits and dragons... well, what child is going to keep that from his playmates? But you're old enough to know."

"What do lords have to do with spirits and dragons?" Suyin asked, still scrubbing.

"Oma and Shu were the first earthbenders, but they were human. It's said the first firebenders were the children of a bright, brave lady, who appeared to her lord when he was on the brink of death, and the sun shone through the rain. She nursed him back to life, fought by his side, and raised their children." Meixiang paused. "And when her lord died, she turned back into a dragon, and flew away."

The 'choke didn't quite slip out of Suyin's hands, but she was glad she hadn't yet picked up a knife. "She was a dragon?"

"Not the only one in our history," Meixiang said plainly. "Many of our greatest heroes, and blackest villains, are said to have had dragon's blood. You can check the genealogies. There are names that come from nowhere, raise children, and vanish. Vanish, not die." She paused, and shook her head. "Or you could have checked them. Fire Lord Sozin outlawed all mention of such people, when he started the hunting of dragons."

Made sense. In a weird kind of way. You wouldn't want to try to get people to hunt down their... relatives. "Do we have-?" Suyin couldn't quite say it.

"We do," her mother nodded. "Your little brother would be proof enough, if I hadn't heard my grandfather's stories." Meixiang regarded her, concerned. "It's nothing to be ashamed of. But it makes us different. We need lords. Dragons... they don't negotiate. One dragon is in charge of one territory, and all the others who live there bow to him. Or her. Or there's a fight, until the loser leaves or submits. Or so the tales say."

Like the pygmy pumas Suyin had watched on the roofs sometimes, snarling and posturing and, once in a while, dissolving into teeth and claws. Which might draw blood, but usually didn't kill anybody.

Like an Agni Kai?

"So," Suyin said, trying to piece it together. "If there weren't lords - people would be fighting all the time?"

"My grandfather read stories written by his several times great-grandfather, about a time when the Fire Nation was all warring clans and pirates," Meixiang nodded. "Ask your father about it. He knows more about the reign of the forty-sixth Earth King than any of us."

Good idea. "But you don't have to fight anybody," Suyin objected.

Meixiang hesitated, and sighed. "Suyin. Do you know why Jinhai - your quiet, shy little brother - hugged a boy he'd only seen once?"

"Well, I..." Suyin's voice trailed off, as she thought about that. It made sense. Didn't it? Why wouldn't Jinhai trust Lee? Lee was-Suyin jerked her head up to meet her mother's gaze. "Lee feels... safe." And that didn't make sense. It didn't make sense at all.

"Oh," Meixiang whispered. Put her knife down, and reached over to hug her daughter close. "Oh, my brave little girl. I didn't know."

"Mom?" Why did her heart feel all fluttery, like this was scary and important as Mom telling her about being alone with boys and why not to do anything unless you had dragged him home to meet armed parents first?

"The strongest dragon rules, but he also protects." Meixiang's gaze searched hers. "Fire is loyal. All its children are. First to your parents, and then to your family. After that, your loyalty is your choice. Be careful who you give it to. Breaking it will break your heart." She looked down, pale and worried. "For a firebender... breaking it kills them."

That sounds crazy. But it wasn't. Suyin could feel it wasn't. She'd rather die than hurt her parents, her brothers, her sister. Wasn't that why she'd fought so hard to keep Jinhai hidden? She'd rather die-

Or kill.

The thought had been there, gnawing, ever since Lee told them about Jet. That's what a pygmy puma did, when something went after her kittens. She'd hiss and slash claws and try everything else first. But if that didn't work....

"Mommy," Suyin whispered, and clung to her.

"I know, sweeting. I know." Meixiang rocked her gently, stroking her hair. "That's why I want you to pay attention to your lessons with Lee. Because if some bastard comes after you, or any of us - I want you to be the one who walks away. Maim him if you have to. Kill him if you have to. Live." Another hug. "And remember what I told Jinhai. If there's trouble, real trouble - find Lee, or his uncle. They're great names. They will protect you."

"Lee's lord didn't protect him," Suyin sniffled.

"That should never have happened," Meixiang said sadly. "The good lords are loyal to their people, even children not old enough to-" She froze.

"Mom?" Suyin whispered.

"Oh, spirits," Meixiang breathed. "That poor boy. No wonder he doesn't think he's...." She let out a slow breath, and let go. "Suyin, can you finish these? I need to talk with your father."

Suyin nodded. "About Lee?"

"About something I hoped I'd never have to study again," Meixiang said, half to herself. "Politics."

The knock on his door wasn't unexpected. Just a bit early. Tingzhe sighed, and put down a mostly untouched glass of wine. "Come in."

Meixiang saw what he had spread out on the desk, and closed the door before she shook her head. "You know what they could do to you, if they catch you with those."

"Bai's gone," Tingzhe said sadly, ruffling through his former student's notes. "This is all I have left of him." He shrugged, and offered her a wry smile. "Besides. Everyone knows I have no interest in current events. Why would anything like these be here?"

"You sly deceiver." Meixiang's smile lit her face, warming his heart all over again. "I'd match you against the Face-Stealer any day."

"I hope not," Tingzhe chuckled. Let his expression turn serious again. "What is it?"

"Lee's Agni Kai." Meixiang winced. "It was his father."

Ah. That fit, unfortunately. "How do you know?"

"He was thirteen. He couldn't owe loyalty to anyone but his family. His uncle's here. And the way he talks about his mother? It couldn't have been her."

Spirits, that possibility hadn't even occurred to him. What sort of land taught mothers to fight?

The kind that maims and exiles a boy at thirteen.

No. He couldn't blame the land for that. The Fire Lord, certainly.

I wonder if Lee ever has.

Meixiang was frowning at him, tapping a finger against her hip. "You're not surprised."

That was his wife. Clear-sighted as a messenger hawk. "I believe I know who he is," Tingzhe said simply.

Meixiang looked at the wine he ordinarily wouldn't touch until after dinner. "It's that bad?"

"No," Tingzhe said thoughtfully, "it's worse." He sighed. "Mind you, this is only an educated guess. The circumstances under which the boy in question was scarred were apparently not common knowledge. But the timing fits. Unless the Fire Lord banished some other great name's son that year, and Bai never had a chance to find out. This is one of the last fragments he found, before... well." Still. That laughter. Awful, soul-shredding; as if the boy had only just realized how obscenely unjust the universe had been.

"Tingzhe." Meixiang gave him a sober look. "Why don't you just tell me?"

"Because you can't not know, once you know," Tingzhe said bluntly. Hesitated, and told the truth. "And... I don't know what will happen. You called him my lord." He dropped his head, ashamed. "I don't want to lose you."

"Oh, Tingzhe." She took his hands between hers, kneading earth-worn fingers. "I'm your wife. You and the children always come first." She gave him a smile of quiet mischief. "Why do you think we train girls to fight? So when husbands or brothers do something stupid, they can protect the children. No matter what their lords do." Her voice dropped. "I love you. No lord can change that."

I love you, too. I have to trust you. "Not even this one?"

Meixiang read Bai's notes. Stopped. Reread them, slowly.

Reached past him, and slugged good wine down like water.

"Precisely," Tingzhe said dryly.

She let out a slow breath. "He said he was here with his uncle."

"If Bai was right, he only has the one," Tingzhe said wryly. "I must admit, the thought of that man inside these walls turns my spine to water. What on earth is he planning?"

"He's not," Meixiang said after a long moment. "They're hiding. Just like the rest of us."

Tingzhe gave her a skeptical look.

"They came to Amaya, love. A man in his position... he wouldn't be here if there were any hope left for them in the Fire Nation."

"A man in his position is far more likely to be carrying out a long-reaching plot-"

"Here? Alone? With only Lee? Hiding with a waterbender's help?" Meixiang studied him, and shook her head. "What's more likely? A plot? Or a man trying to save his nephew by coming to the only place in the world they can hide?"

Tingzhe sighed. "Lee said he'd done things he wasn't proud of." The commander of the ship, indeed. "It's only...how can that man's son be the young man we let into our home?" He was gentle with Jinhai. Kind. Not an implacable enemy. Not a monster. "How could any man do that to his own son?"

"We could ask his brother."

Tingzhe eyed his wife suspiciously. "You're not serious."

"Why not?" Meixiang looked almost impish. "We're having Huojin, Luli, and their girls over next week anyway. Why not invite them, too? Lee will be busy with Jinhai and Suyin, and Lim and Daiyu, and probably fending off Jia, and getting glared at by Min. We'll have plenty of time to corner his uncle and... talk."

"I'd rather corner an enraged dillo-lion," Tingzhe muttered.

"That's why we need to plan this, dear."

"Ah, yes. A plan." Tingzhe nodded. "I'm doomed."

"Here." Amaya set a steaming cup in front of her apprentice, grateful for the quiet as the last regular patients walked away from her door. She'd unlock the front if there was an emergency, but for now, they were alone. "I know you're not fond of tea, and this is good for someone who's had a bad day."

Lee sniffed it first. Brightened a little, like a shaft of sun through rain, before taking a hot sip. "You have limons?"

"Some trade goes through, even these days," Amaya nodded, relaxing a little. Honey and limon in hot water eased a multitude of heartaches. "They're one thing I would miss, if I ever lost my mind and went back to the tribe."

"You don't miss your people?"

"I do," Amaya admitted. "But for decades they've been waiting for something that never happened." The Avatar to be born into the Northern Water Tribe.

It was a reasonable assumption. The Air Nomads were dead, and no one had seen the Avatar. Why shouldn't he have been killed, and reborn? She'd seen the shamans of her tribe testing child after child, to no avail.

She was a bender, and a woman, and not the Avatar. Meaning her parents would likely accept her betrothal to the first strong bender who offered. Master Pakku had been on their list of candidates; he'd been mourning Kanna as lost for years, surely he was ready to look for another bride.

But that hadn't been quite enough to push her into leaving. No; that decision had come from what she'd overheard, inadvertently eavesdropping on one of the shaman's tests.

Find the Avatar. Train him.

Destroy the Fire Nation.

Defeat the Fire Nation, certainly. But destroy it? Break the cycle of elements further, just for revenge? She wouldn't be part of that. She couldn't. There had to be another way.

"I miss them," Amaya admitted now. "But I needed an answer I couldn't find at the North Pole. So I left." She smiled, recalling a giant webbed claw, a face both kind and terrible. "The answer I found gave me many more questions, but it's made my life interesting." She tapped the scroll. "As is this. It must be at least two centuries old... you say a Dai Li gave it to you?"

"Loaned it," Lee stressed. "I think he's trying to recruit me."

Amaya considered that impossible statement. Shook her head. Thought it through again. "Spirits.

Why?"

"I don't know. I'm going to ask Uncle." Lee frowned. "I told him I'd need your permission to learn what's on here." He paused. "Are you going to try the forms? He said your tribe doesn't teach women benders to fight, which is one of the silliest things I've ever- um." He visibly bit his lip. "What I mean is, I don't know waterbending, but I know combat forms. I could help. If you wanted."

Amaya's brows climbed, taking in those shy hints of interest. "You want to try these." Which made no sense, except- "You think you could approximate the forms with boiling water?"

"...Maybe?" Lee said awkwardly.

Hmm. Not all the truth. But there was life in his gaze, where before there had been weary horror.

Decided, Amaya unrolled the scroll. "Let's have a look." Hmm. The water whip, circling waves, breath of ice-

"You have a breathing form?" Lee looked downright interested.

"Not one I think you could fake," Amaya pointed out.

"Not with firebending," Lee admitted. "But I wonder if that's what gave Uncle the idea."

"What idea?" Amaya asked warily. Mushi was a good man, from what she'd seen. Not bad looking, either, if a bit pale. But given his ideas had already landed a healing firebender in her clinic- well.

Lee got up from the table, took a few steps back. Breathed deep. And breathed out licks of flame.

Amaya tried not to stare.

"It's good for staying warm," Lee said shyly. "Or if a waterbender locks you in ice. That's happened to me."

Amaya whistled. "I've never heard of firebenders doing that." Much the opposite. Icing over a firebender was lethal. Or so she'd been taught.

"Uncle invented it," Lee said proudly. "He-" The teenager blanched.

Amaya frowned, then realized the likely cause. "That would give away who you are, to another firebender?"

"...Maybe." Lee looked stricken.

"Lee." She tried not to chuckle. Really. "There can't be that many great names out there who've been declared - what was the term your uncle used, traitors to the Dragon Throne? If I wanted to learn who you were, I probably could." Amaya gave him a serious look. "But I won't. That is your secret, and I will not take it from you." You've lost so much already. "You are my apprentice. You're safe with me. I promise."

Lee just looked at her, wary green eyes enough to break her heart.

He wants to believe me. But he should have been safe with his sister, too.

"Though I admit, it is interesting to know ingenuity runs in the family," Amaya said lightly. She spread out the scroll again. "Which of these should we try?"

"I appreciate the company, nephew," Iroh said warmly, folding his apron before bowing to his employer. Pao might be cranky and a bit cheap, but he'd defended a mere employee from Dai Li interest, and that was no small thing. "But a young man might like some time to himself in the evening, with so many lovely girls in the neighborhood-"

"Jet's around. Somewhere," Zuko said grimly.

"That insane boy?" the teashop owner bleated. "Again?"

"I lost him in the Middle Ring." Zuko shrugged. "Tried to talk him down, but I don't think he's listening."

"He'll listen to the clink of handcuffs, if I see him!" Pao fumed. "Reckless, destructive... cost good money to replace that table, and the door-!"

"You're very thoughtful. Good night!" Iroh said cheerfully. And ushered Zuko out the door before the man could remember the other half of that destruction.

Yes, it is a very good thing Zuko is not working here.

Though perhaps a shame, in a way. There were quite a few pretty girls his nephew's age who stopped in for afternoon tea.

Ah well. His nephew's nerves were stretched taut as it was. Perhaps this was not the best time to try to prod Zuko toward anything as normal as a date.

Wait a few weeks, Iroh decided. Let him grow accustomed to the city, and its people. Tread gently. At least until we've dealt with this Jet boy, one way or another.

Oh Agni, he could all too easily see how that could become a disaster. A vindictive teenager, a young lady who might know no better than to dodge into a blade's path, and his overprotective nephew - well.

No. Better not to shove Zuko into that aspect of normal life. Not yet.

"So how was your day?" Iroh asked as they headed home. Though part of it was written on his nephew's face. Even another duel with Jet should not have left his nephew so worn.

Surprisingly, Zuko gave him a smile. "Master Amaya and I are working on a water wall."

"Truly?" Iroh raised an intrigued brow. "I had thought the Northern waterbenders did not teach women skills beyond healing." Unlike the Southern Water Tribe. Now, those folk knew how to fight.

I wish I could have done more to save them.

Yet he'd still been loyal to Azulon then, and fighting generals of the Earth Kingdom. The South Pole raids were not in his theater of operations. Once he'd learned of the White Lotus, and its goals, he had been able to arrange for contacts to spirit a few of the survivors from prison. So long as it was made clear their efforts in the war were over.

A few. Painfully few.

You did what you could, and what was wise for your people, Iroh told himself. If Lu Ten had not died-

No. Better not to torment himself with such thoughts.

"They don't," Zuko was saying, "but she's figured out a few things. And I've seen some of the moves on the scroll in action. So we're working on it. It's not real impressive yet."

"What scroll?" Iroh asked, curious.

"Tell you when we get to the apartment." Zuko glanced warily around at the street crowds. "It's been an... interesting day."

Oh dear.

Some time later, Iroh eyed his nephew over what was supposed to be a cup of soothing tea. Not that he could blame the blend for failing. It obviously had not been created with his nephew's gift for havoc in mind. "An interesting day."

Having just recounted a tale of bears, Dai Li, vengeful teens, and confused young firebenders, Zuko shrugged.

"Stay wary with the Dai Li," Iroh advised. "Your caution is an ally and a shield. They will expect a refugee to be more nervous than one born here, and more prepared to hear the worst of the rumors about their actions. If Shirong is clever enough to approach you with care, he is unlikely to change his tactics swiftly."

"But why do they want a waterbender at all?" Zuko said warily.

"If you felt you could trust a waterbender, one born in the Fire Nation, would you not wish them among your forces?" Iroh gave him a pointed look.

"Oh." Zuko winced. "I should have thought of that. It's just, most people in the Fire Nation..."

By which you mean my brother, Iroh thought sadly. Reconsidered. And the Fire Sages, and those generals not retired, dead, or fled, and the nobles... well, most is fair enough. "Experience, tactics, and logistics are crucial to winning battles," Iroh stated. "But when those factors are equal, it is the general who can make use of the unexpected who may win the day."

"Don't tell me Sokka's going to be a great general someday," Zuko grumbled.

Now there was a terrifying thought. "Not unless he learns to master his own resources, as well as the Avatar's," Iroh said dryly. "At the moment, most of his offensive capability could be neutralized by... oh, a pretty girl like Ty Lee walking up to the young airbender with an innocent smile."

"You really think he's naïve enough to fall for that?" Zuko said skeptically.

Uncle and nephew stared at each other, then nodded in unison.

"Why didn't I think of that?" Zuko lamented, hands spread to the skies.

"Perhaps because those trained in chi-blocking are not permitted to travel outside the Fire Nation?" Iroh suggested mildly. "We do not wish to risk other nations gaining the technique. Out of compassion for its users, if nothing else. I know what unscrupulous generals of the Earth Kingdom - Fong comes to mind - would be willing to do to gain such knowledge." Physical torture of chiblockers would be the least of it. "And there is the difficulty of getting such an agent close enough to an airbender to begin with."

"Yeah, but if you could, he'd be toast," Zuko muttered. "Even if they missed enough that he could still move... without bending, he's just a skinny kid with a staff. He has no combat training. None of them do, master benders or not-" Zuko froze. And swore under his breath; something he had to have picked up from their crew. "Azula's got Ty Lee with her."

"You do not know that," Iroh cautioned.

"I know Azula." Zuko's eyes narrowed, grim. "She'd get away with it. They ran from her, Uncle. Why else would they let her chase them into making stupid mistakes? A tank's not a small target. They could have frozen it. Or swallowed it in rock. They didn't. They ran. They were afraid." His voice dropped. "There's only one thing that scares a bender that much."

"Amaya told me," Iroh said heavily. "I am sorry, nephew. I am so, so sorry I did not know...."

Zuko was smiling at him. Ruefully, but a smile. "It's not as bad as you think, Uncle. Ty Lee's loyal to Azula... but Azula always said it was training. So Ty Lee could help. Sometimes."

Iroh raised a skeptical brow.

"I learned how to dodge. Some of it, anyway." Still that wry, wistful smile. "If I don't see her coming, she can get my bending. But I can move fast enough that she doesn't put me all the way down. Most of the time."

"And so, the swords," Iroh realized.

Zuko nodded.

"Well done," Iroh said with quiet pride.

Tired as he was, Zuko still sat straighter.

"Though I am curious to know why you chose that path, rather than enlist aid," Iroh said, very carefully.

"Didn't want Azula to try smothering me in my sleep again," Zuko shrugged. "At least with Ty Lee doing it, I was pretty sure I'd still be breathing afterward."

The teacup shattered.

"... You're bleeding." Zuko pulled flame from the lamp, searing out pottery dust to leave whole skin behind.

Would that my heart healed as easily. "You told your parents of this?"

"Mom told her it was wrong," Zuko kept his voice quiet. Level. "So she went to Father, and told him what horrible lies I was telling to get her in trouble. He said that was unworthy of a great name's son. And he smiled at her." He looked aside, into memory. "She smiled just like that, at Grandfather's funeral." Zuko swallowed. "Can we not talk about her? She's not here, and Jet is, and arguing with him doesn't work. What do I do, tie him up and drop him down a well?"

"It is tempting," Iroh acknowledged, setting the anger aside. Time enough for fury later, when Zuko would be sure it was not aimed at him. "I can only say, do as you think best at the time." He smiled wryly. "And I am working in a teashop, nephew. Should he be so rude twice - I am certain, given your example, I can improvise."

Zuko nodded, reluctantly satisfied.

"Perhaps an early night would be wise, for both of us," Iroh reflected. "But I would like you to consider something, Prince Zuko."

"Uncle?" Zuko said warily.

"There is a certain freedom of action in being declared a traitor to the throne," Iroh said levelly. "My brother is not here. The laws of our nation do not rule here. Do what you believe is right." He paused. "And never forget that here, she is not a princess, whose every command must be carried out without fail. Nor are you an exile. She is an enemy of Ba Sing Se, and you are a healer, serving our people within these walls. Innocents she would see executed as traitors, simply for seeking sanctuary. If by some stroke of ill luck she chances on us again - strike her down."

"I'll..." Zuko swallowed dryly, and nodded. "I'll think about that, Uncle."

I pray you do, nephew. Watching Zuko disappear behind a closed screen, Iroh sighed. I never want her to hurt you again. I never want her to believe she has the right.

Ozai. If fate is kind, I will not meet you again. No matter what you have done, you are still my brother, and I would not force Zuko to choose between us. That wound, at least, I would spare him.

But if fate is not kind....

You have a very great deal to answer for.

"Kitty."

Zuko eyed the stuffed calico toy being thrust at him by grubby hands, and nodded. "Looks like a cat-owl to me. Now, just let me see-"

"My kitty!"

"Yes, it is." Zuko gripped the youngster's arm lightly, turning it to get a better look in the morning light. He wasn't sure if his patient was a boy or girl, and he didn't really want to ask. "Just let me see this scratch your mother says-"

"My kitty!"

He dodged the blow by instinct, soft cloth or not. Eyed the brat's mother. Who smiled at him, beaming at her little monster as the kid kept trying to thwack him. "Now, honey," she chirped, "let's not be too much trouble."

Now I know why Amaya was grumbling about shirshu darts. "Ma'am?" Zuko said politely. "Could you take the toy for a minute?" He could deal with a bear. He'd deal with this-

"Mine!" The toddler lunged, and Zuko barely fended off snapping teeth.

No more nice healer for you, brat.

"Well, I never!"

In the midst of taking down the exact improbable sequence of events that had led to a fisherman getting a hook somewhere very painful indeed, Amaya looked up as Madam Li stormed out from behind Lee's screen, biting brat in hand-

Biting, gagged brat in hand.

Giggling in the woman's face wasn't the most professional thing she'd ever done. But oh, it felt good.

Noon sun warmed him down to the bones as Zuko ran cold katas in Amaya's garden, warmth seeping in to replace what healing had drained.

Getting better at this.

Granted, nothing he'd done here was as serious as the wounds he'd healed outside of Ba Sing Se. But it was like any firebending. You had to build your strength gradually.

And you have to breathe.

He took time to do that now, trailing his fingers in the barrel of spring-water they'd set up last night. No need to upset the fish by raising the pond to steam-hot.

And I can't tell her I don't need to. Not yet.

The lie of omission twinged Zuko's conscience, but - he did want to learn how to move hot water by firebending. You never knew with spirits, after all. What if Yue changed her mind, and his waterbending vanished tomorrow?

Would be my luck. Can't count on anything.

Which seemed confused even in his own head. Not being a waterbender would make things easier. Wouldn't it?

Touching cool water, Zuko drew it up in a fluid arc. It's pretty.

Fire was, too, when you did it right. Though it'd taken him years to find any joy in fire again, after... after.

It was a tool. A weapon. I had it. I needed it. I trained it. But it didn't feel... warm. Not like Mom's fire did. It was just... barren. Empty. All sharp edges.

Like the stiff, brittle bush Ursa had rescued from the gardeners once; all thorns and no roses, until she'd planted it in a secluded wild nook, and nursed it into green life.

Those first small buds had smelled like magic.

A breath, and flame danced in his other hand. Zuko turned his palms sideways to face each other, flames and water twisting around each other like bright ribbons.

I think Mom would have liked this.

For once, he didn't shy away from the thought. If Ursa had been a healer, she'd probably been good with outside fire, too. And water was like that. Sort of.

A stab of pain. Water twisted too slowly, and everything scrambled together as steam.

Don't lose it! Just try.

A swirl of both hands, and a boiling sphere hovered between them.

Past the greenery, Zuko heard the screen slide back, and hastily dropped steaming water into the barrel.

"Having fun?" Amaya smiled at him, walking over to gaze into the pond. "Break's almost over."

"How did you- oh." I can feel fire when it's close. "You can feel water moving that far away?"

"Your range improves with experience," Amaya nodded. "It helps that I live here. I know where all the water is supposed to be. You could probably do the same with fire, when you've stayed here a few more months." Still smiling, she waved her hand through fading wisps of steam, gathering it into water around her fingertips.

And looked suddenly thoughtful.

Not good. Whatever it is. "So did you still want me to stand the watch here tonight?" Zuko got out, trying to sound sheepish. "I'm sorry about the gag, it just seemed like a good idea...."

"Oh, I've threatened her with as much before," Amaya said wryly, letting water slide off her fingers. "Now, perhaps, she'll believe me. Hurt children are upset. That's acceptable. Biting is not." She glanced at him. "Besides. I'm curious to find out what your uncle considers a good evening of tea and conversation."

"Music and food," Zuko said ruefully. "Don't let him talk you into playing a tsungi horn."

Amaya snorted. "Not that I even know what a tsungi horn is...."

Oops.

"And on that note - standing watch is something you don't usually hear off the docks in this city. Most would say, hold down the fort."

"Oh." Damn.

"Hmm." But curious as she looked, Amaya didn't press farther. "Good luck with Jinhai."

"Thanks," Zuko said warily. After yesterday, I'm going to need it.

"He gagged the boy?" Mushi clapped a hand to his forehead in disbelief.

Toying with the last of her dessert, Amaya couldn't help but snicker. "He's a very direct young man, your Lee."

"He may never believe this, but that does run in the family," her dinner companion smiled back. "A few more years will calm him down. If we can keep him alive that long."

Assuming I'll help, are you? Not that it was far off the mark. She liked the man's nephew; prickly temper, awkwardness, and all. Even if she hadn't liked him, Lee seemed to be a genuinely good young man. If a little confused about people who weren't out to harm him. She'd feel very small if she didn't help just because he was a firebender. "You always expect trouble, don't you? Both of you. Lee's just more obvious about it."

"Our lives have rarely been quiet," Mushi allowed. "I find working in a teashop very relaxing. And your work? It cannot be easy, taking in an apprentice after years alone. I know my nephew is not always the most patient of students."

"You might be surprised," Amaya mused, setting her chopsticks aside. "He isn't calm, but he is determined. He behaves very well, most of the time. And he's been responsible about getting out of sight if he does need to swear and hit the ground." She regarded Mushi thoughtfully. "How much was his mother able to teach him, before she...." Spirits, what did she say?

"Vanished," Mushi said firmly. "Fled, I hope. Thought I fear- well. I do not know." A quiet shrug. "Nor do I know what she was able to teach him, while his bending was still uncertain. He knew how to soothe pain, at least. And when I showed him what I knew of her kata, he was able to take it that step beyond, and truly heal."

"Tide-touched," Amaya said thoughtfully. "Or... well, I suppose you'd call it something else." How to define it? "Huojin and other swordsmen call recruits like that, a natural?"

"Someone who has the proper instincts, which training will hone," Mushi nodded. "I had not heard of this in bending. I have known prodigies, who take to training very quickly - but that is not the same."

"I'd be surprised if you had known of them," Amaya admitted. "It's not common even in my tribe, where children are often granted freedom to play with water in the moonlight for a year before formal instruction begins. Master Pakku learned that way, I heard. And I imagine hardly anyone in the Earth Kingdom learns from the badger-moles anymore." Amaya glanced around the rest of the dinner crowd enjoying sidewalk tables in the lantern-light. Clear. Good. "A bender who learns from the original source always seems to have a more intuitive grasp than those just taught by humans."

Mushi considered that, and nodded thoughtfully. "Then it would seem that even as an adult, this may be true."

Amaya lifted a brow, intrigued. We were taught by the Moon and Ocean. Who were you taught by?

"Though I do not know any way my nephew could have-" Mushi cut himself off, looking very thoughtful.

Amaya leaned back in her chair. "You know, when Lee looks like that, it means he was right about something all along, and he'd really hoped he wasn't."

"It is a very long story...." His glance touched the crowd, and green eyes narrowed. "And best saved for another time. Good evening, Smellerbee. Longshot. Where is your friend Jet?"

"Fixing his harness," the feral young girl said sourly, as the silent archer behind her shrugged. "Lee tore it up pretty good with that waterbending trick."

"Ah." Mushi regarded them levelly. "You will, perhaps, understand if I hope that takes him some time."

"Okay, so maybe Jet took it too far going after you," Smellerbee said defensively. "Lee didn't have to attack him!"

"I'm sure he didn't-" Amaya began.

"I am certain he did," Mushi said dryly. "Strike the first blow, at least. But in this city, where the war is not mentioned, by claiming us as Fire Nation, it is Jet who attacked." He eyed both children sternly. "Do you wish us to vanish, never to be seen alive again, simply because your friend somehow believes we might be of those who have wronged him?"

Longshot frowned.

"Jet doesn't go after people without a good reason," Smellerbee protested.

"He'd better not go after anyone near my clinic, or he'll see what I know of waterbending," Amaya said angrily. "Don't you understand what your friend is doing? Every time he levels this charge, he holds a knife to Lee's throat!"

"It's not-" Smellerbee started.

"It is exactly that!" Amaya slapped her hand down on the table. "Ba Sing Se took you in. Gave you sanctuary. How dare you threaten that for others?" She shook her head. "Lee is my apprentice, and Mushi is my friend. You send Jet to me. I am Amaya of the Northern Water Tribe, and we've survived enough raids to know them when we see them!"

Longshot raised an eyebrow. Touched Smellerbee's shoulder, and gave her a serious look.

"You're right," the girl said after a moment. "We should go check on him."

That quickly, they were gone. To her eyes, at least. From Mushi's sober frown, he could see them ghosting through the crowd.

"Perhaps we should make an early night of it," Amaya said quietly. And smiled. "It was a good evening, with good company."

"I am glad." Mushi inclined his head, then rose to escort her back. "I have not had the chance to enjoy such an outing with a lovely lady for some time. You will, perhaps, permit me to hope that if this boy is reined in, you might consider it again sometime?"

"It's possible," Amaya allowed, walking beside him. Pale, perhaps, and devious enough to make her think twice whenever that gleam came into his eye - but he wasn't afraid of her.

He's touched the Spirit World, too.

As had Lee. Prickly and impulsive and wary as a feral pygmy puma, yes. But the boy was comfortable to be around.

She'd missed that. For a very long time.

The walk home was uneventful, thankfully. Reaching her front door, habit made Amaya reach out with waterbending, sensing well and spring and pond-

What in the world?

Oh. Of course. Dropping Mushi a wink, she lowered her voice to a whisper. "Has Lee shown you what he's been up to?"

"We have not had much time," Mushi murmured back, obviously intrigued. "We should enter quietly, then?"

Eyes dancing, Amaya snuck into her own house.

Mushi helped her muffle the screens to the garden, and slipped out onto the path with a silence she'd never expected of him. Step by careful step, they advanced toward the whisper of moving water, and quiet crackle of flames.

It's like the Firelight Fountain, made small.

Frozen into ice, a candle floated on the barrel's surface, flames split into three flickering ribbons by Lee's swift-moving fingers. The young man's face was pale with concentration, as he beckoned a stream of water up to weave snakelike around every strand, inhaled-

And blew a white puff of frost, water crackling into glittering ice.

...What?

Beside her, the man who'd faced down guards, bandits, and invading admirals to get here, who'd kept his nephew alive through fire and grief and panic, who'd stood his ground in the face of the unmistakable influence of Tui and La themselves-

Hit the ground in a dead faint.

The world came back in a murmur of voices, and a soft glow of healing blue.

"Uncle? Uncle, don't do this-"

"Nephew." Iroh latched onto Zuko's hand with a sigh of relief, glad for Amaya's support at his side. "I was having the oddest nightmare...."

Eyes open, he looked past the boy, to a candle floating upright, wreathed by ice.

Not a nightmare. Iroh took a steadying breath. Two. "How...?"

"I don't know. I don't know! She drowned me, and you got me back, and the teashop, and something just kept pushing and pulling at me, so I went to the roof for some air, and-" Zuko waved a hand, and water rippled in echo of it. "I'm sorry, I know you had plans, and now she's the heir, and there's nothing I can do...." He winced, and rubbed his temples.

Letting go of Iroh, Amaya crossed over to her apprentice. "Headache?"

"Don't worry about it-"

"You let me decide what I'll worry about." She rested water-wrapped hands on his head, eyes half-closed. "Your uncle told me before that she was considered the heir. Why do both of you look as if someone just died?"

"Several of my plans just did," Iroh admitted. Zuko was young, not foolish. He knew enough to guess the truth. "She was the heir, yes. But we had some hopes...."

"I'm sorry." Zuko looked - small. Exhausted. Beaten. "I know what this means for our people, Uncle. I just... why do they have to hate us so much? So many of our people are going to die, and I don't care if the spirits think it's balance! It's wrong!"

Oh Agni, Iroh could see it. Azula as the heir, or no one; either path would lead his people into bloodshed, savagery, and civil war. And after a century of violence - to think the Earth Kingdom and Water Tribes would be content to simply sit back and watch, was to be ignorant of the hatred nurtured in human hearts.

Even the Avatar's? "Spirits' gifts are often difficult to understand," Iroh said soberly. "I would not be so swift to assume Yue acted out of hatred."

"I hate to say this of a woman of my tribe, Mushi - but I wouldn't be so quick to say she didn't." Amaya took her hands away, blue eyes narrowed. "Does it always hurt when you waterbend?"

Zuko shook his head. "Just when I try to do them both together. Two different kinds of energy."

"It's not. Or it shouldn't be." She rested a hand on his forehead. "Let me look again."

Long moments passed. Iroh sat still on the path, gathering his scattered wits. Zuko... was a waterbender. Spirits, no wonder his nephew was confused.

But he has not lashed out. He has not panicked. He has tried, as much as he can, to face it. To master it.

My beloved nephew. I would claim you as my own in a heartbeat, if you would but allow it.

"Well." Amaya's breath was almost a snarl, as she lifted her hand away. "That is a nasty piece of work, indeed." She glanced between them. "Both of you, brace yourselves. This may be hard to hear."

Iroh held out an arm, comforted when Zuko leaned into it, resting against his side.

"Spirits are energy, that can sometimes take a physical form," Amaya began. "Living beings are energy in a physical form. What works for one, sometimes doesn't work for the other. That's why malevolent spirits can often be harmed by salt, when to us it just stings in cuts. Our physical body protects us from what salt does to them." She looked at Zuko. "The fire-blow you took seared you down to your spirit. It left a hole in you. A scarred hole, where some of your own energy should have been. An... empty place, Yue could fill with water." Amaya winced. "But to do that - she ripped out the scar."

Zuko shivered against him. Iroh couldn't blame the boy. "And this means?"

"She may not have intended any harm," Amaya said grimly. "For a spirit, I think this might be like - oh, eating when you're starving, and letting the food build your muscles back up. But humans aren't that simple. Tear our scars, and you can't just slap new flesh into place. Lee is bleeding, whenever he uses both together. It flexes the heart of who he is, and the scar gapes." She shook her head. "No wonder you're always exhausted."

Iroh held his nephew close. "Can you heal this?"

"That depends on what you mean by heal." Amaya regarded Zuko soberly. "Lee... no. If I do this, I'll need to touch you more deeply than ordinary healing reaches. I promised I wouldn't ask. But for this, I need your name."

"Zuko." His nephew swallowed dryly. "My name is Zuko. Son of Ursa, and-" He closed his mouth, and shook his head.

"That's enough," Amaya said kindly. "Zuko. I see three paths we can take. First - we could do nothing. I don't advise that, but it won't kill you. Immediately. You have a strong spirit. It's quite possible you could go on this way for years. But Huojin says you react in a fight, and if that's true with your bending as well-" Her grim look told its own story.

"A better option, if you would," Iroh said dryly.

"I could restore the scar." Amaya winced as she said it. "My teacher told me never to take with this gift. Only to give. But to save a life... I think he would understand."

"No more water," Zuko said numbly. "It'd make things - simpler."

"No," Iroh said softly, feeling his nephew tremble. "Oh, no. You have been well. You have been happy."

"I have a duty to our people, Uncle." Still numb. Still aching. "What I want doesn't matter."

"It does," Iroh said fiercely. "This time, it does! Think! You said this was Yue's answer to my question. I asked how to save our people, nephew! How to find a path that would hold those bound by love and loyalty together, no matter what nation their forebears came from." He gripped the boy's shoulder. "Think! How can the Avatar shatter us apart, when you stand whole before him?"

"But - if she's the heir-"

Iroh sighed, letting the last of a decade's plans float free as scattered dust. "The damage done has been too great," the retired general said soberly. "There are too many in power like Zhao, and too few like Jeong Jeong. Even if the Avatar himself tried to enforce a peace, firebending has been twisted for far too long. There will be war. In a way, there must be war. Corruption festers throughout our nation, and it must be burned clean." Iroh rested a hand on dark hair. "Enough, nephew. We have both suffered enough. Choose your own destiny."

Zuko looked at him, and nodded. Turned to Amaya. "You said there was another way?"

"My teacher taught me to touch the flesh along with the spirit," Amaya said plainly. "I think I can fix what Yue intended to do. But are you sure? This will be the most delicate work I've ever done. If you fight me, if you fight at all - I can't imagine the harm I might do. Please. Be sure."

Zuko bent his head, fingers clenching and unclenching. "When I knew I was waterbending," he said, almost soundlessly, "when I realized what that meant... I promised myself I'd learn what you did. How to hide our people, and keep them safe. I've fought the spirits my whole life. I'm not letting our people die just because I wasn't brave enough to ask you before."

Just for our people? Iroh thought sadly. Oh, Zuko.

"And - I want it back." Zuko swallowed dryly. "I've been angry with Uncle for years, angry with the whole world, and it's wrong. I wasn't like that before he-" Fingers strayed near the scar; lowered, and clenched. "He took part of me away, and I want it back."

"I can't turn back time," Amaya said gently. "You were wounded. Scarred. I can't change that. This will be water, and it will help you - but it will never be what you were before the fire. It can only be what you are, and what you will be. Is that enough?"

Zuko met her gaze, fiercely determined. "I'll make it enough."

Amaya inclined her head, and opened her arms. "Come here. And trust me." She raised her gaze to Iroh's. "This is going to be delicate. Guard us. Do whatever you have to."

Brows bouncing up in surprise, Iroh nodded. Stood, brushed himself off, and assumed a ready stance.

One hand on Zuko's brow, the other over his heart. Amaya breathed in, and out. And there was light.

Everything was light, and he couldn't seem to close his eyes; it was too bright, he couldn't bear it-

Shh. Trust me, Zuko.

"Amaya?" Why was Amaya inside his head? He could feel her worry, her concern. Her determination to make things right, fierce as fire....

Separation is an illusion. We are all a part of each other. A gentle chuckle. It's just more obvious, spirit to spirit.

"That's why this is dangerous," Zuko whispered. Or thought he did; nothing felt the way it should, and where had the garden gone? "You're touching my spirit? You shouldn't, you don't want to see-"

We are all capable of great good, and great evil. I have my own darkness. And you are not as lost as you think. A shimmer of light, like an outstretched hand. Trust me. Help me help you. We can do this, together.

Tentatively, he reached out....

And saw the gash between golden red and moon-blue, seeping away strength as he breathed. So close to right. Just a little off. All he had to do was touch.

Gently. We have time.

Fire and water were opposites, but they weren't separate. Fire burned, yielding water disguised in hot smoke. Water held inside it the seeds of fire, just waiting for lightning's strike.

Touch. Hold. Melt. Two into one, in a dance that was so familiar....

Just like that. Fire and Water, and Spirit to bind them both.

Spirit? Those pale, not quite colorless wisps reaching out to red and blue, making them whole?

You are my apprentice. What was taught to me, I now teach you. Use it wisely.

He thought he nodded. Everything felt right. Just tired.

Hang on one moment more... look. Over there.

Another light, apart from them both. Blazing, fierce fire, protecting what it-

Zuko's breath caught. "Uncle... loves me?"

Of course he does, you silly little dragon. You are lovable, once we get past all the prickles. A glittering chuckle. Get used to it.

Rest now. You're going to need your strength in the morning. I have a whole new set of lessons for you... waterbender.

Sleep closed over him like a blanket.

"I'm tempted to have you rent out the cot," Amaya said dryly, helping Iroh tuck Zuko back into bed.

"I am tempted to accept," Iroh chuckled, brushing back unruly black hair. "He will be well?"

"I'll have to see how he handles bending both in the morning, but yes, I think so." Blue glanced at him, amused. "You sense spirits. What do you see?"

"Two dragons, no longer wounded," Iroh said softly. A lift of his fingers, and he brushed misty scales; first red, then moon-white. The white was almost the size of its brother, now, and gold eyes regarded him with surprised joy. "Rest now," he wished them both. "I am very, very proud of you."

"Dragons," Amaya breathed, as spirits faded. "You think Zuko learned from dragons."

"No," Iroh said thoughtfully, stepping back from Zuko's cot. "I know he learned from his mother. Who, I believe, may be a dragon's child."

A long silence.

"Walk with me," Amaya requested.

They sat in the opening leading to the garden, Amaya eyeing the thickening moon.

"You seem to believe me," Iroh observed.

"If you were going to lie to me, I think you'd do it with something a little less impossible," the healer said tartly. "Though I admit, I'm trying not to imagine how that works."

Iroh chuckled ruefully. "From our tales, the dragon takes human form. For a night, a year and a day, or a lifetime. They are not ordinary creatures," he added at her look of shock. "They love, and they hate, just as we. And like us, they can be capable of great evil. As Sozin's dragon companion was, hunting down his own kin who would not bow in the wake of the massacre...." He sighed. "I am not certain. There are only - little things. About Zuko, and Lady Ursa, and her parents, Shidan and Lady Kotone. Separate, they mean nothing. Together...." He shrugged.

"I see one already," Amaya said thoughtfully. "In a nation obsessed with power, how does a man not noble rate a lady's hand?"

"By being a powerful firebender, who is also most adept with daisho," Iroh said practically. "Her father approved the match the day he appeared."

"Appeared," Amaya echoed quietly.

"Indeed. True, Shidan brought a genealogy to the match. Which tales say most dragons do not," Iroh admitted. "Though given the order to hunt them had already been issued...." He shrugged again. "Questionable, but not proof. Nor are the swords. Though most firebenders of any skill simply do not bother to master other weapons. My nephew is a rare exception." He hesitated. "And the healing fire... it is the colors of dragons' fire. When they breathe to teach, and not to slay."

Amaya leaned against the frame, considering that. "I was going to ask why you took Zuko's waterbending so calmly-"

"You consider a faint calm?" Iroh murmured, embarrassed.

"You didn't scream at him. You didn't even scold him," Amaya pointed out. "I can only imagine what Master Pakku would have done if one of his students had suddenly thrown sparks. It wouldn't have been pretty."

No, likely not. A member of the White Lotus Pakku might be, but open-minded? No.

"But you're used to the impossible," Amaya went on.

"I have seen the Avatar unleash the fury of Ocean himself," Iroh said gravely. "Many things may be unlikely. But I would hesitate to assume anything impossible." He smiled. "Besides. You did not know my nephew when he was young. He loves water almost as much as he loves wind. If any firebender could master water, it would be Zuko."

Amaya eyed him. "If your nephew hadn't made it clear you two have met the Avatar, and if I hadn't felt his spirit with my own bending... well."

"My nephew is not that unlucky," Iroh said wryly. "Though I plan to have words with the Moon, should we ever meet again."

"She may have done all she could," Amaya said reluctantly. "I was always told the spirits aren't there to solve our problems. They point the way. After that, it's up to us to step in and choose."

Iroh inclined his head, accepting that point. Though had we left here without discovering the injury... spirits are not always kind. The Avatar has returned; they must have a plan. So long as Zuko survived long enough to carry out their chosen part for him - I doubt some of them would have cared what became of him afterward.

"But this question you asked Yue... surely you don't mean for Zuko to fight the Avatar?"

"I do not," Iroh said plainly. Though he has. And that is the purpose of the White Lotus, if hope should fail and an Avatar become corrupt and cruel. "But to stand in the way of hasty judgments by a naïve young boy - yes, that Zuko will do. And I will stand with him."

"I don't understand," Amaya said warily.

Iroh nodded. "Do you wish to be forced back to the North Pole, Lady Amaya?"

"Forced back?" the healer exclaimed, disbelieving. "Who would-?" She read the answer in his level gaze, and recoiled. "He wouldn't!"

"Do we know?" Iroh said bluntly. "Does anyone? The Avatar's balance is meant to include four separate nations. Yet we have lived without that for a hundred years. What will he decide is right, for those like you, who choose another land as home? For families like Jinhai's, who are earth and fire? For untold numbers of people in the Fire Nation, whose parents and grandparents might have blood of earth, or water, or even remnants of air?" He spread empty hands. "I do not know. I cannot even begin to guess. And if I do not know, Zuko has every right to be afraid for our people."

"That certain of yourself, are you?" Amaya said dryly.

"Yes," Iroh said simply.

While she was still stunned, he marshaled his thoughts. "There is something else you must consider. Sooner or later, Jinhai must leave Ba Sing Se."

"This is his home-"

"He is a firebender." Iroh regarded her soberly. "Believe me when I say to you, a child cannot hide that forever, even with help. A month, a year - sooner or later, the Dai Li will come for him."

"But he can't leave," Amaya whispered. "There's nowhere else to go."

"Not yet," Iroh said practically. "My nephew and I plan to create one."

She stared at him, speechless.

"It is not impossible," Iroh said frankly. "Zuko and I know what is required to create, fortify, and defend a colony. And how to evacuate civilians, even under difficult conditions. I should like a few more months to develop it, but we have already begun to craft a plan that should work. If our people decide they wish to leave."

She was still staring.

Iroh lifted a hand to reach out to her, and reluctantly thought better of it. "I know this must seem abrupt-"

"Abrupt?" Amaya finally burst out. "Zuko says he wants to learn how to protect refugees, to hide them - and now you say you've been planning all along to toss that away?"

"A plan we hope we will never have to use," Iroh insisted. "Zuko does wish to learn from you. Even if we evacuate, we may still need to hide what we are. And as for plans - we are great names, Lady Amaya. We protect our people. From the moment we knew what the Dai Li were, we knew we would need strategies to use against them."

"And letting them try to recruit Zuko is part of your strategy?" Blue eyes flashed at him, anger rising.

"A wise strategist makes use of the unexpected," Iroh said practically. "My nephew knows the risks. He will be cautious."

"He's sixteen!"

"Seventeen, in a few months," Iroh pointed out. "Amaya. He was banished at thirteen. Saw his first lethal battle a year later. And has fought alongside me throughout our journey, most recently against bandits who very much wished us dead. He is not a child."

"But you're asking him for the impossible," Amaya protested.

"No. His father asked the impossible," Iroh said grimly. "I only ask for the difficult. And I will not abandon him, lost and afraid, with no idea where to even start." He leaned back, deliberately lightening his tone. "I think you underestimate your apprentice. You assume that I proposed this plan."

About to speak, Amaya cut herself off. Narrowed her eyes at him. Shook her head, and glanced behind them into the shadows of the clinic.

"It is a very hopeful sign," Iroh said quietly. "To even consider this, instead of what I know his father wishes... that loyalty is weakening. A few months, perhaps a year - he will survive, Amaya. I know it."

"You," Amaya said, after long minutes of thoughtful silence, "are absolutely insane."

Which was exactly what his then not-yet-fiancée Natsu had said, many decades ago. Obviously, the night was looking up.

Catching the warmth of his smile, Amaya scowled. "That was not a compliment."

"No?" Iroh did his best to look surprised. And innocent. And cuddly.

"Don't even think about it." Still scowling, she stood, and *hmp*ed. "Stay with Zuko, or go home. Your choice."

"Most generous of you." Iroh stood as well, and bowed. "I wish you a very good night." Turning, he executed a polite strategic withdrawal.

And grinned all the way to bed.

He still missed Natsu. He always would. Though not as sharply as he missed Lu Ten. Natsu had been gone near two decades, now; his son's grief was fresher, and sharpened by being, in part, his responsibility.

But raising Zuko had helped soften that pain. Quarrelsome, impatient, often reckless and sometimes foolish - Zuko still loved him, mending the heart Iroh had thought forever broken by Ba Sing Se.

My second son.

He had decided long ago he would not repeat his father's mistakes. He would love this unlooked-for child, and teach him honor, loyalty, and justice. As Zuko had taught him of the wonder that could be hidden under a mask of rage, and resilience in the face of overwhelming odds.

Still. All battles are easier with allies... and friends.

He would like to be Amaya's friend. He would like that very much. She was lovely and inventive and quietly, fiercely brave.

But she was also Zuko's teacher. And he would not interfere with his nephew's training.

Be patient. Wait. You have made your interest clear; let her choose what she will and will not risk. There is time.

Clearing his mind of hopes and nightmares, Iroh meditated to his nephew's breathing. And deliberately fell asleep.

Chapter 14

Note to self, Huojin thought, head still ringing from hitting the clinic wall, do not shake sleeping imperial firebenders. Bad idea.

“H’ojin?” Lee muttered, blinking as if he couldn’t figure out why, exactly, he was half-dressed with a groaning Guard at his feet. “S middle of the night... two hours ‘til dawn, easy...”

Blinking away a few stars, Huojin eyed him with disbelief. “You can’t be looking at a clock.”

“Who needs a clock? I know-” A jaw-cracking yawn. “Know where the sun is. Isn’t. S’night. Go ‘way.” Eyes sliding shut, he meandered back to the cot.

“Healing emergency.” Face freshly washed, Amaya emerged, giving her apprentice a look of rueful sympathy. “If you’ve rested enough, I could use your help.” She glanced at Huojin. “Are you all right?”

“Had worse,” Huojin admitted. Touched the sore spot, and winced. “Remind me to throw water on him next time.”

That seemed to jerk Lee awake. Green eyes widened, guilty. “I’m sorry. Uncle always calls from the door to wake me up, don’t move-”

“I’ll handle it,” Amaya said firmly. “Get dressed. You’re coming.”

Nodding, Lee grabbed his clothes from the foot of the cot, and stumbled off to the washroom.

Sprawled on the next cot over, Mushi simply snored.

Amaya’s cool touch washed away the pain, and Huojin picked himself off the floor. “Thanks. What are they doing here?” He didn’t mean for it to sound like an accusation. Much.

“Aftereffects of Lee’s drowning,” Amaya said blandly. “The spirits really do have it in for that young man.”

“Maybe this isn’t the best call to take him on,” Huojin said reluctantly. “Everything’s supposed to be handled...” But you could never be sure. Not with creatures like these.

“What’s handled?”

Kid moves fast. “Let’s just say, this wasn’t a regular house fire,” Huojin told the firebender plainly.

“And there are reasons I treat the Dai Li, if they need me,” Amaya added. “They were meant to protect the cultural heritage of Ba Sing Se. They still do. But protecting history means protecting ancient artifacts, and with that...”

“Tsukumogami.” Lee looked a bit more awake, feeling at his sash. “I’ve got salt, but I don’t know anything about consoling ceremonies. That’s more of a Fire Sage thing... what?” he asked at Huojin’s raised brows. “They held ceremonies every solstice where I grew up. Ba Sing Se’s not the only place with old things.”

“Hadn’t occurred to me,” the Guard said honestly. “Is that what you call ninety-nine-year spirits?”

“We have some odd words,” Lee said after a moment. Sighed, and seemed to brace himself. “So Dai Li handle spirits? They must be pretty strong benders.”

“And how,” Huojin agreed grimly. Eyed Amaya again. “You sure you want to bring him? It’s supposed to be just cleanup, but....”

“Anyone who can dodge the Ocean Spirit in a bad mood is safer than you are,” Amaya replied, dryly amused. “Let’s go.”

I tried. Shivering slightly, Huojin led the way.

“What’s wrong?” Lee asked as they threaded their way through dark streets.

“What’s wrong?” Huojin echoed, incredulous. “Spirits, Lee. Any sane man would be heading the other way.”

“That just lets them hit you from behind.”

Which implied Lee was both pessimistic enough to believe running wouldn’t do any good, and optimistic enough to believe he could survive anyway. Ow.

At least the aftermath looked quiet. An unassuming block of Lower Ring apartments, now smoke-stained and surrounded by a huddle of evacuated residents and a few nervous City Guards. You couldn’t see the Dai Li moving through shadows and over rooftops, but you knew they were there.

Amaya headed for the worst of the wounded, those already being tended with herbs and poultices by some of the local non-bending healers. The looks of relief on their faces were enough to make Huojin wince.

Lee hung back a little, taking a few moments to glance over buildings and knots of people before he murmured in Amaya’s ear and started setting up his firepot.

Marked the trouble spots, Huojin realized, following the firebender’s gaze to suspiciously thick patches of char, and faces more angry than glad to be alive. Ready to pull out and take Amaya with you, aren’t you?

Not the most professional reaction from a healer. But personally? He couldn’t blame Lee one bit.

Let’s see if I can’t head some of that trouble off.

Some of the would-be troublemakers just needed someone to talk to. Or talk at. He wasn’t the only Guard listening and nodding politely as various people recounted their fiery encounter with an old stone lamp and a couple of theater fans gone really, really bad.

“-Flapping like a bat-raven!” the latest shocked oldster was recounting, hands up and clawing the air. “Black tears for eyes, that glowed like evil lava....”

Huh. Didn’t sound like a fan-spirit. “I’m sure they’ve gotten all the spirits left in the apartments-”

“No, no, no! Not in there!” A gnarled finger jabbed two alleys over. “I saw it! Before all this happened! But no, no one listens to old Hu....”

Right. And what were the odds of four ninety-nine-year spirits loose in the same area? “I’ll check it out,” Huojin sighed. Traded a few words with the officer in charge, and headed down the alley. Panic tended to spread; nip this in the bud, and there’d be less chance of a riot later-

Something hooked around his throat and yanked him into the wall, hard.

What the-?

Silky membranes whipped dust into his eyes, battered his fingers away from gripping the vice on his throat. The alley went red and black, he couldn't breathe-

Something snapped like the crack of a whip, and there was air.

Black and flapping, all right. But caught like a netted cat-owl in a translucent sphere, water leading back to....

That's not Amaya.

Lee was a firebender. Huojin knew that. He'd seen it.

Just as plainly as he saw water wrapped around the teen's hands, anchoring the net holding a squealing, homicidal spirit. A black, tattered....

Huojin closed his eyes, and shook his head to rattle the image free. Peeked.

No good. Still there.

I almost got strangled to death by an umbrella.

I'm never going to live this down.

"Get help," Lee said tightly.

"No need," came a familiar voice. "We're here."

Iron chains shot out, trapping the indignant spirit with an almost cheery rattle. A familiar Dai Li dropped to the ground, hands clasped behind him as he regarded the thrashing umbrella. "You can let go now."

"Agent Shirong." Water swept back into Lee's waterskin in a flow that stuttered, like a spring freshet around a just-dropped log. "I didn't know the Dai Li handled... things like this."

"Most people would rather not think about it," Shirong shrugged. Eyed Lee. "I don't remember that move from the scroll."

"...I kind of made it up."

Must've hit my head on the wall harder than I thought, Huojin concluded. It was the only way any of this made sense.

"Hmm." Even shadowed by his hat, a flicker of Shirong's surprise still showed. "Then you might want to see if you can modify it. As it is, you're using both hands...."

"So once I've got it, what do I do with it?" Lee sighed. "I know. I can switch off to just one, but it takes a lot of concentration. I'll ask Master Amaya... what?"

Shirong was studying him, very carefully, as fellow agents vanished with the umbrella. "You're far too calm. What kind of kamuiy have you fought before?"

Oh, this is bad, Huojin realized. No way can he tell them - and damn it, Lee's an awful liar-

"A plague spirit," Lee said quietly.

“Seriously?” Huojin croaked.

“One of the scariest nights of my life.” Lee started to go on, stopped, and drew a deep breath, obviously gathering his thoughts. “While Uncle and I were traveling, we came to a ranch, where the animals were sick, and.... We’re not sure of all of it. This is just what we figured out after - after we found the body.”

Shirong winced; the most human reaction Huojin had ever seen on a Dai Li. “A mother with child.”

“She was just a girl,” Lee said sadly. “She wasn’t even my age. We found out there’d been a Fire Nation raid there, months ago, and-” He spread empty hands, helpless. “Her father said she was missing. Her brothers were going along with it.”

“That’d do it.” Shirong actually looked ill. “How did you stop it?”

“Burned the ranch down,” Lee shrugged.

Huojin clapped a hand to his forehead in disbelief.

“At least we hope it worked,” Lee said sheepishly. “We couldn’t exactly stick around. How do you prove you’re not a firebender?”

...He did not just say that.

“Good point,” Shirong chuckled. Turned to go, and paused. “By the way. Plague spirits are vindictive little bastards. If it didn’t follow you, then it worked.”

Some of the tension went out of Lee’s shoulders. “Thank you,” he whispered.

“Try to stay out of trouble,” Shirong advised, almost kindly. “I know you won’t be able to entirely, the spirits have painted a target on your back just like the rest of us... but try not to get into any human trouble.” A vicious chuckle. “It’s so messy when we have to scrape people off walls.”

A rumble of earth, and he dropped out of sight.

“Showoff,” Huojin grumbled. And eyed Lee uncertainly. “What... how?”

“I drowned.” Lee was eyeing him right back, wary as if trying to gauge which way to run. “The Moon - did something to me. It’s crazy, but it’s real.” He swallowed. “Amaya’s going to help me train that, too.”

Too? As in- “You’re... both?” Huojin got out.

“I thought Uncle would be mad,” Lee said in a very small voice.

“No, really?” Huojin managed. Firebender with a waterbending nephew. Ouch.

“But he’s not,” Lee went on, surprised.

“The clinic still standing was a clue,” Huojin said dryly, rubbing his throat. Ow.

“Uncle doesn’t - um. Well, he hasn’t... for a while... he’s retired....”

“I don’t want to know what from, do I?”

“No,” Lee said honestly. Glanced aside, as they started walking back toward the survivors. “He should be really retired. Playing Pai Sho, like he wants... but when he got home, Father - dumped me on him. I didn’t - didn’t really take it well.”

That sounded like an understatement. So why are you telling me this? Huojin wondered.

“Did you do that to Amaya?” Lee asked, low and quiet. “Just - get mad at her, because she wasn’t who you wanted there?”

Oh. Sounded like drowning had made someone think a little. “I did,” Huojin admitted. “You can tell a kid ‘til you’re blue in the face he can’t have what he wants. Doesn’t make it hurt any less.” He arched a paternal brow. “You could start by apologizing.”

“I thought I’d start with your throat,” Lee said wryly.

Huojin brushed the edge of bruises, and winced. “I can live with that.”

Uncle,

I’m sorry for being angry with you. Because you were there, and Mom wasn’t. Because Father made it clear I wasn’t worth his time, and she was. Because of a lot of things.

I’m going to try to do better.

You’re probably going to have to thump it into my head a few more times, though. Family temper. Reckless. That whole mess.

Going out with Amaya to visit some villages near the Outer Wall. Will be back.

...And don’t tell Huojin, but it’s really hard to save somebody when you’re trying not to giggle. Rabid umbrella-spirit. Heh.

-Lee.

Rereading the note in a lull between customers, Iroh smiled. Folded it away, and turned back to his tea.

Shifting his weight in the apple tree as it swayed in the wind, Zuko looked over the green patchwork of fields and villages inside the Outer Wall. “You could lose small islands out here.”

“Can you see my Fluffykins?” called up from below.

Zuko eyed the fluffy white creature cleaning itself in a cleft of thinner branches, just out of safe arm’s reach. “I see her.”

“Well?”

“If I get her, she’s not going to be happy,” Zuko warned.

“Just get her down, please!”

“Don’t say I didn’t warn you,” Zuko muttered. Gathered water, and threw.

The squalling wet white tornado hit a compost pile, and shredded leaves flew.

Even as a waterbender, he's a born firebender, Amaya thought, wryly amused as she helped clean the last of the scratches on those who'd volunteered to catch the city woman's pet. Never work around a problem when you can cut right through it.

Ah well. No one had gotten worse than scratches, and Fluffykins was back with her owner, who'd already left to catch the train, after cooing over her still-damp kitty and gratefully dispensing a small sum of coins to everyone who'd helped.

"So what's a city cat doing all the way out here?" Zuko asked, frowning as he checked over one of the wide-eyed farm children.

Good question, Amaya realized. And glanced covertly at her apprentice. You always know when something's out of place, don't you? Good habit.

"Some crazy young earthbender from the Upper Ring," the headman's wife, Wu, said with a disapproving scowl. She waved a hand, indicating vaguely north and west. "Carved up some of the fields outside the Inner Wall for a zoo, of all things. They say there was a stampede of animals a few days ago - everything in the city!"

Which unleashed a flood of gossip and speculation; what were the Inner Ring nobles thinking, who was going to feed the city if this caught on, how much had the farmers been compensated more than they admitted they had, did this mean the generals were going to move the Outer Wall outward again, and did that mean the war was going well, or...?

Zuko, Amaya was startled to notice, paid careful attention to all of it.

And why are you surprised? the healer asked herself after a little thought. No few of these people are Fire Nation; he can see that as well as they can see him. If he and Mushi are planning... that impossible thing they're planning... of course he needs to know what they're worried about.

An attention to detail she'd never have expected of someone Zuko's age. Tested by the spirits or not.

They're really planning to do it. Evacuate their people. Create a sanctuary, outside of Ba Sing Se.

I've looked after my hidden folk so long....

But being a healer meant you did what was best for your patients. Not what you wanted. Amaya braced herself, and got through the morning of seeing to those who didn't have the time or strength to come into the Lower Ring. And waited until they were on the train back to murmur, "Do you think you'll be able to send word back to the city, once you're all safe?"

Zuko raised that lone brow and gave her a smirk that reminded her of his uncle. "You want to just hear about it? Or do you want to help make it?"

"I don't want to!"

Sitting off to the side in the cellar, Tingzhe held his breath, glad he'd sent Suyin upstairs at the first signs of Jinhai heading toward a full-blown temper tantrum. He could see "Lee" silently counting to ten... and the royal line of Sozin wasn't exactly known for calm and even tempers.

"Firebending," the young prince said levelly, sitting still, "comes from the breath, not the muscles. It took my teacher years to get that into my head, but I have a lot of bad habits. You need to start out with good ones. Fire isn't like other elements. Earth doesn't rise up and crush you; water doesn't decide to pull you down. But fire will spread, and it will try to consume everything it can. You need to control your fire. And you have to start with breathing."

"I won't! It's stupid and you're no fun and-"

The teenager breathed out sharply, and fire erupted.

Tingzhe forced himself to sit there, even as Jinhai yelped at the flames encircling both firebenders. He won't hurt a child. Forget his father - the boy you've seen has been patient, kind, and not someone who enjoys the sight of others in pain.

Spirits, please let me be right....

"You can part another bender's fire with a defensive move. If you control your own fire." Zuko's voice was iron. "You want to leave this circle? Do it."

Jinhai's mouth dropped open. "But - that's not fair!"

"Who ever told you bending was fair?" Zuko's voice didn't soften. "This is fire, Jinhai! Any time you bend, you're walking into a cage with a dillo-lion. A hungry, angry dillo-lion. If you don't have control, it will chew you up and spit you out!"

"Daddy...."

Clenched fists hidden in his sleeves, the professor shook his head. "When I was in training, my teacher threw an extremely large boulder at my head, son." I grant you, I was a bit older. "Lee is correct. Bending is not fair."

Jinhai reached out to the flames, and yanked his hand back. "But he's got the fire!"

"Of course I do," Zuko said dryly. "You want the whole house to burn down? If I let go, that's exactly what will happen." Green eyes narrowed. "Fire is power, Jinhai. It's the determination to get what you want. How badly do you want to get past these flames?"

Don't move, Tingzhe told himself grimly. Unless he's in actual danger - don't move.

Another deliberate breath, and Zuko's circle of flames shrunk inward. "How badly do you want it?"

Jinhai was backing away from the flames, wide-eyed, glancing at his father as if he couldn't believe this was happening. "You're being mean!"

"You haven't seen mean yet." Zuko's voice held an edge of threat that put the hairs up on the back of Tingzhe's neck. "Jinhai. I'm tired is a reason to stop. I don't know what I'm doing is a reason to stop. I don't want to is never a reason to stop." The circle of flames flickered a little lower. "Determination. What do you want?"

Fingers almost brushing flames, Jinhai pulled back, almost tripping over Zuko's knee. Looked at his father again, still stunned that Tingzhe wasn't doing anything.

Oh, how I want to. But Tingzhe arched a brow instead, the same as he would when Jinhai brought him any problem the boy needed to solve himself. And mouthed, "Think."

Jinhai blinked, and swallowed. "I want... to stop?"

The fire went out.

“That works,” Zuko said tiredly. “That’s enough for today.”

Jinhai was already halfway across the cellar, skidding to a stop in front of his father with wide, hurt eyes-

Turned on his heel, and bolted up the steps.

Tingzhe sighed, heart sore. Eyed the teenager standing there, face closed and defiant, stance balanced and subtly braced.

He expects me to attack him.

Well. And what else would he think?

“Come up to the garden,” Tingzhe requested. “I think you need the sun more than Jinhai does.”

Surprised and wary, Zuko followed him out.

“As one teacher to another,” Tingzhe said levelly as they settled on a bench, “if you’re tired enough to start losing your temper, tell your students to go home.”

Zuko winced.

No stranger to proud young men, Tingzhe waited, letting the silence stretch out.

“...It wasn’t supposed to be like this.” Zuko glared into the tangle of a mustard bush. “I promised Uncle I’d try to think. I’m... things are better right now than they’ve been since - we were on a raft for three weeks with nothing! I shouldn’t be angry!”

“Perhaps,” Tingzhe mused. On a raft? Exiled or not, how does a young prince end up... save it for Meixiang. If she’s right, we’ll hear quite a story. “But if I’d been stuck on a raft three weeks, I think I might still be angry. Let alone if I’d suffered the other events you mentioned.”

The unscarred eye narrowed. “When an Agni Kai’s over, it’s over.”

“So I’ve been told,” Tingzhe acknowledged. And here you risk your life on the hope that you are right, and he’s more like his uncle than his father. You’re a sentimental old man, no doubt. “But the outcome of the duel does not change the fact that you were betrayed before it ever began.”

Smoke rose from between clenched fingers. “I owed him loyalty,” the teen gritted out.

“And as one of the Earth Kingdom, I don’t pretend to understand how strong that bond is,” Tingzhe said bluntly. “But my wife tells me loyalty never demands suicide. Forcing a thirteen-year-old boy to duel an unexpected, far stronger opponent - I’m not certain suicide is a strong enough term.” Attempted murder comes closer. That man, I could believe it of.

“But as I said, I can’t ever know,” Tingzhe stated, a bit wistfully. “My wife granted me not only her hand, but part of her spirit’s strength. Sometimes, I wonder if my love can ever be a fair return.” He smiled sadly, and leaned back. “Meixiang would like to invite your family to a potluck, next week.”

Zuko hesitated, smoke wisping away. “What’s that?”

Oh dear. “Why don’t we both talk to her,” Tingzhe said plainly. “She can suggest a few things that aren't hard to cook, and anyway I can never keep straight how much you need to bring for this many people myself." If he even knows how to cook, the professor realized ruefully. Some of our noble children can be spectacularly useless....

"How many people?" Zuko asked warily.

...Well, let's hope for the best.

"Six children, and six adults," Iroh mused, scratching notes on tattered paper with a bit of charcoal. "Hmm."

Keep it slow. Get the wrist movements right.... Zuko pulled most of the water from the pitcher with only one rippling splash, and started snaking it between his hands. "It's a bad idea."

"It's dinner, nephew. Not a surprise attack."

"Surprised me," Zuko muttered. "They can't really want me there, Uncle. I scared Jinhai."

Iroh only raised a brow. "And what did he do, to deserve being frightened?"

Zuko winced, and had to swirl a hand to keep the stream from falling. "He was being a brat." It sounded so petty.

"During training?" Iroh nodded once. "Then it was wise to correct him." The retired general held up a warning hand before Zuko could protest. "If you feel now that you were too harsh, watch him closely in the next lesson. You do not wish him to be afraid of you. But a little fear, in and of itself, is not always bad. Fire is dangerous. Self-control is essential. A firebender cannot act like a temperamental brat." Iroh paused, looking into memory. "No matter how much a young one might deserve to."

"I break things," Zuko muttered, feeling even more guilty. "He just - didn't want to breathe."

"You have not broken anything recently," Iroh stated. "Your temper will always need work to control; it is a flaw of our family, and none of us escape it. But unpleasant as that is, nephew - you break things. You do not harm people. A firebender who does not control his breath will never control his fire. We both know what that leads to." He set his notes aside, and nodded at the liquid flowing with Zuko's movements. "What is that?"

"Amaya calls it streaming the water," Zuko answered, concentrating as he arced it high. For some reason, moving it over his head always threatened to make it fall apart-

Oh. Idiot. North Pole. Ice and water over your head was not good, remember?

He'd melted it then, and survived. This was just a little water. It was not going to drown him.

Rippling water steadied, and he breathed easier, looping the ribbon back down near waist level. "It's a beginner's move. Like playing with a candle."

"To learn the feel of your element, under controlled conditions," Iroh nodded. And paused. "You do not have Jinhai working with candles yet."

"No." Zuko flexed the water. Let it gather into a globe in his palm, and tossed it back into a soaring ribbon. "If he works on breathing again tomorrow, I was going to have him try the burning leaf."

"Good," Iroh stated. "If he sees control directly applied, he may more clearly understand why he needs it.” He raised a brow. “For a beginner’s move, that looks quite useful.”

“Lets you work on quantity, direction, and precision,” Zuko agreed. Up and around. Can I-? Yeah, just twist that way.... Dragging fingers through the ribbon split one strand into three; he held them rippling for a few moments, then collapsed them back together.

But it’d been a long day, and he could feel the tremors that meant he was pushing too far. Gathering water together, he tipped it back into the pitcher. “I can think of a lot you can do with just this. I’ve already done a few things; that net I used to catch the spirit? I didn’t know what I was doing, when I made it up, but it’s just this in a couple different pieces. Toss water, make a globe, bring it back.” Which meant he might be able to make it work one-handed after all. With practice.

“Basics,” Iroh smiled. “Learn them well, and all else will follow.” He raised a curious brow. “What is it like?”

Zuko frowned, reaching out to the quiet tide-pulls of water in their apartment, in the next over, on the roof. “Like walking in the surf just offshore. It pushes and pulls at you, and most of the time, that’s fine; you just keep going. But if you don’t pay attention, and a rogue wave comes through-” He clapped his hands together, remembering the groan of their ship’s twisted metal in the midst of the typhoon.

“Fire, and the ocean,” Iroh mused. “It is not safe to turn your back on either of them. But respect them, and they are powerful allies.” He laughed softly. “Even beautiful, from how I have seen you bend.”

Oh. That was... interesting to know. He hadn’t really been trying for pretty, it’d just happened that way, and... right. Think. “It feels weird,” Zuko admitted. “Not in chi, Amaya fixed that. Just - being able to do both of them. Fire and water. It shouldn’t work.” He hesitated. “It shouldn’t feel like it fits.”

“They are not as separate as one might think,” Iroh said thoughtfully. “I have been told that at its core, all bending is one; that even non-benders who learn to move their chi for battle, as you are teaching Suyin, draw from the same source. More specifically... have I told you of jin?”

“All eighty-five kinds?” Zuko said warily. He did pay attention to lectures on battle strategies, even if he couldn’t name them all off the top of his head.

“It is wise to know them all, but three are most important to bending,” Iroh observed. “Neutral jin is the key to earthbending. The master waits, and listens, to find the exact moment to strike.”

“Professor Tingzhe,” Zuko realized. “He’s always just... calm. Waiting. Until he knows exactly what he wants to say.”

“Indeed,” Iroh agreed. “I very much hope to have an opportunity to speak of bending with him. We use many similar stances, but the reasons behind them are very different. Which leads us to fire. Positive jin, advancing and attacking, is the heart of our art. As our fire is fueled by our own chi, we often cannot fight as long as other benders. So we attack first, relentlessly, to overwhelm our foes before endurance can tip the battle’s scales.”

That one, Zuko knew. But he nodded and listened anyway, sure Uncle had a point. Well, mostly sure.

“Water may oppose fire, but in tactics and energy, our true opposite is airbending,” Iroh went on. “Negative jin, retreating and evading, are part of the philosophy of air. You have seen this chasing the Avatar. He will not stand his ground, he will not fight if he can flee; and while he is himself, and not possessed by Avatars past, he will not kill.”

“The monks fought,” Zuko pointed out. “I’ve seen the temples.”

“An adult knows when to set aside ideals for reality,” Iroh said practically. “If all life is sacred, so is your own life. And you should not allow it to be taken.” He smiled. “So we have come around the cycle, to water. Which balances both positive and negative jin, turning defense into attack as they use their opponents’ force against them. This conserves energy, and allows them to fight for great lengths of time. But they rarely strike the first blow, and if they are too slow to turn their enemy’s attack, they lose momentum.”

Which could be the difference between a battle won, or lost. Zuko glanced away, thinking that through. “So I know positive, and I’ve fought negative....”

“And you have lived in the tide’s grasp for three years,” Iroh stated. “You know water, Prince Zuko. Perhaps not as one of the Water Tribes would, but you do know it. Build on that.”

I’m going to try. “We haven’t talked about....” Zuko swallowed. “I’m not the heir. You said that wrecked a lot of your plans. Did it - what does being a waterbender do to our plan? Just because our people accept Amaya, doesn’t mean they’ll understand if I am.”

“It is likely some will not,” Iroh said bluntly. “Yet it is also likely those are the ones we would not have been able to persuade, even if our names were clear.”

You can’t save them all, Zuko told himself grimly.

...I know I can’t. But I wanted to try. “A lot of them aren’t going to want to leave,” Zuko admitted. “They already started over once.”

“And as you yourself know, to begin another life is never easy,” Iroh nodded. “We will be asking them to leave behind the lives they have built, and cast their fate with those who have created what seems a desperate plan. And if Jinhai is the only firebender who has been born here, in all these years - they may not consider it a risk for their children.” He glanced aside with a grim smile. “Though the risk may be greater than they realize, as the Fire Nation turns more attention here. I think it is not a coincidence that Jinhai was born while my siege still held.”

Okay, interesting to think about later, but not exactly crucial right now. “So we’re only going to get people who are scared, or fed up with the Dai Li, or just out to take a risk,” Zuko concluded.

“Most likely,” Iroh nodded. “And such people are unlikely to balk simply because you are a waterbender. I admit it might have been easier to call on our people’s loyalty had we not been declared traitors, but that time is past. We have both seen what waterbenders can do. You will be a great help.” He sighed. “And given we are alone, and in hiding, it is a great relief to know that one of us will not be without bending during the eclipse.”

Zuko winced. He’d been without his bending before, but Ty Lee had never intended to kill him. Eight minutes without it, without armed backup, when anyone with the brains to look out a window could know firebenders were helpless... not a good situation.

I can’t tell Jinhai. Not until it happens. Maybe the Earth Kingdom has better astronomers than I know, good enough to keep track of the heavens the way the Fire Sages do. But I doubt it. There’s an eclipse every four years, somewhere. If they’d known, they would have used it sometime this last century. So they don’t. And if they don’t - I’m not going to make Professor Tingzhe choose between his nation and his family.

“As for specifics on how waterbending will help,” Iroh smiled, “I have some ideas.”

“Trade you for some on the fortifications,” Zuko offered.

“Oh?” Iroh looked interested.

“We’re going to have to be ready for any element,” Zuko pointed out. “I have some plans for what we can do if we’ve got metal, or if we have to stick with just wood.”

Sleep would be a while coming, but Uncle’s look of approval was worth it.

“Okay,” Suyin said dubiously, holding the dried oak leaf by its stem. Gripping his own, Jinhai looked equally confused. Watching from the corner as she mended a sleeve, Meixiang didn’t look confused - but she didn’t look about to explain, either. “I’m not exactly sure how a leaf is supposed to teach me to fight....”

“Uncle would say something about tiny acorns and mighty oaks, but I’ll spare you the proverbs,” Lee said wryly. “This is actually two lessons. But they’re related. Suyin, you’re getting the moves down, which means it’s time to show you what happens when you have to fight distracted. Which is going to be most of the time. Until you’ve had a lot more practice, any time you fight, thinking is going to go right out the window. So I’m going to show you what that’s like now. That way, if you do get in a fight, you’re less likely to panic. If you stay in control, even if you can’t think, you’re going to react correctly. Which means you live.”

Swallowing hard, Suyin nodded.

“Jinhai. Your lesson is also about control,” Lee went on. “Control your breathing, and you control your fire. This is going to show you exactly how that works.” He gripped the center of Jinhai’s leaf between two fingers, and a spark blazed. “Focus on the fire. Keep the flame burning as long as you can. Slowly. So it takes as long as you can make it to reach the edges of the leaf.” Lee smirked a little. “It’s okay if you mess up. I brought plenty of leaves.”

As one, the two siblings looked over at Lee’s kit. And the paper sack of leaves. Suyin stifled a giggle; not fast enough, though, and Jinhai wrinkled his nose at her.

“Don’t worry. She’s not getting off that easy.” A jab of Lee’s fingers, a wash of heat-

Suyin didn’t drop the leaf. But she felt sweat prickle all over, her breathing quicker, heart speeding up. Fire, it’s on fire, I’m not a bender....

“Suyin.” Lee’s voice was eerily calm. “I know you’re scared. That’s the point. Combat is the scariest thing there is. Fire can’t even come close. I have the fire, Suyin. I won’t let it burn you. Breathe.”

In through the nose. Out through the mouth. Take your stance.

It was like forcing her thoughts through stone. Everything was too bright, too loud, too fast. Dimly she saw a flare as Jinhai gasped, saw Lee walk across the cellar to give her brother another leaf and some encouraging words. She couldn’t hear what. She wasn’t sure she would have understood if she had.

“Suyin.” Lee was in front of her, gently turning her to face away from her brother. “He burned you a couple times?”

I'm not going to cry. I'm not. Eyes brimming, she nodded.

“You love him, but you’re afraid.” Lee held her gaze, understanding. “That’s okay. That’s what this is for. Partly. You have to respect fire. But if you’re afraid, you’ll make the wrong decision when it matters. So we’re going to get you past that. Still breathing?”

Mute, Suyin nodded again. In and out. In, and out.

“This is hard,” Lee said seriously. “I know that. But I also know you can do it.” He guided her over to the futon. “So we start over. This is how you fall, when you can’t use one of your hands.”

Footsteps stomped deliberately down the stairs, and Zuko bit back a curse. We must have gone longer than I thought.

“Min. Jia.” Meixiang’s voice was warm, but not entirely welcoming. “You’re early.”

“Why does he have his hands on Suyin?” Min bit out.

Jia smirked behind him. “And why didn’t you mention he wasn’t bad looking, in a scruffy kind of-”

Letting Suyin up from the pinning hold, Zuko gave Jia a hard look.

“...Ugh.”

Yeah. That’s what I thought.

“You two-!” Suyin blazed.

“Suyin.” Meixiang’s tone was hard. “Forgive my children’s ill manners, Lee. They should know by now what full-contact training looks like. And that not all of us escaped the war unmarked.” She shook her head. “We are going to talk, later. I am very disappointed in both of you.”

What am I supposed to say? Zuko wondered. “I forgive you”? I’m a lousy liar. And I’m not the one Min really insulted. Doesn’t he respect his sister’s ability to protect her own honor?

Then again, the Earth Kingdom didn’t teach women to fight. How messed up was that?

Deliberately turning his back on the stairs, Zuko reached out for Jinhai’s slow-burning leaf. “I think that’s enough for today.”

“Aww.” But Jinhai handed the leaf over, gaze still sliding toward his older brother.

“If you want to practice this, get your parents’ permission first, so someone can spot you,” Zuko said plainly. “And do it right over a sand bucket. So if something goes wrong, all you have to do is drop it.” He hoped he hadn’t let the stab of hurt show. He was used to reactions like Jia’s, but Min-

He’s Jinhai’s brother. You’re just his teacher. Let it go.

But that didn’t feel like the right thing to do either. He didn’t intend to interfere with family loyalties, Meixiang should know that even if Min didn’t-

Earthbender. This isn’t about loyalty. I don’t know what it is... but I can’t let him think he can cut in on their lessons.

Right. Stick to the plan. “There was one more thing I wanted to show you,” Zuko stated. “If Madam Wen doesn’t mind a little experiment? Something the professor said gave me an idea.”

Meixiang raised curious brows. “Let’s see it, then.”

Burning leaf still in hand, Zuko reached into the bag for another handful. Walked to the center of the cleared floor, lit all his leaves from the first, and tossed them into the air.

Move; like water, just a little sharper....

He swept his arms across. Burning leaves followed the arc, swirling in their own hot wind.

Pull, but gently. You don’t want to pull the flame free. You want it to carry its own fuel.

Which wasn’t classic firebending at all. But he’d thrown Sozin’s style against the Avatar a dozen times. It didn’t work.

He can snuff out a fire that’s just chi. But if something’s on fire - he’s not so good with that.

And neither is Azula.

Control kept the leaves burning slowly. But he held a loose grip on the fire, not a tight one that would rip it right off the leaves. Careful... gentle... keep everything in motion....

Swirling leaves echoed swirling hands. Zuko turned, and fire twisted around him in a burning whirlwind.

It works!

Flames burned higher as his heart soared; he almost laughed. No one’s seen firebending like this. Not since-

Kuzon. He didn’t know how he knew. He was just sure, the way he knew the sun would rise tomorrow.

Kuzon knew healing. He knew airbenders. He must have tried this.

Great-grandfather. Thank you.

Wind slowed as he slowed, bringing his hands up in the opening move of streaming water, gathering fiery bits in a globe between his hands. Zuko felt through the cellar for any other fire, marking his own internal flame, and Jinhai’s, searching for any stray sparks....

And exhaled softly, letting fire die to cool ashes.

“Wow,” Jinhai breathed.

Min, Zuko was grimly amused to note, suddenly didn’t look sure of himself at all.

Think, he willed the teenage earthbender. I don’t care how good your teachers tell you you are. I’ve fought earthbenders. If you haven’t fought firebenders - believe me, you don’t want to start with me.

And I don’t want to fight you. I’m here for Jinhai and Suyin. I’m even here for you, you jerk.

You don't want to lose your family. Ever.

Maybe Min would think about it. Maybe Uncle would have a better idea. Right now, he didn't know what else to try. Earth might not have the determination of fire, but they had a stubborn persistence that fixed them to a chosen spot; a fort, a city, a point of view. He wasn't sure how to dislodge Min from his "I hate firebenders" stand without using overwhelming force... and that would not have a beneficial effect on Jinhai's training.

So be like water. Evade and redirect. See what happens.

"I'll have to tell my husband about that move," Meixiang mused. "It reminds me of the sandbenders he's described a few times." She nodded, as if to herself. "I'm sure he looks forward to discussing that with your uncle at the potluck."

"You what?" Min started. And cut himself off at his mother's sharp look.

"I know Uncle's looking forward to that," Zuko said politely, deliberately ignoring the tension in the air. He'd eaten dinners with worse enemies. And Iroh was looking forward to this, cooking and all.

The anniversary's coming up. He should - he should have some time to be happy. Before then.

Min wasn't cruel, after all. Just pigheaded and ignorant. He could survive that.

Exchanging bows with his students, Zuko let Meixiang escort him to the door. And tried to ignore a sudden shiver of foreboding.

Pigheaded, ignorant, and knows I'm a firebender. But he won't do anything to expose me. He wouldn't put Jinhai in that kind of danger.

Spirits, I wish I could believe that.

Jumpy as a rabbiroo on hot coals, Huojin thought ruefully, glancing at Lee out of the corner of his eye as the teen attacked his mochi. Much like a canny but harassed Guard commander would, taking apart a hostage situation.

Poor kid. He's trying, he really is. He just doesn't do normal.

Oh, Lee knew which utensils to use, and why; Amaya had given him that much to build on-

"So, what do you do for fun?" Jia gave him a bright smile, only betrayed by the wariness in her eyes.

"I don't."

-He just absolutely failed at small talk.

"Is he always that serious?" Luli whispered in Huojin's ear, eyes dancing.

"Pretty much," Huojin murmured back.

"Aww. Poor kid...."

Down at the children's end of the table, twelve-year-old Lim and nine-year-old Daiyu were happily chatting away with Suyin... and tolerating Jinhai. Which was about as much as you could expect at their ages, especially after the firebending little scamp had gone after Daiyu's braids with a glue pot a few months back.

Can't really blame Lee for not having a hobby, Huojin admitted to himself. Between the clinic and keeping the kid out of trouble, who'd have time?

Not to mention the waterbending. Oma, Shu, and Agni. If Lee was training that on top of everything else - when did he sleep?

"Always busy, my nephew," Mushi smiled. "I have tried to interest him in Pai Sho, but he usually prefers studying maps. Or fishing, once in a while."

"Too bad you're not out with the fleets," Min said dryly.

"That would make it hard to study with Master Amaya," Lee said levelly.

"Like you'd really miss that," Min said skeptically.

"Yes. I really would."

Oh no, Huojin almost winced, hearing that level, carefully calm tone. Not good.

He couldn't blame Amaya for wanting a nice, quiet evening to herself after a week of Lee and Mushi's havoc. But they really could have used a good calm voice of reason right about now.

Still, Luli hadn't been a Guard's wife this long by accident. She stood, with an easy smile. "Well, it's never too late to learn to have a little fun. Right?" She winked at Meixiang.

"The ruby chard's about done in anyway," Meixiang nodded. "Might as well tear up there, if you want." She waved a shooing hand at Lee, smiling wistfully.

The downright grateful look the young man cast her didn't belong on any teenager being yanked out the door by a gleeful group of kids, Huojin reflected sourly.

Except it did. Because a great name's son apparently had two main responses to any threat: kill, or ignore. Given he probably didn't want to kill Min, and the young earthbender was making it impossible to ignore him... yeah.

And from that Look of Doom Tingzhe's got, they've had this discussion before. And it didn't take. Clearing his throat, Huojin shoved his chair over to put a deliberately heavy hand on Min's shoulder. "Piece of advice? Don't do that."

"Why?" Min said sourly. "Because he's a firebender?"

"No," Huojin said flatly, not letting his gaze off the teenager as Jia gasped and the rest of the adults tensed. "Because he can break you in half with his bare hands. Literally." He's trained, he's lethal, and he's having a really bad year. "What's your problem with him, anyway?"

"He's Fire Nation." Min said it like a curse. "You know what they train firebenders for."

"We do," Mushi said, green eyes weighing Min and finding him wanting. "But I can assure you Lee has never been part of a military action against the Earth Kingdom. He has faced earthbenders of the Army, yes; but that was only to rescue me, when I had done something a bit foolish. Even so, he left them alive. Bruised, and buried underneath their own rocks, but otherwise unharmed." He folded his hands before him. "But do you know what firebenders are trained for? I suspect you do not. Or you would not be making yourself an obstacle to a key strategic objective. That objective being,” Mushi went on over Min’s noise of protest, “the safety of Jinhai, your family, and all of us. Jinhai must learn, or all of your family is at risk. You are Jinhai’s brother, and he looks up to you. Which means my nephew is considering his options for dealing with you very carefully.”

Jia paled a little. Proving yet again she’s a lot smarter than she lets on to her friends, Huojin thought wryly.

“Are you going to let him sit there and say that?” Min said hotly, glancing at his father.

“Min,” Tingzhe said with strained patience, “you are not listening-”

“Oh, I’ve listened enough. Strategic objective? You say a teacher has to respect his students. And you’re letting someone teach Jinhai who doesn’t even care about him?” Scraping his chair back, Min glared at Mushi. “Everything was fine before you showed up! You tell him he can consider his options all he wants. I’m going to do what’s right.”

“Min-” Meixiang started.

“I’ll be back by curfew!”

In the wake of her brother storming out, Jia smiled weakly. “I’m... going to go brush up my haiku. Need to be in shape for the competition.” Bowing politely, she escaped upstairs.

“Oh, this is going to end well,” Huojin said sarcastically. “Professor....”

Tingzhe held up a hand, face sober. “Believe me, we have some idea of exactly how unpleasant this could become.”

“What, worse than you’ve already said?” Luli cocked her head, insatiably curious. “I’m sure it’s not going to be pretty, but they’re just boys. Let them beat each other up a little, and... Meixiang?”

Moving around the table to Mushi’s chair, the professor’s wife was shaking her head sadly. “I don’t think Lee knows how to be just a boy. Or am I wrong?” Bending, she whispered something into his ear.

Mushi didn’t turn a hair, but he did sigh. “Perhaps we might continue this with more privacy?”

“My study,” Tingzhe suggested. Frowned at Huojin and Luli. “You may not want to be aware of the details. For your own safety. Meixiang and I already know the most dangerous part....”

“I believe we can speak without mentioning names,” Mushi said genteelly. “If, that is, you truly wish to know more than you do.” Another sigh. “I will say this. If Min truly believes Lee does not respect Jinhai, and says so... he is likely to learn a very painful lesson.”

“The Fire Lord,” Huojin said faintly. Luli was gripping his hand, jade eyes wide. “He was up against the Fire Lord?”

“It was the Fire Lord’s war room,” Meixiang said bitterly. “If he chose to take offense - yes, he could claim Lee showed disrespect.” Her gaze flashed at Iroh. “It was cruel.”

“It was,” Iroh acknowledged sadly, recalling her silent, respectful whisper: Prince Iroh. “I should never have allowed my nephew into that chamber. I should have realized he could not keep silent, when he saw an outrage to our people. I should have known he... trusted too much.”

“He said he didn’t even try to fight.” Tingzhe grimaced at Iroh’s sharp look. “Don’t blame him. He was very careful not to give specifics. But spirits, I can see why.”

“It was the best decision he could have made,” Iroh said grimly. “I recently learned of events around his mother’s disappearance.” He winced. “I knew my brother favored Lee’s sister as heir. I did not imagine the lengths he might go to.”

Luli and Tingzhe paled; Meixiang swallowed dryly. But Huojin....

Huojin looked at him, anger channeled into a professional’s deliberate focus. “You think your brother helped make this happen. To kill Lee.”

“I believe he would have found such a death convenient,” Iroh said coldly. “But as Lee was on his knees, even the Fire Lord had no excuse for a lethal blow.” He shook his head. “I am certain my brother found that very unpleasant. He preferred Lee’s sister, that I knew. How much so, I did not realize, until she appeared with orders to take us back in chains... alive or dead.” Iroh sought Tingzhe’s gaze directly. “She is an excellent firebender. A true prodigy. Had I been a moment slower to block her strike - Lee had no defense against the move she unleashed. Most believe no such defense even exists.”

“His sister tried to...?” Luli was trembling; in outrage, not fear.

You have found great fortune in your wife, Huojin, Iroh approved. I only hope my nephew is as lucky. “You begin, I think, to understand why my nephew has no idea what to do about Min.”

“Oma and Shu.” The professor held his head in his hands, and drew a sharp breath. Straightened his shoulders, and looked up. “You’re the tactician, General. What do you suggest?”

“General?” Luli and Huojin said, aghast.

“Retired,” Iroh smiled. “And - wait.” He closed his eyes, feeling at that sense of banked fire, far more controlled than Jinhai’s tiny flicker. “Someone is about to knock.”

A few more moments, and his nephew’s fist thumped the door. “Uncle? Professor?”

Tingzhe raised a brow. “Come in.”

The door opened a few inches. “I didn’t mean to interrupt, it’s just-” Zuko’s gaze swept serious faces, and he winced. “What’s hide ‘n slide?”

Ah. “Like hide and explode, I believe,” Iroh said thoughtfully. “But no explosions.”

“Oh.” Zuko still looked dubious.

“And no knives,” Meixiang put in quickly.

“Okay.” Zuko looked a bit less glum. “Thanks.” He shut the door, and retreated.

“No knives?” Tingzhe got out, while the other two were still gaping.

“We play rough, dear.”

“How’d you know he was coming?” Huojin inquired, still eyeing the door.

“A skilled bender can feel his element nearby,” Iroh informed him. “All firebenders carry our own fire within. My nephew can likewise sense me, when he is calm. Which is not often,” he admitted.

“So. To answer your question of why we are here, Madam Meixiang.... Bear with an old man a bit longer.” Spirits. In some ways, this was the hardest part.

Their children, and their lives, are at risk. They have the right to know.

“After the duel, the Fire Lord said that by refusing to fight, my nephew had shown shameful weakness,” Iroh went on. “He was banished, and sent- well. That is a tale for another time. Let us only say, the task was one I knew Lee would never survive alone. So I joined him. I hoped to keep him alive; to teach him, and mend the worst of my brother’s wounds. And I hoped, away from the Fire Nation, we might find - a chance. Something unexpected, that could be turned to our advantage.”

“I believe you had a reputation for that,” Tingzhe said dryly. “Which rather makes me wonder why your brother dared to let you run around loose.”

“Ah.” Iroh smiled, a bit sadly. “But I am only a sad old failure who lost his son, his position, and his will to fight. My brother would tell you so himself.”

“Lee said his father dumped him on you.” Huojin’s brows lowered in unpleasant conclusion. “He meant that, didn’t he?”

“I was grieving my son; I did not return home until some months after Lee’s mother vanished,” Iroh said levelly. “I regret that, as well. His father would not have protected him from his sister, and no one else would have dared. She is... cruel. She enjoys others’ pain. And she is very skilled at deceiving people into believing she is innocent as a koala-lamb.” He lifted a brow. “Should you see her, I advise that you run. Swiftly.”

“But she can’t get into Ba Sing Se,” Luli objected.

“Madam Luli, we are in Ba Sing Se,” Iroh pointed out. “I admit we had aid, but strategy and tactics are in our blood. Lee found his own way into the North Pole, into the very heart of that fortress of ice, before Zhao broke in with all his forces. I doubt she would ever of her own will pass as a mere refugee, but if my brother ordered her to do so, she would. She is loyal to him.” His voice dropped, sad. “Which is, in a way, the most heartbreaking fact of all. For all my brother’s flaws, his children love him, and gave him their loyalty without reservation. And he... I begin to doubt he has ever been loyal to anyone. Even our father.” Iroh gazed into memory, heartbroken. “Especially our father.”

“Your father? But that would have been-” Tingzhe cut himself off, obviously juggling names and dates in his head. “Oh my. That - I can’t even think of a word....”

“Does Lee know?” Meixiang asked quietly.

Iroh breathed in, and sighed. “Yes.” He regarded her soberly. “But I did not. And for years, Lee was too frightened to tell me what he knew. His grandfather was dead. His mother, vanished, and none would say where. And he already knew his sister saw him as an obstacle to be removed. He has been very frightened, for a very long time. Often he buries fear in anger, which can be useful when you are fighting for your life. But he knows he must not do so around Jinhai.”

Huojin groaned. “So basically, the kid’s scarred up inside as a wharf weevil-rat, clueless about normal nasty but don’t want to kill you teenagers as a badger-mole, and mean in a fight as a pygmy puma cornered by scorpion-vipers.”

“Very well put,” Iroh admitted.

“He’s going to tie Min up and leave him dangling under a bridge, isn’t he?” Luli grinned wryly.

Delighted, Iroh beamed at her. And raised an inquiring brow at Tingzhe. “Would you be offended if I suggested such to Lee? It would be far safer for Min than most scenarios I had imagined.”

“You had better not be asking what I believe you are,” Tingzhe warned, fingers tapping restlessly on one knee.

“He’s not,” Huojin said frankly. “Lee’s messed up and hot-tempered, sure. But he’s not looking for a fight.”

Luli rubbed his shoulder, eyes rueful. “Too bad for him, Min is.”

“Right,” Huojin nodded. “So what I think the general’s asking for is - what do you call it, rules of engagement?”

“Even so,” Iroh inclined his head. Regarded the professor again. “My nephew is a just and honorable young man. And he will behave as such. If someone will simply inform us what is appropriate.”

Meixiang held her peace, as her husband crossed his arms and eyed Iroh dubiously.

Well. No one said convincing an earthbender of something he did not wish to accept was easy.

At least Zuko is having fun.

Lying prone in the shadow cast by the side wing’s roof, hands braced against tiles as he listened to mutters of broken haiku, Zuko grinned. The kids currently hiding and searching in Meixiang’s garden knew he had to be somewhere, but they were looking down, not up.

Earth Kingdom. Heh.

Well, that wasn’t quite fair, he allowed, as Jinhai peeked behind the garden’s water barrels to discover a shrieking Lim. A lot of Fire Nation soldiers never seemed to get the knack of looking up, either.

Stupid. Air Nomads aren’t the only ones who can take the high ground.

The Dai Li might have a clue, given the way they’d dropped off the rooftops after the umbrella spirit. And wouldn’t that be ironic, having something in common with the people who’d kill him if they knew who he really was?

They fight spirits. I’ve been after the bridge to the Spirit World. And we’ve both got our orders.

Orders a lot of the rest of the world hated. Orders sanctioned by their rightful rulers; if the Earth King didn’t know exactly what the Dai Li were up to, he damn well ought to.

Yeah. He had a lot more in common with the ominous earthbenders than he liked to think....

Huh. And there they are.

He resisted the temptation to wave to the shadows a few roofs over. They probably wouldn’t appreciate it.

And I’m just fine up here. We’re playing a game.

And possibly the Dai Li recognized that. They weren't doing anything. Though they seemed to be waiting for something....

Tiles shivered under his hands, and he didn't move fast enough.

Baked clay clamped around him like a vice, and Zuko felt the weight of several people tremble through the wall and up onto the roof. "See how you like that move, Min!" someone sneered. "Man, you think you're going to be Dai Li? You didn't even feel it coming!"

Teenage boys. Hate them. Hate them all, Zuko decided, gripping red-hot fury. "I'm not Min," he growled.

"Hey... he's not," another boy said, surprised. "So what do we--"

"Doesn't matter."

Third voice, Zuko registered, breathing slow and controlled as he flattened pinned hands against the roof and stoked the fire inside. He's in charge. He's smug-

"He's here. Which makes him another refugee friend of the family. So he'll just have to carry the message."

Even as tiles tightened, Zuko smirked. He was pinned down. Couldn't obviously use fire. And there were three of them.

Too bad for them.

"I understand your concern," Iroh said patiently, "but--"

The study lamp flared, flame blazing up and flickering. In a deliberate pattern.

Oh no.

Hot tiles shattered, and Zuko's hands had room to move.

Come!

You didn't need to see your element to bend it. You just had to feel it.

Male voices yelled as water slapped them, and his tile prison loosened. It was all he needed.

"Get inside!"

He heard the children's startled yells, but they were far away. He had three earthbenders to deal with here and now; three young, stupid teenagers, who'd already shown they could bend deadly tiles, and there were innocent civilians down there--

A slash of fingers through water, and he had two streams floating over his hands. Bend and spin and breathe....

Ice locked four feet to the roof. The third bender yelled, feet slipping out from under him, and yelled all the way down.

If it'd been just him, Zuko would have immobilized them completely before he jumped off the roof. But it wasn't, and while Suyin was urging Lim and dragging Jinhai back to the house, Daiyu was approaching the swearing teen with innocent intent to help-

Snarling, the teenager swatted her away with a fist of earth.

Bad move.

Zuko dodged the head-sized earth missiles with barely a thought. Blows flying his way weren't heading for the children... and there was another reason to be on the ground rather than the roof. The water was closer.

One stream whipped out, bound busy arms. Another entangled legs before the teenager could fully rise. A second freezing breath.

Down, and out.

Something whistled through air; he almost ducked.

Throwing tiles, Zuko registered through that first bolt of pain. He felt blood trickling, and dismissed it; scalp wounds always bled, and he wasn't dead yet. It's dark, they can't possibly see well enough to be sure it's me they're hitting-

...Damn, I really make a lousy water wall.

Wavering water slowed the tiles, but didn't stop them. He could dodge, but the kids - damn it, he just wasn't good at defense!

So attack.

Compressing water might be hard, but moving it was easy. Zuko swirled it into a twisting wave between himself and the tiles, using the mini-waterspout's gathering momentum to hurl them back-

And the weight of ice and bodies on a tile-stripped, fire-weakened roof, finally did exactly what he'd been hoping for.

Crack. Crunch.

"My robes!" Jia shrieked.

And all the tiles stopped.

Professor Tingzhe was beside him, standing steady as a mountain, hands shaped in a formal gesture of halt that probably held every inch of earth within a block still as ice. Not that the two now half-through the roof could have mustered much opposition.

"What," the professor said sternly, "is the meaning of this vandalism?"

"Not vandalism," Zuko got out, gathering water back into a swirling tentacle at his side as two little girls hit Luli's arms and started wailing. "They said they had a message for Min."

"Oh, did they." Huojin's voice dripped unpleasant implications, as he glared at the frozen teen. "Which one of you fine, upstanding young gentlemen hurt my daughter?"

Even frostbitten, the boy started to sweat.

“Get. Out. Of. My. Room!” Jia appeared at her window, arms circling in a vicious overhead arc-

And her two intruders, arms pinned in tiles, shot back out of the hole in her roof. And dropped.

They stopped, barely an inch above the ground. It wasn't easy to make out in the light of the lamp Meixiang had brought along, but Zuko was pretty sure Tingzhe smirked.

All of them accounted for, Zuko thought. Uncle's got Jinhai and Suyin. Madam Luli's got her kids. Time to let the Guard handle this.

Relieved, he let borrowed water flow back to the barrel, and stepped out of the line of fire. And accepted his waterskin from Iroh with a murmured, “Thanks.”

“Very restrained,” Uncle Iroh approved. “Well done.”

“I hope so, Uncle,” Zuko muttered. “There are Dai Li a few roofs north of here.”

Chapter 15

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Three forms, Shirong thought with great satisfaction, inhaling his morning cup of tea. Three trained earthbenders - not experienced, but they've had years of training - and Lee took them out with three forms. That he learned in a week.

Well... three waterbending forms. What he'd seen from the rooftops hinted at something else, as well. Which was why he was sitting in this particular teashop, out of uniform, waiting for one of its employees to take a well-deserved break.

Not what I would have expected, at all, Shirong mused, sipping the last of his drink. But it makes sense. I would have said it was impossible... but they're obviously here.

Though if I am right - well, there's a kettle of eel-catfish, indeed.

Ah. Pao was stalking out to the front, which meant his target was safely out the back. Paying, the Dai Li agent disappeared into the crowd, slipped up and out of sight up a few handy walls, and descended again behind the teashop.

Mushi, he somehow wasn't surprised to note, didn't turn a hair. "Good morning," the elderly gentleman said graciously.

"So it is," Shirong agreed.

"I believe my nephew has described you well," Mushi noted. "Though I could always be mistaken."

Well, well; that's where Lee gets it, Shirong thought, amused. Not that the young waterbender could do subtle, not with his temper. But at least he could see why Lee recognized it. "Since I know Pao's as stingy with his breaks as everything else... I admit, when Lee borrowed that scroll, I expected him to be diligent in practice. I never expected what I saw last night from someone with no experience bending." He paused, deliberately. "Or should I say, someone with no experience with bending forms."

Mushi raised an eyebrow.

"Forgive the impatience of the young," Shirong said sardonically, "but how did two colonials get all the way to Ba Sing Se?"

"Very carefully," Mushi smiled. "Though it is not as unlikely as you seem to believe. Lee and I left those territories many years ago. For reasons you can likely guess," he added dryly. "Is his style that distinctive?"

"Probably not to most people," Shirong said candidly. "I've seen a fair number of waterbenders. They wait for you to come to them. Lee goes right down an enemy's throat." He raised a brow right back at the older man. "Effectively, too. I imagine he had a very good teacher." You are not a harmless old man, and we both know it. Which makes me wonder why you're taking such pains to look like one.

Mushi regarded him for what felt like ages, and finally sighed. "I have heard stories of the Dai Li, as you can imagine. But I have also heard my nephew's account of you, and I believe you do not wish him harm. Though if that is so, the events of last night bear a bit of explanation."

On one hand, the Dai Li didn't have to explain themselves to anyone. On the other.... He's fought spirits, too. "Lee had things under control," Shirong said bluntly. "Or close enough. Though I was actually watching to see what Min would do with the rabid little upper-class boys he's managed to show up. Our nobles are a bit touchy about deference and proper place. Not that they'd ever stoop to be Dai Li, but spirits forbid a refugee's son should have the strength to qualify." He hesitated. And tried to look as if he weren't.

Ask. You'll never get a better chance.

"Is it true that generals in the Fire Nation aren't nobles?"

"Yes, and no," Mushi said levelly. "Most in high ranks are powerful firebenders, and most of those are of noble blood. But not all. Tactical gifts and the ability to bend are not always found in the same person." He smiled. "I begin to see why my nephew has allowed you so close. You are both curious of how things might be. If you had been born different people. If there was no war... or rumors of war."

Nice save. "I'm curious as to how Lee was born who he is," Shirong said pointedly.

"Lee's mother concealed her heritage," Mushi shrugged. "I learned of her healing by accident; Lee was a difficult birth. But she was my beloved sister-in-law, and I would not betray her."

Shirong's eyes narrowed, thinking of that scar. "But someone figured it out."

"No, I do not believe so." Amusement flickered in Mushi's gaze. "Lee is a poor liar, but good at keeping secrets." He sighed. "No. What you think of... was dealt not because he is a waterbender, but because he has a heart." He shrugged slightly. "I have traveled much in my life. This time, we simply traveled... further."

"I see where Lee gets his knack for understatement," Shirong said dryly. "You realize you could both be arrested as spies."

"We could," Mushi acknowledged. "I can only assure you that we are not. We are, indeed, what we seem: two refugees, fleeing... what lies outside Ba Sing Se."

With that, he was silent. Waiting.

Like Lee. He knows when to stop talking.

Who are you, really?

But it wasn't quite time to press that question. Not yet. "You're an interesting man, Mushi," Shirong stated. "We'll have to talk again sometime."

Mushi inclined his head graciously. "I hope you enjoyed your tea. I will ask Pao if he wishes to introduce more varieties of oolong."

Meaning not only had Mushi seen him in the shop, Shirong considered as he slipped back out of sight, but he'd matched teas to faces. A useful habit for any shopkeeper... or spy.

But they're not spies. No one would make someone as visible as Lee an agent.

Mushi, though....

Damn. A traveler. A colonial who knows how to fight, but can also blend in. Who knew Lee's mother was a waterbender and kept quiet - it makes sense. A lot of sense.

So. A possible spy in a position to teach, and a nephew quietly, obviously devoted to him.

Bets Lee was meant to follow in the family trade, anyone?

Settling into an out of the way corner of rooftop, Shirong leaned back for some serious thought. On the one hand, this was good news. Lee wasn't just a fair catch. He was an excellent catch, already primed and prepared for the hard choices and impossible situations an agent found himself dumped into without warning. On the other....

I don't think I'll tell Quan where Lee's from. Yet.

Dai Li mindbending didn't quite work on those with Fire Nation ancestry. Not the way it should. You could brainwash them, yes. It took longer, a lot longer, but it could be done. You could implant false memories, take over their will-

But if any command pitted them against their loyalties, they just - broke. If they didn't drop dead on the spot, they'd be dead within days. Always.

We can trust Lee, or we can kill him. No middle ground.

Which wasn't necessarily enough to disqualify the boy as a candidate. Historically, a few people had ended up in the Dai Li specifically because they wouldn't bend under ordinary treatment. And in almost every case, if you could trace their ancestry back far enough... well.

"Don't even joke about it, indeed," Shirong chuckled, recalling Lee's quietly frantic attempt to deflect him away from any thought of Fire Nation heritage. "One of these days, I have to see you in a topknot."

Someday after he told Quan the truth. Though how to frame that was going to be tricky. Quan was practical enough to take in a waterbender, colonial or not. Long Feng, though....

He is our leader. But Avatar Kyoshi created us to serve the city, not one man.

A thought Shirong wasn't entirely comfortable with, no matter how true it was. Long Feng had earned his right to power. He'd fought for them all, almost two decades ago, forcing back one of the darkest hordes of spirits ever to swarm within the walls. Shirong himself still carried scars from those horrible nights; Amaya had helped as many as she could, but she'd had to reserve her power for those most critically injured by fangs and claws and leech-mouths that drained chi away like blood.

The agent winced, as memory roused some of those wounds to aching. There were reasons he wasn't married. Jagged blue scars, obviously not made by ordinary teeth and claws, tended to make potential lovers... uneasy.

No. There was no question in his mind that Long Feng deserved his position. But the man sometimes seemed to focus purely on Ba Sing Se, as if the war truly did not exist. Witness their current confinement of the Avatar's sky bison. If Long Feng were so concerned about the Avatar's effect on the Earth King, wouldn't it make more sense to send the beast away, and get rid of all the trouble in one fell swoop?

I'm just an agent. I don't know what our generals are planning. Surely, they have a good reason.

And Shirong wasn't inclined to second-guess the judgment of the man who'd fought to save all their lives, that horrible moon-dark night. Compared to that, General Iroh's later siege had been a model of peace and harmony with the spirits.

For a bloodthirsty firebender, he fought cleanly. I wonder what happened to him after he broke the siege?

Nothing good, most likely, given Fire Lord Azulon had apparently named Ozai to follow him instead. And officers under Fire Lord Ozai... didn't fight cleanly.

"That poor girl," Shirong murmured, thinking of Lee's reluctant confession. The waterbender might not have given the gory details... but he could fill those in for himself. Unfortunately.

Such things had happened once or twice during the siege... but no more than that. Prince Iroh's response to outrages on civilians had always been swift, just, and ruthless. No plague-spirits spread in his wake.

Just fire, blood, and ash, Shirong thought darkly. Half the world they've conquered, and they just won't stop. Spirits, I hate them.

Yet he'd found hate was a very two-edged sword. He'd hated the Fire Nation so much and so deeply, mourning his people's losses, that he'd been driven to understand them - all the better to destroy them, if he had the chance. He'd studied, delved into archives, attended interrogations of the very few firebenders captured alive....

And one dusty afternoon in the university library had shaken him down to his bones.

Honor. Duty. Benevolence. Respect. Courage. Honesty. Righteousness.

The founding principles of the Fire Nation, according to writings left by Avatar Kyoshi herself.

It didn't change anything. He still hated them. Still intended to keep their army from disturbing the hard-won peace of Ba Sing Se. By any means necessary.

Yet deep within the hate, there was something... he didn't know what to call it. But it felt oddly sad.

A colonial waterbender is truer to their principles than their own soldiers. Shirong snorted at the irony. Not that that will be a good argument to use on Quan.

But Quan wasn't the real problem. Quan hated the Fire Nation as well. Long Feng....

I've seen him interrogate prisoners. He doesn't hate them. He despises them.

And something about that made Shirong very uneasy.

Focus, Shirong told himself. You've been given time to recruit Lee. Use it. Let what he can do make his case for him.

In the meantime, he had work to do. There might not be plague on the docks, but rumors like that didn't get started without something behind them. He hadn't found out what. Yet.

Time to go hunting.

Suyin tasted dusty futon again, and groaned. I promised myself I wouldn't stare. I promised.

Yet she had. Again. And Lee had used her distraction, again, to turn what should have been a simple block-and-dodge into another embarrassing defeat. And that didn't even begin to cover Jinhai's wildly flickering leaves, and random bursts of sparks.

Lee sighed, and let her up. "All right, both of you stop. It's obvious neither of you can focus today."

But his tone wasn't mean, or even exasperated, Suyin noticed, relieved. Just - patient.

"Is this about last night?" Lee raised that lone brow, eyeing them.

From his corner, her father set down his notes and politely cleared his throat. "I can understand your uncle not wanting to get into details with the Dai Li in the vicinity. But, "my nephew has reason to study with Master Amaya" leaves quite a few questions unanswered."

Lee took a deep breath, let it sigh out. "Spirits like to mess with me."

"You're joking." But Tingzhe didn't sound sure himself.

"I wish," Lee muttered. Raised a hand near his scar, just for a moment. "When - this happened - Master Amaya thinks it burned most of the water out of my spirit. So later, when she helped hide us - I drowned." Knuckles whitened, before Lee forced fingers straight. "After that, water just started... moving when I got upset." He dredged up a weak smile. "You should have seen Uncle's face."

"I can only imagine," Tingzhe murmured, dazed.

"Can I learn to freeze jerks, too?" Jinhai said eagerly.

"Ice is waterbending," Suyin reminded him. "I know Lee said he could move fire in other things, even water... no, you were napping... what?"

Lee was smiling at her. Really, truly, smiling. "Jinhai? Your sister's a genius."

"She is?" Jinhai said doubtfully.

"I am?" Suyin echoed.

"Let me get a pot," Lee said in a rush, and dashed upstairs. And came back almost before the three of them had time to blink at each other, one of Meixiang's larger metal pots half-filled with water. "If you're out in plain view, you're going to need a fire to keep people from getting suspicious. But down here, we can cheat. Jinhai, hands on the pot. Breathe, but hard, not sharp. Push the fire inside out from your hands. We want heat, not flames."

Jinhai frowned in concentration, and the first tiny bubbles stirred in water, wisps of steam starting to rise.

"Good. Keep it up. And remember how this feels," Lee directed. "If you ever end up falling through ice, this is something that can save your life." He frowned. "There's a couple of other techniques you should know for that, but you need a lot more control of your fire before you start those." He shrugged. "This, by itself, you can use all kinds of ways. And most people never see it coming. Can you tell me why?"

“Umm....” Jinhai chewed his lip, and shook his head.

“Think about it.” Lee looked over both of them. “What’s the difference between this and the other moves I’ve showed you?”

Moves? Suyin thought, confused. “Jinhai’s not moving.”

“Exactly.” Lee glanced at her father, dead serious. “This is one of the differences between fire and earth. Earthbending, you have to move. Firebending, your chi has to move. Which means, if you know what you’re doing... if you can breathe, you can bend.”

“You charred the tiles to break them,” Tingzhe realized.

“They couldn’t see my hands,” Lee said matter-of-factly. “Once I had enough room to call water up, they were toast.” He looked straight at Suyin. “Breath moves your chi. Maybe you can’t burn tiles, but if you’re trained enough, I know you could break them. And I don’t care how strong a bender is. If you can surprise them, you’ve got a chance.”

Suyin swallowed hard, warmed and shaken all at once. “Is this why the Fire Nation keeps winning?” she asked in a small voice. “They just - keep going, keep fighting....”

I’m sorry! she wanted to say, as so many eyes looked at her. I don’t want to hurt you, any of you. I don’t know why I hurt. I just do....

Yet Lee didn’t look angry. Just - sad. And determined, as he reached into his sleeve and took out a sheathed dagger.

It’s pretty, Suyin thought past the ache in her heart, taking in mother-of-pearl inlay, the water-steel revealed when Lee unsheathed the blade-

Never give up without a fight.

“Uncle says you have to draw wisdom from every nation,” Lee said, holding the blade so she could read it clearly. “He sent this to me before the worst days of my life.” Silent, he turned the dagger.

Made in the Earth Kingdom.

“If it wasn’t for this, I wouldn’t have made it this far.” Sheathing the blade, Lee made it vanish again, and looked at them both soberly. “You should be proud of your people. All of your people.”

“Your uncle is a very unusual man,” Tingzhe said thoughtfully.

A faint smile touched Lee’s face. “I guess he is.” He reached out to the pot, and nodded. “That’s hot enough. Jinhai? Watch.” Lee breathed out, and scooped-

A globe of steaming water shimmered in his palm.

“Waterbending,” Tingzhe began.

“No,” Lee shook his head. “Firebending.”

Suyin’s jaw dropped. But... if he can... oh, spirits.

“Really?” Jinhai breathed.

“Really,” Lee stated. “That’s the move you use to grab a handful of fire. There’s fire in hot water.

Move that, and you can move the water with it. If it's hot enough."

"You can teach Jinhai to look like a waterbender," Suyin blurted out, stunned. "You can - he could use this in plain sight...."

"Didn't I tell you you were a genius?" Lee smirked at her. Glanced at her father. "I can't teach him everything with hot water. It's a lot harder than fire. And if he runs into a real waterbender, they'll figure out something's up. But right now, the only waterbenders you've got to worry about are me and Amaya. So...." He grinned at them all. "Who feels like getting out of this cellar?"

Jinhai's cheer shook dust from the rafters.

"Were you scared?"

Zuko glanced at Suyin as they watched Jinhai toss a ball of hot water, giggling. "When water started pulling at me?" he guessed.

Suyin nodded. "I was thinking about it... I know bending's important to Min, and Jia, and Dad, and probably you and Jinhai too. But if the world started changing on me... I know I'd be upset. And I thought, maybe...." She shrugged, shy.

"Jinhai's very lucky," Zuko said quietly. I wish I'd had a sister like you. "The world fell out from under me. I didn't know what to do. What to be." He breathed out slowly. "But it's not the first time things... fell apart. So I kept going."

"It was bad," Suyin said plainly. "After the Agni Kai."

Wordless, Zuko nodded. Reached back, and uncapped his waterskin, drawing out a thin stream to wrap around his fingers. "At least getting better this time is a lot more fun."

Slowly, she smiled.

"But I wasn't scared. Exactly." Zuko shrugged. "I would have been, I was just... tired." He grimaced. "That happens in combat, too. You don't just get hurt and exhausted. Your spirit gets tired. Uncle says you shouldn't keep soldiers on the front more than a month, if you can. People need rest. They need to be safe."

"...Why are you telling me about soldiers?" Suyin asked, voice hushed.

I'll try to be gentle, Uncle. I just don't know if that will be enough. "Because you're good, Suyin," Zuko said honestly, streaming water back into his waterskin. "You pay attention. You ask questions. And you don't just practice until you get it right. You go over moves you've already learned, to see if you can make them better. You're good. If you keep it up, you're going to be very good."

Dark green eyes widened. "I don't want to be a soldier!"

Spirits aren't big on what we want. "But you want to protect Jinhai," Zuko pointed out. "I know what that's like. He's your family. You want to keep him safe." Uncle says you're one of us. I believe him. "I'm telling you this in case, Suyin. In case something goes wrong. In case everything goes wrong. If something happens, and you end up outside Ba Sing Se - don't let anyone tell you girls shouldn't fight. Just say you had relatives from Kyoshi Island, he's your little brother, and they can go to Koh's lair in a handbasket."

Suyin stared at him.

Zuko reddened a little. Okay, not the most polite way to say it. But maybe she'll remember it. And if she yelled that at some over-officious Guard, he might just stay stunned long enough for her to grab a weapon and deal with the problem herself.

Try again. “Suyin - I’m telling you because I know you’ll fight. So you need to know how to take care of yourself. Not just during the fight. Before it, and after. After... after is hard.” Zuko swallowed dryly. “It’s not like the plays and the hero-stories. You feel awful. You’re alive, and you’re glad you’re alive - and that feels awful, because someone else isn’t.”

Suyin paled, fists clenching.

“I’m telling you because you love them.” Zuko tried to keep his voice quiet. Gentle. “When we love people, we throw ourselves between them and the fireball. We don’t even think about it.” He took one of her hands, warming the chilled fist between his fingers. “Your mother knows what that’s like. Talk to her.”

Suyin gulped. “She’s... a professor’s wife....”

“She’s your mother. Never mess with a mom. They bite back.” He backed off a step, considering his options. “Just talk to her. I’ve always been in the middle of trouble. She probably has better ideas.”

Suyin nodded, obviously thinking it over. “So what do we do now?”

Zuko saw Jinhai’s globe start to wobble into a puddle, and strode over to heat it again with a touch. “Now, we figure out how to breathe with hot water.”

Jinhai stuck out his tongue. But grinned, and sat down with a dramatic sigh.

Smart kid.

“And breathe in,” Amaya directed, water-wreathed hand pressed against scarred skin. Feeling Mushi’s watchful eye, the strength of the moon rising outside the apartment with sunset, the steady pulse of chi beneath her touch. Not as swift or as strong a flow as it should be in whole flesh....

But he’s a fighter. He may be rough at the edges, but he’ll survive. Better; he’s thriving.

Satisfied, she took her hand away, letting water flow back into a basin. “I think we’re done.”

Gingerly, Zuko touched the edge of seared skin. And tried not to look disappointed. “I thought... never mind.”

“I’m a healer, not a spirit,” Amaya said plainly.

“And where it matters most, there is improvement,” Mushi stated, holding up a finger in front of his nephew’s eyes. “Follow.”

Amaya stepped back as the gray-haired firebender guided his nephew through a test Yugoda herself might have used to check peripheral vision. And smiled.

“Very good,” Mushi nodded at last. “The surface remains, but all else has improved.”

Zuko braced himself, and nodded. "Thank you."

You do mean that. But it still hurts. Amaya sighed, and touched her student's shoulder, waiting until he reluctantly met her gaze. "In the Water Tribes, a scar is not a mark of shame. It is worn with honor, and respect. It means you survived."

"It wasn't worth his time to kill a failure," Zuko muttered.

Amaya kept herself from flinching, even as she saw Mushi rein in his sorrow. The burn had been dealt by a firebender he trusted....

He's not a child, Amaya reminded herself. He's sligher than many of your tribesmen, he'll never have a spearman's build, but he's of age to prove himself in war. He has, from his uncle's account. "Forgive me. I forget, sometimes, that you're not just another healer. You're a blooded warrior. And a warrior doesn't need sympathy for the scar that failed to slay him."

Green eyes snapped to hers, startled. And, beyond the shock, calculating.

So very alike. How much of that is blood, and how much training?

Age made a difference; Mushi's gratitude was a quiet light in his eyes, while Zuko stood straighter. "So... I'll go see about that duck," Zuko said in a rush, out the door almost before he finished.

"I'm half surprised he remembered to bring water," Amaya murmured wryly.

"My nephew is always mindful of his weapons," Mushi nodded. And smiled at her. "It is hard to raise a young man, sometimes. Those we traveled with were all older men, confident in their skills...."

"And your nephew's been on the losing side of battles with children," Amaya sighed, absently spiraling water up out of the basin with a fingertip. "I've known young warriors. It speaks well of both of you that he's not bitter. Avatar or not, it can't have been easy, seeing your people brushed aside like leaves by a twelve-year-old boy." She gave Mushi a searching glance.

He inclined his head, but not without a twinkle of humor. "One day, I hope to tell you everything. But for now... yes. It has been difficult. The more so because I did not realize, at first, that my nephew believed he should have been able to turn the tide. It is, after all, what his father claimed he expected."

Amaya stepped back a bit, absently tossing water between her hands as she considered that deliberate opening, and how best to use it. "I meant what I said. A warrior doesn't need sympathy. He needs revenge."

Mushi folded his hands, careful to make no sudden movements. "That would be difficult. I myself do not think I could raise a hand against my own brother, and I am not loyal to him. Lee would be in a far more perilous position."

"There are more ways to take revenge than just killing a man," Amaya said levelly. "Sometimes I think my tribe invented most of them. It's a pity you weren't born one of us; our chief would never have known what hit him." She raised a brow at her fellow teacher. "I imagine your plan to create a sanctuary is going to be a fine revenge on someone. Spirits, the Dai Li, the Fire Lord himself - for all I know, all of the above. I'd never accuse you of thinking small."

Mushi was eyeing her with a delightfully wary respect. "You help those in need. Even the Fire Nation."

"I help people who happen to be of the Fire Nation," Amaya corrected. "I save lives where I can. And destroying the Fire Nation would be no more right than destroying the Air Nomads was. But even though my tribe wouldn't teach me to wage war, I will fight to defend my people." She gave him a piercing look. "Or is Lee not Water Tribe after all?"

"Lee may be. But my nephew-"

"They're the same." Amaya streamed water back to the basin, recalling his description of dragons she could sense but not see. "He's my student as well. It's good that he has an uncle; I am glad that he has you. But water depends on community. No one in my tribe would ever leave a young waterbender with so little family. It's just not right."

Frowning, Mushi lifted a hand to speak - then stopped, and looked aside. Let something fall from his sleeve, and regarded the lotus tile in his palm before tucking it away. "You came from one of the smaller villages. Not the North Pole itself."

"I went there to train, before I left," Amaya acknowledged, startled. "How did you know?"

"The main chiefdoms, both North and South, do not consider uncles so important. They trace inheritance through the father's line. It is the smaller villages who look not for a father, but a mother's brother." He smiled. "I would have been honored to be Ursa's brother." The smile stayed, but green eyes were deadly serious. "You believe it is blood feud, then."

"Don't you?" she said bluntly. "The Fire Lord won't take the creation of this sanctuary lightly."

"He will not." Something hardened in Mushi's gaze. "But I have reason to believe he will have more strategically critical matters to attend to."

He means that. Amaya shook her head. "If we are forced to leave Ba Sing Se, will you tell me who you are?"

"If that should come to pass, I will tell you before we leave," Mushi said quietly. "The risks are great. And would be far greater, to you, if we accepted your offer of kinship." He sighed. "I am glad you did not ask Lee directly. To protect you, he would refuse. And he would not be kind."

"Did he do that to you?" Amaya pounced.

"For years," Mushi said dryly. "I think I have finally convinced him he cannot be rid of me so easily. He has been far better behaved of late." A slight shrug. "Though in part, that may be due to our encounter with his sister. It is one thing to drive away one you love, to protect them. It is quite another to have them nearly taken from you, and fight desperately to keep them."

Which explained a great deal. But not, of course, everything. If I ever find out you're keeping secrets just to keep me wondering, you old fox, you're going to find yourself treating frostbite, Amaya decided.

Blinking innocently at her, Mushi glanced at the door. "Where is he?"

It was the yelling that drew Shirong's attention, away from the possible smears of dried blood he'd found on a carpet-seller's roof. Young, male-

"You bastard!"

And obviously fighting mad.

“Stop insulting my mother.”

That voice, Shirong knew. Now what?

“Is that your Lee?” Yunxu, the agent slated to take over the search from him for the night, looked almost awake. Which was about as interested as the man ever got in anything, outside the mindbending rooms under Lake Laogai.

“Hardly mine yet, but yes,” Shirong acknowledged. Peered down into the next alley, where ice glittered around a furious body. “And unless I miss my guess, that would be Jet.”

“Come over here and fight like a man!” the ragged teen yelled, pinned to a wall.

“Do I even have to answer that?” Lee stepped back, water flowing around one hand. “Wake up. You can’t win. You’re not a freedom fighter here. You’re a refugee, just like the rest of us. No, wait; you’re not. My uncle is a respectable teashop worker. I’m a healer’s apprentice. You? You’re a troublemaker, Jet. The Guard let you off with a warning once. I doubt you’ll get a second chance.” His voice dropped, quiet and confident. “Go fight on the Wall, Jet. If you have to hate, take it where it’ll do some good.”

“You think you can stand there and lecture me?” Jet demanded. “I know what you are! Murdering Fire Nation scum-”

Water cracked, whip-fast. A fine red line parted on Jet’s cheek, welling tiny beads of crimson.

So he’s been working on the water whip as well, Shirong thought, satisfied. Good.

“For once in your life,” Lee said, low and cold, “Think. If I’m murdering, sadistic, Fire Nation scum - scum that has you pinned and helpless, that knows exactly how to dismember you and leave the frozen pieces where only the scavenger lizard-birds will find them - why are you still alive?”

Jet’s jaw worked, but no sound came out.

“Goodbye.” Turning on his heel, Lee stalked off.

Shirong smirked, watching Jet squirm fruitlessly in ice. The kid has style.

“Should have killed him,” Yunxu said disinterestedly. “I know the type. He’s not going to shut up until he’s dead or mindbent.”

“Do you want me to take him in?” Shirong said neutrally. Altering minds might be necessary, but he didn’t exactly enjoy it. Not the way Yunxu’s associates did.

“No need.” Yunxu sounded almost amused. “Why waste a good setup?”

Shirong inclined his head, acknowledging the truth of that. Spirits were drawn to those already touched by the spirit world. If the creature they were seeking was a predator-

And it probably is.

-Then if it wasn’t stupid or arrogant enough to attack Lee himself-

And it probably isn’t. Not while he’s with people.

-The next best thing would be a human touched by Lee’s bending. A pinned, helpless, angry young man, bent on disturbing the peace of Ba Sing Se.

“Enjoy your night,” Yunxu waved as Shirong left.

“No,” Shirong murmured, once he was certain Yunxu wouldn’t hear. Thinking of spirits, and a troublemaker turned unwilling bait, and the young waterbender who might well have put a merciful dagger through Jet’s heart rather than leave him as a kamuiy’s prey. “No, I don’t think I will.”

“You really put your foot in it this time, Jet,” Smellerbee grumbled, working with Longshot to chip their leader free. Or should that be, former leader? Jet wasn’t exactly taking charge the way he used to.

Then again, maybe he was. But leading here wasn’t like being in charge in the tree village. Grownups didn’t listen to Jet.

And given what he’d been doing, Smellerbee was starting to wonder if she should, either....

She yawned, and shook herself. Prodded Longshot, when the archer seemed dazed. This was no place to nap. Not with Jet in trouble.

“Too scared to finish me off. He must have guessed you guys would be behind me,” Jet said confidently. “The next thing we should do is-”

Longshot flicked him in the forehead.

“What was that for?”

“He’s right,” Smellerbee growled. “Lee was about as scared as Sokka was. Remember him? The kid who didn’t want you to hurt an old guy?”

“That old man was Fire Nation!”

“So what?” Smellerbee burst out. “And so what if Mushi is? He’s making tea! That’s all he does. All day! Who’s that hurt, huh? Come on!”

“We don’t let the Fire Nation win! We don’t just leave them alone....” Jet’s voice trailed off. Something seemed to whisper through the air, chill and tasting of salt.

Smellerbee traded a glance with Longshot, and started chipping faster.

She had one arm free, and Longshot had mostly broken Jet’s legs loose. But the older boy didn’t move. Instead, Jet seemed to cock his head, as if listening to something they couldn’t hear. “... Dad?”

Jet’s parents were dead. Smellerbee knew that, the same as she knew about every one of the Freedom Fighters’ lost ones. Just as she knew the wind somehow had a sound like waves lapping on the great lake, coming with the shadow suddenly at the mouth of the alley. A shadow that felt lonely, felt wrong... but Jet was straining toward it, breaking the last of the ice-

“Get away!” Smellerbee yelled, and didn’t care how shrill her voice was, or how puny the knives felt in her hands. Longshot was holding their struggling friend back, and she was all they had. “Get lost! You’re not his father. Get out of here!”

Something chuckled, like seawater through rocks. Long black stretched out like an arm-

A door slammed open. “Here now! What’s all this noise....”

Footsteps. The shadow drew closer.

“...Do I know you?”

Grabbing Jet's arm, Smellerbee ran. And didn't look back.

“You fell asleep?” Quan said neutrally.

Yunxu dropped to his knees. “I have no excuse.”

Studying traces left behind, Shirong tried not to glance at either of them. Quan was hard, but fair. “I wouldn't say there's an excuse, but there may be a reason.”

Quan crouched to look at drying bits of twisted brown, not touching them any more than Shirong had. “Seaweed?”

“Smells like it,” Shirong nodded.

Quan let out a slow breath. “Not good.”

Now there was an understatement. All water spirits were unpredictable, and tended toward extremes; a river spirit mild as milk toward its denizens might be lethal as a typhoon to invaders. But of all the kamui bound to water, those of the sea were the worst. At their mildest, they were uncaring. Those strong enough to put a trained Dai Li to sleep... well.

I was right. We're dealing with a man-eater.

Had to be. Nothing else would draw a sea-spirit this far from the shore. Salt was scarce; human lives were packed in like the anchovies in the schools off the eastern shore, that boiled water with their bodies. Lonely, desperate people, half of whom didn't even believe in spirits. The balance of the world was upset, and Ba Sing Se was full of prey.

Sometimes I hate my job, Shirong thought grimly. “Has anyone talked to the waterbenders on the docks? They're not spirit-touched, but they are benders. They may have noticed something-”

“They're gone,” Quan said grimly.

“Gone?” Shirong echoed uneasily, as Yunxu finally got to his feet.

“Not a trace of violence,” Quan went on, eyeing seaweed as if it might burst into flames. “Looks like they started vanishing a week ago. We have reports that some said they'd seen an old friend, and had to go. Others... it's as if they just got up from whatever they were doing and walked away. Of course, they worked with fish. No one would notice a few water-weeds.”

No. They wouldn't. “Old friends,” Shirong wondered. “Shapeshifter?”

“Probably.” Quan didn't look happy at the thought. As well he shouldn't. It narrowed the field of possibilities considerably... but all of those left were lethal.

“And a smart one,” Shirong added, half to himself. “It knows what it's vulnerable to.”

“Or who's vulnerable to it,” Yunxu put in levelly. “Water pulls both ways.”

Waterbenders. Shirong tried not to flinch. “Sir-”

“I’ve already placed a watch on Healer Amaya’s clinic,” Quan informed him, brows lifting slightly. “Calm down.”

“I don’t think it’s the healer he’s worried about,” Yunxu said dryly. “He hasn’t given us any oaths yet, Shirong. You shouldn’t get attached.”

“I’m not,” Shirong said sharply. “Just worried. Lee wasn’t raised Water Tribe. If this is a spirit they’d know about, he’ll have no idea how to protect himself.” He glanced at Quan. “And he’s fairly good at spotting us. If we put a watch on him, he may notice, and try to lose them.” Which might run him straight into a kamui’s jaws.

“So tell him not to,” Quan said bluntly. “If you think he can keep it to himself. The last thing we need is a panic while the Avatar’s here.”

“Some bridge to the spirit world,” Shirong muttered. “Second outbreak of malicious spirits in as many weeks, and he hasn’t noticed anything?”

“He’s twelve,” Quan said dryly. “And he’s an airbender. The Grand Secretariat practically had to hit him over the head with a rock before he noticed you’re not supposed to bother the Earth King with the world outside the walls. And he’s a monk. If the stories are right, he was raised in a temple, by people who prided themselves on being spiritually aware. There probably wasn’t a malevolent kamui within miles.”

Point. Spiritual awareness was well and good. But you had to have something really try to kill you before you developed the spiritual sensitivity to know when Something Nasty wanted you for dinner.

Which is why we’re not monks, Shirong thought wryly. “Given this is now a larger search, sir...”

“I’m reassigning agents to take it over, and we have the Guard looking for Jet and his associates,” Quan said matter-of-factly. “Work on your recruits.” Brown eyes were shadowed. “We need them now more than ever.”

“I don’t usually bring swords to healing sessions,” Zuko observed, following Shirong down through the earthbent tunnel toward an open chamber of green-glowing crystals. A city under the city. Why am I not surprised?

Wait. “There’s water down here,” Zuko breathed, feeling it tug, cool without the touch of sun.

“Quite a bit. That’s why I want you armed,” Shirong said plainly. “As long as there’s something out there, don’t rely on just bending as your only defense.”

I never have. “Something?” Zuko asked pointedly. “You can’t be a little more specific?”

“If I could, we’d be halfway to catching it.” Shirong stopped, just outside an area of more crystals and stronger light. “Go to the left, and stay out of sight. Unless someone gets overenthusiastic and needs your help, I’d prefer it if they had no idea that you’re here.”

Zuko nodded once. “You want to see who’s paying attention to the earth, not just their eyes.”

Smirking a little, Shirong stalked forward.

Zuko waited a few breaths for Shirong to draw their attention, then eased into the cavern, sticking to the shadows cast by the odd half-light of the crystals. Hands tucked into his sleeves, he sat down to watch the mayhem; just another irregular lump on the cavern wall. Think they missed me.

Not that that was such a great accomplishment. Between the crashes, the grating of bent rock, and the playful sparring assaults of various Dai Li agents, the young men in front of him probably would have missed a whole regiment marching through.

A figure in the center caught his eye, narrowly dodging a flung rock glove. Min.

Damn. Given what Shirong had told him about something that might be eating waterbenders, this could make things tricky.

Just keep out of sight, Zuko told himself, surreptitiously heating his waterskin. Amaya had walked him through healing with water instead of fire, but it always seemed to drain him if the water wasn't warm. Decide on your story, make it simple-

Flesh moved slower than rock, and someone screamed.

Here we go.

There's at least four who won't make the cut, Shirong thought, looking at those lined up against the wall out of the action. More than four were injured; some of those Lee was treating had real promise, they just needed a bit more vigorous training to learn when not to jump in front of flying rocks. And one of those Shirong had decided was out hadn't a scratch on him; that young man just glared out of a body-bind of rocks, after he'd deliberately shoved one of the others into the path of a rising earth pillar.

The Army can have that one, Shirong thought darkly. If you couldn't trust one of your own to behave honorably in sparring, you definitely couldn't trust them against spirits-

What's this?

One of the possibles still standing had just done a startled double-take, and was now marching toward Lee with mayhem in his eyes. "What are you doing here?" Min Wen hissed.

"My job." Unfazed, Lee finished sealing his patient's nasty gash, glints of color fading out of water as he bent it back into his waterskin. "Looks like they're interested in you. Congratulations."

Min's eyes narrowed. "Like you really mean that."

Bad blood between them? With all the time Lee's spent at the Wen house? Why? Casually, Shirong drifted closer.

Lee sighed. "Yes, I do. If this is what you want to do with your life, good." He looked into the distance. "At least somebody's life came out the way they planned it."

"You shouldn't be here," Min said tautly.

"I'd say it's fortunate for you he is," Shirong said levelly, snickering to himself as Min jumped. "Next up is partner work. And it looks like we're one short."

"You want me to-" Min caught the look in his eyes, and swallowed the rest of his protest. "Yes, sir."

Lee looked equally dubious, if more relaxed. "Steel or bending?"

One of the other survivors snorted. “You think you can fight earthbenders with swords?”

“I’ve done it before.”

Not a boast. Not a trace of swagger. Just a simple, level statement. Shirong hid a smirk, knowing more than half the young men here simply wouldn’t believe it.

Their loss.

Min didn’t look as if he doubted it, though. Interesting.

“It’s a spar,” Shirong said plainly. “No killing. No maiming. Outside of that... keep yourself and your partner in one piece.” He waved them toward the others, and watched as Agent Bon picked the first set of pairs to compete.

“Begin!”

Min has no idea what he’s doing.

Zuko grimaced, batting a flying rock away as he ducked. Oh, Min knew earthbending. He wasn’t too bad at sparring, either. Though the whites of his eyes were getting a bit too visible for Zuko’s comfort, and if his moves were any more predictable, you could have set a clock by them.

Which was probably the only thing that had kept them in the game this long. Zuko could work around Min, knowing where not to be. There wasn’t any other option; Min had no clue how to work with a partner.

At least, not one that’s not an earthbender-

Earth trembled near his feet. Zuko slipped sideways away from the opening rift, nudging Min’s shoulder with his own to warn him of the oncoming threat.

Min flinched, and earth roared.

No!

Reflex crossed blades in front of him to ward off his own partner’s blow; he needed fire, needed a shield, but he couldn’t-

Water crashed down.

Zuko held his breath through the wave, rising as it receded, some still lapping hungrily at his sandals. Min was down and coughing, in no shape to defend himself. Their opponents hadn’t been hit nearly as hard; they were damp and wary, but stamped feet to yank up stones to punch-

Wet stones.

Zuko spun in place, swords slashing to swirl up waves as he would a storm of fire. Lashed out, letting water call to water, thirsting for movement and surface-creatures and life-

Stone and water and bodies froze.

I win.

It wasn’t over yet. They still breathed. And it’d take so, so little to surge water into gasping lungs, and drain everything....

No!

Zuko shoved ice back into steaming water, dropping to his knees in formal surrender. “Shirong! Shirong, it’s here!”

“Everyone hold!” the agent’s voice snapped out, before freed rocks could pummel him. “Lee! Where?”

Water yanked at him, cruel as the ocean in a surging typhoon. Enemies; he was surrounded by enemies. But the tide would carry him, strong and sure and forever. All he had to do was slip into the cold....

No! Let go!

Silent, mocking laughter. Cold and seawater and cruelty, and it had him, sure as a frozen riptide. Pulling him under, sealing hope and heart away in ice....

Don’t think. Just do.

Eyes closed, Zuko let his dao fall. Brought his hands up before his mouth, remembering another lethal sea of ice. And breathed.

Breath of fire.

With luck, his hands would hide the tiny flames. Without....

Zuko breathed again, fighting the chill in his blood. If this thing gets me, I’m dead anyway.

In, and out, and let chi fan the flames inside to a bonfire-

Something snapped, a chain of ice shattering. Zuko sagged, barely feeling rough stone gloves catch him.

“You’re freezing.” Shirong’s voice was cold as any ambushed commander. “Where is it?”

“The water,” Zuko managed, trying to turn toward that channel etched in stone. “It’s... moving away....”

“On it,” Agent Bon said grimly, leading a green charge along the sides of the canal. “Get the waterbender out of here.”

Zuko felt Shirong’s nod, but didn’t have time to flinch before he was pitched over the agent’s shoulder. “I can walk!”

“Who’s walking?” Shirong’s stance shifted, and earth shot up under them, rocks parting before them with a grinding moan.

Sunlight.

It blazed down Zuko’s nerves, burning through ghosts of ice. Searing away the strength of the sea’s uncaring cruelty, unearthing worry and fear and the pain of having his family shattered.

But it was his pain. Not the alien thing that had ripped through him from the water, turning his ally into something that would have destroyed them all.

Zuko clung to his scars, and breathed.

Reluctant footsteps. “Is he going to be all right?” Min wondered.

Shirong raised a brow, accepting Lee’s dao from the teenager. The healer himself was seated within grabbing range, closed eyes turned to the sun, meditating as if his life depended on it.

And it very well might.

“He’s warmed up, and he’s not wandering off to get eaten,” the agent said practically. “So far, those are good signs.” Wiping a rag down steel to dry it, he clicked the blades together. “I’m hoping he’ll be coherent soon. Any clues we can get to the nature of this kamuïy would help.” Though he suspected speed was no longer a factor. Not when Bon and his men had come up empty-handed.

“It’s dark water,” Lee rasped.

Shirong let out a relieved breath. “Are you all right?”

“Cold.” Lee cleared his throat, and opened tired eyes to glance around the little-used palace garden they’d surfaced in. “But it’s gone. Doesn’t like sunlight.”

Shirong nodded, adding that to the scant list of what they knew about this creature. “What else?”

“Felt like the sea. Like staring down into deep water, where nothing’s alive, not even seaweed....” Lee shuddered. “The middle of the ocean. Where there’s no one to help. No one to care if you live or die. You’re alone.”

“Is that how it’s luring people?” Shirong asked levelly.

Lee shrugged, hands spread; how the hell should I know? “It got me when I - thought I was outnumbered.”

“When Min hit you,” Shirong said bluntly. And you thought you really were alone.

“Hey!” Min protested. “He’s the one who got caught by a spirit!”

“What part of keep your partner in one piece did you not understand?” Shirong said sharply. “I wanted you working with Lee for a reason.” He shook his head. “We didn’t expect an attack, but we knew something might happen. Given your demonstrated level of skill, I thought you’d be the most capable partner Lee could have.”

Silence. Min’s gaze slid away, and he swallowed.

Angry and embarrassed, Shirong judged. Good. You screwed up, Min. Learn from it.

“It got me through the water,” Lee said quietly. “I was fine with my waterskin. But when I was... scared, and reached out to the channel... sunless water. That’s where it’s strong. It - tried to pull me under. Inside. Through my bending.” He drew deliberate breaths. “It wanted to drown everyone. It’s hungry, and cold, and it tried to - to use me, wrapping its power around mine....” Lee’s voice trailed off, and he paled.

“What?” Shirong asked, alert to danger.

“That’s what he did.” Lee’s fists clenched, rage glittering in fire-green eyes. “That’s what he did, that's why they died, that-!"

The punch to unsuspecting ground didn't shock Shirong, though the amount of dust raised took him aback. Yet even that didn't give him nearly as much pause as the occasional crackling words in Lee's sudden stream of curses; a litany of odd, sea-touched foul language that almost made him want to cover Min's innocent ears.

Oh. My. A waterbender who curses with Fire Nation High Court archaisms. Half of which Shirong didn't recognize, despite his study of that people's odd second language. You're lucky I already know what you are.

"-Parents probably got drunk on a moonless midnight-"

Shirong's brows climbed. "Back up," he mouthed at Min, waving a warning hand to be sure the teenager got the message. The Fire Nation took lineage seriously. For Lee to be implying what he was - oh my, indeed. "You've seen this before?" he said neutrally.

Lee's fists hit the ground again, knuckles bone-white, anger rising off him in a heat-haze. But he stared into the distance, jaw clenched, hauling in his runaway temper like an anchor chain. "Something like it. Once." Green eyes closed, conjuring up painful memory. "A waterbender - wanted to hurt the Fire Nation. He let a spirit take him over. The ships... those men had no warning, no chance, I-"

"They were Fire Nation," Min growled.

Bad call, Shirong winced.

"They were people!" Lee blazed. "When the Dragon of the West broke through the Outer Wall, he let people surrender! This - this thing-" He swallowed, and went on, voice thick with horror. "You look into the water, and all you see is broken ships and broken men. And you can't help them. You can't help anyone...."

He's on the edge. Pull him back. Kneeling by the healer, Shirong put a hand on his shoulder. "It's over," he said quietly. "You're alive. And you can help us, Lee. If something like that is loose here, we need all the help we can get."

"But if we could turn it against-" Min started.

"Don't even breathe that," Shirong said coldly, boring into the teen's gaze with his own until Min paled. "In fact, you're going to forget this conversation ever happened. Or you will forget it ever happened. Am I clear?"

"Yes, sir." But Min still looked unconvinced.

"He doesn't understand." Anger was fading from Lee's voice, swamped by exhaustion. "Guess they don't teach the laws of war at the university."

"Like war has any laws," Min snorted.

"Actually, it does," Shirong informed him dryly. Leave it to the Fire Nation to write them down. And hold to them. Mostly. "The one Lee's thinking of, the most basic, is the reason it would be suicide for Ba Sing Se to do what you're suggesting. It's called the law of reprisal." He raised a brow. "In short, don't do to others what you don't want blasted right back in your face."

"Humans don't get the spirits involved in our wars," Lee said bluntly. "Spirits aren't human. They don't recognize honorable surrender; they don't even recognize someone just trying to run away. We're supposed to honor them, and they're supposed to leave us alone to go on with our lives. Mostly. And if we dishonor them, they're supposed to go after the humans who broke the rules. Those people. Specifically." His voice dropped. "Not that they've been holding up their side, lately."

"The definition of broke the rules can be very flexible for malevolent kamuiy," Shirong said dryly. "In essence, Min? The Fire Nation must not know what happened, or there'd be nothing but ice and ash where the North Pole used to be. But if they ever do find out - given they're probably not insane enough to pull the same kind of stunt with a fire spirit, this waterbender's actions would force the Fire Nation to treat every waterbender as if he might do exactly the same thing."

"Which means the Water Tribes die," Lee said flatly. "Though maybe you'd think that's a good thing. Take some of the pressure off the Earth Kingdom. For a while."

Min, Shirong was grimly pleased to note, looked practically gray. "But - they were defending themselves!"

"How the hell do you know that?" Lee said harshly. "You weren't there!"

But you were, Shirong reflected. What happened? When? Why haven't we heard of it?

And why did he have a sense of holding puzzle pieces and just not recognizing their edges?

"The Water Tribes got lucky," Lee said, half to himself. "The Fire Nation's already looking for that waterbender. Hard." He glanced at Shirong. "If that thing pulls me in, and I can't get out-"

"We'll do what has to be done."

Lee nodded, accepting that grim promise.

"Which is another thing you should consider, before you think of spirits as weapons." Shirong eyed Min. "The kamuiy we're hunting would have killed us all. How many of the Water Tribes were destroyed because of what they unleashed?"

"Spirit or fire, dead's dead," Min objected. But he didn't sound quite as certain.

"Oh, no," Shirong said, deadly calm. "No, Min. If you want to be Dai Li, learn this, and learn it well. There are worse fates than death. Much, much worse."

That gave the boy pause for thought. I hope it lasts, Shirong reflected, snaring a palace servant to escort Min out. He's got potential. But if he can't think of the consequences.... The agent sighed.

Lee, he was slightly amused to note, was still sitting in the sunlight. Breathing. "That's a firebending meditation, isn't it."

Lee glanced at him, and away. "It helps."

"It doesn't like fire." Shirong nodded, adding that fact to the rest. And tried not to shiver. "Haima-jiao."

"What?"

"Assuming the worst? That's what we might be dealing with." Shirong frowned. "There's not much in the archives about them. They're sea-spirits, and usually we're too far inland to draw them. But in the time of Chin the Conqueror one supposedly followed a trail of shipwrecks up to the lakes. They're shapeshifters, predators. Usually they pick off people lost or stranded on the shore, or already drowning. And they hate sunlight, and fire."

"Think I'm going to burn lamps around Amaya's well," Lee said, half to himself.

"Couldn't hurt," Shirong acknowledged. Paused, and gave the younger man a deliberate look. "Who's the waterbender?"

Lee hesitated.

Odd. "Don't tell me he's a relative...."

"No!" Lee looked horrified by the thought. And wearily resigned. "No. It's just... you'd never believe me." His voice dropped. "No one would."

I wouldn't? Why wouldn't I-

Puzzle pieces clattered into place, and Shirong looked at his chain of conclusions with dread. A waterbender the Fire Nation was already searching for. A waterbender they're already prepared to throw armies against to destroy. A waterbender Lee doesn't think anyone will believe something so horrible of....

A waterbender we welcomed into the Inner Ring itself. Because he destroyed the Fire Navy.

The Avatar.

He's supposed to be the bridge to the spirit world. To enforce balance between the nations. To protect humans.

He's not supposed to let the spirits use him. Ever.

Yet if he believed Lee - and Shirong did believe Lee - the Avatar had done just that.

And he's in my city. Being kept in my city.

What the hell do I do?

First things first. "We'll get you home."

Lee shook his head, eyes sad. "The clinic. Uncle - he's not going to be home yet."

Grief, Shirong recognized. "You've lost someone."

"Hasn't everyone?"

Point. "The clinic, then. I believe you have something there I need returned."

Lee tensed, then deliberately made his face calm. "Master Amaya and I found the scroll very useful."

You think I'm just going to take it. Whoever had you in their keeping before your uncle, they treated you shabbily, indeed. "Come with me."

Through doors and down corridors; some public, others most definitely not. Those Dai Li lucky enough to have families lived elsewhere. For most, though, barracks under the palace close to their king were good enough.

But barracks weren't the only rooms down here. Shirong led Lee into one of the archives, and stepped aside to see the look on his face.

Surprise. Wonder, as Lee took in end-caps of blue, green, red, and orange. The whole room should have been lit from the force of it. "These are all..."

"Avatar Kyoshi left us very well prepared for our duties," Shirong smiled in satisfaction. "And we've expanded our library since."

Lee smirked, muttering something under his breath that sounded like pirates. Looked over shelves of scrolls with fierce longing. "Have you copied these?"

Interesting question. Particularly given he'd deliberately loaned Lee one of the older scrolls. "Why do you ask?"

"You should make caches. At least three or four. Some outside the city." Lee gave him a sober look. "This is the greatest treasure in Ba Sing Se. It shouldn't be lost if... if something goes wrong."

Shirong laughed once, softly, another part of the puzzle becoming clear in face of that hunger to know. "You're not at the Wen house for Min at all, are you? You've been seeing Professor Tingzhe."

"I like history." Lee's smile was quiet. "It's not like I can afford the university... he's been giving me lessons. And I've been teaching Jinhai."

Damn. Shirong gave him a hard look. "Jinhai's a waterbender?"

Lee grimaced, accepting the rebuke. "I didn't want to tell you earlier; I don't want word to get out to people I don't know. The whole family's upset. Especially Min. He thought Jinhai would get him kicked out of being recruited. And the university..."

"If they knew, the family would be in for hard times," Shirong acknowledged. "But you know the boy's in danger."

"They don't have a well, Jinhai's six and not allowed out after dark, and he bends with hot water," Lee said frankly. "He's probably safer than I am. He's never been marked by the spirits. And Suyin would shove a flaming spear right down the bastard's throat."

Reasonable arguments. Still. "Next time, tell me there's something I need to know. We almost lost you. Remember?"

"You're right," Lee acknowledged quietly. "Sorry. I screw up when I get surprised."

And being told there was a waterbender-eating spirit out there was definitely a surprise. Fair enough. "Think it through next time." Shirong let himself smile slightly. "As for caches... I imagine you're not familiar with earthbending printers, where you're from." He waited, watching.

"Exact copies," Lee realized. "As close as you can bend it to what you see. And if you can make print blocks...." Delight bloomed in green eyes.

"We've done a lot more than make a few caches," Shirong agreed dryly. "If you think you're leaving here empty-handed while there's a lethal kamui out there, you're out of your mind."

Though one thing still bothered the agent, as Lee almost smiled.

What the hell were you doing at the North Pole?

“I made dinner, Uncle Mushi.”

Setting down his traveling box and hat, Iroh nodded. So. We are being observed more closely than normal. He’d thought he suspected a few shadows on nearby roofs. “I appreciate that, nephew.”

“...I miss him, too.”

“I know you do.” Iroh smiled sadly, and moved in for a fragile hug. “I know that you do.” He looked up into worried eyes. “What has happened?”

“It’s not-” Zuko saw the look in his eyes, and winced. “Something tried to make me kill people....”

“Haima-jiao,” Iroh said thoughtfully sometime later, after a stumbling explanation and a slightly scorched dinner. “The lurer. Yes, I have heard of them.” He frowned, stroking his beard. “It must have come up from Chameleon Bay. The western route would be far too chill.”

“But it’s dark water,” Zuko objected.

“A spirit of ocean’s darkness, yes,” Iroh nodded. “But if tales are true, its chill is not that of ice, but of an emptiness of life. It is a spirit of the deserts of the sea; of warm water, warm oceans, that lack the rich bounty of the poles and flowing currents. The haima-jiao lairs beyond the sun’s touch, ever hungering for what it cannot have. But when that great fire retreats, it looks upon the shores, and it hates.” He nodded, recalling texts studied years ago. “Fire is its enemy. Fire, and family. It promises an end to pain - but the end it means is eternal. It lies, nephew. Never forget that.”

“I knew it had to be, but....” Zuko swallowed. “I didn’t know spirits could do that.”

“Most cannot,” Iroh assured him. “Which is why Agent Shirong is, unfortunately for us all, likely to be right. A haima-jiao would have the power to twist water against you.” He sighed. “Most spirits do not have that power... and most benders, even those touched by the spirits, are not powerful enough to be so vulnerable.”

“I’m not powerful.”

How little you know. “You have the determination to drive flesh and bone beyond where others fail, and perish,” Iroh said bluntly. “Your will is stronger than your body.” He smiled wryly. “Usually, this is an advantage.”

“Perfect,” Zuko grumbled. “So how do I fight this thing? Salt’s only going to make it laugh.”

“With fire, and with family,” Iroh said firmly. He gripped the young man’s shoulder. “You are never alone, nephew. There are those who love you, and wish you well. And they are not only myself and Master Amaya. Huojin, Luli, Tingzhe, Meixiang; even young Suyin and Jinhai. They care. Even if I were lost, they would take you in.”

Zuko did not look convinced.

I suppose I cannot blame him. He does not know some of them know the truth. And while we are watched, I cannot tell him.

But the young man sighed, and tried to push his doubts aside. “I miss him, too,” Zuko said quietly.

“And - I don’t know if today’s a good day to tell you this, but when I drowned....”

Ping thinks Lu Ten is cute. Close to death, was close to the spirit world. “Tell me,” Iroh said gently. “Tell me everything.”

Chapter End Notes

Haima-jiao - “sea horse-scaly dragon”. Loosely based off the Celtic each uisge (water horse). Very nasty critter.

Chapter 16

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Never. Letting Katara. Drag me out for girl stuff. Again.

Still smarting from those horrible girls the other day, Toph stalked down into the better end of the Outer Ring, on the hunt for truth in a city built on lies. And hoped she'd know it when she felt it.

"I'm looking for stonework," she'd told the Joo Dee currently watching over them when she left. "Buildings, carvings, fountains... I'll know it when I feel it," she said impatiently when the creepy smiling woman tried to interrupt. "The Avatar's got to have the best earthbending training. I can't just sit back and teach Aang everything I know. I've got to keep looking. See if there's a technique I don't know."

All of which was true. None of which had kept the woman and her Dai Li friends from following anyway. Which suited Toph just fine.

I am the greatest earthbender in the world. We'll see who out-stubborns who.

So here she was, hours later, walking down into the cool of a stone-carver's establishment. Reaching out with her bending, Toph felt marble, agates, quartz... and jade. All right!

"Can we help you, Miss?"

"You may," Toph nodded to the owner, and held up one of the ornaments she and Katara had used to crash that awful party. It'd been tricky, getting straight answers at moments she'd be pretty sure she wouldn't be overheard. "I'd like to talk with Luli."

"It doesn't look as though it needs repair... are you looking for a match?"

"I'm looking for a carver," Toph said impatiently. "She did something interesting with the flaw in this jade, and I want to pick her brains."

"There's no flaw in that jade-"

"There's no flaw you can see," Toph said pointedly. "Believe me, I can feel it. But she made the piece work with it. I want to know how." She drew up her best highborn manners, and folded her arms. "You'll both be paid for your time."

"...Right this way, ma'am."

Eel's-bed apartment design, Toph recognized, following the owner through the shop, into his family's living quarters, and out into a garden full of kids giggling and studying lessons between patches of green-smelling things. Her feet told her walls ahead formed the mirror image of the building she'd just left; the garden was the center of a whole block, with shops fronting the streets and dwellings sandwiched safely between.

Scared people. I don't like this city. At all.

Katara and Sokka and Aang might need the break, after being chased across half the planet. She hadn't been, and she'd joined up with their wild bunch for adventure. Tromping across new patches of ground. Bending rocks she'd never felt before against real bad guys, not just opponents in the ring. And yes, even marching blind and thirsty across deserts, not knowing if she'd make it out alive. Her parents had bundled her up like a blind china doll, and she wanted out.

And what had Aang done? Dropped them into a city under siege, a city where nobody would listen to them. And now he was just waiting, hoping to find Appa and get the Earth King to actually read his petition, when you didn't need eyes to see that Long Feng was the guy in charge and he didn't want a damn thing to do with any invasion plans.

Avatar or not, Aang was an airbender. He'd do just about anything rather than hit a problem head-on.

And I don't know what's the best thing to do yet, Toph admitted to herself, placing feet precisely on gravel. I could bust some heads, but if the others aren't right behind me, what's that going to solve? And Aang's not going anywhere without Appa.

There had to be a way out of this. She just had to figure out who to bury in rocks to find it.

"Luli!" the owner said brightly, as they approached an oasis of relatively calm youngsters. And shade, Toph recognized, feeling the sudden coolness in the air. "This young lady would like to ask you questions about stone-carving." From the shift of his feet, he was gleefully rubbing fingers together to indicate coins.

Idiot. I'm blind, not a moron. "I am Toph Bei Fong, of the Bei Fong family," Toph said with her best society attitude, coupled with the practical touch of one merchant dealing with another. "I have specific questions in regard to the carving on this piece." She held up the hairpin. "I think this will take at least a half an hour of your time."

Toph felt the owner's face fall, as the busybody realized he couldn't be away from the storefront that long. Hid a smirk, as he stuttered something meant to be obsequiously polite and hurried off. Waited until his footsteps thumped away, and grinned at Luli. "Is he always that bad?"

Luli giggled, and lowered her voice to a conspiratorial whisper. "Sometimes? He's worse." She whistled, and four sets of younger feet scampered in from various parts of the garden. "Toph Bei Fong, these are my daughters, Lim and Daiyu...."

"Hi," from someone about her age, and "Eep!" from a girl a few years younger-

"Are you blind?"

Much younger. Sounded like a little boy, though Toph wasn't quite sure.

"Jinhai!" An older girl's voice; probably about Katara's age. "Please forgive my little brother, Lady Bei Fong. We keep trying to teach him manners but it hasn't stuck yet."

Which sounded like a Katara kind of thing to say. But there was something else in her voice that made the earthbender prick up her ears. Something she'd heard before, somewhere.... "Hey, at least he knows the truth when he sees it." Toph stuck out a hand. "Toph."

"Suyin." The girl shook hands with a good grip, not the flimsy little flutter upper-class Ba Sing Se approved of. "Don't let us bother you, we're just visiting."

"Aww," Jinhai muttered.

Sounded like there was a story there. But it also sounded like even Jinhai was wary enough not to tell it to a complete stranger. Toph smirked a little, and turned toward Luli. “You’re not a bender. This was carved. So how’d you find the flaw?”

“Well... first, that’s Apple Mountain jade,” Luli said practically, as kids scattered again. “It has wonderful color, but a lot of it does have flaws. Usually, right in the heart of the best green in it....”

Sitting down on a raised stool of stone, Toph listened to an expert talk rock. This was the kind of thing she needed to teach Aang. You couldn’t just learn the moves and think you knew everything. You had to study your element. Poke at it. Play with it. Listen to it. And listen to people who knew what they were doing. Benders or not.

“...So instead of carving the flaw out to give a large piece with an awkward hole, I tapped a cut to extend the flaw, and let it cleave,” Luli finished practically. “The color left wasn’t the best, but I like how I was able to carve it into sun-dappled leaves....” Her voice trailed off.

“I can feel that,” Toph said plainly. “I can feel the stone’s different, anyway.” She touched the spiraling vine-shape. “There are different kinds of earth. One of them is more here, and less over here.”

Luli’s fingers touched hers, and the jade. “This is dark green.” A fraction left. “This is lighter, shading to almost amber here. And over here is dark again - wait. Come over here.” She moved into the sun, and held a leafy stalk that smelled like mint still. “Feel the leaf. Where it’s warm, that’s sun; that’s a bright green. Where it’s cooler, that’s darker. Where you feel it dried - that’s brown.”

Toph traced her fingers over mint, remembering long hours spent in her family’s estate gardens. She knew what plants felt like. But what they looked like.... You’re blind, her mother would always say. And, I’m sorry.

No one had ever tried to show her something before. To let her see, the way they saw.

“So you can feel different kinds of earth inside stone?” Luli was almost bouncing in place as she held the mint. “Professor Tingzhe would love to trade notes with you. Tingzhe Wen; he’s an earthbending archaeologist at Ba Sing Se University? He’s Jinhai and Suyin’s father; I have them today because Meixiang’s mixed up in some kind of paperwork over Jia and Min’s classes, honestly I don’t know how they ever get things done over there, she must have explained the kids really didn’t know Bai a dozen times-”

“I’m not so sure that’d be a great idea,” Toph admitted. “I got here on my own, but I bet I’d pick up a Joo Dee if I tried to hit the university again.”

Luli’s heart speeded up. “You’re... visiting the city, then.”

Toph lowered her voice. “Yeah. Don’t think I’m being watched right now-”

“You are.” Almost a whisper. “Jinhai’s being watched.”

The kid? Why? “Are you in trouble? I could help-”

“I live with trouble.” Toph could hear Luli’s grin, despite her fear. “My husband’s in the City Guard.”

A massive yawn split the air from Luli’s apartment. “Do I hear somebody slandering my good name?”

“Just telling the truth,” Luli chuckled. “Toph likes the truth. Toph? This is my husband, Huojin.”

Solid footsteps onto gravel; the sway of a nod. “Pleasure to meet you, Miss Toph.”

And she could hear it again in his voice, like she had in Suyin’s and Jinhai’s. Like she’d heard in at least half the kids through the garden. “You’re-”

Toph bit her lip before she could say it. Huojin. Fire metal. The name was Earth Kingdom, but the meaning, and that accent....

You’re Fire Nation.

“You don’t sound like other people I’ve met in the city,” she said instead.

“My parents were refugees,” Huojin said matter-of-factly. “We came when I was six.” He shook his head. “Still shows, huh? Imagine that.”

And he was nervous, a little, but he wasn’t lying. Huh.

“Strange place to come for a visit on your own,” Huojin mused. “This city’s not a good place for a kid alone. I got lucky; Healer Amaya took me in after my parents were gone.” He shifted his weight, obviously eyeing her. “You do have people to go to, don’t you?”

“I’m fine,” Toph scowled. “I can look after myself.”

“Just asking. You looked worried, that’s all. And trust me, even in the Guard, it’s good to have people you can ask for backup.”

Toph smiled ruefully. “You sound like Uncle.” In more ways than one. “I’m okay. I just need to think about something.”

“Rocks?” Luli said wryly. “Or someone with a rock-hard head?”

“Hey!” Huojin protested. “I resemble that remark.”

Toph giggled.

“You’re as stubborn as the Wall, and we both know it,” Luli said affectionately. “So now that you’re up, sleepyhead... are you going out for tea before work? Or should I go pump Mushi for details?”

“You know,” Huojin said dubiously, “it’s actually possible for Lee to go a few days without a disaster.”

“Keep telling yourself that.”

“Who’s Lee?” Toph asked, curious.

“A walking disaster area,” Luli said brightly. “Poor kid!”

“Luli,” Huojin groaned.

“He’s a waterbender,” the carver went on. “Amaya’s apprentice. He’s really a nice young man....”

“But if trouble were lightning, somebody dumped that kid on a mountain top in a thunderstorm hog-monkey-tied in copper wire,” Huojin said ruefully. “So! Do I need to terrorize our little angels into finishing their lessons, or have they taken after their mother and been responsible?"

"They're as responsible as you are, love."

"Oh spirits, not that. We're all doomed." A quick hug, and Huojin charged into the bushes. "Okay! Who's got their books in order?"

Toph listened to childish yells wistfully. She didn't mind being an only child. Honest. But sometimes....

"You know, if you get done thinking, and you do need help, we're right here," Luli offered. "That's what the Guard's for. And my husband's got one of the biggest hearts in it. And the hardest head," she chuckled. "But sometimes, that's just what you need."

Determination. Yeah, that was the Fire Nation all over. "You're right," Toph said thoughtfully. "Sometimes it is." Rising, she bowed politely. "Thanks. That really helped."

Accounts settled, Toph headed back toward the Upper Ring, scuffing her feet over stones as she thought about elements, and Long Feng, and being stuck in a city that felt more and more like a sitting target.

Aang's an airbender. He tries to skate around problems. He won't take Long Feng head-on. Katara, Sokka - they're water. He thinks up a plan, she comes at the bad guys sideways. Only Long Feng's already got the angles covered, so that won't work either. And me? I may be the greatest earthbender ever, but there's an awful lot of Dai Li.

We need to do what none of us really knows how to do. We need to attack.

...We need fire.

Uncle. Spirits, she'd give a lot to have Uncle here right now. Heck, she'd take Sparky; Zuko might be hair-trigger and cranky, but he sure as mountains knew how to go after something bigger and badder than he was. He'd snuck into the North Pole. The Earth King's palace couldn't be that much harder.

Keep dreaming, Toph. Uncle's the Dragon of the West, remember? The whole army's probably got pulverize on sight orders for him. No way is he in Ba Sing Se.

Too bad. Still. If Huojin was Fire Nation, and those other kids also sounded like his kids....

Maybe we can find some fire here after all.

Something to think about. After she pounded Aang into the ground with another lesson.

Another boring night, Shirong thought, perched in the shadow of a cistern atop a specific roof. Huddled a bit in his uniform, as an evening breeze blew off the lakes. Not that there's anything wrong with boring. Considering the alternative.

Not knowing where the spirit was, that was the problem. Everyone was jumpy. Search as they might, the kamui remained stubbornly out of sight. Though they had found evidence of the creature. Damn it.

It took imagination and unpleasant experience to recognize the fish-eaten lumps of flesh washed up on Lake Laogai's shores. For those with that experience... the tattered livers were both threat, and raging incitement to break skulls.

This thing is eating people, Shirong thought darkly, fingering the whistle he had to summon reinforcements. Right over our heads.

There were a lot of angry Dai Li watching the lakeshore tonight.

Not that it has to come up there; not if it's going through the underground waterways, Shirong scowled. Spirits, let it stay arrogant. Let it think it can keep taunting us. If it's learned to travel through artesian water, it could go anywhere-

Earthen tiles trembled in his senses, as a familiar weight climbed the wall and crouched on the roof. "Are you keeping an eye on the neighborhood, or just me?"

Shirong eyed Lee, taken aback. "Ah, well...."

"Because if it's just me, Uncle and I are about to unroll the maps. And he made tea."

"Unroll the maps?" Shirong echoed, confused.

"You want to help pick out interesting spots or not?"

"Interesting how?" There was something decidedly askew about the world tonight. People just didn't walk up to Dai Li!

"Come on inside. Uncle thinks you might like trying a little ginseng in your oolong."

Bemused, Shirong followed Lee down.

And yes, Mushi's blend of tea was tasty.

Odd. So very odd. "How did you know I was there?" Recalling what had been up on the roof, Shirong added, "The cistern?"

"I'm not that good with water," Lee said dryly. "Somebody had to be out there. I just looked."

"I am a bit too old to be climbing onto roofs," Mushi smiled, unrolling a map of the world across the table.

Sure you are, Shirong thought sardonically. Granted, Mushi looked like he'd carried a bit more weight a few months back, but given what he'd seen from Lee? If the man wanted to be up on a roof, he'd be there.

So they hit a bad spot a few months back. I wonder what- Oh.

If Lee had seen the Avatar destroy the Fire Navy's invasion fleet - yes, two surviving colonials would have been in a bad spot. The only surprise would be that they'd lived to get out of it.

Details. I want details.

But he couldn't risk asking. If Lee didn't trust him enough to tell him about the Avatar - then Lee didn't trust him enough. Yet.

Keep your eyes open, and be patient.

Just being invited in was a step forward. If a slightly daunting one. How many people in Ba Sing Se would willingly have a Dai Li in for tea?

It's kind of nice.

And it was an excellent opportunity to gauge the pair of them. You could tell a lot about people from what was in their apartment. And wasn't.

Bare in here, aside from Mushi's bonsai. I know they're not making a lot, but most people would spend a little on dressing up the place.

No wall hangings. No whimsical little lanterns or fine clothes in sight. But if those weren't two stocked travel packs tucked discreetly away in Lee's sleeping alcove, he'd eat his hat.

And the map. Not an expensive map; Shirong had seen bigger and fancier in noble houses of the Upper Ring. But from what he knew, it was an accurate map. Those weren't cheap.

Scraping by, and they've put their resources into being able to run again.

Meaning Lee wasn't paranoid. Something bad had happened to them... and they believed it could happen again.

Which led Shirong right back to the North Pole, and his unsuspecting city, and what in the world was he supposed to do if the haima-jiao latched onto the Avatar...?

Some of the notes on the map's transparent overlay finally sank in, and Shirong tried not to let his eyebrows climb. Little corrections, what ports needed dredging, whose forces had been sighted where and when.... "Have you been all these places?"

"Quite a few," Mushi said generously. Tapped Kyoshi Island's main bay. "The Unagi, here, might be a match for your lake's serpent. It feeds on young elephant koi... and the occasional unwary swimmer."

"I've always heard those people were crazy," Shirong muttered.

"Why?" Lee pounced. "Because they teach girls to fight?"

"Because they thought they could stay out of the war," Shirong said levelly. "Being out of the way only helps so long. And they don't have walls to protect them." The North Pole did - no. Don't ask. Yet. "So... what makes a spot interesting?"

"Ah." Mushi inclined his head. "That, is a matter of some debate." He touched a large island to the southeast. "The Eastern Air Temple."

For a moment, Shirong couldn't believe his ears. "You want to visit an Air Temple? No one can get up there!"

"Says the earthbender," Lee smirked. "You can. If you really want to." He flipped through a stack of handwritten notes. "I don't know. It's close, but you have to get through Chameleon Bay, and there's going to be fleets fighting there. If they aren't already. And it's east. People would have to come a long way."

"An argument against much of the east coast," Mushi observed. "I also recall that the forests are not such as we would find convenient, and the rainfall patterns are different from both here and the west. Which would be an unnecessary hindrance." His finger moved south and west, back onto the main continent. "Gaoling."

“Better spot,” Lee nodded, tracing the coast from Chameleon Bay west. “We’d still have to get through the bay, and it’s a longer trip the first time, but we’d only have to pass through these coastal waters once. It’s almost as far from strategic as you can get. That would help.” He frowned. “But it’s been quiet, so there are a lot of people there. Which could make it tricky.”

“Still, a possible spot,” Mushi noted. “Kyoshi Island.”

“Too small,” Lee stated. Eyed his uncle. “And I think they’d remember us.”

“Very possible,” Mushi acknowledged, a gleam of pure mischief in green eyes.

“It wasn’t my fault!”

Mushi raised a gray brow.

“I- but he- but they didn’t...” Words failed Lee, and he buried his head in his hands, groaning.

“What happened to you on Kyoshi Island?” Shirong asked warily.

“To me? Nothing.” Mushi smiled. “But my nephew happened to them. Let us say, both sides... disagreed.”

“And you’re still in one piece?” Shirong eyed Lee. “I’ve heard their warriors aren’t pushovers.”

“They’re not.” Lee lifted his head, still looking a bit sheepish. “They’re good.” He looked aside, thoughtful.

Mushi cleared his throat. “No.”

“But I could-”

“I do not think so.”

“But they’d be really-”

“Skilled as they are, they have made their stance in this war clear,” Mushi stated. “It would take extraordinary delicacy of manner to persuade them to even consider our plea, and when it comes to diplomacy....”

“Subtle, you’re not,” Shirong added dryly. Considered the locations they’d mentioned, and frowned. They’re not just looking for someplace to visit. What are they looking for?

“The Southern Air Temple,” Mushi suggested.

“No.” Lee shuddered.

“I agree,” Mushi admitted. Glanced at Shirong. “It was unpleasant to visit before, but now that we know you are vulnerable to some spirits... I do not know what Fire Lord Sozin’s commanders were thinking, to leave so many without funeral pyres. The risk of staying beyond nightfall would be far too great.”

Shirong studied the map anew, dredging up old history lessons. What little citizens were officially taught about the war focused on the Fire Nation’s attacks on the Earth Kingdom. But it started here. In the Air Temples. “It’s been a hundred years....”

“In some rooms, the bones still lie as thick as scythed wheat,” Mushi said gravely. “It is not pleasant to consider you have kin among those who carried out such attacks.”

Out of the corner of his eye, Shirong watched Lee, trying to catch flickers of emotion on that scarred face. Anger, guilt, sorrow... determination.

He thinks what the Fire Nation did is wrong. And he wants to do something about it.

What, exactly, Lee thought he might do, Shirong had no idea. Lee was just a teenager.

Then again, the Avatar's barely more than a child. These two got into Ba Sing Se. Whatever they're planning, I wouldn't want to bet against them. “I’m still trying to grasp what you consider interesting.”

Mushi’s smile held amusement, and challenge. “The Western Air Temple.”

“Upside-down would take some getting used to,” Lee reflected. “It’s well placed, but I’m not sure we want to be somewhere you can rappel down into. But maybe.” He touched the map. “We’d be going west through the lakes. That might be safer.”

“And that route leads to other possibilities,” Mushi acknowledged. “Taku.”

“Pohuai Stronghold,” Lee countered.

“Yes... though I believe someone illustrated that was not the most secure of fortresses,” Mushi chuckled.

Shirong stared. Mushi smiled back. And Lee tried to look anywhere else.

He broke into Pohuai Stronghold?

And he was still alive to tell about it. Unbelievable. “Mushi,” Shirong asked bluntly, “what have you been teaching this boy?”

“Everything he would learn,” Mushi said with great satisfaction. “Though some of the credit is not mine. The arts of stealth were never my specialty.”

Lee, Shirong noted wryly, was blushing. “You knew?” the waterbender muttered.

“I lost no little sleep worrying,” Mushi answered quietly. “But I knew you would not have attempted it if you were not certain you could.” He regarded Lee with quiet pride. “I rely on you to do what you believe is right. And I trust that you will do so with care, and proper planning.”

Compliment and gentle rebuke in one, Shirong judged, seeing Lee’s ears go red. On the one hand, he was tempted to tell Mushi to ease up; the boy was only sixteen. On the other....

If he's taking Pohuai Stronghold level risks, I'm amazed Mushi hasn't locked him in a room to calm down.

No wonder Mushi wanted Lee working himself into the ground. Spirits only knew what kind of trouble he’d find if he didn’t.

“So... next was Gaipan?” Lee managed.

“Fire Nation territory, for the last several years,” Shirong pointed out.

“And apparently prone to floods,” Mushi mused. “An upland near there might have promise, but....” He shrugged, and let his finger trace around the mountainous coast, almost to the very northernmost tip of the continent. “And then, there is here.”

“Chilly,” Shirong observed dryly. You got clear of the North Pole once. Why would you come that close again? Even if there is a stretch of ocean between.

“Not as much as you think,” Lee said seriously. “It snows up there, and the winter nights are dark... but high as it is, the mountain tops are warm.” He frowned, and nodded. “At least as warm as Ba Sing Se.”

Shirong glanced at Mushi, startled. “How is that possible?”

“Fortuitous currents of air, it would seem,” the older man informed him. “Though I also suspect this mountain, here, may be volcanic.” He tapped the map just slightly west. “The natural gas underneath the range can be a hazard if one delves too deep in the earth... but that itself could be an asset, properly applied.”

“Not the Temple.” Lee smiled wryly. “Next door.”

“It was cultivated once, and could be again,” Mushi agreed. “Yet it would be far enough from the current occupants to not impose.”

“Wait, wait, wait.” Shirong held up halting hands. “Temple? There’s an Air Temple in the Earth Kingdom? And it’s inhabited? The Fire Nation-”

“Left no survivors,” Mushi cut him off. “Those who dwell there today, are from a village destroyed a decade past by flood. They are of earth. Though living that high has made them... a bit odd.”

“Crazy as an airbender,” Lee muttered. “I’m keeping my feet on the ground.”

“Likely wise,” Mushi chuckled.

Shirong looked at the map. And them. And Lee’s extensive, exhaustive notes. And sat back, stunned. “You’re not planning a visit.”

“Agent Shirong,” Mushi said, quiet and serious. “As a guardian of this city... what would happen if Ba Sing Se fell?”

Shirong felt chill. “It won’t.”

Mushi inclined his head. “But if it did?”

“We’ll fight to the last man standing. You know that.” Shirong half-rose from his chair, angry. “If you know something-”

“It’s not like that!” Lee was on his feet, hands out and empty between them. “It’s not. Just - Shirong, listen.” His voice dropped. “You don’t know what’s out there.”

“Or more accurately, who,” Mushi said gravely. “For the first time since the Siege of Ba Sing Se, a descendant of Sozin’s line has taken to the battlefield in war.”

Shirong swallowed hard. Sank back into his chair, legs suddenly nerveless. “I thought - rumor said the crown prince was exiled....”

“Prince Zuko was, indeed,” Mushi said levelly. “Princess Azula was not.”

Slow breaths, Shirong told himself, trying to keep the world from graying out. One of the royal family on the battlefield. The last time that had happened....

Keep it together. You've got to tell Quan. "If she's the younger heir, she can't be more than a child."

"Don't," Lee said harshly. "Don't ever make that mistake. It'll be the last one you make."

"She is fourteen, true," Mushi said, equally grim. "But she is a firebending prodigy, and a tactical genius. I believe even the Dragon of the West would pause, if he faced her on the field." He swept a hand over the map. "So. I ask you, as guardian of your city and a loyal citizen of the Earth Kingdom. What hope do your people have, if Ba Sing Se falls?"

"I hope it doesn't," Lee said quietly. "I hope you can stand her off. But if things go wrong... and damn it, around me things always go wrong... Shirong, if she takes you, you're Earth Kingdom. You're just dead. If she gets us...."

"I see." And he did. Horribly enough.

They're afraid. These two aren't even afraid of Dai Li - and they're afraid.

"You're going to run," Shirong said bleakly. "Again."

"I'm not running," Lee said grimly. "I'm tired of running." He took a breath. "But sometimes you have to make a strategic retreat."

Call it what you want. They were planning to run. Why had he expected any better? Spies didn't stand and fight-

Wait, Shirong told himself, through the haze of outrage and disappointment. Think. What are they looking at? Resources, rain, how cold it is, how many people are there, how to get past those fighting the war.... "What do you mean by hope?"

Mushi saw the dawning wonder in his face, and smiled. "The only hope that matters. The hope to live, to fight another day."

"...You're planning a resistance outpost." It was incredible. Impossible. They were refugees. Fire Nation colonials, no less. They had no money, no resources, no authority-

And none of that would make a difference, if Ba Sing Se fell, Shirong realized. It'd be chaos, panic; blood in the streets. If they meant to get people out - all they'd have to know is where to find supplies to commandeer, how to talk people into seizing them, and how to get people to listen to them long enough to evacuate.

Like he was listening, right now.

Lee's been all over the city working with Amaya. He's found allies in the university, the Guard - even the palace. He knows how to find us. And who knows what contacts Mushi's made in that teashop.

Spirits... I think they could do this.

Try, at least. Succeed? It still seemed unreal.

"I guess it might work for that," Lee said, after sharing a glance with his uncle. "But that wasn't exactly... the Fire Nation's not going to destroy Ba Sing Se. It's too big. Too valuable. Unless she's having a really bad day...." He took a breath. "What we're looking at is, if that happens, some people shouldn't be here. Me. Uncle. Professor Tingzhe and his family; anybody who knows something about the catacombs under the city. Healer Amaya. And anyone else we can get out who'd poke a hole into any plans to hold the city." He hesitated, and looked Shirong straight in the eye. "Your families."

Shirong smiled wryly, the offer bittersweet. Would that I had one.

But it was a valid point. If Ba Sing Se ever fell - it wouldn't do at all, to have Dai Li families in enemy hands. "I still think it's impossible."

"That may be," Mushi acknowledged. "But we would rather prepare for a disaster that will never come, than be cast adrift in the typhoon." He gestured to the map. "So what do you think we should consider?"

It was impossible. It should have seemed ridiculous.

But if there was one thing he'd learned studying Lee, it was that despite his masquerade as an Earth Kingdom refugee, the young waterbender didn't have a deceptive bone in his body.

And here were two people with a map, who'd been places he'd never see.

"...Tell me about the Air Temples."

Hours later, Shirong was back on a rooftop. Thinking.

Learn your enemy's nature, and half the battle is won.

Not that the Avatar was his enemy. Spirits, no. But a threat to Ba Sing Se - yes. That he might very well be.

And while Lee hadn't breathed one word about the Avatar, he'd been almost talkative when it came to the Temples. The sorrow of the Southern, the peacefulness of the Eastern, the head-hurting upside-down architecture of the Western.

"How does it even stay standing?" Shirong had asked, disbelieving.

"No clue," Lee had muttered, shaking his head as if to blot out memory. "Maybe they found a bunch of insane earthbenders to hook it into the cliff top."

"And paid with many barrels of cactus juice," Mushi had added wryly.

Though when it came to the Northern, Lee had been a lot more picky with his details. Shirong couldn't blame him. Mention in the colonies that you'd seen anyone gliding, and you'd probably find yourself being wrung dry by Fire Nation interrogators, all the while knowing you were responsible for unleashing rabid firebenders on innocent people.

They've literally been around the world. How? Why?

It'd make sense, if they'd been spying for the Fire Nation. But if that were the case, there shouldn't be a Northern Air Temple anymore. On the other hand, if they hadn't visited there until after Mushi had decided his nephew's injury merited an unannounced retirement - why go there?

North, a lot of ocean, and difficult terrain, Shirong reflected. Not a bad place to break your trail if you were worried about Fire Nation pursuit.

Which seemed to fit what he'd seen of them. Lee tried to hide it, but the healer moved like he was expecting an ambush. Always.

But that doesn't make sense. If no one knew he was a waterbender, why chase them? They're just two colonials.

Or were they? Mushi seemed to know things about everywhere in the world. What else was hidden behind wise eyes?

Questions upon questions. Though if they'd been enough places to see the war's horrors firsthand.... Well, it explained why Lee was as determined to learn healing as he must have been to learn swords. There was nothing worse than having someone die on you and knowing you could have done something. If only you'd known how.

Healer or not, Lee was still a fighter, none too subtly prying for details on the haima-jiao whenever they'd paused to brainstorm. Given it was the young man's neck on the line, Shirong had obliged. Though he'd left out exactly how angry his fellow Dai Li were. An agent was always cool, calm, and inhuman. Ask anyone.

"Lake Laogai," Mushi had mused. "If it is lairing there, and not in truly sunless waters below the earth - either there is more salt in the lake, or there are other reasons such a creature is more... comfortable."

Lee had looked alarmed. "Did something happen there?"

"I'll look into it," Shirong had answered. And knew no one was fooled.

Bad, yes. Something that would upset the spirits more than usual? Difficult to say. They'd been mindbending Joo Dees and troublemakers for decades. Imprisoning or executing those the Grand Secretariat deemed necessary, shaping Ba Sing Se as it must be; why should the spirits decide now was any worse than times past?

Before, we didn't have the Avatar's bison.

He'd attended more than a few of Tingzhe's lectures on Chin the Conqueror, trying to gage if the professor were alluding to the current war in ways that might be too dangerous. What the man had said about Chin, Kyoshi, and badger-moles had made him interested enough to look up the Dai Li's own records of Avatars. Which implied the bison... might not be just a bison.

Avatars have animal guides. Kyoshi didn't meet hers until after she defeated Chin, but... she had a badger-mole. Roku had a dragon.

The Avatar was being kept from his bison. The spirits might be very upset, indeed.

Enough to unleash a man-eater on our city? Our people are innocent!

But the Dai Li served the people. And the Dai Li were not.

Oma and Shu. That can't be it. Long Feng wouldn't order the bison kept if it put our people at risk. He wouldn't!

When had he stopped being sure?

Mind on the job, Shirong told himself grimly, looking about in the night. First, keep the water-kamuiy from grabbing any more waterbenders. Second, find the damned thing and arrange for a spirit-roast. Third, work on his recruits.

At least that last seemed to be going well. Once they'd talked out the map, Lee had shyly shown him one of the latest scroll's moves; a flex of fingers that turned water into lethal claws of ice. Useful in and of itself; deadly daggers were no small asset, and when those claws could be thrown - yes, a Dai Li knew how handy that could be.

But Lee had surprised him yet again.

"How do the gloves work?"

From anyone else, Shirong would have laughed. A waterbender whose first training had been in firebending forms, and he thought he could figure out how to shape ice like rock?

But he'd never seen a waterbender create a move like Lee had. A net strong enough to drag a malicious kamuiy off its prey; to trap it, even if only for a minute.

It couldn't hurt to try.

Well, now we know many ways it won't work, Shirong thought wryly. I'm sure he'll be at it again tomorrow. And again, and again, until he gets something to work.

From a purely practical point of view, that was useful in itself. A waterbender practicing might draw their prey into the open.

I hope he survives.

He'd hate to lose any recruit. Lee more than most. The young man had talent, drive, the pure will needed not to give up....

And they had me in for tea, Shirong admitted, recalling the warmth, the friendly looks, their honest respect for his opinion. I could get used to that-

Oh. Oh, spirits.

Rueful admiration in his gaze, Shirong eyed a dark window below. Mushi, you are a sly, conniving, wonderful old man.

A lost pygmy puma, abandoned to live by its wits. That's how he'd thought of Lee, that first day with the bear. An impression that had only strengthened with the first waterbending scroll, and how fast the young healer had blossomed under Amaya's teaching.

But if that were true of Lee, how much more was it true of himself?

I'm not alone. I trust my friends. And I can always take the uniform off, and....

There. That was the sticking point. If he wanted something beyond the Dai Li, he had to hide what he was. Who he was.

With those two, he didn't have to hide anything.

I think someone just tried to recruit me.

Well, well, well.

That man, Shirong thought wryly, has the guts of a first-class cat burglar.

And was it wrong for him to feel delighted, instead of offended? Puzzles, the pair of them; an intricate web of honest mysteries Mushi had all but invited him to unravel.

Let's play. Shirong smiled, plotting out exactly what he'd search for once his shift was over.
Pohuai Stronghold, hmm?

He could hardly wait.

Chapter End Notes

Written in part because, given what we know Sozin and Iroh did in canon (and I'd bet Azulon was no slouch), the reaction of any sane person to somebody out of that family taking the field should not be the Gaang's, "oh, look, crazy ladies with blue fire". More like, "Aaauugh! Sephiroth! Run away! Run away!"

Chapter 17

Too early for big sisters, Suyin thought grumpily, eyes half-open as she tried to work around the giggling girl at the wash basin.

“Paddle my canoe!” Jia chortled. “Oh, the look on Madame Macmu-Ling’s face....”

Poetry class. Argh. Suyin got her face washed, stuck out her tongue behind her sister’s back, and headed downstairs.

“I saw that!”

“So?” Suyin smirked, jumping off the last step with a flourish. To land in front of her mother’s raised eyebrow. “Er... Mom?”

“Ooo, now you’re gonna get it,” Jia said gleefully, gracefully gliding down the stairs like a proper young lady.

“Suyin, be polite to your sister,” Meixiang said firmly. Raised her gaze, and eyed Jia. “Jia, stop hogging the washroom in the morning, or you’re going to have to start cutting your dates an hour shorter.”

“But, Mom-!”

“If you can’t get out of the way fast enough in the morning, you obviously need more sleep. Or am I wrong?” She shooed them both toward breakfast. “Eat, eat; you don’t want to be late.”

Tea, Suyin thought gratefully, gulping it down before she attacked her morning rice. Chewed her way through half of it, trying to ignore the sullen steaming beside her. Jia’d deserved that, she’d been out late a lot-

But some of those times, she was out late when she would have been early. Only she was helping me with Jinhai. Suyin braced herself, and glanced at her sister. “So... something neat happened at poetry?”

I am so going to regret this. Somebody probably scored something esoteric about stars and spring mists off somebody else in the linked verse competition, and I’m going to be so bored....

“You’ll never believe it!” Jia perked up, smiling. “A Water Tribe boy crashed the class!” She giggled. “And I mean crashed. He fell in wearing half the window!”

Suyin’s jaw dropped. “Really?”

Okay. For once? Making nice with her sister wasn’t so bad.

Jia launched into salacious details, including way too many about what Water Tribe tunics didn’t cover, and it was almost enough to make Suyin forget they were being watched. And why.

Something that eats waterbenders. Suyin tried not to shudder. At least her little brother was actually safe.

But Lee’s not.

For once, she hoped the Dai Li won. No matter what it took.

There came a point in time, Smellerbee realized, shivering, where you were just too scared to scream. Even if there hadn't been rock wrapped around her mouth as a gag.

The Dai Li were so quiet.

A few carried crystals that glowed soft green; just enough light to ease their passage through endless tunnels. Only an ingrained habit of defiance kept Smellerbee struggling against her bonds; even if she broke free, even if she by some miracle got Longshot and Jet loose too - where would they go?

Yell at us. Hit us. Look at us. Do something!

The Dai Li weren't even touching them. Just moving at a fast walk, the three bound freedom fighters carried on a rolling wave of stone.

I feel so dumb. Smellerbee squirmed again, useless or not. That Guard warned us. Amaya and Mushi, they told us Jet was asking for trouble. We were trying to talk him out of it! If it weren't for that - that thing....

She thought they'd gotten away from it in the alley. And two of them had. But Jet....

Part of Jet just wasn't home anymore. He kept seeing shadows where there weren't any, listening for a voice neither of them could hear. And at night - at night, he kept trying to get to water.

After she and Longshot had dragged him out of a well, she decided this was a bad idea. That all of Ba Sing Se was a bad idea, and she'd rather take her chances with the whole Fire Nation army camped outside the walls than stick around here anymore.

She'd told Longshot that. He'd nodded once, eyes sober. And they'd tried to get Jet and themselves to the Outer Wall and out.

They hadn't made it.

Now, a pair of Dai Li parted stone like a curtain, and they were lifted into an ordinary room carved into rock, with real lanterns burning on a table by a pitcher of water.

One of the Dai Li did glance at them then, just for a moment. Barely interested; like they were a particularly stubborn boulder that hadn't yet split.

Turned away, and disappeared up stone stairs.

Look at us! We're here! We're right here!

Who knew how long later, footsteps came back down. And not alone. "Was it wise to send him away?" the Dai Li said neutrally.

"The sun is still up," Amaya observed, stepping into the light to regard them with sorrow, and grim determination. "He'll be safe enough with his uncle to look after him. And he may have done some hard things in the past, but this... even to protect those he loves, I would rather not ask this of him."

Which was when Smellerbee stopped being scared, and started being terrified.

Never tick off a healer, her older brother had told her once; back when she'd still had an older brother. They know how to mess you up.

“You usually don’t need my help to question prisoners, Agent Yunxu,” Amaya went on, still with that same chilling sorrow.

“Time is critical,” the sleepy-eyed Dai Li said plainly. “And the one most affected,” he nodded, ever so slightly at Jet, “isn’t behaving... rationally.”

“So you want me to heal him enough to talk.” She sighed. Looked over them all, and inclined her head. “I am sorry. But what they’re after will kill those I care for, if it is not stopped.”

No, no, Smellerbee thought, frozen. Get away....

“The water-spirit almost took Lee’s mind and spirit,” Amaya went on quietly, advancing on Jet. “It will try again. And I will not let that happen. No matter what it takes.”

“The Fire Nation took our homes! The Fire Nation took our families!” Jet had said that, raid after deadly raid. “We have to fight them wherever they are, whoever they are! No matter what it takes!”

Facing it from the other side, Smellerbee was very, very sorry.

“Nothing,” Yunxu frowned.

“Nothing?” Amaya arched a brow, still queasy. Though she’d be damned if she’d let this man know it. Shirong, she might have; a faint light of compassion, of regret, still burned in the man, like stars seen through mist. She couldn’t fault Zuko for being drawn to him. Like called to like, and she knew what wounds Shirong had suffered.

Yunxu... the light was gone. If it had ever existed.

“Nothing we didn’t know.” Yunxu let his gaze linger on the re-gagged children. “We’ll take them now.”

“Why not just let them go?” Amaya said levelly, glancing at the terrified girl out of the corner of her eye. “They were trying to get out of the city. Surely, that would be best for everyone.”

Faint hope lit Smellerbee’s eyes. Longshot held himself still-

“And what if it decides to follow a victim that got away?” Yunxu said dispassionately. “A waterbender is a more attractive target, but we can’t take the chance.”

“Then you could just hold them until the spirit is dealt with,” Amaya suggested.

Yunxu looked at her, and silently looked away.

You can’t save everyone, Amaya told herself, heartsick. People are dying. “I think I could use some air.”

Somehow she wasn’t surprised that Yunxu followed her out to the garden. He didn’t trust her. Hadn’t for years. She was too valuable to drag under Lake Laogai without proof... but Yunxu was sure she was up to something.

Which, of course, she was.

I wish I were up to a bit more, Amaya thought, sitting by her pond to watch flashes of gold, crimson, and blue molly-guppies, flickering through light cast by one of Zuko’s lanterns.

Thoughtful, careful young man; he'd hedged iron and glass in with stones to be sure none would trip over, and refilled all the oil reservoirs before he left-

The pond rippled as if blown by wind, a thin sheet of water lapping over the edge. Upwards.

Lantern-light hissed out.

Have to get back, get away-

“Amaya....”

Blue robes trimmed with white fur, her mother held out a damp hand. And... there was something wrong about that. But she'd been so lonely, so long, and she'd done so many awful things to try and save those she could from the war....

“I forgive you,” whispered a voice of waves and water-weeds.

Yunxu never had a chance to scream.

Shirong stared at a Fire Nation wanted poster, and didn't know whether to laugh or cry.

Pohuai Stronghold, indeed.

The Army always kept the best intelligence for themselves, but a fair amount did eventually end up where a Dai Li could get to it. You had to know what rumors you might need to squash, after all. And which groups of refugees would be the most trouble.

As for the intelligence available on the stronghold and Taku.... Given the last herbalist hanging on up there had a habit of talking to her cat, anyone might be forgiven for thinking her tale of advising the Avatar to look for frozen frogs was - well. But when you put that together with reports of localized whirlwinds, Yu Yan mobilization under a recently-promoted Admiral Zhao, and the absolute chaos that had apparently broken out in the stronghold that night....

Plus, the wanted poster. One simply could not ignore the wanted poster. Fierce-tusked blue theater mask and all.

Spirits, no wonder Lee's paranoid. That's no small string of cash on his head.

And put together, the reports explained much more. That crushing sorrow and guilt, like a blanket of stones. The fierce determination to learn healing from Amaya first, when Lee was a fighter through and through....

He freed the Avatar. And how did the boy repay him? By slaughtering untold thousands of his countrymen.

Exact numbers were hard to come by, but reliable accounts placed the invasion fleet at hundreds of ships. Many of classes that would carry a hundred, even a thousand men. Wrapping his mind around the potential casualty count alone made Shirong shiver.

Even if Lee had abandoned the Fire Nation, the boy had a heart fierce as any waterbender's. Every death must have cut like a knife.

And he's probably convinced himself it's all his fault, Shirong thought bleakly. No wonder he doesn't want to trust anyone.

After all, legends said the Avatar was the defender of the world. If you couldn't trust him to do the right thing, who could you trust?

Except the Avatar doesn't defend your world. Not if you're Fire Nation.

Or so one Fire Nation petitioner had claimed, centuries ago, crying for justice against Kyoshi before the Earth King himself.

What was her name? Tama? Temun? Something odd....

He'd tracked down as much as he could of the original record, hungry to know if there was actually a reason behind a century of war against his people-

Temul. That was her name. A firebender.

A very odd firebender, from what he could cudgel out of memory. Who'd sworn the Avatar had wronged her people, bitterly, and that all the world would suffer for it.

The darkest day in Fire Nation history. I wish I knew what happened.

Professor Tingzhe Wen would know, probably. But speak face to face with a man he might one day have to disappear? No. Not if Shirong could avoid it.

Besides. I already know what I need to. The Avatar isn't always fair. Temul didn't even get a hearing.

And that was Kyoshi. A grown woman who knew that justice required consideration, as well as decisiveness, and that nothing in life was either fully good or evil.

This Avatar is twelve years old. And the people he trusts are barely older. Shirong shook his head. I don't like it.

I want him out of my city.

The agent sat up straight in his chair, the ramifications of that thought sinking in. The generals surely had a plan for the Avatar's power. Long Feng must have a plan, or he wouldn't order the bison confined-

But if the Avatar had his bison, he wouldn't have to be here. They could still plan. He could visit. Why keep the animal from him?

Shirong couldn't think of any good reason. But he could think of a reason. A horrible one.

Back the Avatar into a corner. Trap him, so you can aim that power at your enemies.

Like he was trapped at the North Pole.

No!

Hands clenched on paper, crinkling it; Shirong made himself let go, glad he never used his rock gloves to read. He could imagine the walls of this archive studded with stone from that sudden, soul-deep fury.

I am Dai Li. I've done horrible things to protect my city. I'll probably do a lot more. But this....

I am Dai Li, of the order formed to protect Ba Sing Se from its own spirits. By Avatar Kyoshi herself. And this horrible thing, I will not do.

Shirong had to take a moment just to breathe, shaken. He'd be out of step with his comrades. He'd be potentially disobeying Long Feng....

I don't know what effect that horror at the North Pole had on the spirits, and I don't want to find out here. Ba Sing Se doesn't deserve that. My people don't deserve that. Lee sure as hell doesn't deserve that.

And a twelve-year-old boy who happened to be the Avatar didn't deserve it either. Shirong had read reports on the Ba Sing Se Zoo incident. For all his awesome power, the Avatar was a child. An impulsive, happy, optimistic child.

It's wrong. If I'm right... what they're planning to do is just wrong.

Not to mention lethally short-sighted. Eventually that boy would grow up, and have all the power legend said Kyoshi and Roku had wielded. Did the Earth Kingdom really want someone that powerful knowing they'd been used as a weapon?

No. Oma and Shu, no.

I have to do something.

Do something? Do what? Go against Long Feng's direct orders? Not to mention the purely practical aspect of the number of fellow Dai Li who'd be between him and any attempt to free the bison. He was a reasonably skilled earthbender and agent. He was not the Blind Bandit.

I need help.

Almost against his will, Shirong glanced at the poster again.

There's a big difference between a fortress on a cliff and a labyrinth underground.

Still. Pohuai Stronghold. Who in the Army had ever broken in there?

He's fast, smart, and sneaky. He may have less than a month training his waterbending, but those moves he does know, he has cold. And he has years of training in firebending forms.

Most important of all... no one would see it coming.

Valid points, Shirong thought. But will he do it? He has no reason to love the Avatar.

But Lee did love his uncle. And cared about Amaya. Not to mention the numerous other people he'd apparently gotten mixed up with. The young man cared.

And he's practical. Even if he hates the Avatar, and I couldn't blame him if he did... he'll do what he believes is right.

Still. If Lee agreed, and that was an if, he'd need an earthbender's help to get in-

Running feet; Shirong had just enough time to stuff the poster out of sight before Quan hit the doorframe hard enough to shiver rocks.

"Our agents at the clinic missed their check-in," Quan said grimly.

Amaya.

“Perhaps we should just go home, nephew,” Iroh suggested, as they climbed the steps to Amaya’s clinic. “If she believed it was better for you not to be here....”

“She was going to do something she didn’t want to do, Uncle.” Zuko’s face was grim. “I’ve seen that before.”

And what that might be, Iroh feared to know. Especially if the Dai Li were involved. “Even so,” he said gravely, “she may not be pleased if we interfere.”

“I’m - not planning to interfere,” Zuko admitted quietly. “If she feels she has to - I know what that’s like.” He glanced at his uncle. “But I thought, if it’s over... we could be there. If she needs somebody.”

Iroh raised gray brows, and nodded. “That is very thoughtful, nephew. But let us be polite, as well. If she tells us she wishes us to go, we will-” He cut himself off, as Zuko held up a warning hand.

“What do you hear?” Zuko asked, half a whisper.

Focused, Iroh listened. People in the streets, shopkeepers calling their wares before closing for the night, the outraged squawks of an ostrich-horse a street away....

From the clinic, nothing.

The pair traded glances, and his nephew went through the door fast and hard.

Silence.

Iroh shut the door quietly behind them, and lit a flame in his palm for more light. “Only one lamp lit,” he observed, as they passed through the entryway into the main clinic. “It could not have happened too long after dark....”

The smell reached them then, and Iroh saw his nephew pale.

Seaweed. And blood. “Call a fire.”

“Uncle-”

“We will make explanations later,” Iroh said darkly. “If there is anyone still alive to explain to.”

There wasn’t.

One agent lay lifeless in a cold red pool just inside the screen to Amaya’s garden, throat ravaged as if by the Unagi’s teeth. Another had fallen face-first in the pool, drowned and gone when they turned him over. A third was all but entombed in ice against the wall where he’d tried to flee, hands raised before his face in futile defense-

Not futile, Iroh realized, as they came closer and Zuko swore under his breath. “He kept an airspace open. Quickly!”

Fire in their hands, breathing steam, they cracked the agent free. He fell as dead weight into their arms, pale as ice....

But Iroh had studied waterbenders, and taught his nephew well. A cold body might only seem dead.

Ear by the Dai Li's mouth, Iroh felt the faintest whisper of a breath. "Bring him inside. Build up the fire!"

Hot rocks wrapped in blankets around the man, they propped him by the stove and kept working. Heating water on top of the stove, Zuko wreathed his hands in flame and worked over icy skin. Iroh timed faint breaths, and blew out gentle steam so the agent could breathe in warmth as well.

"Bon," Zuko kept saying as he worked, "Bon, it's Lee. You're at the clinic. We found you. You're going to be all right, just hang on...."

Finally, the agent began to shiver.

Iroh glanced at his nephew, who nodded and released the fire back to the stove, wrapping his hands in hot water instead. "Agent Bon?" Iroh asked. "Can you hear us?"

"Father?" Bon whispered, teeth chattering. "No... can't be... you're dead...."

"Bon!" Zuko said sharply. "It's gone. I can't feel it anywhere. It's gone, and people are dead, and Amaya- Wake up!"

Bon's eyes snapped open. "...Lee?"

Iroh arched an eyebrow, intrigued. Earthbenders didn't usually respond to a firebender's force of will. "We have not found Healer Amaya."

"It took her. Through the water...."

As he'd feared. "Stay with him, while I get help," Iroh directed, rising.

"Not staying here," Bon gasped, trying to sit up before Zuko shoved him back down. "It killed Dai Li, can't let it get away-!"

"Stay. Down." An order, that crackled in the air as Zuko glared the agent into going limp. "You did your duty. You told us what we're up against. Now stay put, so Uncle can get help to keep you alive while we go kill this thing."

"Kill it?" Bon managed through shivers. "But - you're a waterbender...."

"I am." Zuko's gaze went to the lanterns. "Which is why it's never going to see this coming."

One remains who would challenge us.

Curled in endless cold, Amaya tried not to think. But the water and the power and the hunger were all, and she couldn't help but see green eyes under black hair; green that burned to gold....

That one. Hunger, and a chill contempt. Thief. Disrupter. Prey. Yes, we know him....

Thief? Zuko had never-

And she was breathing in storm, she was the storm, fixed on the fires of mortal lives on the frail metal vessel. Born of fire; born enemies. Too dangerous to approach in calmer seas; too dangerous to lure, almost always. Which would make their despair all the sweeter. She felt the lightning building... strike!

No!

Fire-in-flesh had seized the lightning; parried it, away and into the waves. The life dangling so temptingly from twisted metal was grabbed by other lives, hauled away from danger. Unfair, unfair; it hungered, they could not deny it....

But the storm was still strong, the metal hull damaged. The fire-lives would fall. They would. Curses breathed around the mortals, two above all, and Agni had no power here. And no other spirit would deny its feasting. The mortals' own hate and obsession would make them prey-

"Let him go. We need to get this ship to safety."

Impossible! That blood could not ignore its curse. It existed; that alone disrupted what-should-be. It could not deny destiny. It would fall, and be destroyed.

Yet the mortals gained the sunlight at the heart of the storm, and it was powerless.

You cannot rob me of my prey!

But they had. For a time. As another bright fire had, years ago and far away; gold and green and violet burning between water and delectable flesh. It could taste the sand of that warm-water shore, even now.

But that fire-life was well defended, and these more recent thieves had headed north, into waters too chill for comfort. And the hunger would not be sated by anything as petty as waiting. Death and disruption called; and here, the feeding had been good.

There was still need for caution, of course. The Bridge was near, and it was always wise to avoid such great power, no matter how young. The Bridge might not understand what belonged to it by right.

And anything it could take, belonged to it.

As you do. A susurrus of waves. He is the last? And he is coming to us.

Twice he escaped. Fire-born. Enemy. Thief. Once by fire. Once by sun.

The sun will not scorch again for hours. And as for fire....

Water crushed her, and she had no strength to weep.

Think, Zuko told himself. Don't jump in. Don't panic. Think. He tugged the reins of his hastily-borrowed ostrich-horse to aim for a distant stretch of sandy lakeshore between water and towering cliffs. Uncle was matching him pace for pace, still tching a bit about their mounts' hapless owner, who had not fully appreciated the seriousness of their request.

The nerve jabs would wear off. Eventually.

"The plan is clear?" Iroh called to him.

"Yes!" I hope. "Just tell me why this monster isn't going to do the smart thing, hide on the bottom of the lake, and laugh at us."

"Three reasons!" The retired general sounded grimly cheerful. "First, if it did that, we would have no chance to rescue Amaya. And that would simply not be fair."

"This isn't a spirit-tale, Uncle!" The hero doesn't always win. As if we were ever heroes.

“Is it not?”

“Better reason!”

“Young people.... Second - this is a kamuiy, not one of the great spirits. It is surely hungry, and cunning. But I would imagine it is not too bright.”

Okay, he could work with that. Though dumb opponents could be some of the most dangerous. You never knew what the idiots would do. “And third?”

“Well, I am certain that is more than enough....”

“Uncle!” Zuko cast him a brief glare. “We’re risking our lives. We might be risking the whole city! I need to know!”

Iroh gave him a look askance. “Nephew. I have great confidence in your ability to irritate anything.”

...Okay, maybe he didn’t need to know.

Oh hell, it’s a talent. Use it. Which was what their plan meant to do-

His mount shied, as earth erupted. “Stop right there!” an unfamiliar voice ordered.

Dai Li. Wonderful. Zuko halted his mount, searching under night-shadowed hats for any hint of a familiar face. “Agent Shirong! Amaya’s in the lake!”

“You’re sure of that, are you?” Shirong’s stance was subtle, outwardly relaxed, and unmistakable.

He thinks it got me again. Damn it, we don’t have time-!

“We are not,” Iroh stated, voice carrying through the night. “Agent Bon said it took her, and her body was not at the clinic. We hope she is there. And that it has not yet fed.”

“Bon?” the agent apparently in charge echoed darkly.

“Probably feels like he went for a swim at the North Pole, but he was lucid,” Zuko bit out, staring at calm, dark waters. “We left him with the Guard-”

Oh no.

“Down!”

A push froze the leading edge of the wave as it roared overhead, held back the bulk of the water long enough for everyone to bolt clear. But even that light touch of bending swamped him, cold and hunger and death pulling him under....

No.

I am Prince Zuko. Son of Ursa, and Fire Lord Ozai.

I’ve faced fire, and betrayal, and the Avatar himself.

Exile didn’t kill me. The North Pole didn’t kill me. Azula didn’t kill me.

One of us is going to die here. It’s not going to be me!

Night snapped back into focus, and Zuko bared his teeth at towering wet shadows. Pulled up a ball of water between his hands, flattening it between circling palms until it steamed with glints of green and gold. Swirled it into a globe again, and lashed out-

He lost the sphere as soon as it hit shadow-water, with a wrench like someone tearing away a fingernail. But that was fine. Better than fine. Because fire-laced water made it scream, and in the brief moment shadows cleared at the impact-

Amaya.

Suspended in water, limp; eyes open and aglow like nothing the Dai Li had ever seen before. He could tell that from the gasps, the scrambling huddle of fear behind him.

But I've seen it before. And I don't care.

Zuko smirked, and knew Shirong thought he was crazy. "Was that supposed to scare me?" he taunted surging black water. "You'll have to do better than that!"

Shadow-water roared, swirling into a scaled dragon-horse whose head lunged for him, fangs leading.

A duck, a roll, and he laughed in its face. "Too slow!"

Let's see just how mad I can get you.

"He's insane," Shirong said numbly, standing by Quan in terrified shock. The other two Dai Li had raised a low wall to break oncoming waves, and stood ready to bend it higher. If that would do any good. He'd read about haima-jiao, certainly; they all had. But the reality....

We've found it. Now what the hell do we do with it?

"No, only focused." Mushi seized both of them by the shoulders, just long enough for a determined shake. "He is buying you time. Think! It draws strength from the water, and from Amaya. How can we best weaken it?"

"How long can Lee even keep standing?" Shirong shot back. "It's pulling from the whole lake-"

"Lee is not drawing his water from the lake," Mushi said firmly. "Look!"

Mist, was Shirong's first thought. Followed hard by, Why is mist just there, near Lee's feet-?

Sweeping feet, shifting from stance to quick stance as Lee led the monster on a mad chase across the beach. Feet that circled, and whirled, as Lee spun himself back upright after a lash of water knocked him down by the sheer force of displaced air....

Firebending! Shirong realized. Those are firebending stances, the kind they use to gather energy to strike-

But Lee was pulling up water. Out of the shore itself.

Water from the shore is water of the shore, Shirong knew, heart racing. Not the lake. Not the land.

And shores were boundaries, in-between places, like the moments of dawn and dusk. Places spirits roamed freely; yet at the same time, places a human could fight a spirit, even one with the strength of a murdering sea.

Fight, yes, Shirong knew, still shivering. Win?

Mist spun into another small globe, glowed, flung-

An inhuman scream, and the haima-jiao lunged once more.

“So long as he is not bending the same water, it cannot seize him,” Mushi said fiercely. “You are earthbenders! Cut away its strength!”

Quan gave the gray-haired tea-maker a narrow look; then nodded, flinging a subtle gesture at Shirong before gathering the other two and arcing a long wall into the lake.

Gee, thanks, Shirong thought dryly, grabbing Mushi right back. “You couldn’t know we’d be here. You must have had another plan-”

“Ah, yes.” Reaching around, Mushi took a roll of pine-dark cloth and a capped skin off his shoulder. A full skin, that sloshed, and didn’t smell anything like water.

“...Remind me to never, ever get you mad at me,” Shirong said faintly.

Mushi’s smile was wry, and bittersweet. “Do you know spirit-mazes?”

Shirong nodded. That, and every other nasty spirit-trick he could hunt down in the archives, plus anything he could persuade out of people from beyond the Wall.

“Then let us give this creature a night it will never forget.”

Let me die.

She didn’t want to look. She didn’t want to see. She didn’t want to feel the cold, cruel pleasure of hunting Zuko across the shore with waves and water-whips and fangs-

“Amaya!”

No! She didn’t want to hear her student plead, she didn’t-

“Amaya, damn it, wake up! It’s lying to you!”

That... didn’t sound like pleading.

“It feels like it’s angry, but it’s not! Not like you and me. It’s just empty. A hole in the water. It eats and eats, but it can never fill that hole up. That’s why it hates us!

“It makes you feel empty. That’s how it uses you! It makes you alone, and scared, and lost. Makes you feel like you can’t get angry, like that’s giving it what it wants-”

A flicker of vision, as the strength of the lake seemed to shrink. Zuko dodged a spray of ice daggers, vanishing in a cloak of steam. Fire in water confounded the sense of fire-in-flesh; made her tormentor slow, like a lull in the storm.

“It’s lying.” Zuko’s voice was low and dangerous as he stalked out of the fog, glaring defiance into dripping fangs. “You think your tribe faces off things like this by community, by water. That’s what the other waterbenders thought! That’s why they died!”

No, get back, get away-! Helplessness washed over her, and she felt a contented snarl.

Thin mist blocked some of the next wave, but not all. Water yanked Zuko from his feet, fangs tore-Shredded brown cloth, as Zuko kicked free of his over-robe and rolled to his feet, dagger in hand. “You beat it because when you care about your family, you feel,” Zuko panted. “And feeling is fire, Amaya! Get angry!”

What-?

You are alone. Outcast from your tribe. Condemned by your own hands; who would take back one who has served their enemies? You are mine!

But she’d never done it to serve anyone. She’d done it because... because....

Huojin.

Just a little boy, lost and crying on the streets. An innocent young troublemaking scamp, like Jinhai was now, who’d done nothing to deserve the death hunting him.

I did it because I had to. Because he needed me. He needed someone, and I was there, and how could I call myself a healer if I let a child die when I could do something....

Loneliness pounded her like a tsunami, driving her down-

No.

No, I won’t let you.

I have a family. It’s not my tribe. It’s small and hidden and broken. But it doesn’t give up. Not now. Not ever.

You should have settled for me, haima-jiao! That’s my student you’re trying to kill. And you can’t have him!

A hiss of waves; a torrent of images, all the pain and aggravation and fear for the rest of her hidden folk Zuko had brought home to roost. Hate him! Hate, and destroy!

And it was all true - and all lies. No, Amaya thought, and felt shattered boundaries of herself draw together, hardened by growing anger. You hate us, because you envy us; because we are warm and breathing and alive, in a way you can never be. I could never hate Zuko. I am angry with him, for doing something so stupid and wonderful and brave....

And he’d done it for her. She knew that, clear as she could suddenly see the beach, the Dai Li raising walls to cut the strength of water, Mushi’s intent discussion with Shirong as they moved sand in subtle patterns. Surely they had a safer plan. Surely, they could have waited.

But Zuko had put himself on the line, here and now. To get her angry.

Give up, bastard, Amaya thought, focusing all her will on one hand. If she could win that back, even a twitch of her fingers.... You’re going to die!

Foolish little life. None here are strong enough to defeat me!

Water surged, and stone shattered.

No time to think. No time to ask if Mushi had a plan B. Only a moment to stomp and thrust-

Shirong felt something more solid than water hit his raised wall; Lee surfaced through the grasping waves, gasping for air.

Flinging his gloves, Shirong grabbed, and yanked.

“Owe you one,” Lee managed, dripping on sand as rock flew back to Shirong’s hands.

“We’ll settle up later,” Shirong said plainly. “Don’t drip on the lines.” More trenches in the beach than lines, but still....

Lee’s smirk would have looked right at home on a dillo-lion. “Uncle?”

“A few moments more,” the older man stated, digging and pouring. “Fortunately, it is distracted by breaking the walls-”

Ice slashed like razors, and Shirong knew it hadn’t been distracted enough.

Oh. Red, so red; why was everything red when the world was so cold? That’s going to hurt....

For some, war slows the world.

Iroh felt his pulse stretch into slow beats, as Zuko spun to their falling ally and renewed walls of stone ground glacier-slow out of the lake. He was closer to the shore than his nephew and Shirong, closer to danger....

Which was precisely where he wanted to be.

Wait.

Fangs lunged for him, slow as thread unraveling.

Wait.

A scaled foot of water drifted down, crossing sandy trenches-

Now!

A breath, and flames roared up from poured lamp oil, will pushing them ever higher. Just high enough to conceal the sphere of fire Iroh breathed and shaped around himself, stepping through stunned water until one hand touched chilled, struggling flesh-

He snapped open the firethorn robe, wrapping it about Amaya in one swift swirl. Breathed, and stepped....

Out of the water. Out of the maze. Fire still blazing behind them.

Old smoke, indeed.

Lost!

Flesh gone, waterbender gone, lake’s strength being sliced away by stone. It writhed in the maze of flames, bewildered. Prey... prey did not do this....

Prey.

One still touching water, touching its power; blood and fear and alone slinking through its defenses....

Mine.

“Zuko....”

Fire around his hands; Agni, let Uncle be distracting the others, there was no way he could explain this, he was too tired to use water and he couldn’t let Shirong die-

“Zuko.” His mother’s voice, warm and sweet as smoke-sugar. “Come home.”

No. You’re not real. Yet he couldn’t stop himself from rising, and walking toward her.

No! Damn it, you know it’s lying! Shirong is bleeding and you have to-

But it wasn’t just his mother, it was her and Azula; and his sister was smiling, glad to see him, and he wanted it so much, he would have given his heart if it had been real....

Fire is passion.

Love and rage and fire slammed home, steel sinking in to the hilt.

Never give up without a fight.

“You got him,” Shirong whispered, as the black jelly of a dying sea-kamuiy slid off white-hot steel. “Good job.”

We all did a good job, the agent knew, feeling the cold creep back in. He should care about that, but he was so tired....

Not a bad way to go. My city is safe. My people....

Weren’t safe. Not yet. He hadn’t told Lee, he had to tell Lee-

“Shirong.” An exhausted sob; Lee’s hands grabbed his, hot as embers. “Do you trust me?”

Silly question to ask a dying man. But he tried to nod.

“Don’t give up. Just- don’t give up....”

Darkness. And light. And something burning inside, he couldn’t bear it, he’d be nothing more than ash and smoke on the wind-

Don’t give up.

Like breaking through a crust of lava, and still somehow breathing. The fire was everywhere, burning....

Easing. Like banked coals, warming winter-chilled skin. Shirong took a soggy breath, coughed-

And kept breathing.

...Huh. Didn’t see that coming.

Daring, he opened his eyes. “You look like hell.”

“Thanks,” Lee muttered, ghost-pale and shaking. “Sorry about the reports.”

“Reports?” Shirong echoed, confused. But just for a moment. That’s right. I’m alive. Which means I have to write up what happened. Damn. “Are you trying to kill my will to live?”

Lee smirked at him. Turned a little, creaky as an old man, to look Quan in the eye. “Anybody else hurt? Please tell me there’s not....”

“Bumps and bruises. We’ll keep.” Quan crouched beside Shirong, face almost blank with amazement as he took in the healing scars raking the agent’s chest. “Damn. I was sure you were....” He whistled. “Healer Amaya’s a good teacher.”

“Yes, she- Master Amaya!” Lee tried to jump to his feet; staggered, would have fallen if Quan hadn’t caught him. “Uncle- Uncle?”

Eyeing the tea-maker whispering sweet nothings in the drenched healer’s ear - and her desperate clutch on his robes - Shirong raised an eyebrow.

“...That’s just not fair,” Lee managed.

“Indeed,” Shirong stated wryly. “The hero’s supposed to get the girl. You know, the handsome prince, or the injured, bleeding common bender who saved the day in the nick of time? It’s a fundamental law of the universe!”

Mushi lifted his head enough to smile at them, mysterious as a cat-owl. “And what makes you think the hero did not?”

Lee clapped a hand to his forehead.

Shirong snickered. And couldn’t stop. “Oh, Oma and Shu... don’t make me laugh, it hurts....”

But it was a good hurt. Pain meant he was alive.

We’re alive, and it’s dead... and I’ll be able to tell Lee about the bison. Soon.

Chapter 18

Dawn. Amaya could see it in the light filtering through the window-shades. Hear it, in the quiet grumble of Zuko getting breakfast started. Feel it, as Mushi yawned and stretched beside her, warm as the hot rocks wrapped in blankets on her other side.

“Good morning,” Mushi said politely, eyes sleepily half-open. “Are you warm enough?”

“If I were any warmer, I’d be in a sauna,” Amaya stated crisply. What was he up to? He’d always behaved like a perfect gentleman in the past, and she couldn’t have fallen through a winter-frozen lake last night-

Memory crashed like an ice shelf into the sea, and she shivered. No. No...

“It is over. Amaya, brave lady, it is over.” He caught her hands before she could push away, giving her an intent look. “You saved Agent Bon, you know.”

“I... no, I tried to kill him....”

“You sheathed him in ice,” Mushi said bluntly. “He held on long enough for us to revive him. So you did save him.”

“It’s not enough,” Amaya whispered. Yunxu, an agent whose name she’d never known... they were dead. Because she hadn’t been fast enough. Wise enough. Strong enough.

“It never is,” Mushi said quietly, sitting up. “Evil comes, and we do our best to defy it. But always, there is a loss.” He regarded her gravely. “That is the cost of courage. To face evil, because if you did not, more lives would be shattered. Courage scars us all, Amaya. My nephew’s is simply more visible than most.”

“I...” Amaya swallowed, and tried again. “I hurt inside.”

“I know.”

“I want to hurt something else,” she admitted, ashamed. “But it’s already dead, and... I know everyone was doing their best to find it, and...” Speak the truth. “Zuko fought it off!”

“My nephew is a firebender,” Mushi said bluntly. “He could raise fire in his very veins, to beat it back. And even so, he says it was too close. Sometimes all our training and power fails us.” He released her hands, and gestured toward the kitchen. “But when we have fallen, and the battle has passed... that is when we must cling most tightly to hope, and find the courage to reach out to our friends. For the truest will come to us, and help us stand again.”

He means it. Tears threatened; she’d been so cold and alone, and he was still that same sun-warm rock she could rely on, faithful and kind....

And still, there was that glint of mischief in green eyes, playful and not quite innocent. Amaya lifted her chin. “Get out there, and let a respectable lady dress in peace.”

Mushi snapped his fingers, obviously disappointed. Grinned at her, bowed, and departed.

“Reprobate,” she murmured, not unkindly.

It wasn’t the best breakfast she’d ever had, but it was warm, and filling; overall, much better than she'd expected. "Huojin wasn't sure either of you could cook," Amaya remarked. And wished she dared pound her head on the table. Not as rested as I thought.

Zuko snorted, humor dancing in his eyes. Mushi chuckled. "I did enjoy having a cook in the past," he admitted. "But after I came home from campaign once half-dead from bad food, my late wife insisted I learn, in self-defense. And so I later taught our son, and my nephew. She was a brave woman, my Natsu. Not everyone dares to unleash a proud soldier on a kitchen!"

Amaya had to smile, imagining that indignant young soldier. "I would have liked to have met her."

"Me, too," Zuko said softly. "If Mom had been there...."

Mushi rested a hand on his nephew's wrist. "Your mother was only a child then herself, and Shidan and Lady Kotone avoided the capital as much as they could. With good cause. Do not take guilt for what was. Focus on what is."

Words that cleansed and stung at once, like salt on wounds. Amaya sucked in a breath. "The children - down the stairs-"

"We didn't go down there." Zuko inhaled the rest of his breakfast, rinsing out his bowl in a hurry. "I'll go. Tell me what I'm looking for, are they going to be hurt?"

Amaya winced. "It's Jet."

"What?"

For once, Huojin heard Lee coming before he saw him.

"...Idiotic, obsessed, isn't going to take anything less than maiming as a hint...."

Wouldn't want to be on the other end of that, the Guard reflected. "Min again?" he asked, straightening from where he'd been officiously leaning against the wall beside the clinic door. "You're early." Dropping his voice as the young man neared, he nodded toward inside. "Is Amaya all right? Headquarters got orders to post a guard, but not go in...."

"She's shaken up. She's tough." Lee took a deep breath, and reached for the door. "It's going to be ugly."

What happened? Huojin wanted to ask. But bit his tongue. If Lee could have told him on the street, he would have. So he touched his sword and followed, instead.

Blood, and death. Faint. But you could taste it, if you knew the air.

"Huh," Lee muttered to himself. "They cleaned."

"Cleaned?" Huojin said uneasily, following Lee to a slight stain beside the screen to the garden. If that wasn't faint traces of blood spatter, he'd retire to carve wooden tops. "What happened?"

"You're not going to like it...."

You're right. I don't, Huojin decided, as they quickly searched the clinic's upper level while Lee recounted the mad events of last night. Spirits that could take over benders... brr.

And he just knew Lee had downplayed how much danger he'd been in. "I made it mad until it jumped into the maze." Sure. "But Amaya's alive?"

“She’ll be okay. She just needs time.” Lee smiled faintly. “Uncle’s taking her to work. Hot tea, friendly customers... a haima-jiao couldn’t get her there if it tried.”

“But it’s dead- right. For the shock.” Amaya’s mind might know it was dead. If this was anything like a more ordinary assault, her body and spirit would take a lot more convincing. “So what are we really looking for?” Given the Dai Li had apparently clung to their usual mysterious ways and tried to eliminate any sign that something had happened here.

“Something I don’t think I’ll find.” Lighting a lamp, Lee led the way belowground, and sighed.

Rounding the last corner of the stairs himself, Huojin regarded the empty room. “No one’s here.”

“Not anymore.” Lee shook his head. “Jet, Smellerbee, and Longshot. The Dai Li had them here for questioning.” He looked down, shoulders slumped. “I didn’t look down here last night. Neither of us did, we were trying to save Amaya...”

“Sometimes, things don’t work out,” Huojin admitted. “Lee. I know you’re used to being responsible for people. We feel that way in the Guard, too. But when your back’s against the wall and someone you rely on is in trouble... you do the best you can with what you know and where you are. You’re alive. Amaya’s alive. The haima-jiao isn’t going to kill anyone else.” He crossed his arms, and gave Lee a sidelong glance. “So chin up, take a deep breath, and keep moving. You pulled off a damn miracle last night. Stop whining because you’re not perfect.”

Lee gave him an angry look, that slowly melted into embarrassment. “Was I whining?”

Huojin lifted a hand, rubbed thumb and forefinger together. “Just a little.”

“Sorry.” Lee shrugged, still a little red. “I just... I feel bad about really only feeling upset because I’ll have to tell Amaya.”

“Yeah, well, good riddance,” Huojin said darkly. “I warned them. You warned them. Amaya warned them. And you warned them again. You can’t save all the idiots from themselves.” He shrugged, deliberately. “So you’re handling the clinic today?”

“At least the emergencies,” Lee nodded. “Closing early, though. Don’t want her to worry where I am after dark.”

“I’ll leave word at headquarters where to find you if we need you,” Huojin nodded. The Guard already had their apartment marked down, just in case.

“You can get a message to the Dai Li?”

“We can,” Huojin agreed warily.

“Good.” Looking a little more determined, Lee headed for the stairs. “I want to make sure Agent Shirong doesn’t slip through the cracks just because we all think he’s better.” He cast a faint smile over his shoulder. “And... do you know where in the market I can find some hickory wood, powdered sugar, and grape acid?”

“What for?” Huojin asked, beyond confused.

“You never had smoke-sugar when you were a kid?”

“Well... yeah, I think so, but... you know how to make it?”

“Sweet tooth,” Lee admitted shamelessly, grinning. “Mom showed me how a long time ago. Before... before a lot of things.” He shook off the gloom. “You want the recipe?”

Oh, did he ever.

“You work for that man?” Amaya shook her head as they walked back up to Mushi’s apartment through afternoon shadows.

“There is no shame in honest work,” her host proclaimed. “And tea lightens the cares of those who visit us. Though it never does seem to work on my nephew,” he mused.

“There’s only so much a warm drink can handle,” Amaya pointed out wryly. “How long do you intend to put me up when I have a perfectly good home to go to?” I hadn’t realized what a cheapskate Pao is. The small fees Zuko was entitled to as an apprentice were more important than she’d realized.

“Until you feel ready to face the violence that occurred within that home,” Mushi said plainly, opening their door and bowing her in. “Or at least so long as you are willing to allow us this kindness. It is what friends do for one another. And a small enough recompense for the harm we did you, unknowing.”

“Harm?” Amaya frowned as he closed and latched the door.

Mushi sighed, and gestured toward the table. “Tea?” he said hopefully.

She lifted a brow, still standing. “An explanation, first.”

He inclined his head; as you wish. “You told me it was dangerous for a young waterbender to live with so little family. I failed to consider it might be as perilous for you, even though you are well trained. And so I turned away your offer of family, without explanation.”

“You said it was dangerous,” Amaya pointed out.

“It is,” Mushi acknowledged. “But we nearly lost you. And that would have been... horrible to bear.” He sighed. “So. In trying to protect you, I did you harm. It seems a custom of my family.... I would mend that harm, in some small way. So that you may know what it is you risk now, rather than wait until we must flee Ba Sing Se for Jinhai’s sake, or our own.” He lowered his voice. “With the haima-jiao gone, we are no longer watched. It is safe to speak of such things. If you wish.”

Her breath caught. He was offering one of the things she valued most in the world: truth. And yet.... “Don’t. Don’t tell me, just because you feel you’ve wronged me. You haven’t.”

“It is more than that,” Mushi said firmly. “You are dear to me, Lady Amaya. Were I another man, I would have hopes... but I would, at least, have no lies between us. That much comfort, I would claim.” He drew a breath, and met her gaze. “I am Iroh. Son of Fire Lady Ilah, and Fire Lord Azulon.”

For a long moment, the words didn’t make sense. Couldn’t make sense. Azulon; son of Sozin, the Fire Lord who’d begun a century of war. Azulon, the name she and everyone she knew had grown up cursing for his failed assault on the North Pole, and his merciless decimation of the Southern Water Tribe. And Iroh was another name to conjure nightmares. Crown prince, before Ozai took the throne; ruthless general and firebender beyond compare, who had conquered his way across half the Earth Kingdom and held Ba Sing Se under siege for six hundred days.

The Dragon of the West.

“You can’t be,” Amaya whispered, gaze sweeping frantically across the kind, gentle man in Earth Kingdom green. Warm hands, a shoulder to lean on; gentle correction when his nephew needed it most....

Zuko. If his brother is Zuko’s father, then-

Her mind shied from the thought. “You’re a tea-maker. You can’t be... General Iroh.”

“Retired,” Iroh said gently. And smiled, sadly. “I have always taken comfort in tea.”

“You can’t be,” Amaya insisted, panic and hurt and anger mixing together like foaming wine. “Not Sozin’s blood, not-” Words failed her.

“The source of all evil in the world?” Iroh said wryly. “I have heard us called that before. And yes. Sozin was evil. Not because he meant to be. Because he believed that he alone knew how to remake the world into perfection, and set out to do so - even if he must murder an entire race.” Iroh sighed. “I did not realize that was evil. Not when I knew him, when I was still a young man. To me he was Grandfather, and Fire Lord; the ultimate power in our land. If he had started a war, he must be in the right.” He shook his head, looking into memory. “It was only with time, and great pain, that I learned how wrong he was. That the beauty, the very hope of the world lies in the fact that it is not perfect, and we must find ways to cherish what is good in it despite that. For reshape the world as we will, none of us is perfect; and if we cannot love one who is flawed, love itself will die. As my brother’s died, for all of us. I was too kind. Ursa was too gentle. Zuko... Zuko was too weak, with no desire for power. We were human, and so we failed my brother.”

They failed Fire Lord Ozai. And hadn’t she hoped for that? That all of the Fire Nation would fail, and the war finally be over? And yet.... “You are the war,” Amaya whispered brokenly.

“I was,” Iroh admitted, unflinching. “But when we broke the Outer Wall, and invaded, I lost - much. Good men. Far too many good men. Including my son, Lu Ten. I was... horrified. Near mad with grief. He was all I had left. Or so I thought. But I was also the officer in command, the Dragon of the West. I had to think of my men, and of the Fire Nation. Terrain, numbers, morale; the earthbenders’ advantage was too great to overcome without losses that would devastate my troops. Only slaughter or treachery would bring Ba Sing Se down, and I did not wish either. So I ordered the siege ended, our troops withdrawn. Against all orders Azulon had given.” He hesitated. “I did not expect to survive that order.”

A firebender, breaking loyalty.... Amaya shivered.

“Once I recovered, I expected to be executed for treason. But events spared me. Now... now I would end the war, if I could. But more than that, I wish the boy I have raised as a son to survive.” Iroh spread empty hands. “Now you know the truth of us, and what you risk by allying with my brother’s outcast kin. And you must decide if we are worth it.”

“You,” Amaya breathed, voice gradually rising, “you reckless, impossible - Tui and La, he is definitely your nephew, you’re both utterly insane!”

It took at least five minutes of yelling for her to figure out Iroh had preemptively vaporized all the water in the apartment.

But that was all right. Zuko could draw water out of wet sand - and where, exactly, did his uncle think he’d learned that little trick?

Air was harder to draw from than a lake-damp shore. But not by much.

Over the course of sixteen years, especially over the past few months, Zuko had cultivated an intuitive sense for when Things Were About To Blow Up.

It was the little details, mostly. A certain glint in Azula's eye. A scuff of a boot too close in an alley. A tremble of earth that ought to be solid.

And sometimes, it was not so little things. Zhao. The hunch of the Avatar's shoulders, before he turned with mad, glowing eyes. Or, like now, a half-dozen fellow dwellers on this floor at the far end of the corridor from Uncle's apartment, splitting upset looks between each other and the faint sounds of Amaya yelling.

"You're here?" The landlord pushed his way to the front, glaring at Zuko. "You're not supposed to be here! Water's frozen all over the place! How can it be freezing in here when you just got here?"

"Because I didn't do it?" Zuko glared back. "I'm not the only waterbender in the city."

"Well, you're the one who lives in this building!" The landlord pointed an imperious finger. "Fix this!"

I am not going to feed him his finger.

Lee's impulse, born of the tribes' historical feuds; more than a little startling, when he was far more used to the glass-razor insults or explosive lethal violence of Fire Nation politics.

Make an enemy maim himself. Yeah, that's Water Tribe.

Well. He was not going to do that, no matter how tempting. But he couldn't let this pass, either. Lee was Amaya's apprentice. What he did reflected on her - and not even the Dai Li ordered Amaya around.

Zuko drew himself up to his full height, and stared the landlord straight in the eye. Not overtly threatening. Not yet.

Beads of sweat broke out on the man's forehead, and he blinked first. "...Please?"

"Give me some time." Warily, Zuko approached his own door. Knocked, and opened it. "Master Amaya? There's ice all through the building..."

The room wasn't quite as much of a wreck as he'd feared. Chairs were upended. Amaya was panting hoarsely, stance firm as a winter-locked lake. Ice. Uncle in the middle of the ice. Which made him want to throw weeks of caution to the wind and do something-

But Uncle was only in ice up to his neck. Meaning he was frozen because he wanted to be frozen.

Okay, there is something I can do. "What do you want me to do with the witnesses?" Zuko deadpanned.

Amaya flushed, mortified, seeing curious faces edge near in the hall. Uncle Iroh tried not to snicker. Much.

"We'll straighten this out," Zuko said to the hallway at large, and firmly closed the door. Waited a minute, and turned around.

Nobody's dead. Good.

Uncle was still a bit damp, and Master Amaya more than a little pink. And neither of them were quite looking at each other. In a way that raised the hairs on the back of Zuko's neck.

No, no, not good, what do I do, where do I hide, should have kept quiet, they know I'm here-

Panic and exhaustion and two people he cared about were fighting, which meant it was his fault, again....

Thank Agni for windows.

"He won't come down?"

"Not yet, no," Iroh sighed, picking up the last of the groceries Zuko had dropped in his sudden flight. Raising a brow at some of what he'd found. So you meant for us to celebrate. It appears I have unfortunate timing.

"He's a teenage boy, who hasn't had supper," Amaya said confidently. "He will." Gave Iroh a second look at his silence. "Won't he?"

"He is quite capable of remaining up there for days, only venturing down to carry out his duties as he has given word to do," Iroh said unhappily. Caught her frown, and sighed. "It is not defiance, I think...."

Comprehension dawned, and Amaya winced. "His parents fought."

"Not at first," Iroh clarified. "But as my nephew passed four - yes. Often." He hesitated. "You have seen this before?"

"More than I like to think," Amaya admitted. "And it is defiance. Of a sort. You can hurt each other, you can scare me to death, but you can't make me watch." She sighed herself. "Parents can't hurt what they can't catch. I would say Lee's been teaching himself not to get caught for a very long time."

It cut to the bone. "I should have seen--"

"Children are good at hiding things. They want their parents to be all right. No matter what." She touched his shoulder. "It's odd, but... this almost tells me more about the war than anything else."

Iroh raised a curious brow.

"Sozin destroyed an entire nation to shape the world the way he wanted it," Amaya said quietly. "How much more harm did he do to his own people?"

"I have made my own choices to fight, and to stop," Iroh said plainly. "As must we all. Though I have hopes that our plan will show our people another way forward...." He felt a flicker of fire, and breathed a quiet sigh of relief. "I apologize, nephew."

"Uncle." Zuko slipped back in through the window, still wary. "You don't... I just... I should have known it... wasn't what I thought."

"How?" Amaya said practically. "From what your uncle and Huojin have told me, you've never lived around people who just have normal arguments."

“...No. Not really.” Zuko looked between them both, tension easing a little. “It is- was it something I did?”

“No,” Iroh said firmly, heartened. Courage in battle, Zuko had in plenty. Courage to face the ghosts of his past, and come back... his nephew was healing. “It was merely between us. Explanations, long overdue.” He gripped Zuko’s shoulder lightly. “Come. Dinner; and I see you have the makings of smoke-sugar. A fine treat.”

“Smoke-sugar?” Amaya asked, curious.

“After dinner,” Iroh assured her. “My nephew has a light touch with the bubbles.”

“Bubbles?”

Iroh grinned at her.

And smiled again later, enjoying the warmth of company as Amaya crunched into her first translucent bubble of blown sugar, filled with savory gray hickory smoke.

For life is sweet, and fragile, and always spiced with surprise, Iroh thought, enjoying his own silvery-gray globes. Especially for children of fire.

He waited until Zuko was about to bite into his third to deadpan, “She knows who we are.”

Crunch.

Choking on inhaled smoke, Zuko gave him a glare that should have set ice on fire.

“It explains a great deal,” Amaya noted gently. “I couldn’t understand why you were both so sure the Fire Nation’s time was nearing an end.” She laid her hand on the table near Zuko’s, almost touching. “But if the crown prince is a waterbender...”

Zuko looked down, and swallowed. “The Fire Lord is cruel.” A breath. “But Azula... my sister is insane.” He glanced up at Amaya, green eyes pleading. “If we can do this, if we can show you can live without following the Fire Lord - there are great names who won’t pledge loyalty to her. And if they can do that, if they can look after their people and get them out of the war.... If the Avatar’s supposed to be about balance, then he can’t destroy all of the Fire Nation. It’d be tactically sound for him to spare the noncombatants. It’d be the smart thing to do.”

“Unfortunately, the Avatar is twelve, and an airbender devoted to peace,” Iroh said gravely. “So we do not know if he will find wisdom in time, or listen to those who know war. We can only hope, and prepare.”

“I can see how that would work for the future,” Amaya allowed. “But here and now-”

“You can’t give a traitor orders,” Zuko said harshly. “I gave my word to capture the Avatar. But he’s not here.” He took a deep breath. “I don’t know, Master Amaya. I don’t know. I’m here. My people are here. I’m going to do everything I can. But when I make plans... things happen. Things go wrong. Always. So I’m just going to try. As long as I can.”

“Which is all anyone can ask,” Iroh said firmly. “Do not dwell on it, nephew. We have all had very trying days. I am certain all will look brighter, once we have had some rest.”

“I know I’ll feel more at ease when I’ve had a chance to check Shirong for myself,” Amaya said gravely. “If he’ll allow me.”

"He knows it wasn't your fault," Zuko said soberly.

She arched a skeptical brow. "As you do about the Avatar?"

"Oh, no," Iroh stepped in, before blood could be drawn. "I saw the boy let the Ocean take him. That was definitely Avatar Aang's fault." He *hmp*ed. "One would think a bender trained under Monk Gyatso, one of the most legendary airbending masters, would have been more wary of the spirits."

"He probably thought he could make friends with it," Zuko griped. "How do you know that about Gyatso? I've never heard anything about legendary airbending masters."

"There are sources of information the Fire Lord would not approve of," Iroh said practically. "Once I had a name, I could make inquiries. None of which yielded information that would have helped in our chase," he added at Zuko's dark look. "But I was curious. Especially when I found he counted Avatar Roku among his truest friends."

"Can you tell me about him?" Zuko didn't squirm under his gaze, though he did redden. "He thought I was someone else. I just want to know who."

Iroh hid a chuckle. "Ah. Well, if I were to guess.... It is likely he thought you were your mother's grandfather." He shrugged. "The records I have seen say nothing of Kuzon knowing Aang, but there is a mention of Gyatso."

"Being a spirit must give you lousy eyesight," Zuko grumbled. "Do I look a century old?" Glancing at Amaya, he tensed, and made himself relax. "So... you look like you need to talk a little more, so... just call me off the roof when you're done."

That swiftly, he was gone again.

Iroh raised a brow at the healer.

"You're hiding something," she said levelly.

"A suspicion, only," he admitted. "I cannot see that it would make any difference--"

"Iroh."

Ah, how sweet to hear his real name from such a vision of beauty and courage... er. Was that a snowball in her hands? "I do not think it would help my nephew to know," Iroh answered, sensing for fire to be certain that nephew was out of earshot. "I have no proof. And I can think of none that would prove such wild fancies, truly."

"Tell me."

Iroh sighed. "When Zuko was in the spirit world, he looked for Kuzon for aid. A wise move; they were kin, even though they had never met, for Kuzon died before my nephew was born. And I later learned it was not a natural death, though he was ninety-eight; he was a strong firebender, and I would not have been surprised if he had reached Sozin's age. But he was on Azulon's list." Iroh paused. "Zuko looked, but he did not find. And it has been my experience that spirits know precisely whom they are speaking to."

Amaya let her snowball melt back into her cup. "...I can see why you don't want to tell him."

"Do you?" Iroh asked quietly. "My nephew has been so lonely, so full of pain. Shall I tell him that once he had family who loved him truly, and joy, and a life of peace? Shall I tell him that the Avatar was granted Gyatso as friend and mentor in two lives, yet the spirit who was once Aang's friend is now counted among his enemies?" He shook his head. "My nephew has reason enough to resent fate's blows. There is no need to add more."

Amaya nodded. "Will you ever tell him?"

"When the time is right." When Zuko knew enough of the White Lotus to know why they existed. And why they had not acted before.

Another, more deliberate nod. "Are you hiding anything else?"

"Much," Iroh answered honestly. "But nothing else that bears on here and now."

"So you say." Standing, Amaya folded her arms, and gave him a measuring look. "You don't have enough family. One nephew can't keep you honest."

Iroh kept a curious look on his face as he tried to decipher that inscrutable look. "I have been hoping he would find a nice girl, but there was Jet's interference to consider, and we have been very busy...."

"He's not the one who needs a nice girl." Blue eyes danced. "Though I don't think I've been nice for a few decades."

Slowly, Iroh smiled.

He did remember to tell Zuko it was safe to come back down. Later.

Chapter 19

Chapter Notes

Again, don't own episode dialogue, especially from "Lake Laogai."

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Warm, Shirong thought drowsily, curled on rocks in the Dai Li's borrowed palace garden. Tugged his hat a bit lower, eyes still shut; no point getting burned if he fell asleep out here. Which he might. Like most spirits of malice, the haima-jiao hadn't just wounded his body. His chi was thin, depleted; he didn't feel up to much beyond flicking a pebble, even resting directly on nurturing earth. Sunlight seemed to help, sinking into his veins like a blessing, but when he thought of what he meant to ask of Lee....

Stay calm, and rest, Shirong advised himself, feeling familiar footsteps on the earth. Ask him, and let him think. He's creative. Don't count it a lost cause just because you won't be in shape to help.

"I didn't think anybody could make rocks look comfortable," Lee said wryly.

Shirong cracked an eye open to blink at the healers, shifting a shoulder in an abbreviated shrug. "Earth helps us heal." He glanced at Amaya directly. "Are you well? Lee was shaken up, and it barely touched his spirit; malicious kamuï can make the strongest of us feel as though we've struggled free of a midden."

"I'm healing," Amaya said quietly. "May I?"

"Just don't ask me to look," Shirong stated, lifting clear the top layer of his robe. "I'm still not sure I want to know how close it was."

"I can see why." Water-wrapped hands smoothed coolness over his skin, soothing small aches. "Hmm."

From another healer, that would have worried him. But Amaya had a good heart. She wouldn't have sounded thoughtful if there were any danger. "What?"

She withdrew her hands and eyed her apprentice. Who swallowed, but didn't back down. "It froze the life out of him," Lee said plainly. "I just... tried to fix it."

"I think you overdid it," Amaya murmured.

"Overdid what?" Shirong asked pointedly.

Amaya glanced about the garden, and raised a brow in silent question.

"We're alone. Though Quan will be by later," Shirong answered. That hadn't been hard to arrange. Fortunately. Everyone knew Amaya would never betray a patient.

"Lee used a technique I reserve for emergencies," Amaya said simply. "It's dangerous. And even when it succeeds, which it did, it disturbs the patient's chi for several days." She glanced skyward. "You were fighting water and darkness. Until it settles, your chi will be seeking light and fire." She frowned slightly, then shook it off. "I would say this is the best prescription. Rest, stone, and sunlight." She gave Lee a serious look. "Try not to do that again soon."

The young man nodded, though he did glance wryly toward the Inner Wall. East, toward Lake Laogai.

Right. There's a limit to the promises you can keep when the spirits come knocking, Shirong reflected. And on that note.... "Could I speak with Lee in private?"

Blue eyes narrowed. "If this is about trying to recruit a boy I haven't even finished training yet--"

"It's not," Shirong said hastily, as Lee looked indignant. "It's... personal." To me, at least. Though Long Feng won't see it that way.

I am a Dai Li agent of Ba Sing Se. My city needs me to act. No matter what our leader orders.

It still felt like stepping off a cliff.

Breathe. Act calm. The less people who know, the better chance Lee will have.

If Lee chose to help.

Oma and Shu, please let him. I can't do this on my own.

So he was going to enlist a teenage boy. Wonderful. Too bad he couldn't blame this on a concussion.

The Avatar's teachers are even younger. And Lee's got sense. When he has a chance to think.

Which, oddly enough, reminded him of Temul again. The record had been blisteringly clear on the firebender's tendency to open mouth and insert foot. But there was something more....

He set it aside; Amaya was making her way out of the garden and Lee was frowning at him. Shirong took a reluctant breath, and beckoned him closer. "I need your help."

Lee raked him with a checking-you-for-missing-limbs look he must have picked up from his teacher, and raised that lone brow. "A kamuï?"

"Not... exactly." Shirong sighed. This is harder than I thought. "Your uncle asked if there might be a reason the haima-jiao was in the lake. There is." He met fiery green squarely. "The Avatar's bison is under Lake Laogai."

Lee froze. Shirong could see panic trying to clench every muscle in the young man's body, seeking to drive him into flight. But Lee held still, breathing ragged, forcing himself to think. "Why... how... why tell me?"

"The Blue Spirit helped the Avatar once," Shirong said levelly. "I grant you, after what happened at the North Pole, he might want to chain the Avatar to a rock and throw him off a pier. But I hope that the man wanted for raiding Pohuai Stronghold might take pity on the citizens of Ba Sing Se. They don't deserve another haima-jiao."

"I don't... understand," Lee got out. "It's an animal. It's smart, but...."

Gently. He's frightened. And angry. I can't blame him. "If the writings about Avatar Kyoshi are right, it's not just an animal," Shirong told him. "It's the Avatar's animal guide. They're connected. Spiritually. And when they're separated--"

"The spirits get angry," Lee managed, barely above a whisper. "Oh, Agni."

Shirong let out a relieved breath. He's holding it together. Oma and Shu, that kid is tough. "I'm afraid it may be worse than that."

"...Of course it is," Lee ground out. Sat down on the grass, head lowered, forcing himself through a quick meditation. Let out a sigh, and nodded. "So what's the bad news?"

"I found a report from General Fong about the Avatar State," Shirong said carefully. Found wasn't exactly accurate; it had landed on him yesterday, while he'd been on light duty sorting paperwork. He'd had a dizzy spell and staggered one way, an officious clerk had jerked another - and an entire shelf had collapsed on top of them. Onlookers had had to dig them both out of the scrolls, and he hadn't even realized he'd carried one off until later. He probably should have returned it, but he'd been sore and bored....

He hadn't been bored since. Terrified, yes. Not bored.

"He noted," Shirong went on, still careful as picking his way across a slope of loose scree, "that you could successfully induce this state by threatening something the Avatar cares about."

Lee went white. "Is he insane?"

"If he is," oh, spirits, no, "I fear the Grand Secretariat may have joined him." Shirong wet his lips. "I can't let this happen to my city. I meant to do... something, but-"

"You'd get skewered before you got near Appa." Lee's voice was grim, green eyes glittering. "Don't. You're too hurt to get away clean, and this is going to have to work right the first time." He blinked, then buried his head in his hands as his own words sank in. "Oh, hell...."

Hope stole Shirong's breath. "You don't even have the floorplan!"

"I didn't know the North Pole's, either." Lee lifted his head, smile wry. "At least there won't be a blizzard."

"You broke into the...." Shirong knuckled his brow, trying to ward off a headache. "One of these days, we need to have a long talk."

Lee smirked; then shivered, looking into memory. "Fong's crazy. The avatar looks like a twelve-year-old kid. Peaceful. Harmless. But when he's... like that... Aang's not there anymore. It's just the Avatar, and the elements. And they're angry at you. They're angry at everything."

"You are going to do it." Shirong shook his head, trying to sort out the morass of relief and gratitude and sudden, sharp worry. "I thought, after what you'd seen...."

"The last thing I want to do is help Aang," Lee grated out. Clenched his fists; breathed out, and deliberately straightened his fingers. "Just so you know, their plan won't work. Admiral Zhao was arrogant and overconfident, and he never saw the Ocean coming until it was too late. But Zhao's not out there. Azula is. She's a military genius. And she's read the reports." Lee smirked, cold and bitter. "There's a reason the Fire Lord put her on his trail after Zhao failed. If anyone can figure out how to kill an Avatar, she can."

Spirits, Shirong thought, shaken. He'd never even considered that. Just how high up was his uncle-no. Don't ask. Yet. "Thank you."

"Don't." Lee's voice was hard. "What you're asking has a cost."

Damn. Well. He'd done terrible things to save his city in the past, what was one more-?

"Tell them I'm not suitable as a recruit."

Shirong blinked, not sure if he should believe his own ears. "What?"

"I'm going to be acting against the Dai Li. You could never be sure I wouldn't do that again."
Lee's eyes were hard as jade. "I lost my honor a long time ago. I won't take yours down with it."

For a long moment, words failed the agent. "...I never believed in the Seven Principles before."

"You know the principles?" Lee asked warily.

"Avatar Kyoshi wrote them down, while she was learning firebending," Shirong explained. Among other things. "I thought the Fire Nation she knew was gone. Drowned in a wave of blood." He smiled wryly. "But you're not all gone, are you? Just scattered. Living by your wits." And your honor. "Though I suppose even wits have their limit. Tell your uncle everyone is convinced Jet was crazy, and I'm fairly sure no one else had time to notice the flames were too high, but he should be careful heating up steel. I didn't see him ignite your dagger, and if anyone else had there would have already been an arrest... but tell him to stay low for a while. I'd miss his tea."

"...My uncle's not a firebender."

"You," Shirong said dryly, "are a terrible liar." He chuckled softly. "I've seen you both move, and I've seen you both fight. What you didn't pick up from Amaya, you definitely learned from him." He shrugged, deliberately casual. "Though I've never heard of any bender taking the time to train someone who can't touch their element...."

"He's Uncle," Lee said quietly. "He knows I've got a lousy temper. And awful luck. He tried to train me to stay alive." The waterbender glanced aside. "I wasn't always a good student." Green eyes looked back up, hard. "So what are you going to do?"

"Do about what?" Shirong said practically. "Amaya saved my life. She's saved a lot of lives, no few of them my comrades. If it weren't for your uncle, we'd have lost her. All I intend to do is lie here in the sun and forget that night ever happened. Near-death memories can be very unclear. Or so I've heard." He leaned back against the rocks. "No, I think I'll just rest here and tell you about... well, someplace you'll never see. Since you've declined to be recruited."

Taut as a bowstring, Lee listened.

"Temul," Shirong said, surprised; the fact he'd been searching for finally surfacing from memory with that intent look from Lee. "Ask your uncle about Temul. She was a firebender a few centuries back... I think she tried something the opposite of what you've done, adapting waterbending moves to fire." Which hadn't made Avatar Kyoshi happy at all, if he recalled correctly. She'd kept the nations separate with a granite glove behind a golden war fan, and what she would have said about a mixed-blood waterbender probably couldn't be repeated in polite company. "If he knows anything, it might help."

Lee nodded once, obviously committing the name to memory. "The lake?"

"Ah, yes. Well, that's going to be tricky...."

The bison's here. The bison's here.

Oh Agni, what do I do?

Dimly Zuko recalled that Amaya had left him to head for the clinic, sending him on his way to teach Jinhai. He also remembered glaring at a scraggly-headed man who'd tried to pick his belt pouch, and assisting another overeager hand into a wall, before he'd reclaimed enough common sense to get off the streets and up onto the roofs.

No people up here. No conflicting voices to have to sort through for meaning when the whole world wanted to blur into a hiss of noise. Just the wind, and the sounds of the city.

Better.

Breathe. In and out.

You're panicking.

Well, yes. The impulse to either gibber or beat somebody else's brains against the wall was a good clue. It wasn't fair, it just wasn't fair; where the bison was the Avatar couldn't be far away, and the plan wasn't ready, he hadn't had enough time-!

You can't panic here.

Basics. When the world fell apart, stick to basics. He had new and unexpected intelligence on an opponent and target, and he was not reacting in a combat-ready manner.

Strategic withdrawal. Find someplace secure, and reexamine your information.

Meaning decide on a location, and move. Movement would help; movement always helped. Katas, running, fighting. He moved better than he could put things into words. Always.

So move. But move where?

Clinic, or Uncle? The clinic would be safe, but Amaya had no experience with infiltration. She'd probably try to talk him out of this. And he couldn't walk away. His word depended on it. The whole city might depend on it.

Uncle.

A better tactical choice, given Iroh's experience with combat, strategy, and the Avatar. But it was the middle of the day, and dragging Uncle away from work might draw all kinds of unpleasant attention. Just because the haima-jiao was dead didn't mean they might not still be watched. Like Jinhai might be-

I have a pattern. The Dai Li know that. If I don't show up at the Wen house - they'll know something is wrong.

And broken patterns would lead to curiosity about why they'd been broken, and if he did get Appa loose-

They could trace it back to Shirong.

Which would be bad. Not just for the agent. If they took him, they'd question him - and Shirong didn't have the defenses Amaya had given Lee.

I've got to make things look normal.

Jinhai's house, then.

Move. Just get there. Get somewhere safe.

Work out what to do after.

A glance pinned down where he was. Forcing himself into the narrow focus of where am I, where am I going, Zuko settled into a roof-eating lope. And tried not to think.

The Dai Li would have seen him come by way of the rooftops before. This wouldn't look suspicious. He hoped.

I can't take the streets right now. I'll break something. Or somebody.

Which would upset Uncle and Amaya, spirits, what was he going to tell them....

Don't think about it.

Alleys and roofs and balconies, and finally he dropped into a street near the Wen's to at least look semi-respectable entering the house....

One step at a time.

"Lee!" Suyin's face was bright; sobered, seeing him. "Is something wrong?"

"I've had better days," Zuko said dryly. Looked past her to Jinhai. "We should stick to simple moves today. What we got Amaya out of... it was close. Too close."

"What did happen?" Meixiang stepped out of the kitchen, giving him a searching look. "You look like you've been raked over shattered ice."

"Close. Almost drowned," Zuko admitted. "There was a man-eating kamiuy. We stopped it." He held up a hand before they could speak. "If you want details, I'll tell you after practice. If I think about it before... it was too close."

Falling. Dodging. Strikes, with foot or fist or bladed hand. He walked them through it all, warmed by how much better they'd gotten in just a few weeks.

I may never teach them again.

No. No, damn it! My people need me. They need me here!

There had to be a way.

Jinhai was panting, glad to flop down in the garden by the time Zuko called a halt. Suyin was just as sweaty, but breathed easier, ducking inside to get her mother with a look of unbridled curiosity.

Stepping out, Meixiang glanced over her sweating children, and gave him a measuring look. "You stopped it?"

"I helped," Zuko stated. And gave them a brief account of that awful night, sparing the goriest details. But not the key facts: the haima-jiao had killed other waterbenders, and tried to do worse to Amaya. "Uncle says it's a spirit of warm oceans; deserts of the sea," Zuko finished. "I wonder if that's why the Water Tribes stay near the poles." I wonder why something like that never went after Katara; she's been around enough bloodshed to draw them....

Oh. Idiot. She's always with the Avatar. The haima-jiao might not have been the brightest spirit on the block, but I doubt any of them are that stupid.

"She lost all her people?" Suyin sniffled, and swiped at her eyes. "That's awful."

"You're her people too, you know," Zuko told her. "She cares about you. A lot."

"I know, but... do you think it would help if we told her about the Southern Water Tribe boy here?"

No. It can't be.

The Avatar's bison was here. It damn well could be. "What Southern Water Tribe boy?" Zuko ground out.

Jinhai scrunched into his mother's arms, wide-eyed; even Suyin paled. "He- Jia said his name was Sokka...."

Words vanished in a white hiss of fury.

Don't move. Don't do anything.

Head down, fists clenched on his green robe, Zuko breathed. And forced himself to stay still. Move, and the simmering cauldron of rage and fear and frustration would tip over, spilling into a wave of fire that would reach out and destroy....

These are your allies. These are your people. Don't move.

"...Back up... tell me where... it's all right, sometimes the great names...."

Meixiang's voice. Worried, but not frightened. Thank Agni, not frightened.

Don't give me a target. Please. I'm so angry....

And afraid. So desperately afraid. Everything he'd built, everything he'd tried to plan - it was all coming apart, like folded paper cast into flames.

"...My lord. Can you hear me yet? My lord, my blade is yours, against your enemies...."

She needs me. Zuko forced himself to look up, dragging back words and meaning to human voices.

Meixiang was kneeling in front of him, dagger casting back the sun by her side.

"Don't... do that," Zuko rasped, trying to slow his racing heart. "I'm not your lord."

"Yes," Meixiang said simply. "You are." But she looked up, searching his face with concern. And relief. "You've banked the fury? You can understand my words?"

Zuko flinched. "I- how did you-?"

"It happens to some firebenders." Tension eased from Meixiang's frame. "I knew one, years ago... my grandfather called it dragon's rage. Dragons aren't hatched with the skill to speak; not like humans are. When fury takes them, they can lose the art of it, and words seem but whistles in the wind. So." A graceful gesture toward herself, kneeling. "You are lord here, and you know I follow. This calms the dragon in the blood, and lets you reclaim human words." At his look of confusion, she frowned. "Hasn't your uncle told you this?"

"This... doesn't happen to my uncle." Dragon's blood? He'd heard the legends, like everyone else. But she can't be serious.

"But I thought - your family's line-" Meixiang closed her mouth, wincing.

"What do you know about my family?" Zuko demanded.

"I... know you are great names." Meixiang looked troubled. "But if it isn't from your uncle's side, then-" Green eyes widened. "Oh. You said your mother was a healer...."

"This isn't her fault!" Zuko blazed. Shuddered, and hauled in his temper with trembling hands. "I just- I'm not good enough. I don't know why it happens, everything just burns inside and the words fly away...."

"Not her fault," Meixiang said firmly. "Her heritage. It happens." She made her blade disappear up her sleeve. "Is this Sokka your enemy?"

He's fifteen. But Azula was fourteen, did it make any difference? "He... has been." Zuko picked his words. "He's an ally of the Avatar. Who has been declared a threat to the Fire Nation."

"Oh." A breath more than a word; eyes green from Amaya's water wincing with hurt. "A task you could never survive alone... spirits, Lee! You're just one bender!"

But I'm not Lee. "Those are the terms," Zuko said harshly. "I gave my word."

Silence, taut between them. Zuko dipped his head, and started to rise. "I'm sorry-"

"My lord, with all due respect - stay right there."

He sank back down, taken aback. That? Definitely angry Mom mode.

Which stung his pride; she was not his mother, he didn't need looking after-

But I need help, Zuko admitted to himself, swallowing the acid burn. I can't do this on my own. I need any help I can get.

"I never thought I'd be glad for sitting through so many faculty meetings... what did you promise the Fire Lord to do?" Meixiang said bluntly. "What did you promise, exactly?"

"I... I never spoke it to him," Zuko admitted painfully. "He wouldn't see me, after. She- someone delivered the terms...." Terms that had shattered his life, and exiled him forever.

"Wiggle room," Meixiang murmured. Nodded. "So what did you promise to do?"

Even through cloth, fingernails bit into his palms. "To capture the Avatar. End his threat to the Fire Nation. To my people."

"And who are we?" Meixiang said bluntly. "Myself. Huojin. Our children. All of us. Who are we, my lord?"

"...My people." Zuko wiped sweat off his face. "My head hurts." My heart hurts.

"I can only imagine." She inched closer, slow and cautious. "Are you going to talk to your uncle?"

Jerkily, he nodded. "Have to," Zuko got out. "There's more than Sokka, you don't know - have to make sure the bison isn't there anymore, need to get the damn spirits to stop using the city as target practice....” White noise threatened to close in again; he cradled his head in his hands.

“Wait. Just a little longer.” Meixiang rose and hurried into the house. Came back shortly, drawing a pale Suyin in her wake. “Go with Lee. Make sure he gets to his uncle, then come home.”

“Okay,” Suyin said uncertainly. “What’s wrong?”

“It’s complicated.” Meixiang bent and whispered something in the girl’s ear. Suyin started, and gulped.

Stepping away, Meixiang regarded Zuko again. “My lord. I trust you will see that my daughter is safe with you.”

So I don’t do anything stupid while she’s there. Zuko clung to that with relief. “I’ll be careful.”

“You’d better be,” Meixiang said bluntly. “We need you. More than you know.”

“What do you mean, he’s not here?”

Suyin tried not to flinch at the raw edge in Lee’s voice. It helped that Pao looked more morose than angry, sniffing a cup of his own tea and groaning. “I mean he quit!” the teashop owner lamented. “That noble rascal Quon offered him his own shop, in the Upper Ring! And he took it! Even after I offered him the position of Senior Executive Assistant Manager!”

“And how would that be different from what he was doing?” Lee said dryly.

“...He’d make more tea?”

Lee looked like he didn’t know whether to laugh, cry, or set something on fire.

“Stay with him, so he stays alive,” her mother had said. “I’ll explain later. Be careful.”

Which was even scarier than traveling the Lower Ring on her own. Though walking with Lee seemed to make people she’d usually worry about find other places to be. “It’s good news, right?” Suyin ventured. “He’d want to tell you. And you’re usually at the clinic now.”

For a moment Lee seemed to look through her. Focused, and nodded.

“You could talk to him!” Pao almost pounced; thought better of it at Lee’s narrowed eyes.

“Convince him to come back!”

“Uncle loves tea,” Lee said bluntly. “If he left, he’s not coming back.”

Pao wailed as they left.

“You could have been a little nicer,” Suyin scolded him as they went down the street. “Even if you’re having a bad day-”

“You have no idea.” Lee shook his head, and tried to rein in his tone. “Suyin. The last thing Pao needs is for me or Uncle to be there. Things could get... bad. Fast.”

How bad? Suyin wanted to ask. And was afraid to. “Will you tell me? At Amaya’s?”

“Your mother told you to get me to Uncle and go home. She doesn’t want you getting hurt.”

Boys! “We don’t want you getting hurt, either!”

“I can’t- you shouldn’t-” Lee gripped the bridge of his nose, and sighed. “Ask Uncle. I’m not... thinking very well right now.”

Well, at least he knew that. Which put him one up on Min.

And Uncle was at the clinic, grinning as he shared tea with Amaya. A grin that slipped into sober worry the moment he saw Lee. “Nephew?”

Lee glanced around the edge of screens that partitioned off resting patients; forced a smile for a mother nursing a no longer feverish baby. Stepped close, so his words wouldn’t reach past the screen. “The bison’s under Lake Laogai.” He jabbed a thumb toward Suyin. “And she knows something about Sokka.” He dipped his head to Amaya. “Master Amaya. I’m... going to go break some ice in your garden. Maybe a lot of ice.”

Silent footsteps, and he was gone.

“Oh, dear.” Uncle looked grave. “What is it you know, Miss Suyin?”

“Well, I....”

Ice creaked and cracked, loud as Min shattering rocks.

“He’s somewhere in the Upper Ring,” Suyin said in a rush. “He has to be, or he couldn’t have fallen into Madam Macmu-Ling’s class. Jia saw him there, he’s Southern Water Tribe, I thought maybe you’d like to talk to him?” She looked at Amaya, eyes wide. “Lee was acting weird before I told him - kept the lessons really simple, like he was trying not to think about something - and then when I said Sokka’s name, I thought- it was scary!”

“I would think it was,” Uncle murmured. “Tell me what you know, and exactly what you saw.”

They’re here, Zuko thought, shards of ice melting around him. Those idiots are here, and I have to do something, I have to!

Something. But what?

Even if I can find him-

Oh, take that as a given, where Sokka was the Avatar wouldn’t be too far away.

If I find him - it’s just me, and Uncle, in the middle of Ba Sing Se. If he goes into the Avatar State... thousands of people could get hurt.

Not that he could let that matter when his duty to his nation was on the line.

But... my people are here, too. What do I do? I can’t do nothing, but I don’t know what to-

Panic. An old enemy. He knew the coppery taste of it, the way it bent the world into enemy and destroy and blocked out any words that argued otherwise.

Reaching back to Uncle’s lessons in survival, Zuko sat down.

Ow.

Knelt, brushed away a few chunks of ice, and sat again. And breathed.

Survival. Basics. What do you have? What do you need?

He had information on the Avatar, and the bison. He needed-

My people. Safe.

If he captured the Avatar, they would be safe-

Can I do that? Zuko drove the doubt home, mercilessly. Lives were at stake, not just his honor. He couldn't afford to be optimistic. He couldn't afford to be wrong. He's the Avatar. Master of air. Probably master of water and earth by this time. I'm not even a master of fire. And with water? Katara could thrash me up, down, and sideways. I know healing, but Amaya and I are teaching ourselves combat moves. Against a trained waterbender? We'd be toast.

He's the Avatar, and he's not alone. And I know how the Dai Li like to keep things quiet. I can't fight them all.

Remember. Remember what Uncle said. Azula could catch the Avatar. But could she hold him? Without killing him?

I... can't.

It hurt. Like fire. Like clutching the shattered edge of an icy lake, cutting and numbing and hurting all the worse for it.

I am not going to cry.

Zuko hugged his knees for long minutes, trying not to think. Pain was not the enemy. People thought it was, but it wasn't. Pain was a warning. Something is amiss. Something is about to break.

But he was already broken. There was nothing to do but accept the pain, and wait until he'd suffered enough. Until it sank into his very bones, where it could be acknowledged... and ignored.

I can't capture the Avatar. But I have to protect my people.

Inside and outside the walls; Agni, this was so like the North Pole, how could Avatar be this stupid twice?

I wish I could yell at him. I wish I could pick him up and shake him until his teeth rattled-

Something white blew in the wind.

Climb, leap, and scramble; Zuko gained the clinic's roof, snatched paper from the air-

A flyer. Neatly and professionally inked, with a picture of a creature most hadn't seen for a hundred years.

Zuko shook a fist at the sky, wishing he knew enough about air-spirits to castigate them all to the lowest bowels of Koh's lair. "I know already!"

"Do you think it was wise to leave him behind?" Amaya frowned as they headed into the Inner Ring, glancing back as if she expected the young firebender to melt out of the crowds.

“He promised he would stay,” Iroh said gravely. And he keeps his promises. Usually. “He asked us to scout the situation. That means he is thinking.”

“But if he’s planning to-”

“We do not know what he is planning,” Iroh interrupted. “But if he meant to be reckless and impulsive, he would have acted by now.”

Amaya rolled her eyes. “You’re his uncle. Can’t you simply tell him no?”

“Technically? No.”

The healer choked mid-breath, and glared at him. “Tui and La, why not?”

“A crown prince outranks a general,” Iroh said plainly. “If I had ever given him orders in front of the men, it would have undermined discipline. Which is very bad aboard any ship. Much less a ship full of firebenders.”

“...No wonder he had an attitude problem.”

“Part of that was his injury, I imagine, but yes,” Iroh acknowledged. “I was always glad when we could go ashore, away from other eyes. Then I could be the father he needed, and not just an old man of high rank.” He smiled. “In a way, my nephew’s raid on the North Pole was the best thing to happen to us in a long time. Had we not been cut off from the Fire Nation, and cast adrift on our own resources, I would never have been truly able to act as his uncle, and his master. And he needed me. More than I knew.”

“He needs you to tell him no,” Amaya said practically.

“I will not,” Iroh said soberly. “His honor and his loyalty are at stake. As are the lives of every being in Ba Sing Se. The longer the Avatar remains here, the more time the Fire Nation has to muster its forces against the city.”

“They’ve tried to conquer us for years.” Amaya cast him a look askance. “You should know.”

“The last siege meant to conquer, yes,” Iroh said soberly. “But the Fire Lord knows full well what strength the Avatar may gain. He knows no other creature can hope to slay his armies in their very tracks. So long as the Avatar remains within these walls, the Fire Nation’s goal will not be to conquer. It will be to destroy.” He had to look away. “You have not seen what Sozin’s line can do, when they wish to destroy. Remember the airbenders. Remember, Sozin’s forces destroyed their nation within a day.” He shook his head. “That is what awaits Ba Sing Se, should the Avatar remain.”

Amaya swallowed, pale.

“So. I will argue with my nephew. I will advise him, as best I can. But I will not tell him not to act.” Iroh smiled wryly. “We have patched our vessel in the midst of a raging storm. Now we must see if it will hold. And be prepared to bail.”

“...You have tremendous faith in that boy.”

“He has more of his father of him than he wishes to think,” Iroh stated. “And that is not so ill a heritage as you might first believe. His mother was gentle, kind, and honorable. She also avoided conflict unless there was no other choice. And by then, much damage had been done. While my family - well. We have no qualms about striking first. And unleashing enough force that no further blow is needed.” He shrugged. “I have tried to teach him to balance the two. With luck, we have succeeded. Is this the house?”

“The right address, according to the flyer.” Amaya nodded at the small mansion on their right. “That just seems so odd....”

“At the South Pole, we were the only ship in range to see the light of the Avatar’s awakening,” Iroh said plainly. “We made port to find a replacement lotus tile, and found pirates from whom Katara had just stolen a waterbending scroll. Another time we pulled in at a prison barge to re-supply with coal... and found her necklace, and then a bounty hunter who could track them from it. Even traveling by ourselves in the midst of the plains, with no desire or thought of finding the Avatar - we have found bison fur, and met again.” He sighed. “My nephew is a skilled tracker, determined, and well-taught in predicting his foes. But I believe the spirits want my nephew to chase the Avatar.” His eyes narrowed. “To chase, but not to catch. So many times, Aang has slipped from his fingers... if I ever meet those who have plotted so cruelly, we will have words.”

“Invite me along,” Amaya murmured. “Lee has a gift. He may not be as swift to catch on as some I’ve seen, but he’s thorough. He doesn’t just heal what he sees and assume he’s done. He listens to the energies.” She gave Iroh a determined look. “Make this work. I want him back.”

Iroh bowed to her, and slipped out of sight behind the Avatar’s house. Took a lump of flint from his sleeve, and quietly banged on the foundation.

Let us hope I am right, and the Blind Bandit sees more clearly than most who think they have eyes.

Thump. Thump. Thump.

Toph sighed, and hid a grimace. Bouncing her ball against the wall didn’t quite cover the rustle of Katara and Sokka playing cards, but it did break up the patter of Aang’s anxious feet as he burst back in through the front door with Momo.

“I just finished dropping all the leaflets! Has anyone come in with news about Appa?”

...And the connection Twinkletoes apparently couldn’t make between those two sentences was why Toph sometimes felt like beating her brains out rather than trying to teach him earthbending.

Oh, Aang was good enough to beat the robes off most earthbenders. He had more power than any other bender she’d ever seen, and power could cover for a lot of slipshod bending.

But if he took the time to do it right, he could do so much more....

Aang didn’t want to take the time to do it right. Get a move down enough to make it work, and push on. In a way, Toph could understand that. Aang was up against an end-of-summer deadline to throw-down with the Fire Lord, and the more he did before that, the better.

What she couldn’t sympathize with was Aang’s attitude toward training. If it’d been her with the fate of the world at stake, she’d be up before dawn and fall into bed only when she couldn’t move any more. Aang seemed to think “train hard” meant “train until I get tired, bored, or spot a butterfly”.

Lesson after lesson, she’d tried to thump that out of him. But every time she got him near the edge, every time she thought she’d get Aang to understand you could go way beyond the point it started to hurt, if you had to-

“It’s only been a day.” Katara fluttered her cards. “Just be patient.”

Yep. In swooped Katara to kiss it better. It made Toph want to tear her hair out. Or burrow into the ground and not come out.

She felt Aang’s chin hit the table as he sighed, almost heavy enough to cover the no-nonsense stride walking up to the door. Medium-weight, she’d guess a bit taller than Katara, and definitely a woman....

A knock, and Aang finally realized someone was there. “Wow, you’re right! Patience really pays off.” He swept toward the door. “Hi! Are you here about Appa?”

“I came to meet some distant relatives.” The woman sounded about as old as Toph’s mother. “I hear there are Southern Water tribesmen here?”

“You’re here to see Sokka?” Katara’s voice dripped disbelief. “Wait - you’re Northern Water Tribe! What are you doing in Ba Sing Se?”

“Healing, mostly....”

Toph tuned the rest of the pleasantries out, struck by a familiar rhythm echoing through the floor. That was... the opening theme of the Earth Rumble tournaments?

Somebody wants to talk to the Blind Bandit.

She snuck out the back door, listening and feeling....

And grinned. “Hey, Uncle.”

“Good afternoon, Toph.”

She sensed Iroh’s polite bow in the shift of his weight, and stepped into the cool of shadows beside him. “Should I even ask how you got in here, or just chalk it up to you being a sneaky old dragon?”

Iroh chuckled. “It’s a very long story, I’m afraid. And one I would prefer not to tell here, where the Dai Li are watching. Though I do not think they can see us, here. And Amaya is likely distracting enough, speaking to Katara and Sokka of her tribe and theirs, that we should have some time to talk.”

Toph raised a brow. “You know the lady inside?”

“She is a very good friend.”

A lot more than that, from the joy and good humor seeping past the worry in his stance. All right, Uncle! “So... you want to talk to me,” Toph realized. “And you want to do it without them,” she jerked a thumb back toward the house, “because they know where you are, your nephew’s not far, and Katara’s still ticked off he tied her to a tree.”

“Not the most comfortable of captivities,” Iroh allowed. “He could have been far more gentle, true. But it kept her under our eyes, in clear sight. Which prevented the pirates from doing... many things.”

“The pirates who were working for Zuko?” Toph said pointedly.

“The pirates who had allied with my nephew to win back the waterbending scroll Katara stole from them,” Iroh answered dryly. “Very few steal from pirates and live to tell of it. Those who do, especially young women, often wish they had not.”

“...Sugar Queen kind of left out that part.” Toph frowned. She’d known Katara hadn’t told her everything, but stealing? And Iroh wasn’t lying. “Okay. I’m listening.”

“My nephew and I know where Appa may be found. But we need an earthbender’s assistance.”

“And you want my help?” Toph crossed her arms. “Aren’t you two trying to catch Aang?”

“I would prefer not to,” Iroh said plainly. “The world has been out of balance long enough. But my nephew...” He sighed. “My nephew is making a difficult decision. I cannot be certain what he will choose to do. But I think, if he were offered help where he expects none, and words of good sense from an ally of Aang’s who does not hate him...”

Hope, she could feel in that upright stance. Desperate worry; probably for Zuko. Some controlled fear even now, for her and the people inside. Put that together with what he’d said about pirates- “We’re in trouble, huh?” Toph blurted out.

“Grave danger, indeed,” Iroh nodded. “Enough that I believe my nephew would risk his life to protect you, if he were forced to. And we would be risking our lives. If the Dai Li learned there were folk of the Fire Nation in Ba Sing Se... it would not be well.”

Not just for you, Toph thought, remembering a laughing Guard and happy children. “Okay, you talked me into it.” She held up a hand before he could respond. “Into hearing him out, anyway. I don’t like what he has to say, I’m leaving. And if either of you go after Aang, the Blind Bandit is going to rock. Get me?”

“Very clearly.” Amusement and respect, shimmering through the earth and his voice.

“Good,” Toph nodded. “Just let me tell them something... huh.” Yeah, that’d work. Aang wasn’t exactly fond of hunting up his own lessons. “I’ll tell them I’m going to see Luli again. Aang just doesn’t get jade-” “Luli, Huojin’s wife?” Iroh interrupted.

“You know her?”

“I do,” Iroh nodded. “Though they do not know my name. And my nephew, they know only as Lee.” He paused, thinking. “I would be quite willing to meet you there, where we both have a friend. And where the presence of a Guard means no one will be... impulsive.”

Neutral ground. He is serious. “And it’ll be easier to slip by Dai Li if we don’t show up together,” Toph agreed. And grinned. “Well? Get moving! I want to hear what Sparky has to say for himself.”

“Sparky? Indeed.” Chuckling, Iroh slipped quietly away.

Okay. Here we go. Toph headed back inside, and drew a breath. “Guys-”

There was a rapping at the door, and Aang ran for it. “Maybe this is it!” He opened the door, and blinked. “Joo Dee?”

Amaya stepped back, out of what Toph realized must be line of sight.

“Hello, Aang and Katara and Sokka and Toph,” Joo Dee said with that eerie cheer.

“What happened to you?” Sokka asked, crowding forward with Katara. “Did the Dai Li throw you in jail?"

"What, jail?" Joo Dee said dismissively. "Of course not. The Dai Li are the protectors of our cultural heritage."

Scary thing was, she seemed to believe that. "But you disappeared at the Earth King's party," Toph said, crowding around with the others. If Amaya didn't want to be seen, there was probably a good reason.

"Oh, I simply took a short vacation to Lake Laogai, out in the country," Joo Dee said cheerfully. "It was quite relaxing."

From the shift of his feet, Sokka didn't buy that. Which made Toph wish all over again he wasn't stuck on Suki. Sokka wasn't half bad.

"But then they replaced you with some other woman who also said her name was Joo Dee," Katara objected.

"I'm Joo Dee."

Clue, Katara, Toph wanted to yell. Something's wrong here!

"Why are you here?" Aang asked.

Paper rustled as Joo Dee pulled something out. "Dropping flyers and putting up posters isn't permitted within the city. Not without proper clearance."

Of course it wasn't. Sheesh. Why were they here in the city again?

Because Aang can't live without Appa. Almost literally, seems like.

"We can't wait around to get permission for everything," Sokka objected.

Ah! At last, he gets it! Toph almost threw up her hands and cheered.

"You are absolutely forbidden by the rules of the city to continue putting up posters."

...Okay, that was freaky. Nobody should sound that cheerful stomping somebody's plans- uh-oh. That tensing of Aang's feet was really not good-

"We don't care about the rules, and we're not asking permission!" Aang yelled.

Toph smirked. Now, why couldn't she get some of that when he was training?

"We're finding Appa on our own," Aang went on, backing the startled woman out the door, "and you should just stay out of our way!" He slammed the door, Joo Dee on the other side.

"That might come back to bite us in the blubber," Sokka said thoughtfully.

"More than you know," Amaya spoke up. "She'll be reporting this to the Dai Li. The system is fairly regimented, so it may not be heard for some hours... but a report from this Joo Dee will have priority, given she's been assigned to the Avatar's party."

"This Joo Dee?" Katara pounced. "You make it sound like there's... more than one."

"There are hundreds."

Uncle's right, Toph thought, chilled. We are in trouble.

"That can't be right," Aang objected, still fuming. "I mean, two women with the same name, sure. But hundreds?"

"Lee was right," Amaya muttered under her breath, too quiet for any but Toph's sharp ears to catch. "You are naïve." She rocked back on her heels a little, and Toph felt a cold anger shiver through the floor. "You're a healer, Katara. Didn't you ever try to treat them?"

"Treat what?" Katara shrugged. "Joo Dee - whoever she is - they're weird. They're not hurt."

"...Yugoda should have covered mental trauma in your second week of training."

"Yeah, well," Sokka shrugged, "Katara really trained with that old sea-prune Pakku-"

"It was awesome!" Some of the frustration washed out of Aang's stance, and he bounced, grinning. "He said he wouldn't teach her, and she cracked the audience chamber floor, and threw razor-disks of ice at him, and shoved off his water-"

"You're not a trained healer." Amaya's words knifed across Aang's exuberance. "You have Master Pakku's betrothal necklace. I thought for certain you must be trained. I hoped you knew, and were only biding your time until you could find a way to escape. Not that most of us have a chance to escape Long Feng's reach...." She breathed out a chill wisp, anger and sorrow warring in her stance.

"My necklace is from my mother," Katara said angrily. "Gran-Gran Kanna brought it with her. And I am trained!"

"She really is," Aang insisted, hands out to smooth things over. "She's my waterbending master."

"And I thought Lee lost his temper too easily," Amaya said, half to herself. Shook her head. "I can't stay. The Dai Li give me some leeway, because my healing is useful to them. But I dare not presume on their goodwill." A breath. "Do not let the Dai Li know you're not fully trained. It's probably all that has kept Long Feng from taking one of you and... damaging your minds. You're not Fire Nation. You wouldn't have the strength to resist, even long enough to be rescued."

"How can you say they're better than us?" Katara gasped. "Don't you know what they've done? What they tried to do? They tried to kill the Moon!"

Sokka shifted, feeling for his boomerang, and Toph grimaced. That's it. Nobody's going to listen now.

From Amaya's soft sigh, she could see that without earthbending. "I said their minds were stronger. More resistant to what Long Feng can do. To a point. They'll break - but they will not bend." She drew herself up, and Toph could feel her simmering anger as she pointed toward Aang. "If you refuse to understand that, Avatar - if you refuse to learn why, and where they have gained such strength - then you will never learn firebending. And the world will remain out of balance, and all of us will suffer."

"No, it won't!" Aang insisted. "I'll defeat the Fire Lord, and the war will be over. And I'm never going to learn firebending!" Toph felt his glance at Katara in the catch of his breath. "I'm never going to hurt someone I - care about, again."

"Then there's nothing more I can do," Amaya said simply. "I wish you luck. And I hope you escape."

“That’s it?” Sokka sputtered. “You’re Water Tribe! You know the Dai Li are bad guys. Help us out!”

“I am Water Tribe.” Almost to the door, Amaya’s voice was iron. “I am the last of the Water Tribe within these walls. Save for you, and my apprentice, Lee.”

Sparky is her apprentice? Toph bit back a whistle. And he’s letting her call him Water Tribe?

“Two weeks ago, there were almost two score of us, benders and not,” Amaya went on, grief and pain seeping into the floor around her. “They’re all dead now. Because of the war. Because the spirits are restless. Because one malicious kamuïy followed a trail of blood into Ba Sing Se, and you-” she took one long step toward Aang, who shrank back “-you sensed nothing.”

“I- I didn’t know,” Aang stammered. “I didn’t- why didn’t somebody tell me?”

“Because there is no war in Ba Sing Se,” Amaya said darkly. “Long Feng wants you kept quiet. Contained. Until he can find a way to use you, the way he does everyone.”

She’s guessing, Toph judged. But she’s pretty sure.

“And you’re the Avatar. You’re supposed to sense when the spirits are angry.” Pain rang through Amaya’s voice. “The Dai Li are only human. Gifted benders, but human. Still, they tracked it. They found it. They stopped it. Some of them died stopping it. I owe them my life.” She focused on Sokka. “Call them evil, if you will. But for a century the Avatar abandoned this world, and they have been all that stood between Ba Sing Se and destruction.” She shook her head. “I’m going home now. I hope you find your bison. And leave.”

The door closed like a tomb.

“And I thought the Joo Dees were weird,” Katara said uneasily.

“She was telling the truth,” Toph spoke up. “She was angry, and scared, but it was real.” Which the Joo Dees weren’t. They didn’t lie - but they didn’t exactly feel when they said stuff. Not like regular people did.

“But she can’t be!” Aang protested. “I would have known! I’m the Avatar!”

“Okay,” Toph shrugged. “So how does this spirit-sensy thing of yours work again?”

“Umm....”

“I hate to admit it, but Amaya could be right,” Sokka said reluctantly. “I’m not saying she is!” he added hastily at Aang’s wounded twitch. “But you were right there at the pond, in the Spirit Oasis, and you didn’t know what the fish were until after you went poof and left your body where Zuko could catch it.”

“We got you back,” Katara said grimly. “But Yue....”

“Yeah. I’ll never forgive Prince Ponytail for that, either.” Sokka blew out a breath. “Thing is, Aang, we don’t know. And I’m kind of getting a bad feeling about how much we don’t know about this place.”

“So you want us to go along with Joo Dee?” Aang demanded. “Just stay put, while Appa’s out there?”

“I didn’t say that-”

“Good! Because from now on, we do whatever it takes to find Appa.”

“Yeah!” Toph cheered, feeling his glare in her feet. Finally, some backbone! Keep it up, and we can get somewhere. “So what are we going to do? Bury the Dai Li? Storm the palace? Kidnap the Earth King?” Hey, if they were going to break rules, why not go all the way?

“...I kind of thought we’d put up the posters,” Aang admitted.

Forehead, meet palm. Repeat.

She felt like doing it all over again as Sokka, Aang, and Katara moved through the city, plastering up posters. “We’ll split up to cover more area,” Sokka said, satisfied. “Toph. I guess you should just come with me.”

“Better idea, Snoozles,” Toph said peevishly. “I’m going to find Luli again. There’s something I want to ask her, and if we do find Appa? I’m not sticking around long enough to get another chance.”

Ditched ‘em. Finally.

Which meant she could think, as she made her way through busy streets. And wince. This could be a bad idea.

Well, maybe. Uncle seemed to be a pretty good guy. And everything Toph had heard about the Dragon of the West said he was one of the most honorable firebenders out there. If he said they wanted to talk, she believed him.

Zuko’s honor-bound to catch Aang. This could still be a trap.

Except the exiled prince might be a lot of things, but he wasn’t stupid. He’d let them take off back at the ghost town, so he could look after Uncle and beat feet before Azula came back. And here he was in the very heart of the Earth Kingdom, trying to stay out of sight as a waterbending healer’s apprentice.

And how Sparky’s pulling that off, I really want to know!

If he’d been smart enough to keep from jumping Aang then, honor or no honor, he’d be smart enough to play fair now. At least while they talked. After, she wouldn’t bet on... but then she’d know where he was.

And if the rest of the guys aren’t there to blame Yue dying on him, we might really be able to talk.

Why Sokka pinned Princess Yue’s death on Zuko, Toph still couldn’t figure out. From what they’d said, Zhao had grabbed the Moon after they’d gotten back from Zuko’s kidnap attempt. Sparky himself had been out cold and tied up in Appa’s saddle, unable to tilt the fight either way. And Uncle had tried to stop Zhao.

General Iroh used to be the crown prince, too. And he’s Zuko’s uncle. Katara said he said everybody needs the Moon, even the Fire Nation. If he fought for the Moon - what makes them think Zuko wouldn’t have?

Oh, yeah, right. Fire Nation bad, Earth Kingdom and Water Tribe good. Sheesh.

She'd told them. Maybe she hadn't found the right words. Maybe she didn't know as much about the Water Tribes as she thought, and Zuko had somehow given them some kind of dire insult that could never be forgiven. Whatever it was, they didn't seem to want to hear that - based on everything Toph knew - Zuko's only interest was Aang. Not the Water Tribes. Not the Earth Kingdom. The Avatar. That was it.

Heck, even Suki'd admitted that Zuko left Kyoshi Island after Aang took off. Left, and didn't come back.

He deserves a chance for someone to hear him out. Toph smirked, and cracked her knuckles. And if that doesn't work... if Sweetness can take him, so can I.

Breezing through the carver's shop, Toph stepped into the garden, and headed for voices.

"How about the Jasmine Dragon?" Iroh said heartily. "It's dramatic, poetic, has a nice ring to it."

"How can you think about teashop names at a time like this?" Zuko groaned.

"Who knows? We might get lucky. The Tea Weevil! No, that's stupid...."

"Toph," Zuko said flatly, rising.

"A good name, yes, but already taken-"

"He means Toph's here," Huojin said, amused. "Afternoon, Miss Bei Fong. You know these two walking disaster areas?"

"Huojin!" Zuko protested.

"We met once," Iroh smiled. "Briefly."

"Yeah, but it was the kind of meeting you never forget," Toph grinned. Cocked her head, listening to Zuko move across the garden to give her a civil nod. "Huh. You really are Amaya's apprentice."

"...What?"

"Your stance is different." Still strong, still aggressive - but lighter, more fluid. Less straight-in, and more of a hint of circling that would deflect away a strike before it could ever land.

Less dillo-lion, and more dragon.

"But I didn't come to talk bending," Toph said bluntly, sitting down across from them. "I know your honor means you've got to catch Aang for the Fire Lord-"

"What?" Huojin burst out.

"Patience, if you will," Iroh said graciously, seating himself. Zuko settled down by him, still tense. "We are here to discuss matters amicably, and hopefully avoid violence."

"Thank the spirits Luli's taking the kids to Meixiang's tonight," Huojin muttered, reluctantly sitting.

"Wise," Iroh murmured. "You may need an alibi."

"...Oh, I really didn't need to hear that...."

"I know the terms are you've got to catch him," Toph forged on. "And I know you know you're not getting him unless you go through me first. So. What have we got to talk about?"

"Lee, she's just a kid," Huojin started.

"Hey!" Toph objected.

"She's a master earthbender, and an honorable opponent," Zuko said plainly. "We're negotiating a temporary alliance. She's got every right to be blunt."

"Still not hearing any reason we should work together." Toph crossed her arms. "Knowing where Appa is isn't enough. If you can find him, we can."

"But not in time," Zuko said levelly. "You need to get out of Ba Sing Se. You need to get out now."

"That's what Amaya said," Toph nodded. Paying careful attention to Iroh's stillness. He was waiting. Hoping. "You want to tell me why?"

"Did your friends tell you what happened at the North Pole?"

"Crazy spirits, Fire Navy go squish?" Toph said. Knowing she was pushing it. If Sparky's going to fly off the handle, I need to know now.

Zuko tensed, but forced himself to stay still. "The people in charge here are trying to make that happen again."

Toph froze. "No. No way, Aang hates what happened there." She'd heard plenty about that, and about General Fong's pushing Aang into the kind of Avatar freak-out that had blasted sandbenders halfway across the Si Wong desert. And felt a lot more in what Sokka and Katara didn't say about the general they'd met on the Wall. Maybe glowing it up like that could take out the Fire Nation army, but.... "He doesn't want to do stuff like that again! Not ever."

"That makes two of us," Zuko said grimly. "That's why I'm going to help you."

Oh. Toph tried not to react. Oh, wow. This is big.

"Nephew?" Iroh asked carefully.

Yeah, Toph thought. Get him to spell it out. I think I know what he's getting at, but whoa....

"Honor doesn't demand suicide," Zuko said bitterly. Toph could feel his hands clenching on cloth in the way the ground vibrated under him. "I can't capture the Avatar in Ba Sing Se. Not without exposing myself as a firebender. If I do that...." He took a shaky breath. "If I do that, I'm dead. And not just me. The Dai Li will go after anyone who's helped me. Anyone they even suspect might know what I am. Because there is no war in Ba Sing Se." Another breath; another clench of muscle and bone. "If I try to capture the Avatar here, I'll die. And I'll die a failure."

"I fear that is so," Iroh said quietly. "You would need tremendous luck to succeed, and survive. And luck... does not favor you."

"It never has," Zuko muttered. Bent his head, and sighed. "If I can't serve my people by capturing the Avatar - then the best thing I can do is keep something like the North Pole from happening again." He looked straight at her. "Appa's under Lake Laogai. Will you help us get him out?"

“Should I even be listening to this?” Huojin muttered.

“Well, I hear the Dai Li deny the bison is even there,” Iroh said mildly. “And he does belong with the Avatar. Surely, what they do not admit they have, cannot be stolen from them?”

“There’s something screwy in your logic. I just know it.” Huojin stood, scratching his head. “Miss? Are you going to be all right with these two would-be lawbreakers, or do I have to hang around and incriminate myself?”

“I think I’ll be okay,” Toph said, surprised. “I think I’ll be fine.” She listened to Zuko, tracking every shift of breath and posture. “You really mean it. You’re going to help. No strings.”

“One string,” Zuko corrected, taking out a rustle of paper. “This is for Sokka. It’s... some of the stuff I know about the city. Maybe it’ll help him make up his mind to get out of here.”

Toph took the letter, folding it inside her belt. “If he knows it’s from you, he’s not going to listen.”

Zuko snorted. “I didn’t sign it.”

“Not bad,” Toph approved. “Though I’m guessing there’s one more string.” She paused, deliberately. “You want me to come with you alone. Without the guys.”

“You know them better than we,” Iroh said plainly. “Would they accept our aid? Or instead, reveal us for what we are, and doom us all?”

“Not sure I want to find out,” Toph admitted. “Okay, I’m in. What’s the plan?”

Huojin cleared his throat, loudly. “Leaving. Now.”

“Wait,” Zuko said; a quiet, lonely plea. “Toph... I know they wouldn’t believe me.” He swallowed. “Why do you?”

“Because you never lied to me,” Toph said bluntly. “I know who you are, and who Uncle is. I know you have honor, no matter what the Fire Nation thinks. If you didn’t, you never would have warned us about your crazy sister.” She had to look away, even if she couldn’t see. “The Bei Fongs deal with Fire Nation merchants. You don’t talk about fights inside the clan. Not to outsiders. They’re not worth it. But you? You owed Katara. And you paid up.” She turned back to him. “You treated her like she had honor. Even if she was an outsider. Even if she was Water Tribe.” The earthbender held out a hand. “Told you. I’m in.”

The fingers that gripped hers were warm, and strong, and barely trembling with relief. “Agreed.”

Chapter End Notes

The bit between Zuko and Meixiang is in part based on the scene where Roku is revealed as the next Avatar, and everybody hits the ground; even the prince kneeling. Proper signals of dominance and submission are very important to large, heavily-armed predators.

It’s also in part based on what we see from Fang, Ran, and Sho. Dragons communicate through (apparent) telepathic images, and movement. Words, they’re not so good at.

Chapter 20

Chapter Notes

At this point, changes from canon plot start snowballing. Hang onto your seats, it's gonna be a bumpy ride....

See the end of the chapter for more notes

“Where’s Toph?” Katara wondered.

Sokka frowned, ostentatiously looking around and down for an aggravated earthbender. No Toph.

Which was just what he’d expected. Don’t make me have to explain, Toph. Please? Katara’s scary when she gets mad....

“She said she was going to see that jade-carver, Luli,” Aang said, looking everywhere at once as they walked back through poster-strewn streets. “Wish I knew why. How often am I going to have to bend jade? It’s not like it comes in pieces big enough to throw at somebody.”

“Hey, your old friend Bumi learned to bend with his face,” Sokka pointed out. “I think having rocks in your head makes you just a little bit crazy.”

“Toph’s stubborn, and she likes to pretend she doesn’t have any manners, but she’s not crazy,” Katara argued. “She knows how worried we were the last time she walked off. She wouldn’t stay out this long without a reason.” His sister dropped her voice. “And I think we’re being followed.”

“We are,” Sokka said practically, carefully not looking up to those shadows on the rooftops. Aw, spirits. I’m going to have to tell them. “I’m hoping that’s a good thing.”

“Um... how is us being followed a good thing?” Aang said, confused.

“Because if we’re lucky, they’re not following Toph.” At the airbender’s raised brow, Sokka sighed, and nodded at the crowds carefully parting around them, wherever they walked. “Look. Haven’t you noticed nobody’s talking to us? Not about anything important. I’m guessing they know we’re in trouble, and they don’t want to end up in the stewpot with us.”

“Like Amaya,” Katara growled.

“Not exactly,” Sokka admitted. “Katara, think. Don’t you guys say waterbending is about deflecting, and redirecting your enemy’s attack?” Like Suki with her war-fans; oh, he missed her.

“Yeah,” Aang nodded, glancing up at the roofs. “So?”

Sokka tried not to whack himself in the forehead. Subtle, Aang was not. “So, why would a waterbender come straight in and say she couldn’t help us? And why would Toph, who loves to listen in on everyone and who’s always nosy about places she’s never been, just disappear while we’re talking to somebody from the Northern Tribe?” Granted, it’d taken him these last few hours to figure all of it out, but Katara didn’t have to know that.

“Maybe she just, well... kind of got bored?” Aang said sheepishly.

“You weren’t bored when we were talking to Bato,” Katara objected.

“Actually? I kind of was.”

“Toph doesn’t bore that easily,” Sokka broke in, before his sister could get huffy. “If she’s not with us, she’s after something important.”

“Finding flaws in rock,” Aang sighed.

“No. Appa.”

“What?”

“Keep your voice down!” Sokka hissed. “You want to blow Toph’s plan?”

“What plan?” Katara said pointedly.

Sokka sighed, hoping their watchers didn’t have Toph’s ears. “Amaya came to talk because we were Water Tribe, right? Why didn’t she bring Lee?”

“Because she doesn’t want to help,” Katara bit out.

“I think she did,” Sokka eyed both of them. “I think maybe Amaya was a distraction for the Dai Li. Did you see how Toph was when she did come back? Like she was waiting for something. Maybe, getting a chance to split up?” He frowned. “I think Lee was there. And Toph talked to him.”

“And he knew where Appa was?” Aang pounced. But thankfully, kept his voice down. “Why wouldn’t she tell us?”

Sokka winced. “She might think you still blame her for losing Appa in the first place. You were pretty blunt about that.”

“He was angry,” Katara defended Aang. “Anybody would have been. Toph knows he didn’t mean it.”

“I’m just saying, he never said he was sorry,” Sokka shrugged. “And you know how Toph is about pulling her own weight.”

“But this is different!” Aang insisted. “If she knows where Appa is, we’ve got to be there!”

“Aang’s right,” Katara nodded. “Toph’s a little overconfident sometimes-”

The little menace could trash Earth Rumble benders with flicks of her fingers, and take out a charging saber-moose lion. Overconfident was not the word Sokka would use.

“-She could need our help,” Katara finished. “Especially if she’s with Lee. Who in the Water Tribe names their kid Lee?”

Okay, that was a good point. “But that could wreck Toph’s plan!” Sokka argued. “If the Dai Li are keeping an eye on us-”

“Appa’s more important than Toph’s plan,” Aang said impatiently. “Let’s go find Luli.”

“So... the Avatar didn’t intend to destroy the fleet?”

Dark cloak over her robes, mask ready to go on at Zuko's signal, Toph considered the exiled prince's words very carefully. Half of an Earth Rumble wasn't bending at all, really; it was getting inside your opponent's head, so you knew how he'd move, how he'd flinch, and what would get the crowd pumped up and roaring.

He trusts me, a little, Toph thought, reading his footsteps as they made their way down farm roads toward the distant lake. A train would have been way faster, but she didn't need Zuko to tell her those earthbenders probably reported to the Dai Li too.

He's going to help. This time. But he's not just any firebender. He's Prince Zuko.

Aang had been raised by monks, who seemed to spend a lot of time contemplating the universe and otherwise answered to a council of elders if they didn't shave often enough. Katara and Sokka had grown up in a small village, where their dad was responsible for, oh, maybe a few hundred people. Zuko? He'd been raised to someday take over the whole Fire Nation.

Toph might not do maps, but she was a merchant's daughter. And she could feel how big Ba Sing Se was. Huge. Mind-numbingly huge. A quarter of a continent big.

And General Iroh had once held the entire city under siege.

The number of soldiers that must have taken made her head hurt. The number of people who had to be behind those soldiers, maintaining supplies of food, steel, new recruits... ow.

And Zuko had been taught to be responsible for all of them.

From what Katara and Sokka had said about the North Pole, Aang had wiped out years of shipbuilding. And who knew how much time and experience in the sailors and the marines on those ships. In one night.

Uh-uh. Zuko's question wasn't nearly as simple as it sounded.

"He wanted to stop the fleet," Toph said bluntly. "I think he'd have been happy if they just turned around and went away."

"They couldn't do that. Not under Admiral Zhao's orders."

"So, what?" Toph asked dryly. "Aang should have just grabbed a waterbending master and run away?"

"It would have been the smart thing to do," Zuko shot back. "There are islands. There are miles of coastline in the north, near the mountains. He could have trained on the coast, kept somebody on lookout, and just retreated behind the mountains any time Fire Nation forces approached. Move there out of sight - it'd be easy on Appa - and he could just fly back over to the coast when he was clear."

Oh. Now she felt like an idiot. Why didn't Sokka think of that?

"But that probably wouldn't have stopped the invasion," Zuko admitted reluctantly. "Zhao had... too much influence by then. Came close to catching the Avatar too many times. Did catch him, once. Why the hell was he after frozen frogs in range of Pohuai Stronghold, the idiot...."

"Frozen frogs?" Toph asked, curious. Sokka had complained about frogs a few weeks back, something about warts on his tongue. To absolutely no sympathy from Katara.

“...Nothing.”

Definitely wasn't nothing. But Zuko had tensed up in a way that said she'd have more luck asking with hot knives and bamboo slivers.

“Zhao had influence, and he had a plan. The Fire Lord backed him. If the Avatar hadn't headed into Water Tribe territory, maybe... but he did.” Zuko blew out a hot breath. “Nothing would have stopped the invasion then.”

“You sound like you think it was a bad idea,” Toph said, trying for casual.

“Well, it didn't work, did it?” The acid in Zuko's voice could have stripped limestone down to chalky water.

“You got in,” Toph pointed out.

“Zhao didn't even know I was there,” Zuko snorted. “He thought I was dead.”

Say what? But Toph let that interesting fact slide, feeling the tension seeping out of Zuko's stride. Maybe he just needs somebody to listen. “Okay, Sparky. How would you have pried Aang out of all that ice?”

“With Zhao's resources? I wouldn't have used a whole fleet,” Zuko said thoughtfully. “A few ships, to carry the people I needed... you've met Ty Lee.”

“Uh, yeah,” Toph said, startled. “How'd you know that?”

“My sister was chasing you,” Zuko said dryly. “I found some of the camps she chased you out of. Only one thing makes master benders retreat that fast.”

Toph gulped. “There are more people like her?”

“A lot more. They're not supposed to leave the Fire Nation in wartime, but Azula's never let little things like laws stop her....” He tapped fingers against his thigh, thinking. “Stealth teams. Sneak past the lookouts; they're looking for metal, red, and black, not small boats and people dressed like snow. They're not trained lookouts anyway. The Water Tribes don't have an organized military. More of a militia. They're trained warriors, they're good individually, but their command and control structure sucks. There are exceptions, like Chief Hakoda, but most of their leaders don't have a grasp on long-term strategy. They don't fight to defend their nation; they fight because you're an outsider, and you're there. The Northern Tribe is used to relying on their waterbenders and the ice. They hadn't suffered a determined assault in eighty-five years, which meant all their trained warriors had no one to fight but each other. And believe me, they did. Hereditary house territories and political alliances with upper-class families, that's where their weapons and bending training got focused. And that means when they put lookouts on the walls, those people weren't watching the Fire Nation. They were watching their enemies, the ones they'd have to live with after we were gone. And they assumed we would be gone - the last invasion didn't work, and this time they had the Avatar on their side.” Zuko's bitter smile seared through the ground. “And because they couldn't forget about each other and focus on us, they huddled in allied groups. Which left gaps in the lookout coverage.” He shrugged. “Make it in through the gaps, find the Avatar, extract him, and retreat. Let the Water Tribe think the Avatar's abandoned them. Again. That would break their morale right there. You wouldn't need to fight.”

“Oh,” Toph said, voice small. Swallowed hard. Well, you asked.

And when you felt past the scary shiver of realizing Zuko had thought about this... he'd told her the truth. Again. Toph frowned. “How long is it going to take us to get to this lake?”

“A while yet. Why?”

“You know I could feel anybody sneaking up on us way before we had to hide,” Toph said confidently.

“Good,” Zuko said warily. “So?”

“So, tell me what’s happened since you started chasing Aang,” Toph demanded. “These guys only mention things they think I need to know, and they leave all kinds of good stuff out! Katara stole a waterbending scroll?”

“Ah, yeah...?”

“She never told me that part! I had to hear it from Uncle.” Toph bounced on her heels. “Tell me what you saw. How’d this whole mess get started?”

Tell me how I can get you on our side. Twinkletoes is going to need a firebending master, like it or not....

And if your sister ever wised up and gave you what you need to catch Aang, we’d be in big trouble.

Zuko swallowed, and drew a breath. “A hundred years ago, a ship’s log recorded sighting a bison heading toward the South Pole....”

“Why would Healer Amaya visit the Avatar?”

Reading by lantern-light - handy as glowing crystals were, his eyes hated them - Shirong started. Glanced up at Quan, curious. “Nothing I can think of-”

No. He wouldn’t.

“But?” Quan said pointedly.

“One of the Avatar’s companions is a waterbender,” Shirong said practically. “Amaya might want to discuss bending.” All the while, his mind raced. Oh, spirits. Lee, tell me you didn’t. “What’s going on?”

“We should advise her not to do that again soon.” Quan frowned. “Long Feng is... disturbed. The Avatar’s Joo Dee has had to be removed from duty. Again. Currently the children are chasing their posters through the city, which is relatively harmless... but we’ve lost track of the earthbender.”

Oma and Shu. He did.

Only long practice let Shirong keep his face neutral and interested. Inside he was torn between gut-wrenching terror and utter delight at Lee’s sheer nerve.

He needed an earthbender to get to the bison. He found one. Oh, my.... “I seem to recall that the Blind Bandit’s remarkably apt to vanish when she wants to,” Shirong observed. “But she always shows up again. Usually with a new rock sample to bounce off her companions’ heads.”

“True,” Quan acknowledged. “Well. At least you’ll get a good night’s sleep.”

“Extra guard shifts?” Shirong raised a brow.

“Just a precaution.” Quan regarded him levelly, just a fraction of an instant too long-

Smiled, and saw himself out. “Have a good night.”

Shirong kept an answering smile on his face as Quan’s footsteps retreated, feeling his heart try to freeze in his chest. Oma and Shu. They know.

No. They couldn’t know. They might suspect something could be amiss, Lee hadn’t exactly looked perfectly calm and contained heading out with Amaya, but they couldn’t know. Or he’d be answering to Long Feng personally.

And not of my own will.

Spirits, no. I’d rather die.

Startling thought. Living was living, after all. He’d served Long Feng for years, darkening his soul as every Dai Li had to. Did it matter if he lost one more shred of himself?

Yes. It does. I won’t be used. I won’t betray my city to the whims of people who can’t see beyond the Avatar’s power to the heart of a twelve-year-old boy!

Shirong sucked in a breath, shaken by his own certainty. It burned, that sureness; warming and painful at once.

I won’t be used. And I won’t betray Lee.

Which meant he had to do the hardest thing of all. Nothing.

He broke into Pohuai Stronghold. He got into the North Pole. He can do this.

I hope.

But the only way Lee would stand a chance was if Quan wasn’t sure. If Shirong moved to help, if he moved at all - Quan would be sure.

There’s nothing I can do.

No. Not quite true. There was one thing. And given the close shave he’d had with the haima-jiao, it wouldn’t even look suspicious. Much.

Lighting incense, Shirong stuck the smoking sticks in a bowl of rice before the mini-shrine every Dai Li kept in his quarters, and clapped his hands to pray.

Oma and Shu, Tui and La... Agni, if you’ll hear one who’s cursed your people so thoroughly most of his life.... One of your children really needs your help.

I know he’s a crazy, mixed-up kid. I know you’re all probably staring at him cross-eyed, trying to figure out what to do with a Fire Nation waterbender - with a firebender uncle! - who can’t turn around without tripping over a kamuiy. But he’s trying to do the right thing. He’s trying to help that other poor kid you stuck with the fate of the world. That’s got to count for something.

I know I don’t deserve any favors. I’m Dai Li. I did what I had to do. But... help him. Please.

Well. That was it. Shirong sighed, and lowered his hands-

For one heartbeat, the shrine glowed gold.

“Sparky?”

“Yes?” Zuko answered, half-listening as he scanned the dark lake for any sign of a boat. Toph could pick up anything moving on the ground, but they’d already had one near miss with a courier dead asleep on a canny old ostrich-horse standing in the middle of the road. Which had led to a tense, whispered explanation of how seeing with earthbending worked, and his realization that to Toph, the lake was one big black hole.

“I’m impressed.” Said with the kind of finality that implied Toph just didn’t do impressed, most of the time.

“Why?” Zuko looked at her, puzzled. “You know what my uncle did as a general. If the Fire Lord commands, you obey.”

“And...?” Toph prodded.

Zuko rolled his eyes. “You know, that’s really annoying.” Useful, though. What he wouldn’t give for a living lie detector to handle the court weasel-snakes.

Would have given, Zuko reminded himself. At least you should be able to avoid most of them, now. Not entirely, the plan might bring them in contact with who knew what... but they definitely wouldn’t be around on a daily basis.

“Deal with it,” Toph said cheerfully. “Come on. We both know you’re not in this just to follow orders.”

Can I trust her?

Does it really matter?

Zuko sighed. “Do you want Azula in charge of the Fire Nation?” He shivered at the thought. No doubt Toph felt it. He just didn’t care.

The earthbender let out what would have been a whistle, if they hadn’t been worried about getting caught. “Yeah. Yeah, that’d make me... pretty determined. If it was me.” She smirked, and stomped; a lump of shaped rock rose to the surface, round door shedding water. “Guess that just leaves one more question. How can you fake it so well everybody in the city thinks you’re a waterbender?”

Zuko smirked back, and raised his hands, palms together. “Watch your rocks.” A breath, and he swept his hands apart and down.

Water sheeted off stone, slipping back into the lake like a silken curtain. Toph’s jaw dropped.

“We don’t want to leave wet footprints,” Zuko said bluntly. “I’m not going to be able to do that inside. The Dai Li keep track of every bender in the city. If I use water, the mask won’t matter.” He hesitated. “Don’t tell them. Please.”

“Okay,” Toph nodded, milky eyes still wide. “Nobody’d believe it anyway... how?”

“I drowned on dry land.” Zuko shrugged, trying not to let it matter. “If... what I was told is right, the spirits are arguing over what should happen next. With Aang. With everything. Yue... she said I’d tried to bring some balance back. After that - Amaya got the water out of my lungs, and took me in.” He snorted. “Want to know what’s really scary? She and Uncle conspire on my lessons.

There's nothing in any scrolls about bending fire and water at the same time, so they get to be creative. I swear I've caught them giggling." And that was really too much, he shouldn't have-

"I bet." Toph's face was one wide grin. "Can I at least tell the guys Lee's Fire Nation? We're going to be leaving anyway... and I have got to feel the look on Sugar Queen's face!"

Surprising himself, Zuko snickered. Wish I could see that. "Just say we're colonials. That's the story Uncle's been using." He let out a slow breath, shutting fear and laughter away. "Ready?"

"Right behind you." Toph crooked a finger, and the cover skated aside.

Focus on the goal, Zuko reminded himself. Forget you're helping the Avatar. Remember you're saving your people.

Determined, he descended into green-lit shadows.

In a way, the frantic pounding on Huojin's door was a relief.

Dai Li wouldn't pound, they'd just appear inside. The Guard hopped over one of Daiyu's stray wooden ostrich-horses as he headed for the door. He'd been about to head out for headquarters anyway, his fellow Guards knew where he was. They probably just needed an extra, early hand. Riot, fire, fugitive in the area, something like that. All of which, no matter how dire, had to be better than Dai Li on his doorstep. I really lucked out-

He opened the door, and had to look down.

Skinny kid. Shaved bald. Flying lemur on his shoulder. Airbender tattoos. Oh, and two determined-looking Water Tribe teens backing him up, one carrying a mean boomerang and the girl a waterskin and a glint in blue eyes that said she knew how to use it.

...I'm going to get you for this, Lee. Somehow.

"Where's Luli?" the airbender - the Avatar - demanded.

"Where's Toph?" the waterbender added, voice edged with violence.

"And who's this guy Lee, anyway?" Boomerang jumped in.

"Evening to you, too," Huojin drawled. Act like you don't see the threat, and maybe they'll get over themselves. "You can report missing persons at Guard headquarters." Might as well head there now, Huojin thought, stepping into the street past them and marching off. I want backup. Lots of backup.

"Report this, wait for that - everything here strangles in rules!" The airbender's staff struck the ground, and Huojin felt a familiar tremor-

He didn't move fast enough.

Okay, Huojin thought, up to his neck in rock and trying to hold his temper to a slow simmer, now I know why Lee's so snarly.

The Avatar landed in front of him, gray eyes determined. "Where's Luli?"

Keep your temper, Huojin told himself, trying not to growl. Don't escalate the situation. "What the hell do you want with my wife?"

...Well, I tried.

“Your wife?” The Avatar blinked, and seemed to shrink a little. “Um... we just want to talk to her....”

“Rocks off,” Huojin said flatly. “Then we can talk.”

Earth rumbled back into the street.

Brushing himself off, Huojin looked at the kids and shook his head. “What is with you, anyway? Don’t you know that’s assault? On a City Guard? Trouble doesn’t even begin to cover it.” He eyed the oldest of the bunch, boomerang and all. “And you’re all out past curfew. Toph would know better.”

“She said she wanted to talk to Luli, and then she didn’t come back,” Boomerang stated, hands out to ease the tension. “It took us hours just to find you. We just want to know where Toph is.”

“And who Lee is,” the waterbender said darkly.

A kid with more guts than sense. “Toph was here earlier,” Huojin said plainly. “I didn’t see when she left.” Or who she’d left with. The less he knew about Lee breaking into Dai Li headquarters, the better.

“Why was she here?” Boomerang said pointedly.

So one of them had half a brain. But given he’d asked that on the street.... Huojin sighed.

The teenager slapped himself on the forehead, and gave Huojin a weak grin. “Right! To see Luli. Why else? So... where is Luli?”

“Papers,” Huojin said bluntly.

“What?”

“You’re underage, you’re out past curfew, you assaulted a Guard, and you are definitely behaving in a belligerent and disorderly fashion,” Huojin stated. “You think I’m going to tell you where my wife is when I don’t know who you are?”

“We... don’t have any papers,” the waterbender admitted. “Toph did, but....”

“We don’t need papers!” That obstinate look was back in gray eyes. “I’m the Avatar.”

Huojin lifted a brow, arched with all the skeptical disbelief of a Guard who’d heard every drunk spirit-tale under the sun. “Sure you are.”

Heh. This could be fun.

Well, if everything blows up in our faces, at least Sparky’s having fun, Toph thought, grinning behind her mask.

It wasn’t anything big. Other people probably wouldn’t even see a smile. But there was a lightness in Zuko’s step she’d never felt before. A fragile joy, as if all the lumps of confused prince had dropped away and left a flutter-hornet dancing in the breeze.

He’s good at this.

Which was weird, for a firebender, given how much of this was listening and waiting to move. Silence and speed and silence again, moving in the gaps of guards' attention. He'd even held her shoulder, one unseen moment, and demonstrated a slight adjustment to her step that softened her footfalls even further.

And while all the rest of him was silent, she could feel his heart beating like solstice morning.

Or like the tournaments, Toph realized, following close behind. This is the real opponent. The good one. The one that's going to take everything you've got, and you still might lose.

But if you pull it off... man, you win it all.

On top of that, he was glad she was there. Her. Specifically. She'd felt tension seeping out of him as they'd walked, and she'd proved she was a better lookout at night than anyone with eyes. Felt him - not tense - but ready himself to watch what might be out in the water, where she couldn't see. Felt his hesitance as he adjusted her step, and his honest delight when she silently accepted the correction and did her best to mimic him, within the limits of her bending.

Zuko was glad she was there. That was... whoa.

So stay on your toes, Toph told herself, as they ghosted down yet another corridor of mostly-empty prison cells. Don't screw this up. Her eyes widened, and she stopped, hand out close enough to feel the heat radiating from Zuko's shirt. "What?" she murmured.

"I don't believe this," Zuko breathed, peering into one cell. Wrestled with himself, and sighed. "We have to get them out. You'd better do the talking."

"Why just them?" Toph asked pointedly.

"I don't know why anybody else is here. These three, I do. Damn."

Okay, she could work with that. Zuko eased the lock open, and Toph stuck her masked head in enough to hear the differences between a young girl, a skinny guy, and a guy a little more heavily built than Zuko. "If you want out of here, follow us, and stay quiet."

Feet thumped the floor, startled. "I'm Jet," the more muscled teen said; voice trying for confident, but ragged at the edges. "They're Smellerbee and Longshot. Who are you?"

"You don't want to know," Toph said bluntly, aware of Zuko's silence. "Less talking, more sneaking."

Around and down, following Zuko's earth-shimmering steps. Toph felt a chamber beyond the wall, the vibrations of too-still bodies, the earth-shadow of a partly open door.

"I'm Joo Dee," a man's voice said calmly. "Welcome to Ba Sing Se."

"I'm Joo Dee," dozens of women said in unison. "Welcome to Ba Sing Se."

"We are so lucky to have our walls to create order."

"We are so lucky to have our walls to create order."

There are hundreds, Amaya had said. Toph felt chilled. And angry.

Some of that was smoking off her partner in crime; she could feel heat drifting through the air. She couldn't blame Sparky one bit.

I don't care what Aang thinks. The Fire Nation wants this city? They can have it.

But that wouldn't be fair to people like Luli, and Huojin, and Amaya. People just trying to get by; people who knew something was wrong with their city, but didn't have the power to fix it.

I'm not sure even Aang can fix this place.

"That - they tried to do that to us, they-"

Smellerbee grabbed Jet's arm, and Longshot clapped a hand over Jet's mouth, shaking his head no.

Oh boy. Toph's stomach headed for her ankles. We're in for it now....

"Shirong hasn't moved?" Long Feng asked coolly. Juggling a myriad interlocking plots in his mind, calculating and recalculating the moves that would need to be made to maintain control of the city and the Earth King. Calculations the Avatar was making needlessly complicated.

He's twelve. He should sit still, keep his mouth shut, and let those who know better decide what is right.

If only he dared bring the Avatar down here....

Too risky. If that blunderer General Fong is accurate, the Avatar State is triggered by extreme emotions. We can't afford to lose all we've built here.

"He's been quiet," Quan reported. "Reading. Praying." The agent met his gaze. "Sir, I admit he's acting... oddly. But we've all had bad days after spirit-injuries."

"So we have," Long Feng acknowledged. "Coming close to death... it shakes a person. But that is precisely the point. I know you're his friend, Quan-"

"It will not prevent me from carrying out my duty. Sir."

"Of course not," Long Feng said levelly. "But friendship can soften any man's judgment." He frowned darkly. "He arranged to see Amaya and Lee unwatched, and then she arranged to see the Avatar. One of whose teachers is now missing."

"Coincidence?" Quan offered.

Long Feng cast him a look askance.

Quan bowed his head. "There are no coincidences." He breathed out slowly. "Sir, Healer Amaya has been a reliable asset for years...."

"But she is now Lee's master," Long Feng stated. "And Lee... troubles me."

Reluctantly, Quan nodded. "It wasn't obvious at first... but no one with that level of weapons training should have avoided military attention. Elderly uncle as a dependant or not."

"Yet that's apparently precisely what he has done," Long Feng observed. "And the haima-jiao. I've read the reports. They are disturbing." He shook his head. "How does a half-trained bender throw off a spirit that sucked in his own master whole? A spirit that drew strength from water, and was only harmed by light and fire?"

Quan inclined his head, acknowledging the unanswered questions. "Lee is certainly suspect. But we have no reason to believe Shirong has... strayed.”

“None yet,” Long Feng started.

Running feet, and a junior agent was panting in his doorway. “Sir! We’ve found Bei Fong!”

Or rather, Long Feng realized as he and Quan broke in on the fray, she’d found them.

And she wasn’t alone.

The three Yunxu questioned about the haima-jiao, Long Feng realized. Conscious, still defiant - but a minimal threat, given they were unarmed aside from a few hastily-grabbed shards of stone. Insignificant, in the face of a rampaging Toph Bei Fong. And it was indeed her, despite that ridiculous mask. No other earthbender could disintegrate stone fists without even looking, and swat Dai Li agents across the room with pillars of rock.

That’s the known danger, Long Feng thought dispassionately, waiting motionless as he sized up the form behind the Blue Spirit mask. Right height, the right build, dao... a pity he’d been right about Shirong....

The intruder slashed stone from the air, and fire lashed out to blast agents away.

A firebender!

Too many of them, Zuko thought grimly, blasting to pieces the stone glove on the back of Toph’s shirt before it could drag her away. Trying not to glance behind him, as Smellerbee and Longshot kept their leader from strangling him.

I give up. Jet’s not just an idiot. He’s insane.

A passing thought, flitting around the taut focus of working with Toph to keep them all alive and free. There were just too many Dai Li....

At least, too many for nonlethal tactics.

I don’t want to kill them. I know some of these people. All we want is to get the bison and get out. If we just had some cover....

He was moving before he could think it through, blades clicking together, free hand diving into his shirt to pull out a bag and scatter its contents in one furious toss.

Dried leaves fluttered. For one instant, he saw Long Feng’s startled look.

Burn.

The fire-wind blazed, flames whipping around to block them from the Dai Li’s view.

Benders can’t hit what they can’t see.

Except for Toph, who laughed as the missiles stopped coming and slammed up walls just beyond the fire. Cracked her knuckles, and yanked a square door open in stone. “Come on!”

He dove and rolled, Smellerbee and Longshot yanked Jet through, and Toph slammed the wall behind them.

We're being stalled, Katara thought darkly, stalking through the pre-dawn twilight toward the Wen house. At least it had better be the Wen house, after the time Luli's husband and his fellow guards had spent denying the Avatar right in front of their faces.

They did it on purpose. They knew who Aang was. Everybody knows!

Ooo, she would have liked to freeze them all to the floor. Especially Luli's husband. Something about him just set her teeth on edge.

This had better be it, or I'm freezing people solid.

"Maybe Aang should knock on the door," Sokka spoke up behind her.

"Right," Katara bit out. "Because that worked so well last time."

"Okay, maybe I should."

She rounded on him. "Oh, like you did any better, the way those Guards stalled us!"

"They're scared," Aang said quietly.

"That's no excuse! We're trying to help them!"

"And we want them to help us," Sokka pointed out. "They're not going to want to do that if you turn them into ice cubes." Face set, he pushed past her and knocked on the door.

A long minute passed. Katara listened hard, catching a murmur that sounded like arguing behind thick wood.

The door opened, and a well-dressed woman about as old as Toph's mother swept a green gaze over them all. "Can I help you?"

"I'm Sokka," her brother smiled, and gestured toward them. "This is my sister Katara, our friend Aang, and Momo-"

The lemur trilled, cocking his head endearingly.

"We're looking for a friend of ours, Toph Bei Fong? She said she was going to see Luli, and we hear she's here. At the Wen house? Unless we have the wrong place, and in that case I'm sorry we woke you up...."

If she hadn't been watching, Katara would never have caught the flicker of the woman's eyes toward the rooftops.

"I'm Meixiang Wen," the woman stated, standing aside from the doorway. "Luli's still asleep; the children wore her out. But I may be able to answer your questions." A slight smile touched her face. "And my daughter Jia would never forgive me if I let you get away before she's up. You're still the talk of her poetry class."

"Really?" Sokka preened.

Boys! Katara fumed. But held her peace until the door was closed behind them. "Look, I'm sure Sokka would love to stick around, but we need to find Toph."

"And Appa," Aang added. "Please, could you just talk to us? Toph could really be in trouble!"

Meixiang looked over them again, and sighed. “She already is.” She shook her head. “But she has help. It should be enough. And I know if you go after her, you will likely all be imprisoned. Or worse.” She didn’t give them time to gasp, green eyes fixing on startled gray. “Avatar Aang. What harm has my family ever done you, that you bring the Dai Li to our door?”

“You can’t blame Aang for that!” Katara objected.

“They’re following us,” Sokka pointed out. “She kind of has a point.” He frowned at Meixiang. “Are you going to be in trouble?”

“My husband is a professor of archaeology, a teacher of history from the time before there were Dai Li. Long before they claimed the reins of power as their own. We live in danger.” She looked at Aang again. “I told you, Toph is not here. She found someone who could help her, and she’s gone to find something you lost. I suggest you find somewhere Toph can find you, and wait.” She frowned. “And then I suggest you leave Ba Sing Se, and go where you stand a chance of helping our people.”

“I have been helping!” Aang protested. “I’m trying to save the Earth Kingdom! Why do people keep telling me to leave?”

“You....” Meixiang flung up her hands in frustration, and called upstairs. “Tingzhe!”

A startled, graying professor Katara vaguely recognized from the university appeared at the top of the stairs, still wrapped in sleeping robes. “Meixiang?”

“I need to force-feed this boy a map!”

One brow went up, and he peered at Aang. Shook his head, and sighed. “Second set of shelves, two down, right hand side. And try not to scar him before I get there, hmm?”

“Sokka has plenty of maps,” Katara started.

“Then he hasn’t been looking at them,” Meixiang stated, opening the door to a scroll-strewn study. She picked her way down the shelves, took out three scrolls, put one back, and spread a map of the Earth Kingdom on a small table. “Look. We’re here.” She tapped the massive double oval of walls that marked Ba Sing Se. “The Fire Nation has invaded here-” her hand swept over the western peninsula and coast “-and while no one tells us of the war, they’ve probably moved to invade the other water route, into Chameleon Bay and the two lakes.”

“They’re cutting you off,” Sokka nodded. “That’s why we have to be here.”

“No!” Meixiang shot him a look of mingled anger and impatience. “That’s why you shouldn’t be here!”

“She’s right, you know.” Professor Tingzhe walked in behind them, robe tied. “In Chin the Conqueror’s time, Ba Sing Se almost fell before Kyoshi defeated him-”

“You mean killed him,” Aang said, disgusted.

“And what would you have had her do? Invite him to a tea ceremony?” Tingzhe regarded Aang with a level look. “The city almost fell, true. But Chin had far more solid a grip on the continent than the Fire Nation has yet managed. And Kyoshi was not within these walls. That led Chin to split his forces, and that itself might have led to his defeat even if she had not acted.” His gaze went to Sokka. “I’ve been told you have some small grasp on tactics... so long as Avatar Aang is inside Ba Sing Se, the Fire Nation can concentrate their forces. Which allows them to develop the simplest and shortest supply lines possible, and....” Seeing their looks of confusion, he grimaced. “Earthbending, Avatar. Think of the Earth Kingdom as a mighty boulder. What is more likely to shatter it? Scattered, small strikes? Or one massive blow?”

“What are you doing?”

Katara jerked her attention to the aghast teenage boy in the doorway. Taller than Sokka, earth-green eyes, face dark with not-yet-shaved morning stubble. “You can’t be talking about this!” the young man went on. “You know what can happen. You know what happened to Bai Xiu!”

“I do know, Min,” Tingzhe said soberly. “But I also know to do nothing against evil is not a neutral act.” He glanced at Aang. “A mistake your people made, centuries ago. The Earth Kingdom has long memories. It cost you. Dearly.” He looked back at his son. “I have done nothing because there was nothing I could do. But the Avatar is here, and our fate is already in the Dai Li’s hands.”

“Not if I can help it,” Meixiang said grimly.

“This is crazy,” Min breathed, looking between his parents. “You’re crazy. You can’t- you never would have done this before he showed up!”

“Who’s he?” Katara pounced. “Lee?”

From the flare of anger in Min’s eyes, she knew she’d hit home. “Get out,” Min snarled at them. “Get out of here, before you get my family killed!”

“Min!” Tingzhe said sternly. “You will not behave so to guests. Even uninvited ones.”

“Nobody’s going to be killed,” Aang said stubbornly. “Just tell me how I can help. I’m the Avatar. Helping people is what I do.”

“You can’t help,” Min growled, turning on his heel and stomping off.

“Min, wait,” Katara said impulsively, running after him to the foot of the stairs. “If your family’s in trouble, we can do something!”

“You’re kids,” Min said dismissively. “What are you going to do, hold off a thousand Dai Li single-handed? I don’t even know why Mom let you in! She knows what this could do to us, what this could do to my brother and sisters. And Dad’s helping her....” Fists clenched, he shook his head. “Go. Just - go.”

“You can’t give up,” Katara said, determined. “Maybe we’re strangers here. Maybe we can’t do anything. But they’re your family! There’s got to be something you can do.”

“Yeah,” Min said, half to himself, eyes dark. “I guess there is.”

They could have used the door, Zuko reflected. But Toph was having way too much fun.

Bits of rock crumbling in every direction, they tumbled into a chamber that smelled like hay and thick fur and outside. Chains clinked, and he looked up at a massive shape of white and tan and sharp black horns-

“Appa! Hey, fuzzy!” Toph ran straight for a furry foreleg. “I’m sorry, I’m so sorry....”

Are you crazy? Zuko spun and leaped, trying to get between her and furry death. That thing is-

His glove touched an arrow of fur, and the world wavered.

Half-light of dawn fell over a grassy mountain meadow, and Aang was chuckling as he scratched under dark horns. “Don’t worry. Appa’s a vegetarian.”

The firebender snorted. “You’ve never seen komodo-rhino calves born, have you?”

Dawn went out like a candle, and Zuko took a hasty half-step sideways to keep from staggering. What was that?

That never happened. I know it never happened.

So why did it feel real?

“Appa?” Jet finally quit fighting his friends, though he glared at Zuko. “The Dai Li had the Avatar’s bison?”

Still have. Unless we move. Zuko tapped Toph on the shoulder while she was wiping her eyes, pointed up to the grate closing off the skylight. It’ll be tight, but it’s big enough to fly out.

“Right!” Straightening, Toph waved to the freedom fighters. “Climb on!” Dropped her voice to a whisper. “Um. Can’t see in the air, how are we going to-?”

“You know how many times I’ve watched Aang fly away?” Zuko murmured back, unlocking the first massive manacle. “We can do this.”

Toph scooted around to hit the locks on the other side, and Appa’s wide head moved back and forth to watch them both. Turned toward Zuko again as he reached for the last metal twist-key-

Sucked in a breath that spiraled, lifting the key half clear.

“Smart,” Zuko whispered to the bison, untwisting it the rest of the way. “Don’t get caught this way twice.” He leapt up to perch on the back of the furry neck, and latched onto Toph’s hand, pulling her up-

Rock surged, sucking in the bison’s feet. Appa bellowed, tail flailing with a mighty wind.

“Struggle all you like.” Long Feng advanced through the open door, ranks of Dai Li behind him. “You’re going-”

“Trust me!” Zuko hissed, and swung Toph down.

Her feet hit rock, and she twisted her toes, stone dissolving into sand. “Yip yip!”

Zuko pulled even as Appa launched, a solid lump of earthbender driving the breath from him in the wake of Appa’s wind.

Grate’s coming up awfully fast-

Toph punched, and they soared free into dawn.

“Yes!” Smellerbee caterwauled, dour face stretched in an incredulous grin.

“Why?” Jet demanded, voice full of hate. “You’re a firebender. Why are you doing this?”

“Because not everybody in the Fire Nation’s crazy, you blockhead!” Toph yanked off her mask.

"I'm Aang's earthbending teacher. And he's a friend."

"A friend?"

Agni. Longshot can talk.

"Yeah. And he can't get caught." Toph leaned back next to Zuko. "Now what?"

"Follow what I do," Zuko murmured. "The Nomads didn't always use reins." Taking her hand in his own, he pressed near Appa's left horn. The bison obligingly banked.

I wish we could go slower. But there's no time.

He urged Appa up and over the Outer Wall, dodging blocks of stone hefted by startled guards.

"Now, that's just rude," Toph complained.

Zuko snorted, guiding Appa down at least an hour's ride outside the Wall. Pointed at the freedom fighters, and swept a hand toward the ground.

"You're just going to leave us here?" Jet burst out. "We've got nothing!"

"We're out of Ba Sing Se," Smellerbee shot back, jumping down. "That's not nothing."

Silent again, Longshot yanked Jet off.

"Here!" Toph tossed a coin-string Smellerbee's general direction. "I'm Toph Bei Fong. And one of these days, you're going to pay me back!" She patted Appa's head. "Yip yip!"

"Can you afford that?" Zuko asked, keeping his voice low as they climbed skyward. "You're going to need to run-"

Toph waved it off. "Hello? Earth Rumble champion? I'm good. Besides, people give Aang stuff. We'll be fine."

"Like Azula," Zuko muttered under his breath.

Toph frowned. "Um, Sparky? She's almost as short and bouncy, I'll give you that. But why would you think Aang's anything like her?"

"Everything's easy for her." Heading back over the wall too high for boulders, Zuko swallowed hard. "Look at him. Twelve years old, and he's a master. A few months, and he could waterbend. Don't tell me he's not getting in days what took you years." He looked aside. "And everyone helps him. Everyone says he's doing the right thing. Agni, even the spirits want him to win."

"I kind of want him to win too, Sparky."

"At least you're honest about it," Zuko said tiredly. "I wish I could stop the war, Toph. I really wish I could. But I can't. Because you know what will happen if it stops? They'll come for us. The Earth Kingdom, the Water Tribes... you have no idea how much they hate us. They'll come. And what will the Avatar do then?"

"...Aang wouldn't let that happen. Not to anybody."

"Don't lie to me, Toph," Zuko said angrily. "Sozin destroyed everything Aang knew. Everything. You haven't been to the Air Temples. I have. I've seen them all." Taking her mask and his own, he threw them into Lake Laogai. "The North Pole was just a warm-up!"

“Zuko-”

“Just get them out, Toph. Get them out.” He took the cloak off her shoulders, preparing to reverse it from dark to a pale green to hide the Blue Spirit’s outfit. “Drop me in the Upper Ring. I’ll tell you where. And then, this is what you do....”

“Sokka, we’ve got to go back and help them!”

Keeping a good grip on yellow and orange, Sokka kept walking. “I think we’ve helped them enough, Aang.” Hit the Fire Nation from behind. Like sending a decoy hunter to strike the tiger-seals, and drive them the way you want them to go. I should have thought of that. Why didn’t I think of that?

I got caught up in “I must defeat the Fire Lord”, that’s why. And maybe the spirits do want Aang to take him one-on-one. Crazy as that sounds. But big and evil as he is, Fire Lord Ozai’s just one guy. We’ve got whole armies to worry about.

Still. The Wens didn’t know about the eclipse. They had a chance to knock out the Fire Lord and his main guys in the Fire Nation. They had to take it. But in order to do that, they had to see the Earth King, and get the generals on their side.

And for that, we need Toph. I hate to say it, but it looks like the only way we’re going to get anywhere is start knocking down walls-

“Sokka!” Katara grabbed his wrist, startling him into letting go of Aang. “Look!”

Sokka’s jaw dropped. White and brown with a patch of green clinging for dear life, flying north, then east, south, west, and back around the rough square-

“Appa!” Snapping his glider open, Aang hurtled into the air.

“Oh, boy,” Sokka breathed, pulling out his boomerang as Katara flicked open her waterskin. The green shadows on the roofs were heading for the streets, and the moment those stone shoes touched earth-

Appa swooped down, Aang holding his staff out so they could grab on, sucking them up with a friendly wind.

Stone gloves crashed through empty air, and they were flying.

“Appa!” Aang was clinging to the bison’s head, tears running. “Oh, I missed you, buddy....”

“Toph!” Katara grabbed the white-faced earthbender, pulled her back to anchor between the two of them. “You’re all right!”

“Hey,” Toph said breathlessly. “Hope you didn’t leave anything you can’t live without in the mansion. I just took out a dozen Dai Li, and boy are they mad.”

“The Dai Li had Appa?” Aang yelped.

“It gets a lot worse than that, Twinkletoes.” Toph tried to put on a brave face, but she was shivering.

She can’t see anything, and we don’t even have a saddle to grab onto. Sokka hand-walked a few inches closer, making sure Toph was wedged up against Katara. “Let’s land somewhere and talk.”

“Not in the city!” Toph gulped, and clung tighter. “There’s an island. Out in the lake. Should be safe for a while.”

“Toph,” Katara said, worried, “how do you know there’s an island over there?”

“Lee told me,” Toph said practically. “He gave me a letter for you, Sokka. You better read it.”

Sokka traded a glance with Aang. The airbender looked ahead, and nodded. “One island, coming up!”

They tumbled off Appa’s back onto gritty sand, and Toph shook out cramped fingers. Grimly, she drew folded paper out of her robes. “Here.” She whipped a finger toward Katara before his sister could speak. “And no questions! Not until after Sokka reads it.”

“Okay,” Katara said, one brow raised dubiously. “Sokka?”

Sokka unfolded neat creases, and even Aang stopped scratching Appa to listen.

Sokka of the Southern Water Tribe, neatly inked characters read.

If Toph hasn’t already convinced you to get out of Ba Sing Se, leave. Now.

This isn’t Omashu, or any of the other places you’ve been. The Earth King is a figurehead; a political center everyone can refer to as the ultimate authority, even though they know he’s nothing of the kind. The real power in Ba Sing Se is the Grand Secretariat, Long Feng, head of the Dai Li. The generals know this, and are in willing collusion with him. They know what the Dai Li do, but they rely on them to keep order in the city while they battle the Fire Nation. By any means necessary. They know the Dai Li warp people’s minds. They know the Dai Li make some people disappear. They know, and they permit it to go on.

Ba Sing Se is a trap.

Refugees are drawn here by the hope of escaping the war. Once inside, they are told there is no war in Ba Sing Se. Those who cannot accept this, disappear. Those who can and are not broken usually fight on the Wall. Those who break - and many do - work in Ba Sing Se, living a lie. Whatever the original purpose behind this policy, it drains the countryside of potential pockets of resistance, keeps the city itself controlled by fear, and fosters an enduring - and because it is unspoken, irrational - hate of the Fire Nation. I’m sure Fire Lord Ozai would approve.

People who use these tactics are not your allies.

If none of this convinces you, consider why Long Feng had the bison. He has reports from General Fong on the Avatar State. He knows the Fire Navy was shattered at the North Pole. He, or the generals, have decided this is a viable tactic to wreak destruction on the Fire Nation.

The philosophy of the airbenders was that all life is precious. If you want your friend to be himself, and not a living weapon - get out.

It wasn’t signed.

It was weird, though. Something about the words was familiar. Like Sokka could almost hear the voice to match them, if he just remembered-

“Lee gave you this?” Katara said skeptically. “Why didn’t he just tell us?”

"That does seem weird." Aang scratched the back of his neck. "I mean, Monk Gyatso always said the Water Tribes weren't great letter writers... not that that's a bad thing! It's great that you like to talk to people face to face. But you can kind of lose track of someone if they don't visit."

And we couldn't visit the Northern Tribe, being raided all the time, Sokka realized. They just... stopped coming. We got raided for years, and they never sent help. Until Aang broke the Fire Navy for them.

They had reasons. He was sure. But-

"Three reasons," Toph said bluntly, shaking him out of his grim thoughts. "One, we were being watched. Two, we had to go in to get Appa, fast, and I think he was worried he wouldn't get back out. He hasn't been waterbending that long, and he couldn't under the lake, or the Dai Li would know who he was. Three... he didn't want you guys to see him because he didn't want to wind up full of icicles."

"What?" Katara said in disbelief.

Sokka looked at the letter, and the phrasing, and winced. "Lee's not Water Tribe."

"But he's a waterbender," Katara started.

"He's Fire Nation." Toph angled her head toward Aang. "He wanted to help, but he was scared. He's heard about the North Pole. A lot of people have."

"A Fire Nation waterbender?" Katara looked like someone had slapped her with a saw-dogfish.

"He said something about being from the colonies." Toph didn't take her ears off Aang.

The airbender seemed to shrink in on himself. "I didn't mean to do... that." He tried to smile. "He's really Fire Nation? Wow, that must be weird-"

"You don't get to dodge this one, Twinkletoes." Toph crossed her arms, immovable as granite. "Maybe you didn't want to. Maybe you didn't mean to. But you did it. And everybody thinks you're going to do it again. Long Feng. The generals. The whole Fire Nation." She shook her head. "You should have heard Lee. He felt awful. Here he is, with the only waterbender he can find who doesn't care where he came from - and you show up. If he doesn't get you out of here, the Fire Nation smashes Ba Sing Se to bits and he's got nowhere left to go. If he does get you out, he's helping the guy who killed thousands of his people. Talk about a rock and a hard place!"

"Well he should feel awful!" Katara flared. "After everything the Fire Nation's done to the world? To us? To Aang? He should feel so horrible he should just - just crawl away and die!"

What the heck is with- oh. Sokka saw her fingers touch her necklace, and grimaced. It's that time of year again. When we lost Mom.

"Katara," Aang started patiently.

"You take that back!" Toph's fists clenched, sand hardening under her feet into solid stone. "Lots of people help us because they want to. Because they know Aang's the Avatar, and they think he's gonna stomp the Fire Nation and stop the war. Lee didn't! Lee doesn't like Aang! He doesn't want anything to do with Aang. He helped get Appa back because it was the right thing to do. Because he doesn't want Aang to ever hurt the way he did at the North Pole again! You take that back!"

She's crying? Sokka realized, jaw dropping. Toph was too tough to cry.

“Lee told me,” Toph said, voice thick with angry tears. “He told me, and I didn’t want to believe him. He said even if the Fire Nation stopped the war, you’d bring it right back to them. That I didn’t know how much the Water Tribes hated the Fire Nation. He helped me, he’s a waterbender, and all you want him to do is die?” She swallowed hard. “Aang, how are you going to stop the war?”

“And then what?” Toph demanded. “We’re going to use the eclipse. We’re going to kick Fire Lord butt. But you’re going to need more than us to do it! Earth Kingdom, Water Tribes - and there they’re gonna be, right in the middle of the people they hate! Then what?”

“Then what we saw at the party, all these weeks of trouble.... Long Feng is in control of the city. I think we should just keep flying and leave this horrible place behind us.”

“But we escaped from the Dai Li. And we got Appa back. We’re on a roll,” Sokka said confidently. “We should go to the Earth King now and tell him our plan. Before Long Feng can get to him.”

“Maybe Long Feng already got to him,” Toph objected. “I heard them making Joo Dees under the lake. They just... make these ladies so they’ll say what the Dai Li want them to say! What if they did that to the Earth King, too?”

“Then we have to go to him, so Katara can heal him.” Aang looked between them all, full of that sureness that everything in the world could be fixed if they just tried. “If he knows the truth about the Dai Li and the war, I know he’ll help! It’s the right thing to do.” He glanced up suddenly, and raced to the lakeshore.

“Aang, what’s-” Sokka looked out into the water. Earth Kingdom ships. “Um... how many Dai Li did you say you squashed?”

“There were a lot of them.” Toph touched a toe to the water, obviously unhappy. “They’re out there?”

“Probably. So....” Sokka turned to Katara, sure of what she’d say. Mention healing, and she was all over the situation.

Too close.

Iroh sat in their new apartment with a cup of fragrant jasmine tea, watching his nephew sleep the sleep of an exhausted infiltrator. But only sleep. No sign of the deadly fever that would mark a break of his father's loyalty. Not yet.

But it will come, Iroh reflected grimly. I have tried to balance him on a knife's edge... and he is slipping.

The Avatar. Why here? Why now? Was the spirits' plan so desperate it could not have waited another month? Even another week?

Our flight weakened us. Amaya and I have done what we can... but I do not know if he is strong enough to survive. If his loyalty breaks now....

Fingers wrapped around his tea, Iroh tried to hold onto hope.

It slipped through his grasp like ashes.

"...The Council of Five and the military are loyal to the Earth King, but the Dai Li remain loyal to you, Long Feng, sir."

Long Feng smiled behind walls sheathed in steel, considering plots upon plots and options the Avatar's little group of troublemakers had never dreamed of. So the Earth King had proved easily swayed? Then he would be as swiftly swayed back, once given information that rather than fighting against the Fire Nation, the Avatar's allies were agents of the Fire Lord himself.

Poor little Bei Fong, by now trapped and unable to dispute his Dai Li's evidence... especially given her little friends were now scattered to the winds, save for one overconfident waterbender. He'd seen benders puffed up with their supposed mastery before. Katara could easily be neutralized. The Kyoshi Warriors were a less predictable factor... but they'd offered their services to Full Moon Bay to fight in the war. They should be easily convinced it didn't matter who was in charge in Ba Sing Se.

And once Lee had given up his firebender contact - and been convinced to give evidence of his conspiracy with the Fire Nation and Shirong, so the Earth King would see only a rogue Dai Li at fault and not his most trusted advisor - these steel bars would be but a memory.

Min Wen will make a fine agent, indeed.

Chapter End Notes

Okay, did anybody else look at what was found in Long Feng's office and think, "Trap!"

We know Long Feng's a plotter, and has been for decades. Information related to the Gaang, that those generals could find in his office? That just happens to get his latest enemies-slash-annoyances scattered to the four winds, with two of the three powerful benders out of the city entirely?

Right. Trap.

Azula piggy-backing on the opportunity to get in was probably the one thing Long

Feng didn't see coming. But then, she was born lucky.

Assume most of "The Earth King" happened as canon, minus Appa's tooth-marks and Zuko's hallucinations. Poor guy. He'd probably prefer the hallucinations, compared to what's coming.

Chapter 21

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

And my brother chased these fools for months? Azula thought contemptuously, lounging at her ease in their Upper Ring guest quarters as Ty Lee and Mai surreptitiously checked their rooms for spy-holes and listening posts. They were sure to be here, just as they were in the ambassadorial rooms put at their disposal in the palace. The trick was to locate the most likely spots, and shape their conversations accordingly.

Sokka of the Southern Water Tribe, Azula recalled, committing the name to her mental files of useful idiots. It was good to know exactly who among your enemies was fool enough to let in those he assumed were allies without ever checking for himself.

Zuzu chased you across the world and couldn't catch you. But I don't have to chase you anymore. All I have to do is wait... and gather the forces I need to take out the Avatar once and for all.

And thanks to the Earth King, she knew precisely where to find them. What a naïve, useful young man. Perhaps she'd leave him as a puppet. He was so good at it.

Sitting in front of her mirror, Mai signaled a subtle, currently clear.

Azula smiled. "We have been presented with an extraordinary opportunity, girls...."

An opportunity her brother would never have seized. Poor Zuzu. Bent on removing a threat to the Fire Nation, and never seeing that threat mobilized their people to make all their conquests possible.

My brother never did have vision. Even before Dad took half of it away.

A pity Fire Lord Ozai hadn't finished the job. But that was all right. As soon as Ba Sing Se was on its knees, she'd find dear Zuzu....

And finally indulge in being an only child.

Well, the good news is the Avatar took his bison and left, Shirong reflected, stalking down one of the palace's little-used corridors as if he had every right to be there. The bad news is, the Avatar's little band raised more havoc than a chest full of ninety-nine-year spirits, Long Feng's been arrested, the generals are making some kind of massive plans....

And I'm being watched.

Off and on, not at all times... but even so, it made no sense. If Lee had left some sign of his identity breaking the bison free, then they should both be in interrogation rooms even now. If Lee hadn't - why the watching eyes?

Whatever it is, it can't be good.

Which was why he'd moved to intercept Lee here, before the healer stood a chance of encountering any new faces in the palace, rather than waiting in the garden. He had an excuse, if anyone asked. It was even true.

And there's my young break-in artist.

"You'd better get well soon," Lee said, smile crooked. "I'm missing my uncle's grand opening--"

"You might want to watch your step today," Shirong said, carefully casual.

"Why?" the healer asked warily.

"It's better if I just show you. That way, you'll know what parts of the palace to avoid." And hopefully, that will give my watchers time to relax.

Not that his fellow agents would allow themselves to be bored. But complacent... yes, that was possible. If the Dai Li knew where their targets were heading, and so relaxed - it might give them breathing room. Particularly since these young women were definitely in the Earth King's favor.

Lee kept his questions to himself, only pausing near the outskirts of the section in question to murmur, "Ambassadorial quarters?"

"I suppose they were, once," Shirong said, startled. "How did you know?"

"Color scheme."

Which made no sense whatsoever-

Shirong blinked, and looked at decorative friezes and tapestries with fresh eyes. The dominant colors were greens and browns, as befitted a palace of the Earth Kingdom. But there were also touches of blue, and yellow, and even hints of red and black.

The elements, Shirong realized. I've walked these halls for twenty years and never saw it. "Are you certain you won't change your mind?" he said wistfully, stopping for a moment in the shadow of a pillar. "We could use you. Now more than ever."

"It wouldn't be honorable," Lee started.

And vanished.

No stranger to taking the high ground, Shirong joined the young waterbender up near the ceiling. I'll be. He got the ice gloves to work.

Though they were more lumps than gloves, frozen to stone. Still, it was working; panic could do wonders for any focused bender. And Lee was definitely half a breath from panic.

White as he is? I'd give fifty-fifty on just fainting.

Shirong shook his head minutely, and moved so he could catch Lee if things went wrong. He'd heard those armored young ladies were good, but Lee's meeting must have really left a mark-

"Will we be able to speak to General How?" the black-haired leader said to a palace guard, marching with precise and graceful steps as her two subordinates trailed in her wake. "Much as the Earth King has honored us with his welcome, we would be most grateful for the chance to address a leader skilled and ingenious enough to come up with such a plan."

"The general's very busy, ma'am, but I'm sure something can be arranged...."

Shirong waited until they were out of earshot to murmur, "Sorry about the shock. I thought it would be better to show you where the Kyoshi Warriors are--"

“They’re not Kyoshi Warriors.”

Grim. Angry. And desperately afraid. Shirong heard it all in Lee’s voice, and tried not to shiver. “What?”

“Outside,” Lee whispered, face gray. “We have to- I can’t- air.”

Shirong led them both to their usual garden, all too aware they were likely to be watched. But it was one of the few places they shouldn’t have guests stumbling on them. And the way Lee’s face had just shut down, like a soldier cut off and about to be swarmed....

If it’s that bad, we might want the rest of the Dai Li to know. “What do you mean, they’re not Kyoshi Warriors?”

“They’re Fire Nation.”

The world seemed to tilt sideways. Shirong forced himself to catch his breath, and silently cursed himself for using his rock gloves so casually earlier. His chi still wasn’t up to bending. “Those outfits, that makeup - how can you possibly-?”

“I know, all right?” Lee drew a breath, deliberately unclenching his fists. “I know them.”

“How convenient.”

Shirong whipped his head around, taking in Quan’s grim look, a pale Min Wen in a trainee’s outfit-
We’re dead.

But he wasn’t about to go down without a fight, weak chi or not. “Why?” Shirong asked, trying not to let his heartbreak show in his voice. And wondering why it cut so very keenly. He was Dai Li, he knew the score; it didn’t matter if you were loyal, if Ba Sing Se would be more stable without you. “I’ve always acted to protect this city.”

“By concealing the presence of Fire Nation colonials, and allowing them to make contact with a firebender infiltrated inside?” Quan’s gaze was hard as he eyed Lee. “It’ll go easier with you if you give the firebender up.”

“No,” Lee said dryly, stance ready and calm as he glanced at Min. “I don’t think it will.” He looked back at Quan, unshakable as granite. “You don’t want to do this. You’ve got bigger problems than me. You don’t know who they are-”

“Yes. They do.”

Gleaming steel flew, and Lee dodged by a hair, rolling to come up in a classic firebending stance.

Why? He has his waterskin - why firebending?

One of the Warriors stood, ready to throw more of the razor edges glinting between her fingers. Her voice was cold, with a studied disinterest that chilled Shirong to the core; she might look like a teenage girl, but she was undoubtedly lethal. “Well. Looks like there’s going to be a family reunion.”

Fire Nation. Lee was right.

“Mai,” Lee breathed, not moving from stance. “Don’t do it.”

“Why?” Gold eyes narrowed. “You never wrote me back.”

Lee glared. “She almost killed Uncle, and you’re upset about a letter?”

“Your uncle’s a traitor. You know what that means.” A black brow flicked slightly upward. “And what do you mean, a letter?”

I had questions about you, Lee, Shirong thought, dryly amused, focused on steel, but this wasn’t how I thought I’d get my answers.

Wait. Just wait. Someone’s going to twitch-

“Are you two talking or killing each other?” Min wondered, held back by Quan’s hand from bending. At either side.

“Shut up,” both Fire Nation teens snapped.

Either’s still possible, then, Shirong thought wryly. But if they were talking, they weren’t killing each other. And given Quan seemed just as coolly interested in hearing more.... Keep them talking. Long enough to get your strength back. “Let me guess. You’re related?”

“No.” Mai’s lip curled.

“Yes,” Lee sighed.

“What?”

“Uncle looked it up when you kept getting serious! He couldn’t figure out why your parents thought they had a chance with my father when there aren’t any benders in your-”

“There are!” Mai’s voice finally betrayed a hint of anger. “Momiji was adopted out because she wasn’t, I know that, but her parents were-”

“Her mother was Ta Min, I know,” Lee said impatiently. “She was Ilah’s mother, too!”

Dead silence.

Ilah, Shirong thought furiously. I’ve heard that name before, somewhere- oh. Damn, Lee had no luck at all, did he? Who’d named their daughter after Fire Lord Ozai’s mother? “So you are related.”

“Second-third cousins,” Lee said impatiently. “Maybe a little closer, given some of the families... never mind. I told you this, Mai! In the last letter, after - after. It wasn’t going to happen, it didn’t matter who your father greased at court - you didn’t need my kind of trouble!”

Mai’s stance didn’t waver, but gold eyes were wide. “...I think I’m going to be sick.”

Shirong added up what he’d heard, and blinked. “Old girlfriend?” he asked Lee dryly.

“I was thirteen!” Lee said defensively. “It’s hard to find records on children adopted out, even when it’s recent. This was a hundred and twenty-one years ago!” He actually took his eyes off Mai, just long enough to give Shirong an aggravated look. “Like Uncle says, I’ve done a lot of foolish things in my life. But this? This one, is not my fault!”

“It has to be.” Mai’s voice was flat, and bitter as wormwood. “She promised me.”

“She lies, Mai.” Lee’s fists were clenched, but his eyes were sad. “Azula always lies.”

Shirong felt his heart speed up, and hoped to hell his bending could match it. “Princess Azula is in the palace?” Seeing Quan’s studiously neutral expression, Shirong blanched. “And you knew. Oma and Shu, why haven’t you-?”

“We are loyal to Long Feng, Shirong,” Quan said bluntly. “It’s a shame you forgot that.”

Lee let out a bitter laugh. “I never thought I’d feel sorry for Long Feng.” He narrowed fire-green eyes at Quan. “She’ll chew him up and spit him out. He’ll just see a little girl, playing with plots she can’t really understand. She’ll smile at him, and tell him how smart he is - and when she’s done, he’ll be dead. Or wish he was.” He flicked a glance at Min. “You should run. As far and fast as you can. If Azula gets her hands on you, your family’s dead.”

“I did this to save my family!” Min said fiercely. “This is your fault! You’re nothing but trouble!”

“From the night I was born,” Lee agreed, a bitter smile ghosting over his face. “Funny thing is? I understand. I do. You do... horrible things, when you’re trying to keep your family together. You try not to see that your sister’s a monster... and your father’s a bloodthirsty murderer.”

“Don’t say things like that!” Mai took a step forward, alarmed. “You’re not a traitor!”

“That’s not what Azula said, when she tried to take us in chains,” Lee bit out. “Did she mention that? Or trying to kill me with a lightning bolt?”

“She wouldn’t!”

“You know damn well she would, Mai!” Lee snarled. “Azula always gets what she wants. Always! There’s just one thing left she hasn’t got. One thing the Fire Sages won’t give her as long as I’m alive! You know that!”

I have the pieces, Shirong thought, stunned. It just doesn’t make sense....

Mai shook her head, black bangs barely stirring. “She’s your sister, Zuko.”

Oh. My. Spirits....

Well. Now he knew why Agni had graced his altar with a sign, after that desperate prayer.

One of your children, indeed.

“That’s never stopped her before.” Lee - Prince Zuko - deepened his stance, obviously seeing opponent, not ex-girlfriend. “If she takes me, I’m dead. Uncle is dead-”

Uncle? Shirong’s eyes bugged, and he saw Quan blink, making the connection. Oma and Shu! General Iroh is here?

“-And if you don’t give a damn about us, there’s an hono’o shoshinsha who doesn’t deserve what’s going to happen!”

One of those words is flame, Shirong thought. What’s the other?

Whatever it was, it stopped Mai in her tracks. Her glance flicked to the palace, then back. “You know I’m loyal to her.”

“I know,” Zuko said plainly. “But you know I’ve never lied to you.” He didn’t even glance at the earthbenders. “Don’t do it, Quan. I’d hate to hurt you. But there are people counting on me. People Azula will kill, if she catches them.” He swallowed. “And she’ll make it hurt a long, long time.”

The utter surety in his voice must have reached Quan. The senior agent stepped back, hands down.

“You can’t be,” Min said in disbelief. “Not a- you have-”

“I showed disrespect to the Fire Lord.” Zuko’s voice was cold and sharp as ice-shattered flint. “Ask Quan. Every noble in the whole damn world laughs about it. I’d be surprised if the Dai Li don’t have all the juicy details.”

Exiled forever, Shirong recalled, forcing his stunned brain to work. Unless he can return with the Avatar-

I sent him after the Avatar’s bison. To save Ba Sing Se. And he let it go.

Heart in his throat, he stepped to Zuko’s side.

“What are you doing?” Quan said in disbelief.

“Avatar Kyoshi created us to serve the city, not one man.” Shirong tried not to let his voice shake. Spirits, what’s wrong with me? “Quan, what if he’s right? Call me a rogue; set a hunt for me if you have to! But the plan I told you about - it’s good. It could work. And what have you lost? Minor resources, easily replaced. Troublemakers Ba Sing Se doesn’t need. What does it cost the Dai Li to let us try? The Dai Li, not Long Feng!”

Quan considered that a long moment. Sighed, and inclined his head.

Mai’s stance coiled. Ready to throw. Zuko tensed-

“Fifteen minutes,” she said coldly. “Then I scream.”

Nodding, Zuko fled.

Scrambling to catch up - damn, he was fast! - Shirong hit the garden wall beside the exiled prince. “Do you believe her?”

“Climb.”

Steel sang and clattered off stone, a hair’s breadth from their feet. “She said-”

“Fifteen until she screams.” Zuko went up like a wasp-spider, fingers clinging to cracks as surely as if he were in rock gloves. “If it doesn’t look right - you don’t want to know what Azula will do.”

“No wonder you’re paranoid.” Breasting the wall, Shirong dropped, bending as his feet hit so the ground yielded instead of his ankles. I’m in no shape for this. “She’s really your-”

“Yes.” Uncoiling from the impact, Zuko raced onward, heading for the outer wall of the palace and the closest gate.

Shirong kept pace, relieved when the guards took one look at them and started opening the portal. Running waterbender with running Dai Li - that was a symptom of the kind of trouble no sane guard wanted to deal with. “And she’s really tried to-”

“I stopped counting when I was eleven.” They bolted out the gate, and Zuko sucked in a breath. “She didn’t try so often after Uncle came home. The one good thing about exile was it was away from her!”

Through crowds, down streets; they finally fetched up behind a sweets shop, as lights were flashing in Shirong’s vision. “Breathe,” Zuko ordered, propping him up from one side. “I need to think.”

“We’re doomed,” Shirong croaked, fighting for air. I should leave. I’m slowing him down. Too injured to run, too weak to fight-

“I need you to warn the Wens.”

“Min bargained for their safety,” Shirong gasped. Quan might be a fool for dealing with the demon-princess, but he wasn’t that stupid.

“If Azula gets near Jinhai, no one’s safe.” Zuko weighed him a second longer, and breathed out sharply. “Firebenders can feel each other.”

Jinhai bends with hot water. A weird, off-the-wall comment he’d let slide, in the wake of trying to do something about the spirit that had nearly eaten... his waterbending recruit.

Prince Zuko. A firebender. How in the world can he-? “I’ve seen you make ice,” Shirong protested.

“Azula hasn’t.” Zuko’s smirk was shadowed, but real. “If Quan tells her, I’m dead. If he doesn’t... I might actually survive.” He nodded. “Go to Meixiang Wen. They’ve got plans. I think they can hide you. I’ll warn Uncle.”

The Dragon of the West is in my city. Has been, for over a month. “Why do you trust me?” Shirong demanded.

“You promised you’d kill me rather than let the haima-jiao use me,” Zuko said simply. “You do what’s right. And letting a six-year-old fall into Azula’s hands....” He shook his head. “You have honor. Being Earth Kingdom doesn’t change that.”

Shirong regarded the exiled prince through narrowed eyes. “Don’t you dare get killed. We need to have a long talk.”

“Later,” Zuko agreed dryly. And faded into the crowd.

One ex-boyfriend, escaped, Mai calculated coldly. His rogue Dai Li agent, likewise. Quan seemed willing to keep silent, and rein in his trainee. And as for the princess who would soon wonder where she was-

She lied to me. Azula lied. To me.

Azula lied to Zuko; everyone knew that. Prince Zuko and political maneuvering mixed about as well as oil and sparks, with much the same results. It just wasn’t prudent to tell Zuko the truth about which nobles were really in the Fire Lord’s favor, or what new maneuvers the army was using, or... anything.

But she told me the Fire Lord would approve our engagement. Just as soon as - as he changed his mind about Zuko’s exile....

And when had Fire Lord Ozai ever changed his mind? About anything?

“The best way to lie to someone,” Azula had laughed, during one late-night planning session, “is to tell them the truth.”

Mai glanced at the sky. She wasn’t a firebender, to feel the sun’s trek toward the west... but close enough. Deep breath.

Mai raised her head to the sun, and loosed phoenix-eagle screams to the sky.

She ignored stunned eyes on her in the sudden silence. “It is Mai,” she said levelly. “Daughter of Niji, and of Governor Tsumami. I pray to be allowed to address Agni.”

Perhaps the sunlight strengthened. Perhaps.

“When loyalty rests with one unworthy of it, honor requires that it not remain.”

A cloud passed over the sun. And what more needed to be said?

“Mai!” Ty Lee bounded in, Azula treading deliberately after her. “What happened?”

“A Fire Nation infiltrator was in the palace,” Quan said smoothly. “If you warrior ladies will excuse us, we need to inform the guards.” Keeping a firm grip on Min’s shoulder, the Dai Li steered his pale recruit inside.

“An infiltrator?” Azula’s gaze took in the knives gleaming in stone, and Mai’s disinterested expression.

“Your brother’s in town,” Mai said coolly.

Azula’s eyes widened, and she drew in a sharp breath. “Is he.”

“Zuko’s here?” Ty Lee bounced, smiling brightly. “Is he still cute? Did you get to kiss him-?”

“Why isn’t he here?” Azula interrupted coolly.

Brow arched, Mai started pulling her knives from rock.

“Zuzu’s a fool, not a coward.” Azula tapped a sharp nail against heavy skirts. “If he knows you’re here, he knows I’m here... and he’s not smart enough to run from me. Not when I stand between him and his precious honor.” Golden eyes were cold. “Who is he protecting?”

Min, Mai realized, recalling how Quan had gotten the boy away. One of Min’s family is the firebender! “There was an injured Dai Li agent with him. Someone called him a rogue.” She met Azula’s gaze squarely. “I don’t know why the agent didn’t mention it.”

“Dirty laundry in the Dai Li,” Azula murmured, eyes gleaming. “How convenient.” She smiled. “And how like Zuzu. Picking up strays.”

Mai recalled the fate of some stray animals near the palace, and tried not to think. “Should we pursue them?”

“Run off, when we’re guests of his majesty?” Azula’s smile turned almost playful. “That would be rude.” She tilted her head back, looking to the great walls in the distance. “Why waste the effort? Once Long Feng and I have had our chat... we’ll have Zuko brought to us.”

This was a good idea, Katara thought, heading for her table with a happy lemur on her shoulder. The Earth King seemed to be a nice young man, but - well, she wasn’t Aang. It made her knees a little shaky to talk to a king. Tea was just what she-

“I’m brewing as fast as I can!”

Her jaw dropped. The old man behind the counter was - was-

If he’s here - where’s Zuko?

The waterbender didn’t stick around to find out, fleeing down the steps. Need help, need - no, Toph’s not here, but - Suki! That’s it, I’ll-

A dark-haired boy in green moved out of the crowd like lightning, poised and angry and striking hard as Toph’s rocks.

Can’t breathe.... Katara fumbled for her waterskin, got the cap loose-

Momo leapt into the air with a screech, as Zuko followed the blow to her solar plexus with a bladed hand to her wrist, numbing her fingers before she could call her water. The exiled prince yanked her arm out straight, whirling her around to crash knees-first into the stone steps.

Ow! Bastard. Why? Aang’s not even here- wait, he’s only got one hand on me-

Something cool touched her head, and the world went out.

“Excuse me, she fainted, let me through....”

Zuko? Iroh looked up from his latest brew. This early? He took in the scolding lemur strafing Zuko’s hair, the familiar young face over the blue dress in Zuko’s arms, and braced for the worst. “Nephew, when I said you could bring home a nice girl, this wasn’t what I had in mind.” Reaching under the counter, he offered Momo a slice of candied peach.

The lemur snatched it and landed, still scolding.

Servers laughed, and Zuko reddened. “She fainted,” he gritted out, shoulders hunched like any abashed teen. “I thought - maybe some ice water?”

“Of course, how very thoughtful of you,” Iroh chuckled. “Lu, if you could see to the pots....”

The matronly woman who helped with the brewing smiled at him, then turned a stern glance on his nephew. “Mind your uncle, and do don’t anything improper with that young lady, Lee!”

“Thought never crossed my mind,” Zuko said sourly, hefting the young waterbender through the gap in the counter and into the back of the kitchen.

“She doesn’t look hurt.” Iroh kept his voice low, despite the noise of boiling water. Momo sailed in after them, still miffed.

“I put her out.” Zuko laid her gently down. “Master Amaya’s not a strong healer. Yugoda taught her how to make people sleep long enough to work on them. You can’t use it too long, people start having trouble breathing - but I can keep her under a little longer. I have to, she was running from here, which means she saw you, and if she was running from you she’d be running to help, and it isn’t, and she doesn’t know, why is she even here-”

“Nephew!” Iroh ordered. “Start from the beginning.”

Zuko shuddered, and took a breath. “Azula’s in the palace.”

“...I believe I will sit down,” Iroh mused, claiming a stool.

Zuko waved another away, pacing between counter and stove as if he would otherwise fly apart. “Azula, Mai, Ty Lee - they’re dressed as Kyoshi Warriors. The Dai Li know they aren’t, but- Min turned Lee in to the Dai Li for having a firebender contact. Quan and Min ambushed me and Shirong, only Mai caught up to all of us. She gave us fifteen minutes. And Quan - Shirong told him the plan could still work - he didn’t try to stop us. I sent Shirong to warn the Wens. I hope they can hide him, he shouldn’t be running. Much less running from her.” A gulp of air. “I sent him, I came here, I saw her - I stopped her. I haven’t gotten much farther. I’ve got to warn Amaya-”

“No,” Iroh said firmly. “I will send a messenger.” Lu had far more qualifications than just brewing. Including a very good game of Pai Sho. “You acted well, and swiftly. But Azula will be looking for you, even if the Dai Li are not.” He nodded toward Katara. “And given that scroll, she will be missed soon enough.”

“She’s been talking to the generals,” Zuko groaned, heel of his hand against his forehead. “I don’t believe this... are they insane?”

“No, simply young,” Iroh sighed. “Come. I believe I have not shown you the cellars. Very interesting cellars, this shop has....”

“Zuko is where?” Sokka asked again as they soared up and away from Chameleon Bay, still not sure he’d heard right. Wind in my ears. Could be, maybe, has to be... right?

“Ba Sing Se!” Aang urged Appa onward into the night, leaving the Water Tribe fleet behind. “At least, he’s got to be there. I saw him hit Katara, and then... and then he did something, like Ty Lee, and she just stayed down!”

Like Ty Lee. And it was Zuko, again, hurting his sister, again. Like he had with the pirates, and the bounty hunter. Like he had at the North Pole. “They’ve been playing us,” Sokka said, feeling sick. “It must have been an act... spirits, I didn’t know Zuko had that kind of lying in him....”

Aang glanced back at him from Appa’s head, frustrated and puzzled. “What are you talking about?”

“Zuko and Azula,” Sokka shot back, starting to get angry. “They’ve been working together all along!”

“But - we saw her burn Zuko’s uncle-”

“When she knew Katara was right there!” Sokka said impatiently. “Katara heals at the drop of a hat! Everybody knows that.”

“But Toph said Zuko wasn’t lying!”

“He didn’t have to!” Sokka yelled back. “Sure, she’s evil and crazy and wants to kill us. She’s Fire Nation! And she’s Zuko’s sister. They have to be working together.”

“But Toph said Azula wants to be-”

“Toph’s an only child,” Sokka waved that feeble protest off. “She doesn’t know what it’s like to have a little sister. Or a big brother. Believe me, if I got kicked out of the Water Tribe? Katara would do anything to get me back. That's what sisters do." At Aang's doubtful look, he scowled, leaning forward. "Look, you're the one with the crazy spirit visions! You saw Zuko hit her. Like Ty Lee! And we know Azula and the rest of them were outside Ba Sing Se a few weeks back. They must have found Zuko, and he must have snuck in! It's obvious!"

"But... I didn't think he'd hurt Iroh that way," Aang said reluctantly. "He seemed to really... care."

"Yeah, well, remember what happened to the North Pole, and Yue," Sokka said harshly. "He cares more about his honor than anybody."

Katara. Hang on. We're coming.

This isn't real. Hidden in one of the many catacombs under Ba Sing Se, Suyin cradled her head in her hands and tried not to cry. Please, make this not be real....

But the bent stone she was sitting on was real. The Dai Li agent, Shirong, talking things over quietly with her parents, was real. Jinhai helping a lemur build a fort with wooden blocks, trying to be brave, was real. And the teenage waterbender in blue leggings and dress, out cold on a ledge with one of their mother's quilted jackets to keep her warm... she was far too real.

Min betrayed Lee. Betrayed us. I don't understand...

I don't want to understand! How could he do that? How?

"I know it doesn't help, but your brother was trying to do the right thing."

Wide-eyed, Suyin looked up at the agent, and at her father behind him. Tingzhe looked concerned, but he hadn't pulled out the "Professor Dad" scowl. So Dad thinks he's okay. Even if he is Dai Li. "How could turning Lee in be the right thing!"

"I said he was trying to, not that he did," Shirong said wryly. "I'm sure the Joo Dees have been managing things so the Avatar hasn't realized how many people he's talked to have been interrogated afterwards. And at least a third of those have disappeared. Given your father already has a record of teaching seditious students? Min probably thought we were within hours of pouncing on all of you." The Dai Li's face was sad, and cold as deep winter. "And then Jinhai would have thrown sparks, and you'd all be dead."

Suyin shivered.

"As it was... well, he did what I might have done, if I'd been sixteen and desperate," Shirong said honestly. "He turned you in - properly horrified, I'm sure - for knowing Lee. And turned in Lee as a colonial with a firebender contact. Lee's already listed in our records as a waterbender, like Jinhai. It would have worked. You would have been safe." He grimaced. "Unless someone actually caught Lee, and mindbent him enough to put him in an interrogation trance. Min must have been just hoping that wouldn't happen--"

"From what I understand, Amaya's methods provide a certain measure of protection against that," Tingzhe observed.

"Methods? What?" Shirong stopped himself. "Lee's eyes are green. But he's...." The Dai Li let out a slow breath. "Spirits. The perfect disguise. How?"

"I was careful never to ask for details," Meixiang said calmly. "It's delicate. And terrifying. But it works.”

“So I see,” Shirong said, impressed. “So it really would have worked, if Mai hadn’t walked in on us. Oma and Shu, when Lee said things went wrong around him, he didn’t say the half of it. This is a mess. I’ve seen ambushed ambushes that weren’t so f-” He glanced at her, and swallowed whatever he’d been about to say. “...I mean, it’s a very bad situation.”

Suyin put together what he had said with some of the nastier words she’d heard from Min, and gave him her best version of Mom’s disapproving look.

Meixiang herself shrugged, as if the near profanity was no more important than a dropped scarf. “He was ordered by the Fire Lord to pit himself against the bridge between our world and the spirits. The bad luck must spread like ink in water.”

Shirong started. “You know?”

“We’ve known who they are for weeks,” Tingzhe stated. Glanced aside into memory, and smiled wryly. “They weren’t at all what I expected.”

“You know who Lee really is?” Jinhai looked up from the lemur tumbling through his blocks. “Who?”

Shirong winced. “That’s complicated to explain....”

The waterbender gasped, and Meixiang waved Shirong back into the shadows. “You might want to stay out of sight.” She put a hand on the groaning girl’s shoulder. “Katara? Are you all right?”

“Zuko!” Katara shot up, grabbing for her waterskin. Winced, touched her head; grimaced, and looked up again. “Madame Meixiang? Professor? We need to tell the Guard; we need to tell the Earth King! Zuko’s in Ba Sing Se! He hit me; he’s going to be after Aang, but Aang’s not here....” She looked around. “Why are we underground?”

“That would be because we are hiding, young lady,” Tingzhe said gravely.

“From Zuko?” Katara nodded seriously. “But he’s a fugitive. If we just tell somebody-”

“No wonder he knocked you out,” Shirong muttered.

“You’re Dai Li!” Katara flicked the top off her waterskin, liquid coursing down her hands with deadly intent.

“Wait!” Suyin burst out. “Please! Agent Shirong came to help us!”

“Surprising as that may seem, he did,” her father said firmly. “He’s just as much a fugitive as the rest of us.” Tingzhe sighed. “We knew we might have to go into hiding. We just never dreamed it would be so soon.”

“You’re fugitives?” Katara stood, puzzled, water easing back into her skin. Momo sailed back to her shoulder with a happy chirrup. “But the Dai Li are working for the Earth King now. Why are you still in trouble for trying to help Aang?”

Shirong smacked himself in the forehead. Jinhai huddled on himself. Suyin set her jaw, and stepped between her brother and the waterbender, even as Meixiang swooped in to pick Jinhai up and murmur soft reassurances.

“Believe it or not, young lady,” Tingzhe said levelly, “not everything in this world revolves around the Avatar.” He shook his head. “And the Dai Li are not loyal to the Earth King. Which is why Shirong is a fugitive.”

“You’re not making sense,” Katara objected. “We stopped Long Feng!”

“No, you convinced the Earth King to imprison him,” Shirong corrected her. “And I wish I knew how. He may be my king, but Kuei’s always been, well, flighty....” He shrugged. “At the moment, Long Feng seems to be working on a plan to persuade the Earth King that was a terrible mistake. An innocent mistake on your part, of course; but still a mistake.”

“He’s in jail,” Katara said impatiently. “Nobody can bend their way past steel bars.”

“As long as he can get messages out, he doesn’t have to,” Shirong said bleakly. “All he needs is a sufficiently suspicious person to set up to take the blame. And I’m afraid I, and someone else I know, just happen to fit those requirements.”

Katara studied him narrowly. “Okay. Say I believe you, even a little. Long Feng’s a horrible person; I could see him trying to come up with a plot even when he knows he’s finished. Why would he luck out and frame the one Dai Li who might be a good guy?”

“Because I made the mistake of believing we’re supposed to protect the city, not Long Feng,” Shirong answered. “I was lucky. A friend helped me escape from the palace. And if you’d made it back there, as I’m informed you intended, you would have walked right into a trap. So would you please put that down and listen?” He drew a deep breath, and winced, hand over his ribs. “I couldn’t threaten a drowned kitten-owlet right now. Much less the Avatar’s waterbending master.”

“You’re hurt.” Some of the suspicion eased out of Katara’s face. “Amaya said there was an evil spirit....”

“There was. Thank the spirits Lake Laogai is about as far from your house as you can get and still be in the city,” Shirong sighed, sitting down on another stone bench. “We kept round-the-clock watches on all of you, praying the haima-jiao couldn’t suck the Avatar in the way the Ocean Spirit did... you have no idea how relieved I was to see that bison fly away. I’d hoped you all went with it.”

“Suck him in?” Katara sputtered. “The spirits needed Aang’s help! He’s the Avatar; he’s supposed to-”

“He’s supposed to protect us from the spirits, not help them slaughter us!” Shirong erupted. “You’re Water Tribe. I can only imagine what you’ve suffered. But the Earth Kingdom has lost plenty of its own. I hate the Fire Nation. I’ve hated them for decades! But what happened to the Fire Navy-” He stopped, and grimaced. “I’ve seen spirits kill. It’s a horrible way to die. So I’m only going to ask you one thing. The Ocean Spirit killed your enemies. What would you have done if it decided that wasn’t enough?”

“You’re more hurt than I thought,” Katara muttered, moving in with hands gloved with water. “Professor? How long has he been delirious?”

Shirong snarled. “I’m not-”

“Easy, Agent,” Tingzhe said firmly. “I know this must have been preying on your mind for some time. But the haima-jiao is dead, and we have more pressing matters breathing down our necks.”

“No kidding,” Katara agreed, glowing water moving over Shirong’s side. “Huh... has Amaya been looking after you? This seems like it's healing pretty well." She frowned, and blew out a breath. "Did you see who got me away from Zuko? He's going to be back. He never gives up, and he's used me to get to Aang before...." She looked at the grownups, light fading from her water as she bent it back into her waterskin. "Why are you looking at me like that?"

Suyin added her parents' looks, and silence, and who she'd seen carry Katara in. And gulped. "Who's Zuko?"

"You don't know?" Katara said in disbelief.

"There is no war in Ba Sing Se." Meixiang set Jinhai back down. "Those of us who know something about the current rulers of the Fire Nation are usually wiser than to say so in public." She met Suyin's gaze. "Prince Zuko, son of Ursa, and Fire Lord Ozai. Once heir to the Dragon Throne, before he was scarred and banished; a great name, and one... rumored... to take more after his uncle, General Iroh, than his father."

A great name. Scarred and banished. Suyin paled. Lee?

Lee was a noble, sure. But a prince?

And Uncle Mushi is... oh, boy.

"I know it's scary to think about," Katara said kindly. "But he's not as tough as he likes to think. I've taken him down before. This time, he just didn't fight fair." She smiled confidently, one fist at her hip. "So which way did he go?"

Suyin saw her parents glance at each other, and at Shirong, with the unhappy creases around their eyes that meant they'd decided to stay silent.

No one's going to tell her she's wrong.

And that was just wrong. Lee - Zuko didn't deserve that. "He went to save my sister," Suyin said angrily. "Jia's out at class, she doesn't know what Min did yet. Zuko brought you down here so you'd be safe, and then he went to get her! He could get hurt; he could get killed! But the Dai Li are looking for all of us, and Jia won't trust just anybody, and he's the only one who knows how to fight if they catch him...." She swiped at angry tears, and swallowed. "Why didn't you teach me to fight, Dad? I want to be out there! I want to do something!"

"I'm sorry, Suyin," her father said heavily. "We've had peace inside these walls so long... I hoped you'd never need to know."

"That's partly the anger talking, love," Meixiang said plainly, gathering Suyin into a hug. "Try not to take it too much to heart." She held her daughter close, a few breaths longer. "Waiting is always the hardest part of a fight."

"And jumping into a fight with Zuko is a good way to get hurt," Katara said fiercely. "He told you he was going to help your sister? And you believed him?"

That? That was just- oooh! "He said he would!" Suyin sputtered. "Zuko doesn't lie!"

"He doesn't lie? You didn't even know his name." Katara looked at her with pity. "He said he was going to capture the Avatar, too. You know, the last hope for the whole world? Zuko wants to capture him and bring him to the Fire Lord. The Fire Lord! The most horrible, evil person in the world! And you think someone like that is going to help your sister?"

The Fire Lord. Suyin felt ill. The Fire Lord is Lee's... Zuko's father. His father burned him and cast him out.

He made a promise. And Mom tried to help him not have to keep it. “Yes,” Suyin said, voice shaking. “Yes, he will.” Her fists clenched. “I just wish I was good enough to help him.”

“Could we go, Mom?” Jinhai tugged hopefully on Meixiang’s sleeve. “If he’s in trouble, shouldn’t we be in trouble too?”

“Er, well....”

Shirong snickered under his breath. “Spirits, you’ve raised a whole clan of them.”

“So it seems,” Tingzhe agreed, bemused. “Do you think they’ll execute me for treason, or sedition?”

“Neither, if Azula kills you first,” Shirong said wryly.

“Azula?” Katara’s hand went back to her waterskin. “Azula and Zuko? Where? We’ve got to warn people, this is bad-”

“The princess is in the palace,” Meixiang said bluntly. “And if the Dai Li haven’t taken her prisoner by now, it’s already too late. She is of the blood of Sozin, she is Fire... and if other Dai Li are as driven by their loyalty as you have been, Agent Shirong, they’ve walked straight into a steel-jawed dragon trap.”

Shirong tensed. “She may be of the royal family, but she’s only one bender.”

“I never thought I’d say this, but I have to agree with him,” Katara said firmly. “Even if she is in the palace, even if she’s got Mai and Ty Lee with her, they’re just three people. Sure, Toph got Appa past the Dai Li, but she’s Toph. Azula’s really scary, but if enough earthbenders box her in? They can take her.”

“No, they can’t,” Meixiang said quietly. “Shirong. You didn’t stay with the Dai Li. You went with Prince Zuko. And he wasn’t even trying.” She looked grim. “Princess Azula would have been taught to use her inner fire, especially on those whose loyalties are vulnerable. If they waver at all, if Long Feng isn’t strong enough... she’ll have them. All of them.”

Tingzhe closed his eyes, pained. “Even Min?”

“He’s been near the prince. He’s still young. I don’t know.” She bowed her head, and hugged Jinhai close. “I just don’t know.”

“...And so bright petals fall,” Jia concluded.

Madame Macmu-Ling frowned at her.

Jia counted syllables, and flushed, as other students tittered around her. Darn it, she knew better! She was just - distracted. And who wouldn’t be? Fire Nation strangers her parents seemed to like, the Avatar showing up on her doorstep, the Dai Li watching them....

And she’d left home this morning knowing her parents were packing essentials like her father’s notes, and tough clothing, and the hidden stash of coin they didn’t know she knew about. Things were going wrong. Who could concentrate on poetry?

You have to. You know that.

Her mother was a refugee, and her little brother was a firebender. If she didn't look like a perfect professor's daughter, people would look at the Wen family even harder than they were already. But if she had the right clothes, the right makeup, the right manners... then maybe, just maybe, people would think everything was all right.

Besides. She was good at looking perfect. Most of the time.

The giggles finally died down, into a murmur of interest. Jia dared to glance toward the door-

Oh no.

Lee. Dressed... well, reasonably decent. There were plenty of university students who looked scruffier. But they didn't come near Madame Macmu-Ling's classes. They didn't dare. And that scar, and he couldn't possibly know how to behave, coming as a refugee from the Lower Ring-

Lee bowed, properly, before crossing the threshold. Walked precisely along the edge of the classroom, stopped a few feet away from the stage, and bowed directly to Madame Macmu-Ling. And knelt there.

Respect to the place of learning, respect to the instructor... how did he...?

"My apologies," Lee stated deliberately. "Jia must come with me now. Tingzhe bids her home."

Jia tried not to drop her jaw.

"Five, seven, then five, syllables make a haiku," Madame Macmu-Ling said coolly. "Unkempt intruder."

Lee inclined his head again. "Are dandelions, unkempt in zephyr's laughter? So I, too, will fly."

Jia stared. The first haiku he could have figured out on the way here, sure. But the second? Referring to himself as a common flower, and Madame Macmu-Ling as the wind, a known symbol of superior nobles? And further stating he depended only on her grace to be here?

She hadn't heard anybody flatter her instructor so gracefully in weeks.

Madame Macmu-Ling smiled. "Jia lacks focus." She looked at Jia. "Perhaps her father's learning, could aid her better."

Jia forced a smile, and bowed her head. Slid a subtle glance Lee's way-

And if that wasn't the subtle gesture her mother had taught her meant, get over here so I can rescue you, she'd eat her headaddress.

She rose as Lee did, and stepped gracefully over to him so they could bow together.

"Madame Macmu-Ling," Lee said formally, "We, with your understanding, will surely depart."

Another bow, and they made their escape.

"You never said you knew poetry!" Jia accused him as they made their way through darkening streets. Scarred, scruffy, a refugee - and he'd spent all this time with Suyin and Jinhai and never said he could help with haiku?

“You never asked,” Lee said wryly. Shrugged, sheepish. “Uncle insisted. He said one of the best ways to defeat your opponent was to make sure they never got to the battlefield in the first place.” He waved a hand at her carefully-chosen presentation of self; makeup, clothing, ornaments. “Like you. The best camouflage is when nobody even realizes there’s anything to hide.”

Jia swallowed. “I - I thought you didn’t like me....”

“Because of what you said?” Lee snorted, eyes dark. “Everybody looks at the scar first. That’s why he did it.” Another shrug, only slightly bitter. “You were being an upper-class daughter. Being friendly with a Lower Ring healer’s refugee apprentice would have hurt your family’s standing. And that’s important. That’s how you were protecting them.” He smiled at her; faint and wry, but there. “There are all kinds of ways to fight.”

She’d never thought of it that way. At least her makeup blunted her blush. “This isn’t the way back....”

“It’s the way to where your family is,” Lee said quietly. “Do you trust me?”

She nodded, and offered her arm.

Aw. He blushes!

He was also watching. Everywhere. Which meant- She blanched, and tried not to look up.

“It’s okay.” Lee’s voice was low, but sure. “I don’t think they’ll be looking for us. Yet. Someone else is looking for me, but Ba Sing Se’s a big place.... Smile. Like everything’s normal. I know you can do this.”

Damn right I can. Jia held her head high, despite her fear, and stepped with a lady’s grace.

They wove through crowds and out of sight, slipping into a brush-maker’s shop Jia had visited a few times for fine calligraphy supplies. Not often, nothing here was less than expensive - but she didn’t stint on her classwork. Not when it was important.

“Ah, Healer Lee!” Brush-maker Tu traded bows with them both, before ushering them into the back. “Your uncle sent word you’d be by. Come, come....”

“I don’t think we were watched coming in,” Lee started.

“Then I’m sure you were not. You are Mushi’s nephew, after all.” The elderly brush-maker smiled briefly. “Don’t worry. Your uncle’s friends can handle a little danger.”

“If it were just a little, I wouldn’t be worried....”

One concealed door and a goodbye later, Lee was leading the pair of them through a labyrinth lit with green crystals. “You’ve been down here before?” Jia asked, curious.

“No. Someone just gave me directions.”

“Directions?” Jia eyed him, suddenly uneasy. “You don’t even have a map?”

“A tunnel map? With earthbenders around?” Lee said dryly. “You might as well ask the badger-moles.” He shrugged. “If we get lost, I know which way’s up, and you can get us out. We’ll be okay.”

Apparently so; after some time, and a few warnings about the odd people she was going to meet, she heard a murmur of familiar voices. Swallowing, she all but flung herself around the next corner. “Mom! Dad!”

...Okay, not genteel, but it wasn't like there was anybody she had to impress. Not this time.

“You're Jia?” A Water Tribe-accented voice; Jia could still hear the surprise in it, as Mom hugged her. A girl, dark as Sokka, features definitely close enough to be his sister; though it was hard to tell her clothes were really blue, given the crystals' glow.

And now surprise was fading into anger, as the young waterbender rested a hand near her waterskin. “Well. Look who slunk in.”

Lee looked at Katara askance, and sighed. “Let me guess. I'm not going to get a thank you.”

“Thank you? You hit me, you-”

“Probably not,” Agent Shirong said wryly, sitting on a stone bench as if he'd rather not move again today, thanks. “She doesn't really believe your sister's in the palace-”

“How could Azula get into Ba Sing Se?” Katara burst out. “She couldn't beat the Kyoshi Warriors.” She jabbed a finger toward Lee. “You couldn't beat them!”

“I never tried,” Lee snarled back. “They were an obstacle. When they weren't anymore, I didn't have any reason to fight them!”

...I'm getting over here, Jia thought, easing out from between angry firebender and angrier waterbender. She could see Suyin keeping Jinhai out of the line of fire behind their parents, her little brother petting a lemur so its fur went sideways. But no sign of Min. Oh, no.

“Go ahead, tell yourself that,” Katara said sarcastically. “It doesn't change what happened. You failed. And you're always going to fail when you go after Aang. You know why? Because we're going to stop you!”

Lee gave her a hard, flat look, deliberately ignoring how close her hand was to her waterskin. “Are you even listening? Azula. Is in. The palace.”

“Quan could have come to his senses and ordered her captured,” Shirong offered.

“I doubt it,” Lee said dryly. “We haven't heard any explosions.”

“Explosions?” Tingzhe asked, startled.

“The royal line of Sozin,” Meixiang said quietly. “They often have a gift for lightning-bending.”

“Lightning?” Shirong swallowed dryly. “I know - someone said that, but...”

“She doesn't use lightning,” Katara said dismissively. “She bends this crazy blue fire-”

“She's never used lightning on you,” Lee said flatly. “Believe me, she can do it.”

“You attacked me in broad daylight, and you expect me to believe you?” Contempt twisted Katara's face as she jabbed a finger toward Suyin. “I'm not like your little fan over there. I know what you are!”

“I didn't have time to explain! I had to keep you from running into a trap-”

“Oh, of course it’s a trap!” Katara shot back. “So when Aang shows up to rescue me, you can finally have him in your little Fire Nation clutches!” She clawed her hands, eyes narrowed and furious.

Definitely staying over here, Jia thought, seeing the careful coldness of Lee’s face. And she’d guess that was probably all Katara saw. But she’d practiced reading hints of emotion under the careful society facades, and under the surface....

Hurt. Exhaustion. Resignation.

She’s not going to listen, Jia realized. And he knows she’s not.

Spirits, it was like watching a carriage wreck. She just couldn’t look away.

“You’re a terrible person, you know that?” Katara steamed on. “Always following us, hunting the Avatar, trying to capture the world’s last hope for peace! But what do you care? You’re the Fire Lord’s son. Spreading war and violence and hatred is in your blood!”

Jia’s jaw dropped as Lee’s fists clenched. The Fire Lord’s-?

Amaya’s scruffy little scarred apprentice, who knew poetry and manners and could barely hold a dinner conversation even if his life depended on it... was a prince?

The girls in class would never believe this.

Chapter End Notes

My apologies to Maiko fans. I love Mai. She is Really Cool. But that relationship has always left me with a deep and abiding, “huh?” Zuko was banished at 13, left chasing rumors and then the Avatar for 3 years - and he picks right back up with a girl he knows is loyal to the sister that tried to kill him? Does not compute. But Azula being sneaky, sadistic and squicky enough to set up a “kissing cousins” relationship to hold over them later at the worst possible moment? Oh, yeah.

About Roku, Sozin, and bloodlines... a couple of things jumped out at me. 1) We have no idea how many kids Roku might have had. 2) Sozin seems the type to think “friends close, enemies closer” is excellent advice. 3) There’s a consistent Cain and Abel theme running through the Fire Nation. Sozin and Roku; Ozai and Iroh; Azula and Zuko. The only odd man out is Azulon. So... why not Ilah as the “good firebender” of that pairing? Iroh’s definitely powerful enough to justify a heritage from Roku, in my opinion. (And it handles that whole “if Zuko has to choose between good and evil, how do we explain Iroh?” plothole. Also... the mind-twists Azulon would have put his kids through knowing whose grandsons they are, ouch.) And no, Zuko has no idea who Ta Min’s husband was. Someone (I’m looking at a certain Dragon of the West) conveniently neglected to mention it.

Also, I’ve been asked about the Sun Warriors. This, unfortunately, is a case where the writer Knows Too Much. While I did love that episode (dragons! Indiana Jones problem-solving!), the fact that the canon Sun Warriors are supposed to be some variant on Aztec, when the Fire Nation today looks like a cross between Early Modern Japan and Imperial China, hurts my brain. On top of that - read up on the Aztecs, and exactly how they worshiped the sun and fire. If you can, without tossing your cookies. Let’s just say, they have a lot less in common with The Emperor’s New Groove and a lot more in common with Aliens vs. Predator. You don't want me to go there. Trust me.

And I am sincerely trying not to bash Katara. Just to write her as the show portrayed her - stubborn, thinking with her heart, and stuck on "Water Tribe ways are the best". Much thanks to Laryna6, for comments on Min that helped me get the poor guy's motivations out in the open!

Chapter 22

Chapter Notes

Loyalty breaking doesn't kill you instantly. Recall that Iroh was able to order a retreat, and make sure it was happening, before he collapsed.

It's implied that firebenders have a tendency to intermarry heavily, given they consider themselves superior. Zuko and Mai aren't just reacting to one relative in common; they're reacting to the fact that if they have one shared branch of a family tree, they may have more unsuspected, and that could be a problem.

Warning, some disturbing imagery near the end of the chapter.

They know. They all know, now. Grimly, Zuko looked up, braced for the hatred Jinhai's parents would rightly feel-

Except... he didn't see it. Just concern, and a bit of motherly worry on Meixiang's face.

"Katara blew your cover when she woke up," Shirong shrugged, carefully casual. "I think we're mostly over the shock."

Over it? Zuko thought in disbelief. You know who I am, and you still-

"How can you say that?" Katara blazed. "Don't you know what the Fire Nation has done to the Earth Kingdom? To the whole world?"

"Would you stop worrying about the world for a minute?" Zuko said, exasperated. "We need to concentrate on right here, right now!"

"Is that how you live with yourself? How you live with lying to these people?" Katara waved an angry hand at the Wens. "Just tell yourself the past doesn't matter, I'll just be someone else for a while? Well, you're not! You're a monster! And nothing you do will ever change that!"

"Says the thief!" Zuko snarled back. "Says the ignorant peasant girl who would have left me to die in a North Pole blizzard!"

"After you kidnapped Aang-"

"I had my orders!" Zuko made himself breathe. Made himself not close his fists; the fire was crackling inside him, begging to be set free... and he couldn't. He couldn't. "I've never tried to kill you!" Breathe. Breathe, damn it! "Just - stop. Stop. Give me a minute, and listen. You're angry at me because I want to capture Aang? Fine. Azula wants to kill him. Would you consider that maybe, just maybe, neither of us wants that to happen?"

"It's not going to happen," Katara said levelly. "I'm going to stop you."

It didn't make sense. He knew what he'd said. What was she hearing?

Shirong cleared his throat. "What I think the prince is trying to say," the agent said blandly, regarding the waterbender with narrowed green eyes, "is that we're all trying not to get killed by Azula, and it might be easier if we all tried that together."

"He told you Azula's trying to kill him?" Katara said in disbelief. "Low, Zuko. That's low. Even for you. How could you say that about your sister?"

She might have said more. Zuko couldn't hear it. She doesn't believe me. No one believes me.

Why won't anyone believe me?

Fist clenched, he drove the fire and fury into stone.

"Oh dear," Iroh murmured, rounding the corner onto crackling flame and shattering crystals. Harsher words sprang to mind; he kept them off his lips with a determined effort. Unleashing some of Jeong Jeong's favorite Army curses wouldn't solve anything.

But it would make me feel better, Iroh admitted to himself, watching Zuko drive one more fiery punch into the cavern wall before the young man stopped, shaking. The Wens and Shirong were between the children and any flying fragments, Katara had water wrapped around her hands and an angry look on her face...

And his nephew was not looking at the Water Tribe girl. Deliberately.

Regarding Katara with a wary eye, Iroh moved into Zuko's field of vision, and wrapped his nephew in a hug.

"M sorry." A bare whisper in his ear, almost a hiccup of pain. "She won't listen."

Katara had done far more than that, somehow. I should not have stayed so long at the teashop, Iroh thought unhappily. He'd thought it worth the risk, to try to send warnings to the generals of the Council of Five, and listen for word on what Azula might have set in motion. And more than worth it, for what he had learned from the White Lotus of the spirit-snare his nephew was in. But nothing was worth this. "Diplomacy is not one of your better skills," Iroh said clearly. "I will explain matters." He let go, and swung the pack he'd carried off his shoulder. "It is late, and we are all tired. Perhaps some dinner, and rest, would do us good."

"...Not hungry."

That, I doubt, Iroh thought dryly. "Then you will not mind helping the children with theirs, yes? Come; let us separate the dishes." He bent to help his nephew, but kept a steely gaze on Katara.

Not one word, little waterbender. Not one. Or I will deal with you.

Whatever she saw in his face made her blanch, and step back.

Good.

Suyin took a gulp of breath, and stepped forward to lend a hand. "So... do we have rice, or noodles?"

"Noodles," Zuko muttered, shoulders slumped.

"Well come on, Jinhai hates it when noodles get cold..."

Meixiang nodded encouragement, and smiled at her youngest son before gently shoving him off Jia's way. Squeezed her husband's hand as the children took their share of dinner into the next chamber; a subtle gesture Iroh recognized from his own marriage. It'll be all right, love. Trust me.

"Zuko," Tingzhe said levelly, before the young man could follow. "Remember, I heard you out before I made my decision. I had to hear her out as well." He gave Katara a measured look. "I think your uncle and I will have quite a bit to say to the young lady."

Iroh hid a smile. Perhaps the situation is not as grave as I feared.

Though grave enough, from the way Tingzhe carefully raised stone to block the tunnel after them, thick enough that the adults would be able to speak in private, even if Zuko cupped an ear to the wall.

"You're letting your kids go off with him?" Katara said in disbelief. "You saw what he just did!"

"Young lady," Tingzhe said dryly, "I've seen a great many teenage benders lose their temper. I trust him far more than I trust you."

There was a subtle twist of venom under the cool tone that made Iroh raise a startled brow, and eye the waterbender even more warily. "Precisely what did you say to my nephew, Miss Katara?"

"Before or after she called him a monster?" Shirong was watching Katara like a hawk-eagle. "Did you leave him to die at the North Pole?"

"Aang would never let that happen!" Katara glared at the Dai Li agent, obviously tempted to slap him with a water whip.

"So you would have." Shirong shook his head, grim. "And you're the one teaching the Avatar waterbending? We're doomed."

"A monster," Iroh said, very quietly. Conscious of a growing rage he had not felt in... a very long time.

One of my men was ambushed, where he expected no enemy... calm. Stay calm.

"Well, first she accused him of lying about Azula being in the palace," Shirong said, matter of fact. "Then she called him a failure who couldn't even beat Kyoshi Warriors, then lying again about Azula lightning-bending, then accused him of using her to set a trap for Aang, then... well, I'd rather not go into what she said about your brother, General, and Zuko being his father's son... have I missed anything, Madam Wen?"

"Not yet," Meixiang said, coolly furious.

"I see," Iroh said, still quiet. She is Water Tribe. But I had thought the Avatar would have... stay calm.

"But he didn't crack until she called him a liar for saying Azula wanted to kill him," Shirong finished. "Does Fire Lord Ozai know Princess Azula's tried to kill the crown prince?"

"Insofar as I can determine, my brother has encouraged it," Iroh stated, never taking his gaze off the waterbender. Out of the corner of his eye, he could see Meixiang raise a hand to cover her horror and rage, and Tingzhe draw her close for comfort. But Katara...

Katara stared back at him, unrepentant. Defiant, as if she were facing a true enemy. "Oh, come on!

Even if she weren't his sister - and she is! - that doesn't make sense. Why would the Fire Lord let anyone kill his precious son?"

"Because if Azula does so, she will have proven she is precisely the heir Fire Lord Ozai wishes," Iroh said in a voice like iron. "Cunning, strong, and ruthless. And loyal only to him. My brother despises Zuko for his kindness, his wish to see the Fire Nation whole and at peace, instead of eternally at war. But his rule of our people is not absolute, no matter what he wishes the rest of the world to believe. If he were seen to raise his hand directly against Zuko, after failing to slay him in combat, all the great names would fear for their own heirs, and Ozai's power would be damaged. Yet if he allows Zuko to live... The Fire Sages are not fools. They would not choose Azula as the next Fire Lord, no matter what Ozai's will might state. Not if they had another choice. But if Zuko should die facing the Avatar, as so many of the Fire Nation have died..." He shook his head. "Who would question who truly dealt the blow? The Avatar, after all, is also a firebender."

"He'd do that to Aang?" Wide-eyed, Katara swallowed. "I don't care what Toph says. You're all monsters!"

Tingzhe tensed. "Now, see here, young lady-!"

Iroh held up a warning hand. "Professor. What we have here is a failure to understand one another's cultures."

"A failure?" Tingzhe said, incredulous. "She just called your entire nation monstrous! And while I might say that about some of your army..."

"By the standards of the Water Tribes," Iroh stated, "we are."

Tingzhe eyed him, considering that. Shirong blinked, surprised, and settled back onto his bench to listen. Meixiang paled. "Amaya never said..."

"Amaya's got something wrong with her," Katara snapped. "Training a Fire Nation apprentice? What is she thinking? Who knows why he really helped Toph, it sure wasn't for Aang-"

"Be. Quiet." Just a touch of fire's rage. The merest hint of smoke. Any more, and... well, Iroh was certain he would regret it. Later. "Amaya has learned something every Avatar was meant to learn. Something it seems Aang has not learned. Nor have you. The four nations are different. Not only in their bending, but in their culture. And most important of all, in how they define right, wrong, and responsibility."

"Right and wrong don't change!" Katara flung at him. "It doesn't matter who you are!"

"Ah. But who is assigned the blame for a wrong, does change," Iroh said plainly. "And that is why you call us all monsters."

"Because you are!"

"No," Iroh said firmly. "Very few of us are. Zhao, yes; my brother... Azula. But Zuko? No. My nephew is not, and has never been, a monster. Yet to you who are Water Tribe, that does not matter. In the tribe, it is the community which bears the guilt or credit for an individual's actions. When Chief Hakoda sinks a Fire Nation ship, you all have won a victory; when one of your warriors falls to a firebending soldier, you all feel shamed. And the tribe is your source of right and wrong; right is what benefits the tribe, and wrong is what harms it. So harm done to others, who stand outside the tribe, does not truly matter. Which is why the Northern Tribe saw the Ocean strike, and cheered a great victory... and never, ever, felt compassion for those struck down."

"Oh," Shirong said softly. "Spirits, no wonder he was worried it could happen again. If the haimajiao had... oh, damn." He eyed Katara with a look of wary dread, as if calculating exactly how far he could get from her before he'd have to start tunneling through walls.

"How can you say that?" Katara gasped. "I'm not evil! Not like the Fire Nation."

"Says the young lady we have followed across the world as she lied, cheated, and stole from those she passed," Iroh said dryly.

"The pirates stole that waterbending scroll, and you know it!" Katara planted fists on her hips. "Aang needed it."

"My nephew needs his honor," Iroh observed, looking at her askance. "Yet you do not seem to consider that reason enough for him." He sighed. "But then, you would not. You consider Aang one of your tribe, even if he is an airbender... and my nephew is not of your tribe, and so an enemy."

"You say that like you don't think he's done anything wrong," Katara fumed.

"No!" Iroh slashed a hand across, trailing only a hint of heat-shimmer in its wake. "Never have I said that! But you would hold my nephew guilty of Ozai's crimes! And Azulon's! And Sozin's! You would hold him guilty of the decimation of your people, and the extinction of the Air Nomads! And that, he did not do!"

Katara stared at him, still angry... but also confused, if wide blue eyes spoke truly. "But he's the Fire Lord's son."

"And I am the Fire Lord's brother," Iroh said levelly. "And in the Fire Nation - and yes, the Earth Kingdom as well - no young man is held guilty of what his father has done." He spread empty hands. "I know it is foreign to you. But grant us this grace, for Zuko truly did mean you well, no matter how little he explained. Grant us the honor of trying to understand."

"You think I don't understand?" Angry tears filled her eyes. "Do you know what this war has put me through? Me, personally? The Fire Nation took my mother from me!"

A harsh loss for any child, Iroh knew. But she was the Avatar's teacher. She had to be able to look beyond her own needs, or the world was doomed. "And so has my nephew lost his mother, to Ozai's schemes," Iroh replied. "So did I lose my son, in the siege of Ba Sing Se. You are not alone in your grief. A century of war has harmed us all."

"And you think the only one who's guilty is the Fire Lord?" Katara shook her head, tears still streaming. "How can you live like that? How does anybody stop a murderer, if he knows his family's not going to pay for it?" She gave him a venomous look. "Oh, that's right. You haven't!"

"No, I have not," Iroh acknowledged. "I do not believe I could defeat Ozai. Not alone. And if I did, our people would only see a brother slaying a brother for power. And the war would go on. For true justice to be done, the Fire Lord must be defeated by someone else."

"Justice?" Katara swiped at her tears, and straightened, looking at him. "How can you talk about justice when the war needs to stop?"

So. Mention defeating the Fire Lord, and she listens, Iroh thought wryly. "Because without justice, the war will not stop. Even if the Fire Lord is dead."

Katara drew in a breath, scowling-

"He's right, you know," Tingzhe said plainly. "That's what history tells us happened, when Avatar Kyoshi faced Chin the Conqueror."

"Really?" Shirong put in. Sounding only normally interested, if you didn't catch the sharpness in green eyes. "I've never known as much about that part of history as I'd like to have."

"No, I'd imagine that wasn't a time Long Feng encouraged his men to learn about. Not since he took power." Tingzhe clasped his hands behind him, a professor calculating how best to fit what he knew to his audience. "Avatar Aang implied that you know of Chin the Conqueror?"

"Aang got put on trial for Chin's murder," Katara said heatedly. "Avatar Kyoshi... appeared... and told us about it. But it was self-defense!"

"Hmm." Tingzhe nodded. "But did she tell you that severing Kyoshi Island from the mainland, and Chin's death, were not enough to stop the war?"

Katara looked aside. "She... didn't have much time."

"Then I'll try to be brief, as well."

Meixiang smothered a laugh.

"Yes, I can be brief, from time to time," the professor said dryly, giving his wife a sidelong look. "It's not as though she's paying for the lecture... where was I?"

"Justice," Iroh stated, hiding his own chuckle. How many generations of students had Tingzhe fooled with that absent air? "And Chin the Conqueror."

"Ah, yes. Justice." Tingzhe nodded once. "In the Earth Kingdom, and from what I know the Fire Nation as well, justice is done not by the decisions of the tribe, but by having a system of laws, and Guards to enforce those laws. Now, the laws themselves are not always fair, given they are made by rulers like the Earth King, or the Fire Lord..."

Iroh inclined his head, admitting the point.

"But in some respects they are more fair, for they are not decided by the chieftain of the tribe and his most powerful followers gathering to state what they will do this time. They are the laws, and everyone knows them, and the consequences of breaking them." Tingzhe raised a finger, stabbing air. "As Chin's soldiers broke laws, to follow him. Yet they could, and did, argue that the laws they broke were unfair. That events, and striving to give their families a better life, had left them no choice."

"So... what did Kyoshi do?" Katara asked warily. "If the laws are supposed to be the same for everyone - they had to be punished."

"From what I've studied, that is one of the reasons we have an Avatar," Tingzhe said plainly. "As they do not truly belong to any one nation, so they are not bound by its laws. And it's a very unwise sovereign who crosses them without good cause."

"Unfortunately, Sozin thought he had one," Iroh sighed. "I am curious as well. What did she do?"

"From my studies? One of the first things she did was to seize all Chin's records," Tingzhe said plainly. "After all, if Chin himself had reason to think a soldier had acted brutally, and just hadn't gotten around to doing something about it..." He shrugged. "The Avatar did many things. But one key thing she did, which Avatar Aang should think about, was try to uncover why the war happened in the first place. Who thought they had been wronged, and who believed they had something to gain. And that was one of the reasons she created the Dai Li."

Katara's jaw dropped. "Avatar Kyoshi...?"

If it wouldn't have completely shattered Tingzhe's spell of words, Iroh would have hugged the man. Trust an earthbender to wait, and listen, until he found the one weak spot that would take a fortress down.

Not that Iroh believed the teachings of Katara's childhood had been defeated so easily. But she was at least listening.

"You see, one of the reasons Chin got as far as he did, was, to be blunt, the forty-sixth Earth King himself," Tingzhe went on. "The man was a tyrant. And a bit of a brute, besides."

"Hey!" Shirong objected.

"Divine right or no, that's what the records indicate," Tingzhe said practically. "We can only hope Kuei never takes after him... hmm. Where was I? Ah, yes. The Dai Li." He nodded. "I must admit, most of what I know about the Water Tribe is from books, or speaking with Amaya, or a few of the other waterbenders who... used to work with the fishing fleets. But I have the impression that most items you make and use do not last a full century?"

"So what's wrong with that?" Katara shrugged. "We make what we need. It doesn't have to last forever."

"My dear young lady, there's nothing wrong with that," Tingzhe replied. "But it means your tribes do not encounter one of the hazards more settled people often face. The chief of those being ninety-nine-year spirits."

"Ninety-nine what?" Katara echoed doubtfully.

"When something is used by people for a long time, it can develop a life of its own," Meixiang explained. "Sometimes they're just playful and quiet; they move when no one's watching, or make noises no one can explain. But sometimes... they can try to kill people."

"Among his other offenses, the Earth King had encouraged the preservation of ancient artifacts without making sure there were enough ceremonies being held to placate hostile spirits," Tingzhe stated. "The peasants revolted, and destroyed many artifacts that represented the old government. By the time Kyoshi was called in... well. Eventually, there was a compromise. The Earth King agreed to allow peasants more of a voice, and Avatar Kyoshi trained a group of elite earthbenders to protect the cultural heritage of Ba Sing Se. Which meant, in a large part, protecting Ba Sing Se's citizens from the spirits created by that heritage."

"I've always preferred that part of the job," Shirong said wistfully. "It may be dirty and exhausting and dangerous as walking straight into the lake serpent's jaws, but it's for our people." He sighed. "What went wrong, Professor? We only wanted to protect our city."

"This is just a guess on my part... I would say it was the assassination of the royal family, twenty years ago," Tingzhe replied. "You likely weren't an agent then-"

"New recruit," Shirong said simply. "I'd only been in a few months. I still have the scars." He frowned. "Though they haven't been bothering me as much, lately..."

"Whether we like it or not, the royal family is a center of spiritual power," Tingzhe informed

Katara. "When all but Kuei were assassinated - well, one four-year-old boy wasn't enough to hold the balance. Things... broke loose. The moon went dark. Spirits were roused. Chaos and destruction swept the streets. Personally, I am alive today because I am a strong earthbender. To fight off spirits, you either must be a strong bender or have a will so determined it verges on legend. Ba Sing Se stands today because Long Feng rescued Kuei, rallied the remnants of the Dai Li, and beat back the darkness by main force."

Silence. Iroh dared to breathe. Spirits, just let her think-

"You see? They're evil!" Katara flung up her hands. "Assassinating people. Unleashing spirits. They never change!"

"What on earth makes you think the assassins were Fire Nation?" Tingzhe said dryly.

"Because that's what they do! That's..." Katara ground to a halt, looking at the three city-dwellers. "It... wasn't them?"

"The assassins were Earth Kingdom," Shirong said plainly. "From Taku. The Council retaliated by cutting off military aid... now they're gone, and the Fire Nation has Pohuai Stronghold to anchor that part of their conquest." He smirked. "Your Aang's just lucky Prince Zuko managed to get him out of there in one piece. Admiral Zhao was no pushover, from the reports. And frankly, the Yu Yan archers scare half our army to death. That raid must have taken guts."

"Nice try," Katara said at last. "But I've never heard of this stronghold, and Zuko's never rescued anybody. Aang would have told us if there was good in somebody like him."

"Apparently not," Iroh murmured. Held up a hand, before she could protest further. "I do not ask that you believe us." Since you apparently will not. "I only ask that, when you can, you ask Avatar Aang what truly happened with Zhao, and the frozen frogs."

"I will ask him," Katara said fiercely. "But I don't think you'll like what Aang tells me."

"If he speaks the truth, it will be more than enough," Iroh said levelly. And if he does not....

Perhaps it was only a child's confusion at being aided by an enemy. He hoped so. It had been almost two thousand years since the White Lotus had been called on to take... drastic measures, to deal with an Avatar. By all the spirits, he did not wish that responsibility to fall on his shoulders. Not with Sozin's legacy looming over him. Not with the boy truly the last of his kind. Even if his feeling was right, and the spirits truly had scattered the airbending gift in the folk of other nations to preserve the balance... Aang was the last trained airbender. Rebuilding the forms without him would take centuries.

Agni, let there be another option.

But if the world was not so kind... he had joined his nephew's quest for more than one reason.

Agni, be merciful. I would not enjoy the irony of carrying out my brother's wishes.

Still. He had always known the will of the spirits could be merciless, when mere humans upset the balance. He'd tried to shield Zuko from the worst of that cold rage, even as he had trained Zuko to seek the honor found in a balanced world.

Though he'd never expected to help train two elements. Which was far more unsettling than he ever wished Zuko would have to know. Not because his nephew was a waterbender... but because of what that second element implied.

Yue said the spirits themselves are uncertain what should happen. But it would seem the Moon - and Agni as well - is willing to consider some... very old options.

Options he would never have known of, had he not asked his contacts to consult the records of the White Lotus. Very few people kept even fragments of stories of the time before there had been an Avatar.

Iroh sighed, and shut dark thoughts away. "It is late, and we have had a busy day," he said kindly. "It would be best if we remained here, where Azula is unlikely to find us. Tomorrow, I can send you to people who can help you reach Aang. Will that suffice?"

"Just keep your nephew away from me," Katara said shortly.

Iroh smiled wryly. I doubt that will be a problem. "Dinner?"

Zuko felt the eyes on him as the other children ate, and tried not to shrink into a corner. "I'm sorry," he said, voice low. "I have... a really bad temper. I know that's not an excuse. I didn't mean to scare you. I just..." He looked down, ashamed. "My father, Azula... they're always in control. Always. Me, I - I lose it. Mom had to get after me, all the time..." He swallowed hard. "It's not right. What I did. But - Mom taught me, if I couldn't hang on anymore... hit something that wasn't alive. Break something. Instead of hurt somebody." He made himself eat, even if it tasted like ashes. Who knew when things would get back to normal. If they ever would.

So what's normal? a dark part of him snorted. Running for your life sure seems to be. Having someplace to go, where people even want you a little... that's not normal. You know better.

He did. That was the awful part. For a few weeks, he'd been able to... rest. To think that maybe the past didn't matter, and he could make something better of his life.

Right. Like the Fire Lord would ever let you be that lucky. Like the spirits ever would.

Focus. Eat. Survive.

And try not to feel, as dreams crumbled.

"So this is just you?" Suyin asked carefully. "Mom said so, but... Jinhai won't...?"

"What? No!" Zuko exclaimed, startled away from gloom. "No, this is just... my problem. Uncle says it runs in the family, but you know he's kind... no. Jinhai. If you want to know what to be, watch your father. He's a good man. You pay attention, you listen to him - you'll be a better person than I am. He's your father. I'm just your teacher." And the way things are going, pretty soon I won't even be that. It's not fair.

"But... your father's a really bad guy," Jinhai whispered, staring at his empty bowl.

"...I know that now." Zuko rinsed his own bowl, set it aside. "I guess - I've known that for a long time." Though without the Wens, without the people he'd met with Amaya, he wasn't sure he would have found the courage to admit it. How could he say what was wrong with his family when he'd never seen anything right? Just going on a feeling, a sickening dread that the way his father and sister and himself interacted was just not right....

He'd been trained to deal with facts, not feelings. Mercy, pity - those were for the weak.

But Uncle's not weak. He faced Azula. He got us here. He kept me alive.

"What my father's doing is wrong," Zuko admitted, interlacing his fingers so his hands gripped each other. He wouldn't raise angry flame that way. Maybe a little smoke, but no fire. "But he's the Fire Lord. I can't stop him." I can't disobey my orders. Even if I want to. "All I can do is try to be like Mom, and Uncle. Help people, not hurt them."

Only Mom killed a Fire Lord.

But he didn't know that. Not for sure. And Azulon wasn't her father.

"Except when you're punching little witches," Jia smirked. And gave him an arch glance before he could sputter. "Oh, don't look like that. She deserved it."

"But - you don't even know-" Zuko started.

"I know enough." Jia tossed her head, upper-class haughty with just a touch of wicked humor. "I've seen her before, with a dozen different faces. The queen flutter-hornet, pretty as a picture. And vicious as a scorpion-viper, when she doesn't get what she wants. Only most people don't see it, because she almost always does. Sometimes by working for it; a lot of girls like that do work, hard. But most of the time? Because she's Daddy's girl, and Daddy's someone very important." Jia snorted. "She's not really a peasant, is she?"

"I don't know," Zuko admitted. "It's not like we ever sat down and traded family trees." He had to smirk, just a little, at the thought. "I'd be throwing fire at her, she'd be throwing ice at me... she buried me under a whole pillar of it, once. That hurt."

"See? Fair's fair," Jia nodded.

"Though that was after I knocked her out," Zuko shrugged.

"Um...."

"Which was after she froze me in ice," Zuko went on, trying not to grin at Jia's increasingly dubious look. It was funny. Kind of. "Which was after... well, a lot of stuff."

The two sisters traded glances. "How many times have you two been fighting?" Suyin asked.

"Lost count," Zuko shrugged. "We chased her and her friends from the South Pole all the way north. That took a few months. It was a lot."

Another pair of glances. Jia shook her head, and stood; took a stance, and casually swept down the wall between them and the adults. "Mom!"

"Jia?" Meixiang stepped into the opening, one brow raised.

"Remember that talk you gave us about what kind of boys to drag home?" Jia jerked a thumb over her shoulder. "He's the guy you warned us about."

"I didn't do anything!" Zuko protested. Trying not to look past Meixiang to Katara. Who hated him anyway, so it wasn't like it mattered... but he hadn't.

"No, of course you didn't." Meixiang smiled, bittersweet. "Sweet, deadly, and broken. Your uncle's going to have to beat them off with a stick."

Which made exactly no sense. Though Uncle looked amused. Never a good sign. And Tingzhe looked mildly horrified, which was even worse.

No help there, Zuko judged, and eyed Shirong. "What the heck are they talking about?"

"You don't know?" Shirong eyed Iroh in turn. "At sea since he was thirteen?"

"With very little time allowed in port," Uncle admitted.

"So, clueless," Shirong concluded.

"I very much fear he is, yes."

"He is standing right here, Uncle," Zuko said warily. "And he would like an explanation."

"Of course, nephew." Iroh folded his hands in his sleeves with suspicious serenity. "Now let me see, I am sure I have a proverb for this..."

"Never mind," Zuko winced. "I don't want to know."

Shirong's cough sounded suspiciously like, clueless.

"Nasty cough," Zuko said wryly. Waved a hand toward a lamp tucked into a niche against the wall; a hint of gold light to liven the green glow from wall crystals. "Get over here so I can check you."

"I already-" Katara looked at him, and glanced at a no longer smiling Iroh, and shut her mouth. "...Not like you know what you're doing, anyway."

Ignore idiot waterbender, Zuko told himself firmly, already shaping the small flame. Standing so Katara couldn't get a good look at his eyes; with luck, the background green light had kept her from realizing there was anything different about him, or Uncle. He'd fought her enough to know she was cow-pig-headed stubborn, not stupid. See green where she knew it should be gold, and she'd start asking questions. So far she didn't know he and Lee were the same person, and he wanted to keep it that way as long as he could. You never knew when you might need another tile up your sleeve.

But that's not the real reason, is it? Zuko admitted to himself. I just... I want something she hasn't spit on. Something that's mine. Something I did right.

"It's okay," he said under his breath, as Shirong braced himself. "I've done this before. You were just a little... out of it." The firebender smiled wryly. "This is just checking, not trying to patch you back together before you bleed to death. It won't hurt."

"So you say." Shirong leaned back against comforting stone, eyeing gold and green and violet with a speculative look. "I've seen those colors before... oh." He laughed, apparently surprising even himself. "Oh, that was inspired. No one would ever..." He glanced at Iroh. "Your idea?"

"My nephew's," Iroh smiled. "It has served us well."

Zuko made himself ignore the banter, the way he was ignoring angry blue eyes boring into the back of his neck. Only the fire mattered. The fire, and the wounded chi it was mending.

Move slowly, Amaya's voice murmured in memory. Quick healing is good. It's what you need on the battlefield, or with accidents that can kill in heartbeats. But once the worst is mended... slow. Go slow, and wait, and listen. Don't force wounds to heal. Let your patient's body and spirit tell you what they need.

Zuko held healing fire against scarred skin, and waited, eyes closed. There was the fire in his hands, and there the resistance of healing wounds, like dull copper knots. And there...

That's it. That's what Shirong was talking about.

He had to be careful, wisps of fire touching gentle as a breath, or everything blurred into one flow of energies. But when he held still, and waited... Fine threads of chi led outward from Shirong's skin, subtle as spiderweb on a dewy morning; thicker, somehow more practiced, about hands and feet. The threads sank into earth and stone, rooting the Dai Li agent like a young sapling; drawing strength from earth, but frail enough that uncaring hands could tear it away. And it had been torn. Large swathes of that web trembled in the shimmer of fire; tattered and broken, scarred by spirit claws.

Benders need their element. Zuko swallowed hard, thinking of the strength he always felt around open flame. Of the sea barges for imprisoned earthbenders, and the dry cells Uncle had told him about for captured waterbenders. I'm going to be sick.

No. He was not going to throw up in front of Katara. He wasn't going to give the little idiot the satisfaction.

Just breathe, Zuko told himself firmly. One thing at a time. You can't change what happened. But you can fix this. Here. Now. You can give Shirong a chance.

He leaned into the flames, adding their strength to injured strands one gentle stroke at a time. Over here to nurture, and over there to draw jagged ends together and splint, and there...

Huh. That's interesting.

Some of those new, faint threads of chi weren't seeking stone. They reached up and out instead, almost as if...

Deep in the flame, Zuko smiled. It's night. Why don't you come over here?

Wisps touched flame, and he felt Shirong start. Zuko made one more slow pass, and nodded, releasing fire and blinking his way back to the world. "Don't use the gloves unless you have to," he told the startled agent, pressing the lamp into his hands. "But move a few pebbles, once in a while. What the haima-jiao did to your chi... it's kind of like if you broke your leg. We've got it set straight, and it's healing. You don't want to put a lot of weight on it. But if you don't put a little on it... even resting, the bone won't get strong the way it should. So just be careful."

He glanced carefully over his shoulder, to see Katara watching him. Scowling. No surprise there. But behind the scowl...

She saw something she didn't expect, Zuko realized. What? She's a healer.

Though he didn't really care. Just as long as she was watching him. And not Jinhai, who'd been looking at the little lamp with open longing.

We're going to have to do something about that. We can't stay down here too long. Uncle and I can take it, but Jinhai could panic. And if he does that while Katara's here - not good.

Anywhere but Ba Sing Se, with anyone but Katara, he wouldn't have worried about it. But he'd tracked the Avatar's little band for months. Outside of Toph, they couldn't keep a secret to save their lives. No way was he going to put Jinhai's life in their hands.

Toph. Oh no. "Where are the others?" Zuko asked abruptly, looking at Katara.

"Like you care." She shot a glance at Iroh. "You said you'd keep him away from me."

"It is a fair question," Iroh said mildly. "You do not wish to be bait to lure the Avatar, which is wise. But Azula will not hesitate to use your brother or young Toph, if she can. Are they safe?"

"Do you think I'd stay here if they weren't?" Katara challenged him.

Yes. Because you're an idiot. Zuko gritted his teeth and kept quiet while Iroh made soothing conversation. What your opponent didn't say could be the most important thing of all.

She didn't say they were safe. She doesn't know.

The tricky part was, did she not know because the Avatar's little group had been their usual feckless selves and scattered to the four winds when they thought they were safe? Or had she thought they were somewhere they'd be okay, only now she was actually putting together what it meant that Azula was in the city?

Damn it, I need to know!

Zuko sat on his temper, and made himself think. No. He didn't need to know. Uncle needed to know, and Iroh was currently talking the Water Tribe girl into picking out one of the many futons Uncle's Pai Sho-playing friends had stocked this little underground house with. If anyone could get it out of her, Iroh would.

Finding his own corner, away from everyone else - no way did he want a repeat of that mess with Huojin - Zuko curled up and closed his eyes. And tried not to panic.

Azula's in the city. With Mai, and Ty Lee. And Long Feng ready to eat out of her hand.

And Amaya was still in her clinic, counting on Dai Li calculations of her usefulness to keep her away from Azula's eye.

Which is going to last as long as it takes for Long Feng to figure out Azula owns him, Zuko thought bleakly. Then he'll be grabbing for anyone else he can feed her, to keep her away from his throat.

Which might take... oh, another two days. Depending on how cranky his sister was feeling. Enough time for Iroh to convince Amaya to do the smart thing, and hide. He hoped.

It's her life. It's her right to risk it for what she cares about.

Which didn't stop Zuko from wanting to knock Master Amaya out and carry her down here like a sack of potato-chokes. He'd bet almost anything Uncle was tempted. And... maybe somebody from the Water Tribe would have done that. Zuko didn't know. But they couldn't do that to her.

Step between her and her loyalty? No. No way.

He'd done what he could. Saved what, who, he could. Now Azula would do whatever she was planning, and they had to be ready. Meaning they had to have clear heads.

Which meant sleep. Oh, joy.

Haven't had nightmares for at least a few days, Zuko thought with bleak humor. Guess I'm overdue.

He needed sleep. He knew that. As surely as he knew the night was going to be one long parade of horrors.

Survive, Zuko told himself flatly. You don't have to like it. You just have to do it.

Determined, he tried to think of nothing at all.

I wonder if Mai pulled it off...

She had to give the Dai Li points for skill, Mai thought, curled feverish in bed under as many blankets as she could pile on. Stone slid aside from her wall almost soundlessly, opening just enough of a door for Min and Agent Quan to enter.

"...You look awful."

Nothing but honesty in the young man's face. Plus a little guilt. "I'll live," Mai said harshly.

"Will you?" Quan asked levelly.

"Stomach flu-"

"For your sake, I hope the Fire Princess believes that," Quan said plainly. "Will you?"

She picked up a ceramic cup of water from the stool beside her bed in a trembling hand. Managed a sip, and set it back down. "I'm still alive. And I'm not a firebender." Mai leaned back against pillows, shivering. "I have a chance."

"...You could die." Min looked almost as pale as she was. "You could die, just from..."

"Reclaiming my loyalty." Mai let her eyes slip closed a moment. "Yes."

"Then why-?"

"Because my honor required it." She looked at Min directly. "And my prince asked me to save a child's life."

The young earthbender had to look down.

"He doesn't ask for much," Mai mused. "Zuko never has. Like his mother. You would have liked Lady Ursa. I did. That's why... he was nice. Do you know how hard it is to find a nice firebending boy? And he was never as good as Azula, never good enough for the Fire Lord... but he could show you the best ways to sneak into the kitchen, and he never laughed when my knives went all over the place. And they did, when I was starting out. A lot." She shivered. "I have a little brother. Tom-Tom. He's two, he's a brat... but my parents love him. Earth Kingdom rebels and the Avatar kidnapped him. And Azula... Azula made me choose..."

"She's horrible," Min breathed.

"She's the Fire Princess," Mai said flatly. "Fire Lord Ozai's chosen heir. No loyal citizen of the Fire Nation can disobey her commands." She took a breath. "Except Zuko. And General Iroh." Another breath. "So I had no choice."

"We weren't even aware it was possible for one of the Fire Nation to survive broken loyalties," Quan said thoughtfully. "That's... interesting."

Mai looked at him, and the young man Quan was carefully not looking at, and felt something twist behind her carefully-built wall of indifference. "How did it happen? I know how I got into this mess. How did you?"

Min swallowed, silent.

"I'm dying, Min." Mai made herself face it, head on. She'd avoided the truth of Azula for years. The least she could do was accept this one. "If I make it to dawn, if Agni shines on me and I'm not dead yet... I might live. But the fire inside me is bleeding, and I'm so cold..." She swallowed the tears. "And I can't even have Ty Lee in here, because she'd guess. She'd try to do something... and Azula would take her out, too. I'm cold." I'm alone. I don't want to die alone.

At least her parents had the son they'd always wanted. Her clan would survive.

"We'll have a fire built up," Quan said neutrally. "It wouldn't do for a guest of the Earth King to be... uncomfortable. Especially since her leader is about to be called on an unexpected official visit."

Long Feng is making his move. Mai nodded, accepting the gift of information. Or make that the offered trade, from the slight edge to his glance. "Zuko's telling the truth," she said in return. "Whatever your Grand Secretariat has planned, Azula's going to be three steps ahead of him. She's brilliant. And she's of Sozin's line. Ba Sing Se will fall. She'll make it happen."

"We are loyal to Long Feng," Quan stated. "I must bring her to him."

"Then let General Iroh's plan happen," Mai answered. "I don't know if it will save the city. But it'll save something." Her lips quirked in a bitter smile. "Zuko's still alive. Up against Azula... that's not easy."

"Isn't that why you're telling us this?" Min said bitterly. "Trying to save your boyfriend?"

"Ex-boyfriend," Mai said flatly. "When I was nine, Azula put an apple on my head and hit it with a fire blast. Zuko knocked me into a pond to try and put it out." She shrugged, shifting layers of blankets. "Who would you rather trust with the city?"

"An interesting argument," Quan noted. "Trainee Min will remain with you, if there's anything else that can help." He paused in the opening of stone. "And as I understand it, Professor Tingzhe Wen comes from an impeccable line of Ba Sing Se earthbenders. His wife Meixiang... was a refugee, about eighteen years ago. With valid documents, of course." He didn't even glance toward Min. "Though it seems the family has been trying to conceal the fact that their youngest, Jinhai, appears to have been gifted as a... waterbender. Perfectly understandable, of course. It's the sort of thing that would lead to pressure on the university to cost the professor his tenure; even his position. No noble would want their child instructed by someone who had connections to the Foggy Swamp." Smiling slightly, Quan stepped into the shadows, raising stone behind him.

For the first time in a long time, Mai found her jaw tempted to drop. "A waterbender?"

"Hot water," Min mumbled, embarrassed. "But I guess you know that trick."

"I've never even heard of that." Mai blinked, surprised. Amazing. She hadn't felt that in... years.

I want to feel that again. I want to live.

Mai had to smile slightly. "So you're in this because of your little brother, too. That's kind of funny." Another tremor shook her; she clenched her teeth against it-

Min got an awkward arm around her, holding the cup when her own hands shook too badly. "Is there - would a healer help? I might be able to sneak Amaya in..."

Amaya. That's a Water Tribe name. "A waterbender?" Mai shook her head. "I need fire. Not something to put it out." She glanced down to his fingers, still wrapped around hers. "Your hands are warm."

Min almost pulled away. Braced himself, and looked at her again. "My mother's the enemy," he managed. "How am I... how can I live with that? She's lied to me all my life, and now my little brother..." He shook his head. "What could I do?"

"Sometimes there aren't any good choices," Mai said quietly. Looked back at him, studying pain-filled green eyes. "Talk to me. Ty Lee's... always talking." It let me forget what we were doing. Sometimes. "I've been with the princess chasing the Avatar for the past few months. What have you been doing?"

"Trying not to strangle my little brother?" Min offered.

"Oh come on. That's a given." Mai smirked. Just a little. "Little brothers are annoying. It's their job." She lifted a black brow. "What do you do? You're in the Dai Li. You must be a good bender."

"Not as good as I want to be," Min admitted. "Trained agents... did you see how smooth that wall opened? Have you ever seen anything like that?"

"The Avatar's earthbender," Mai nodded. "She's the only one I've seen that good." She let herself have another slight smile. "Even better than the Terra Team."

"That's what I want," Min said, intense. "To be that good. To know what I'm doing is the right thing for... for our people." He swallowed dryly. "And then, last month, everything... fell apart."

Mai listened, letting the words beat back the cold. And hoped.

In his nightmares, Zuko walked on water.

Sometimes it was ice, solid as a glacier or crackling underfoot. Sometimes it just was, water rejecting his very footfall, refusing to even have the mercy of drowning him for Sozin's deeds.

This night, like so many nights, the ocean was awash in bodies.

Armor was cold and slick under his bare feet; not yielding itself, but dipping into water in a way that told of the flood-bloated flesh within. He could smell the corruption, taste the horror in the air; rank and fetid, oddly out of place in air so crisp and still.

The ocean rose and fell in a slow wave, a feaster sated at last.

There's nothing I can do.

Zuko walked. Past the staring blind eyes of the dead. Past rolling, unnaturally living eyes in moon-pale dead faces. Past those with no eyes or ears or face, the scavengers of sea and air already feeding.

Nothing I can do... too late, couldn't stop it... couldn't help... failure, always the failure...

And his next step was on the sodden robe of a woman, drowned with her child in her arms.

Mud... debris... not the North Pole...

The clear blue sky of autumn mocked him, sun beating down like a hammer, boiling dead and living alike in the steam of a Fire Nation afternoon. The stench caught him by the throat, strangling him, seeping into clothes and hair and skin until he thought he'd never be rid of it. Only the very tiniest of lizard-birds, the mosquito hawks, kept insect hordes at bay. Blue and red-brown and beetle-green feathers flashed like fireworks in the wind.

In the midst of the rubble near the bodies, something moved.

No... no, I don't want to see this again, please...

A tattered lion-dog, faithful to the last. Matted with mud, starving; trying to lift its head, and he crooned to it that it was okay, he'd been a good boy...

NO!

Zuko woke in the green dimness, breath ragged. Covered his face with his hands, and let the tears soak his sleeves.

Nara. Spirits. Nara again.

The Fire Lord was no idiot. Why leave a good general sitting around rusting, even if Iroh had been training a crown prince? Logistics, planning, coordination, adaptability - they weren't just good on the battlefield. The Fire Nation needed them at home, desperately, from late summer throughout autumn. The season of air. Of storms. Of the spirit-winds, the hurricanes.

Nara had been almost five years ago, now. One of the worst storms to hit the Fire Nation in decades. Thousands of homes destroyed. Ships demolished, or lifted by wind and wave miles inland. Hundreds dead, despite their lords' best precautions. And they'd tried so hard...

We're on an up cycle, Uncle says. For the next twenty years, it's just going to get worse.

He believed Iroh. Completely. Nothing else could explain chasing the Avatar into a hurricane in the middle of the spirit-damned winter.

It was just weeks after the solstice! There aren't supposed to be storms like that, not when the sun is just starting to come back!

So he'd doubted his uncle, and his ship and crew had almost paid the ultimate price. Like so many of Nara had paid.

It was Nara that had made him realize he had to stop Azula. He'd been with Uncle and their contingent of guards, seeing the death and devastation... and the order brought out of chaos, as General Iroh and the Home Guard brought in food, clean water, and steel-edged hope. Seeing the difference in deaths between the larger port of Nara, where the land had actually been hit harder - and Jang Hui, up a nearby river, whose lord was weak and whose far fewer people had died by the scores.

You don't understand us, Zuko thought wearily, not looking toward where the waterbender slept. How could you? Life at the Poles is hard, but it doesn't change. You know when the ice will freeze. When the winter storms will howl. When you need to hunt. When you need to prepare.

The Fire Nation had to prepare every summer, for storms that might not hit at all. That might not hit for years. Or might hit four or more in a month, devastating land and fleets alike. There had to be a plan. There had to be supplies laid in, and forts on higher ground, and a record of who could move to safety on their own, and where to look for those who'd need help. And there had to be a strong, compassionate lord, and a loyal people. Because the most warning anyone ever had was two days in advance, and that only if a fleet with a sharp-eyed captain sent a messenger hawk in time.

Zuko loved the wind. A clear, brisk breeze on the ocean, carrying the scent of salt and green of distant lands... there was nothing like it. But the monsters of wind and storm and wave that roared off the Western Ocean in autumn - no. He knew them too well.

You command the wind, Avatar Aang. You command the storm itself, if you wish. Zuko shook his head. Don't you know why we hated your people?

Enough koala-woolgathering. Time to put one of his bad habits to use, and see if he could fall asleep meditating. Breathe in, and hold, and out...

Momo curled next to her heart, Katara waited in the darkness for strained breathing to even out. And shivered.

I thought it was Sokka, having a nightmare about - about Mom...

The same kind of strangled gasp, that in waking life would have been a scream. The same hitch of breath as terror shot its victim from sleep to bolt awake, and the mind scrambled to catch up. The same stifled sounds, and sense of water moving, as her brother hiding tears.

Zuko wasn't like her brother. At all.

But he wasn't acting like Zuko either. Not like the enemy she knew. Checking somebody with his healing? Who wasn't Iroh, or bleeding to death? He'd even looked... almost nice, doing it.

Must be the hair. Makes him look harmless.

Yeah, right. Like anybody who could punch like that could ever be harmless. No challenge, no stepping out into the open so she could see him, no chance for her to threaten him back - Zuko might talk a lot about honor, but the worst Water Tribe warrior she'd ever met had more. Even Haun and his warriors, who Chief Arnook had sent on that sneaky, dishonest mission Sokka had told her about, dressing up as Fire Nation warriors - even they would have had the decency to challenge Zhao before they killed him.

They must have been very brave. None of them had come back.

Zuko? Rescue anybody? What, walk up to a stronghold Zhao was in, and say, "For my honor, turn over the Avatar"? I don't think so.

So Shirong was lying to her. That made sense; he was Dai Li. But given the professor was worried about Dai Li, but seemed to trust this one... Something about this whole situation seemed wrong.

Why won't anyone listen to me?

It could just be Ba Sing Se. But it didn't feel like the Joo Dees' misdirection, or the Earth King's bewildered ignorance, or even the generals' hunger to strike back at the Fire Nation. This - it was like these people didn't think the Fire Nation was the enemy!

No, Katara thought. The professor said Fire Nation soldiers were monsters. But not the whole nation. Which didn't make sense. The warriors were the nation. Every Water Tribe man fought.

But... a lot of Earth Kingdom men didn't seem like warriors at all. They didn't carry swords, or spears. They didn't dress like they were ready to fight; not in fancy clothes like that. And they gave Sokka's weapons weird looks, walking around town. Clothes, too. But especially the weapons.

It just didn't make sense. How could Iroh say Zuko wasn't evil? That was like saying Sokka could be evil, when everyone knew he was Hakoda's son! Good people had good children, and evil people... well, there weren't any left in her tribe, but she knew what you did with those. Wait until you got them alone, then push them off the ice when no one was looking.

...Okay, so ice was probably a little harder to come by in the Fire Nation, given Aang had once said there were only a few places it ever snowed. There had to be something just as good.

Though if there wasn't, that would explain a lot.

Ooo, she just wanted to sneak over there, lock the jerk up in ice, and demand some straight answers out of him!

...Except that even locked in ice, Zuko was a pretty scary firebender. Master Pakku had told her that freezing a firebender in a wave of ice like that would, as he'd smirked, "stop them cold."

She'd frozen Zuko. Smirked at him, heart still racing, glad that it was finally over and Aang was safe...

Then the sun had risen, and the next thing she remembered was waking up to an aching head and Aang gone.

Some finishing move. She might as well have been throwing snowballs.

Which was why she was not going to freeze him now, no matter how much she wanted to. All she had was her waterskin, and it obviously took more than that to take Zuko down.

Besides. Attack him the way he deserved to be attacked, and he'd probably pull some "poor little me" lie on the Wens. As if he were innocent.

Aang's the one who's innocent!

She'd never had a problem getting people to believe that before. Well, except for Chin Village. But they'd had this crazy idea that Chin the Conqueror was a good guy.

It's like I'm stuck behind ice. I pound and pound, and they see me, but they're not listening...

Katara's breath caught. Meixiang... she'd said something about Azula using inner fire - whatever that was - on people who were vulnerable. And something about Zuko maybe doing that to Shirong...

Maybe it's not ice I'm pounding on.

Moving quietly, she uncapped her waterskin, wrapping a soft glow around her fingers-

Steel gleamed in faint green light. "Amaya doesn't heal people without permission."

Meixiang's voice. Soft and quiet, but edged with the same steel as the dagger she was stropping on a bit of cloth, kneeling between Katara and her children. "I thought you might be tempted to try something," the professor's wife went on. "For both our sakes, don't."

"I just want to help!" Katara kept it to an urgent whisper, uneasily aware of the firebender in the corner, and Iroh napping with the other adults near the cave entrance. "I don't know what Zuko did to you, but-"

"All he has done is be a young man, working as a healer in Ba Sing Se," Meixiang said simply. "Just one more refugee, among thousands. He's impulsive, yes. Rude, sometimes. And he certainly has a temper. But I've seen worse. Even my Min has been more thoughtless, sometimes."

Katara snorted. "Somehow, I don't think your son ever burned down a village."

"No," Meixiang said calmly. "But I would, to protect the people I love." Another slow strop of cloth on steel; Meixiang didn't even watch her fingers move, green gaze fixed on Katara. "Please stay away from my children."

Mouth dry, Katara bent her water back into its skin, and dove back into her futon. The last time she'd seen someone look like that...

Mom told me to leave the tent. When she knew what that firebender was going to do.

Meixiang was putting herself between Katara and her children. Against the Avatar's waterbending master. With only a knife.

But I'm not like him! I'm not!

Yet that look, frightened and determined and knowing there might be no way out...

I'm not like him! I'm not like Zuko!

Angry enough to shatter icebergs, Katara cried herself to sleep.

Shirong wasn't sure how long he'd been drowsing before footsteps and murmured voices trembled the earth. He opened his eyes to see the general wrap Amaya in a fierce hug, while the Wens traded amused glances and held hands. "You're all right," he said, barely loud enough to be heard. All too aware of the children tumbled together in their futons, and one young man knotted on himself in the most defensible corner he could find. "We were worried."

"Agent Bon warned me it was time to go." Amaya beckoned him over, so they could move around a corner in stone and Tingzhe could raise a wall to keep exhausted youngsters from waking. "He couldn't say it directly, but I think Min is safe, for now. The Wen family is under suspicion... for concealing a waterbender. Which is reason for an interrogation, but not an arrest." Amaya gave Tingzhe a sober look. "From what Bon didn't say, Quan would prefer it if you never showed up for that interrogation."

"So it's exile, then," Tingzhe said heavily. "Spirits..." He caught Meixiang's worried look, and gave her a tired smile. "He's alive. Exile means nothing beside that."

"Exile is when you leave everyone you care about behind, love," Meixiang said firmly. "I did that once. This? You're here. My children are here, or as safe as they can be. This isn't exile." She smiled back, proud and sad. "You did what you had to for our city, and for the Avatar. Now, we have to look after our clan."

Amaya stepped aside with Iroh, to give the pair a breath more privacy. Looked Shirong up and down with a critical eye. "Are you well?"

"Better," Shirong said plainly, thinking of fiery colors, and the odd shock of holding a lit lamp. "But I think I need you to be a bit more specific about exactly what your apprentice... overdid." He cast a glance at Meixiang. "And why that makes certain people think the Dai Li are vulnerable to the Fire Princess."

"Ah." It was Iroh who nodded, surprising Shirong. "That, I fear, is something we must all discuss. It may change our plans for escape. And if it does not, it changes the urgency of those plans. Even, perhaps, beyond what is necessary to deal with Azula."

Shirong eyed the retired general. "We're fugitives. Azula, who you say is a master firebender and tactician, is in the palace, ready to conspire with Long Feng." Which was reassuring only in that Long Feng knew how important Kuei's life was to Ba Sing Se. His king should be safe. For now. "And any day, the Avatar might fly right back into a trap. Oma and Shu, how can things get any worse?"

Iroh regarded him for a moment, eyes half-closed as he seemed to listen. And then sighed, nodding. "Three reasons. Two of which are tightly intertwined. But the first - yes. The Dai Li are vulnerable to Azula. And they will have no warning, before their own hearts betray them."

Shirong shook his head, unwilling to believe that. And more than unwilling to look at why he felt Iroh was right. "That makes no sense. We're loyal to the city."

"To death, and beyond," Iroh said gravely. "For Ba Sing Se, you fight the spirit world itself. And that requires courage beyond that of even a skilled bender. It requires a spirit that fights to live, to prevail, to conquer any enemy set against it." He paused, deliberately. "A soul touched by fire."

Shirong stiffened. "We're Earth Kingdom."

"You are," Iroh agreed. "Though perhaps your family, generations ago... well. Every spirit has a touch of all four elements. Even the strongest firebender has water within him, binding him to family and home. The Dai Li are earthbenders, but your training and battles strengthen the fire within you as well. And that fire, that loyalty, is vulnerable to the pull of greater fires. Like Azula's."

"Because she's of the blood of Sozin?" Shirong folded his arms, unconvinced. "I don't see any Dai Li following you around, General."

"An old tea-maker? That would be most inconvenient." Iroh smiled. And straightened, green eyes no longer full of bemused affection, but sharp as a diamond blade-

Shirong staggered, breath driven from his lungs in a gasp of fear and fury.

This. This is what faced the haima-jiao. The general who held us under siege for six hundred days.

This is the Dragon of the West.

In his sense of spirits, Iroh burned.

Power crushed like a fiery vise, threatening to burn him to ashes. His only hope to survive was to join his small flame to that inferno; to give himself to it and let the firestorm carry him...

No.

A raft in a hurricane; a grasping hand, gripping before he could slip into the abyss. Something let his spirit brace against it, lending its strength to his own. Not as fierce and strong as the inferno pressing on him, no. But it was enough. "No." Shirong dared to meet Iroh's gaze, voice shaking. "You can't have me."

"And I will not," General Iroh said gently. The sense of fire retreated, until he only seemed a harmless bender again. "Do not fear, Agent Shirong. I would never tamper with the loyalty of one who has already chosen his lord." He sighed, grim. "But Azula is not so honorable."

"Most Dai Li have never been so deeply wounded by the spirits," Amaya stated, as Shirong tried to catch his breath. "I doubt she could influence them so easily."

"Not directly, no," Iroh nodded. "But neither will they sense her fire so clearly, or be so quick to fight against it. They will simply believe they are impressed by her skills, her tactics, and her ruthlessness. They will want to follow her. Long Feng will not lose them in one heartbeat of chosen loyalties. They will simply... slip through his fingers."

"Then stop her." Tingzhe looked almost as rattled as Shirong felt, but he stood firm as the university itself. "If she can turn the Dai Li, surely you can as well."

"I cannot," Iroh shook his head. "Azula will act as an ally of Long Feng. Which she is, so long as he serves her purposes. I am his enemy. Spirit to spirit, that cannot be feigned." He sighed. "Even if I could, I have a more important responsibility. Prince Zuko must escape Ba Sing Se."

"We all need to do that," Shirong pointed out dryly. Leave Ba Sing Se. Spirits, I never thought I would.

"But we are not all yāorén." Iroh indulged in a wry smile at their looks of confusion. "You are not the only one interested in old history, Professor. I have contacts with records which are... very old, indeed." He regarded Amaya. "When Zuko drowned, he was told the spirits were in disagreement over what should happen to the Fire Nation, and to the world. That the Avatar was human as well as spirit, and none knew what he might do. But," he raised a determined finger, "the Moon also said my nephew's efforts to restore balance deserved her answer."

"The Moon gave him waterbending?" Shirong said, very carefully. A Fire Nation prince?

"An event I found as surprising as you," Iroh said dryly. "Imagine my further surprise when I learned - only hours ago - this may not be the first time a firebender has been so gifted."

You could have felt a pin drop.

"Long ago, so long it has been lost to all our nations, the Avatar may not have been alone in keeping balance in the world," Iroh went on. "The records are but fragments, yet... it seems there were others to aid him, and give him council. Only the Avatar could bend all four elements, true - but what remains about the yāorén suggests they could bend two. And so they too would know the struggle of learning to master more than one element; the difficulty, and the heartbreak, of trying to belong to more than one nation." He let out a slow breath. "But while the Avatar is born, it seems a yāorén could only be made. And that, only at great risk. Those I asked did not have a record of what that risk was... but Zuko died. Even if only for moments. I do not doubt, had he not succeeded in the tasks the spirits set him - my nephew would not have returned to me."

"And if you can bend one element, why risk your life for two?" Meixiang nodded. "There could never have been many of them."

"And the fewer people who know a technique, the more easily it can be lost," Tingzhe said gravely.

"At the risk of sounding horribly disrespectful to a certain great spirit," Shirong said carefully, "your nephew is the last person I'd pick to... counsel the Avatar."

"Shirong," Amaya said, half-scolding, "you know Lee better than that."

"Please, allow me," Iroh said mildly. "For you well know, on the surface, it would seem he is right."

On the surface? Shirong thought in disbelief. Reconsidered, taking into account precisely who was speaking; not just Lee's fond uncle, but the general who had harried the Earth Kingdom army from one end of the continent to the other. "I'm not going to like this, am I?"

"I am not well pleased myself," Iroh said gravely. "But having pursued the Avatar at my nephew's side, I have seen things the airbender lacks, whose absence may yet lead to a very short life. Would have led so, save for the Water Tribe children and young Toph." He let a breath sigh out, counting off items on his fingers. "Aang is reckless. While I fully understand the use of excessive force against an enemy, Aang's bending has often caused as much damage to his surroundings - and far more to innocent bystanders - as my nephew. And that before the Avatar state was unleashed."

"When Zuko was firebending?" Meixiang's brows climbed.

"Even so," Iroh said dryly. Lifted a second finger. "Aang is naive. He has little grasp of the differences in customs between nations, and appears to believe that any custom he disagrees with may be flaunted without thought or fear of reprisal. Breaking a prisoner's parole he gave my nephew. Teaching Katara combative waterbending in secret at the North Pole, when women were not permitted to learn. And here, in Ba Sing Se, invading the very palace to see the Earth King." Iroh shook his head. "I do not say he did not have reason to do so. The Avatar had no reason to know my nephew was honorable. Katara needed to be taught. And Kuei needed, badly, to know the truth of his city. But every time he has acted, Aang has been amazed that there were consequences."

Amaya gave Iroh a considering look. "How do you know what the Avatar did at the North Pole?"

Iroh's grin was pure mischief. "That, I cannot tell you. Yet. There are ways; I hope to tell you of them in time."

"Ice cubes," Amaya muttered. "Sleeping robe. Don't think I won't."

"I never doubted it," Iroh said virtuously. And raised a third finger. "Aang is... irresponsible. From what Amaya has told me, he has already tried firebending - before he was ready to learn - and whatever the result, he has now decided he will never firebend." Iroh looked grim. "He is the Avatar. He is a firebender, whether or not he wishes to be. If he does not master his inner fire, he will not master himself." The general swept them all with a sober gaze. "We have all seen our world without an Avatar. Do we wish to see our world with an Avatar's power unleashed by one who will not think?"

"Iroh," Shirong said quietly. Daring to look that most dangerous man in the eye. "He's a twelve-year-old boy."

"So he is," Iroh nodded. "Do not think I do not feel compassion. No child should be forced to bear the fate of the world. And I have seen many children bereft by war. I do not doubt some of what drives his recklessness is the need to forget. The need to do something, anything, rather than live in a world which has destroyed all he knew and loved." Iroh looked down, saddened. "I grieve that his people are no more. I understand why he wishes to run from his duty. But the spirits will not allow it. No matter how much harm that does Aang, or any of us."

Amaya stirred at his side. "You do believe the spirits have been using Zuko to chase Aang."

"Yes." Iroh looked away, as if into memory. "Were it not for my nephew's determination to track any lead, no matter how slim, no Fire Nation ship would have been close enough to spot the Avatar's awakening. Aang would still be with the Southern Water Tribe, a child among the other children. And that... would not suit the spirits' purposes."

"You have a nasty, suspicious mind," Shirong stated, smiling wryly. And thank the spirits for that. Lee - Zuko - would never have lasted this long without guile on his side.

"An unfortunate side effect of command," Iroh chuckled. "Or at least, of surviving it." He sobered. "But I think you are right. It is not wise for the spirits to have chosen my nephew for such a task. Not because he would not be capable of it, if he survived disobeying the Fire Lord. But because Aang's other allies, save Toph, hate us. As Katara hates us. And how can anyone expect a young boy to listen to the hard reality of my nephew's good sense, when those who have taken him in as family speak against such advice simply because it is Zuko's?"

Ouch, Shirong winced. "Not to mention that small detail of your nephew having chased him across the world. Fire, clanking armor, life or death insults...."

"My nephew took very good care of his armor," Iroh said practically. "It never clanked."

Meixiang smiled. Tingzhe raised a brow at her. "Just picturing our Lee in armor, dear. He doesn't have quite enough hair yet for a respectable topknot... oh." She looked at Iroh, eyes worried. "I hadn't really... thought about that before."

"Hair grows back," Iroh smiled ruefully. "My nephew needed my support, more than I needed my pride."

Gentle words, but the steel behind them hardened Shirong's intuition into conviction. "You're not about to let the spirits have their way, are you?"

"If I had let certain spirits act as they willed, neither Zuko nor I would be here," Iroh observed.

Shirong looked at him askance. "You're getting Zuko out so the spirits' plan won't work. So he won't be here when the Avatar comes looking for Katara, and won't get shanghaied into being this... yāorén counselor."

"That is my intent, yes."

"But to go against the spirits-" Tingzhe began.

"My nephew is human!" Iroh's fists clenched; he made himself breathe. "My nephew has lost everything he hoped to gain. Again. Even if his loyalty were not at stake, even if he chose to help the Avatar freely - what help would he be to Aang, when the Avatar loathes the very thought of firebending? When Katara, whom Aang trusts, calls us monsters?" Iroh shook his head. "The Avatar is the bridge between our world and the spirits because spirits do not understand humans well. I do not intend to go against the spirits. I simply believe they have miscalculated. For if there is one thing I have learned raising my son and nephew, it is that you cannot force a boy to listen. He must decide he needs help, and seek you out." He sighed. "And so, yes. I will remove Zuko from this city before the Avatar can return. My contacts claim he went to the Western Air Temple, to learn... certain things. That should take some time; three, perhaps four more days, at the least." He regarded Shirong. "We will get Zuko out. And we will get you out, as well."

"Me?" Shirong said, startled, as Amaya clapped a hand to her forehead with a muffled groan of disbelief. "What... how... what did Zuko do?"

"I missed it," Amaya admitted. "The obvious signs weren't there, so I thought it wasn't as serious.... The technique I mentioned? It usually has three components. Body, mind, and spirit. You didn't need the first two, but the haima-jiao was drowning your spirit. He must have poured flame in to fight it."

"So I believe," Iroh said gently. And lit a flame in one cupped hand.

He can't be serious, Shirong thought, stunned. He can't mean....

Iroh's smile was patient, and touched with rueful humor. He waited.

He could wait there all night. Shirong swallowed dryly, and held out a nerveless hand.

"Do not fear," Iroh said, still gentle. "Controlling fire is difficult. Holding it, if one does not move too hastily, is easy. Breathe, and remember you are part of each other."

Like holding a baby cat-owl. Warm, and fragile; a heartbeat he could feel through his fingertips, warming his very bones. It pulled on his energies, light as moving grains of sand, flickering with his breath.

I think I want to sit down now.

"Do you know what this means?" Tingzhe asked in amazement, as Iroh snuffed that unsettling flame.

"That I've become the enemy?" Shirong snapped, voice ragged. Mourning the absence of fire like he would an old friend. Spirits.

"It means we have hope," Tingzhe said, not rising to the bait. "It means my children, my family... we won't be alone."

"No, we won't," Meixiang agreed. "Our people will come. Anyone who's never quite fit into Ba Sing Se. And probably quite a few who thought they did, before...."

Iroh raised his eyebrows, curious.

Meixiang's smile was touched with bittersweet amusement. "You control your inner fire, Prince Iroh. So you go unnoticed. Prince Zuko... doesn't."

Stunned realization swept over Iroh's face, and he closed his eyes in utter disbelief. "Oh, Agni. I did not even think of it."

"Think of what?" Shirong glanced at Amaya, who seemed just as clueless.

"He was thirteen when we left." Iroh was - groaning, Shirong decided. "Barely old enough... and he struggled so hard with the basics, I did not think to work on such advanced techniques... and there was no need, those assigned to our ship were always in a clear chain of command, there were no civilians...."

"Meixiang?" Tingzhe asked, wary as Shirong felt.

She smiled ruefully. "The general's just realized he's dropped a lodestone in a sandpit laced with iron filings."

Laced with-? Shirong felt his jaw drop as the implications finally hit home. Meixiang, these two - they're not isolated colonial survivors. Which means.... "How many Fire Nation refugees are there in Ba Sing Se?"

"Counting children born here? Over three thousand." Amaya looked just as stunned. "And I've managed to bring Zuko near most of them."

Thousands. A drop in the bucket, compared to the millions within the Outer Wall. Even so....
"This had better be a really good plan," Shirong said levelly.

"I hope that it is." Iroh straightened, shaking off shock. "For I will need to rely on all of you, and whoever you can trust, to begin carrying it out. It will only work if Aang is not here - and to ensure that, Zuko and I must see that Katara gets to safety. Azula will be searching for her, and none of you would survive Azula, should fate turn against us." He stepped aside, and reached into a satchel Amaya had brought to draw out a thick sheaf of notes. "Come, and tell me what you think we can do."

A/N: Hono'o shoshinsha - "beginner flame". Roughly, a young firebender.

Yāorén - sorcerer (Chinese). Interestingly, the Chinese word for the art of sorcery, wu, is also that for dance. Which certainly brings bending styles to mind. And certain types of sorcery did, specifically, involve invoking the four elements of air, earth, fire, and water, instead of the more usual Oriental suite of five elements (earth, fire, water, wood, and metal) seen in feng shui.

Eskimo culture doesn't do prisons. To this day, pushing someone off the ice is quietly considered legitimate "treatment" for someone with incorrigibly antisocial behavior.

And Theodosia asked for a review of the names and generations... bear in mind that I'm going mostly from the show's original timeline (you can look on), before the creators retconned a few things. After all, the Guru's supposedly over 150 and in good (if eccentric) shape; Sozin making it to 153 seems quite reasonable. (Theodosia, if this doesn't cover what you asked, please let me know!)

Fire Lord Sozin: Born 183 years before the series begins. Wife unknown; one son, Azulon. Year of the start of his reign, not known. Died at 153, in bed, rich, and supposedly happy and respected, about 30 years before the series start. Appears to have regretted in his final years what he did to Roku.

Fire Lord Azulon: Born 100 years before Avatar begins, the same year the airbenders were wiped out. Wife Fire Lady Ilah; two sons, Iroh and Ozai. Reigned from about 30 years before series start to about 6 years before the series starts. Died at 93... and not from natural causes.

General Iroh (former crown prince): Born about 64 years before the series starts (from various sources). Which means he would have been 17 when Sozin died; and yes, knew him for some time. Wife in canon unknown, but implied to be deceased sometime after the birth of her only child, Lu Ten. Lu Ten's date of birth is unknown, but his memorial picture implies he was an adult serving in the army in the Siege of Ba Sing Se, where he died.

Fire Lord Ozai: Born about 43 years before the series starts. Only son of Sozin's line who had not served as a general, prior to the series. Wife Lady Ursa; she never had the chance to become Fire Lady. It is canon their marriage was arranged, and at first happy. Two children, Zuko (former crown prince) and Princess Azula.

Avatar Roku: Date of birth varies according to source, but shared a birthday with Sozin. Date of death known to be 112 years before the start of the series. Wife Ta Min. At least one son known to have been born. In this AU... well, they were married for decades before that volcano blew up. So I've written that they had some daughters as well: Momiji and Ilah. (And I have a plan for where that son went, too.)

We know from Piandao's case that non-firebender children are often given up by firebender parents. I can see this happening not just from unhappiness (as in his case) but pure safety reasons (the kid can't ever protect himself if you slip). Plus in pre-modern Japan, there was a custom of adopting children out into another family if their skills and inclinations matched a certain trade better than their birth family's. This was considered a good thing for the kids and the families; people got successors better fitted to their profession (a blacksmith needs muscle and skill, a brush-maker needs a more delicate touch), you didn't have as much of a "lead time" while a new youngster was taking up the post when his parents died (which could be fatal to a family business), and the families often kept in touch. So, Momiji got adopted out. She probably would have gone to a family with high status. Mai is a governor's daughter, implying the family's been powerful for some time; in this AU she is Momiji's great-granddaughter.

Ilah, however, was a firebender - and would have known her father still thought of Sozin as his dearest friend, despite years of being estranged. It seems to be canon that very few people, if any, knew how Roku died. I can see her falling for the baby Azulon, and given upper-rank firebenders have arranged marriages, that probably wouldn't have struck her as a bad idea when Sozin suggested it.

Kuzon of Byakko: I don't think we knew his age in canon, so I set it at 15. This means he was born 115 years before Avatar, and died 17 years before Aang woke up. Wife unknown. Daughter, Lady Kotone, who married the wandering swordsman and firebender Shidan. They in turn had one known daughter, Lady Ursa, age unknown. She looks to be in her thirties in Zuko's flashback, but we know benders tend to live a long time, so I have said she's at least Ozai's age.

And no, there are no death dates for Shidan and Kotone. Yes, go ahead, plot away...

Sorry if this sounds a bit tetchy, but... here's a final note for those who think characters focus too much on the Siege of the North. Take into account that Zuko and Iroh were on a raft, which means pretty much going with the current. Which means they saw everything else that drifted with that current. Which in turn means, in the aftermath of the Ocean Spirit, one hell of a lot of corpses. The words major trauma come to mind. Is Zuko obsessed with that incident? Oh yeah. Zuko believes in the Avatar... the way survivors of Andrew, Ivan, or Katrina believe in hurricanes. That's the level of devastation Aang caused.

I would say anyone who heard about - much less saw - the destruction of an entire Fire Navy fleet, who then saw Aang walking around town, ought to be forgiven for being a bit twitchy.

Chapter 23

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

"Let me get this straight." Toph gave herself a little shake to get rid of the dust from her... mishap, with moving earth and two smarty-pants boys sneaking up on her with a flying bison. Totally not fair. "Aang had a spooky spirit vision that Katara's in trouble, so we're going to run right into Ba Sing Se after her?" She cracked her knuckles. "Aang, you get Appa down right now."

"Hey!" Sokka protested. "Zuko's got my-"

"I heard it the first time, Snoozles!" I just don't believe it, Toph thought. There's got to be a good reason. "I need to talk to you guys, and I'm not doing it where I can't see you."

"But Katara's in trouble!" Aang protested.

"Hate to burst your bubble, Twinkletoes, but you got that vision when, exactly? If she's in trouble, she's been there a while. A few more minutes? Probably not going to make much difference." Toph pointed toward Sokka. More or less. "But it could make a heck of a lot of difference to us. You don't just jump into the ring in a rumble. You take a minute, you plan, and then you bust some heads."

"She's got a point," Sokka admitted reluctantly. "Appa could probably use a break, anyway. We've been flying all night."

"But it's Katara!" Aang objected.

"And I know my sister," Sokka said practically. "She'd hate it if we got hurt just because we didn't take a minute to put together a good plan. And this is Zuko. He may not have been up to beating all of us, even before Toph joined up. But you know he's not going to make this easy. And if he's working with Azula..."

Sokka let the words trail off, probably shaking his head. If she could only see. "This is why I need you guys to land!" Toph said, exasperated. "Where'd you get this crazy idea Zuko's working with Azula?"

"Well-" Aang started.

"On the ground, Twinkletoes!"

Grumbling under his breath, Aang set them down.

Land, Toph thought gratefully, wiggling bare toes in grassy herbs. Stepping carefully, to avoid a patch of thorny bramble; she might not be able to see the thorns, but they grabbed into earth with a pattern of fine roots she'd been able to recognize for years. "Okay. How'd you get Azula out of seeing Zuko hit Katara?"

"Because after he hit her, he touched her head - and she just fell over!" Aang said impatiently. "Just like Ty Lee!"

Toph felt Sokka's heart jump. "He hit her in the head?" Sokka asked. "You didn't say that before."

"Head, chest, what does it matter?" Aang grumbled.

"Then I guess Zuko knows something Ty Lee doesn't," Sokka frowned. "When she hit me in the head, all she got was bent fingers."

"Or he doesn't know anything about what Ty Lee does," Toph put in. Careful, Toph, she cautioned herself. You tell them the straight truth, and they'll listen about as much as they did to Zuko's note. So... bend it a little. "Look, I didn't want to mention this because I didn't want to get you guys upset... my parents? They're merchants. Really, really powerful merchants. Which means they deal with trade all over the world." She paused. "Even the Fire Nation."

"Whaaat?" Sokka yelped. Hand fishing for Boomerang with the speed of pure reflex.

"Sokka, calm down!" Aang held out empty hands, warding off the anger. "That's the way things used to be. The nations are separate, but people visited each other. I used to visit Bumi all the time. Even the monks brought fruit we picked at the temple to the Earth Kingdom to trade for rice noodles, and things that didn't grow that good on a mountain."

"Yeah, but- now?"

"I'm not saying it's a good thing," Toph said bluntly. "I'm just saying, they do. So I know some stuff about the Fire Nation." Some of which I just got from Zuko, but... keep going. "Ty Lee's a chi-blocker. That means she's not supposed to be outside the Fire Nation while there's a war on."

Sokka snorted. "Yeah, well, looks like Azula didn't get that messenger hawk-

"Zuko's been exiled three years."

Silence. Toph felt the two boys look at each other. "You already told us that," Aang said, puzzled.

"But we didn't think about it," Sokka admitted, unhappy. "You're saying Zuko can't know what Ty Lee does. Or they'd never have kicked him out."

"They probably would have stuck him in prison, or marooned him on some island even the sea vultures wouldn't land on," Toph nodded. "He sure wouldn't be running around loose."

"Ty Lee could have taught him," Aang pointed out. "I can learn other bending styles, he could- Sokka?"

The Water Tribe boy was shaking his head. "Told you. Ty Lee hits you in the head, all she does is hurt her hand." He eyed Toph. "But you didn't think Zuko was working with Azula even before that. Why? She's his sister."

"She wants to be the heir," Toph said bluntly.

"Yeah. We get that-

"No, you don't," Toph bit out. "This isn't want to like, I want the last berry-cake. This is, cut off my own hand to get this."

"Eww." Sokka shuddered.

"I don't get it," Aang said after a moment, patting Appa's side for comfort. "Why does it matter so much? The monks said your body was the house of your spirit, and you should always honor that. Why would you hurt yourself just for a title?"

"Were the temple elders just a title?" Toph shot back. "They were going to take you away from Gyatso; that's why Katara said you ran away. And I don't blame you one bit. Anyone who tried to take me away from you guys, I'd squash him." She slapped her palm with a fist. "But they thought they could do it, because they were the elders. It's not the title Crazy Blue Fire wants, Aang. It's the power. Some people... they're just like that. They're scary to be in the ring with. They don't just fight a good fight and learn from it. They do anything to win. Even cozying up to you for months, so they can jump you when you finally turn your back." Toph puffed a loose strand of hair out of her face. "The Fire Lord's heir has a lot of power. Azula wants it. She's not going to help Zuko. Ever."

"So Zuko just wants to catch me for the power." Aang's shoulders slumped.

"No, he doesn't," Toph shook her head. Uh-oh. "I mean, I don't think so. The scary people, the ones who'll put a boulder in your back? They don't care about people. Zuko cares about Uncle. A lot."

"You're not making sense," Aang groaned. "If Zuko doesn't want to be the heir, why doesn't he just quit chasing us?"

"First off? He's got orders," Toph said practically. "Nobody in the Fire Nation disobeys the Fire Lord. And reason number two? If he quits, Azula is the heir. You think she scares us? You have no clue how much she scares Zuko." She shrugged. "Sokka, I know this is gonna be creepy. But just for a minute? Try to pretend you're Zuko."

"That is creepy," Sokka shuddered again. "Grr, argh, honor?"

"Just shut up and listen," Toph scowled. "Think of it like - like the Fire Nation was your village. You'd be chief if your father died, right?"

"Well... yeah, maybe someday. Not soon."

"So, think of your village," Toph forged on. "Only instead of Katara for your sister, you've got Azula. And if you don't pull off something impossible, Azula's going to be ruling your village. How do you feel about it? Not-" She waved her hands before he could talk. "Not what you'd do. How do you feel?"

There was a long, uneasy silence. "Scared," Sokka whispered at last. "I'd be... really scared."

"Zuko's scared," Toph said quietly. "He's scared all the time. You guys think he's an angry jerk? He is. But he's angry because he's scared. For his people. His people, Sokka. Just like you're scared for the Water Tribe. And you know what? I don't blame him." She pointed toward Aang. "I'm on your side, Twinkletoes. I want the war over, and I want the balance back. But I don't care that you're the Avatar. You're my friend. I'm going to be there for you all the way. But you know Zuko. If he hit Katara when you weren't even there to catch - does that sound like one of his plans? Or does it sound like maybe we need to find something out before we crash the palace?" She crossed her arms. "'Cause if you want to listen before you move, I think I know where we can go to start asking."

"Wait a minute," Sokka said thoughtfully. "How do you know that? We just figured out it probably wasn't Ty Lee-"

"My parents saw a lot of healers." Toph waved a hand in front of blind eyes. "They know how to put people out, too."

"...You think Zuko's been training with a healer?" Aang said at last.

He wants to believe it, Toph realized, surprised. He wants to believe Zuko would do something that's not evil. "I think whatever he's up to, Zuko's not stupid. What if Azula caught them again, when Katara wasn't there? He almost lost Uncle. He's not going to do that again." She angled a blind glance Sokka's way. "And in Ba Sing Se? Anybody who heals is going to have to have a license. On record, where people can look it up."

"People, huh?" Sokka smirked. "I guess that leaves it up to us."

Toph grinned. "Not exactly."

Shift can't be over soon enough, Huojin thought. He wet his brush in ink to mark a few last, neat formal characters, finishing a report that explained exactly why someone had thought balancing on top of a lightpost was a good idea, and the resulting injuries and arrests: one set of busted ribs, someone else's busted arm, and a warehouse crew hopefully now sobering up in the general disorderly cell. I need to get home.

He wasn't quite sure what he'd do at home, given what he'd heard. But with the feeling out on the streets... he wanted to hold his family. And not let go for a while.

We need to figure out what we're going to do.

He and Luli had discussed it. Hashed what they knew of the general's plan over and over again. And decided... well, that they couldn't decide yet.

Huojin knew what he wanted to do. Whether or not it was the right thing for his family... he didn't know. He just didn't.

Loyalty isn't easy, Meixiang had told him. It can break your heart.

She'd sat him down for a good talking-to, not long after that hair-raising potluck. Filled him in on a few things he would have grown up knowing, if he'd grown up... somewhere else.

It was a heck of an eye-opener.

"Lee is a great name, and a firebender," Meixiang had said, after a few minutes circling around the point. "And he's sixteen. That's about the right age, in human terms, for a young dragon to strike out for his own territory. Or so my grandfather said."

"A young what?" Huojin had exclaimed in disbelief. Bad enough he had spirits on his beat. Dragons?

"All children of fire are children of dragons," Meixiang answered simply. "Where did you think gold eyes came from? No other nation has them. Ever."

"You're serious," he said, after a long moment of shock. "You really think that some of your ancestors were..." He flapped his hands.

"Large, predatory, wise creatures, with fire breath and far too many teeth?" For once, Meixiang looked almost as impish as Luli. "Tell me it doesn't explain Lee."

"Nothing explains Lee," Huojin said frankly. "So he's got a temper that should've gone to a dillolion. What's that got to do with me?"

"Dragons live in clans, just as we do. And those of lesser power seek those that are greater. They help defend the clan's territory, so all of them can hold more than just a strong dragon alone. And in return, the leader helps protect them." She had given him a sober look. "That's part of us, just as much as the eyes and the temper. You're a dragon's kin, and though you're not alone, you're not in the safety of a clan. And here is Lee. A strong firebender, who's already bled for your children." She'd spread her hands. "Your loyalty is your choice. But I thought someone should warn you that you will want to follow Lee. Whether or not it's wise."

And if that didn't send chills down a sane man's spine, nothing would. Which was why he was talking everything over with Luli. She might look like pure bounce and happiness, but his wife had a patient ability to poke at things from every angle, trained by long years coaxing beauty out of solid rock. If she thought Mushi's plan was a good idea...

I want to go. I really, really do. It's wild and crazy and risky - and they're going to need some Guards, to keep people behaving long enough to start working together. "We're all in this together" has a nasty tendency to go south the first time somebody swipes a bigger piece of fruit-tart than the next guy.

It'd be a challenge. One heck of a challenge. And damned if that didn't hook him just as much as that odd pull to follow Lee.

And he'd told Luli that. All of it. Laid it out as blunt as he could; that something in him had about as much common sense as one of the cackling idiots rumor said surfed the mail chutes of Omashu, and she shouldn't trust it one inch.

Luli had looked at him a long moment; then smiled, and kissed him... and that was way too distracting to be thinking about in the station, even if he was almost off-duty-

Something thumped in the street outside. Big. Heavy enough to shake the building. Mad earthbender? Huojin wondered, as the whole station broke off whatever they were doing to grab for weapons and whistles filled with pepper sand. Just in case.

There was a massive, animal groan outside.

...Oh no. Huojin capped his ink, and glanced furtively over the rest of his fellow Guards, all just going off shift, or coming on. Maybe if I sneak out onto the roof, nobody will-

"Huojin!"

Busted. "Yes, Captain?" Huojin said politely, trying to look alert and attentive and not trying to sneak out early at all, honest.

Like a scowling mountain, Captain An Lu-shan walked toward Huojin's desk from the front of the room, a trio of too-familiar kids trailing in his wake. "You brought 'em in the first time. Handle this."

And maybe there was a hint of apology under salt-and-pepper brows; everybody in the station knew what a narrow shave Luli and his kids had had. But somebody had to do it.

Huojin looked at blue and yellow and orange, and stifled a deep sigh. "Yes, sir."

And then green pushed her way through, and held out a hand, grinning. "Hey."

"Good morning, Miss Toph." Huojin smiled and shook it, suddenly feeling a little better about this mess. "I see your friends caught up to you." He let go, and looked into eyes of worried, angry blue and gray. "How would you like to take this up onto the roof? It's quieter up there." With a lot less witnesses.

"Good idea," Sokka said thoughtfully. "Appa gets kind of worried if we're gone too long."

If I'd been caught by the Dai Li? Huojin thought, leading them upstairs past curious eyes. Worried wouldn't even begin to cover it.

"You stalled us."

Given those were Sokka's first words out on the roof, Huojin revised his opinion of how things were going to go right back down. "Damn right I did," he said bluntly. Trying not to eye the ten-ton furry beast craning his head to look up at them with a whuffle that blew Huojin's queue of hair back. "You want to know why?"

"Actually... yeah," Sokka admitted, waving Aang silent when the airbender looked like he wanted to explode. "We're Team Avatar. We can handle whole Fire Navy fleets coming after us. And you're just a regular guy."

Team Avatar? Huojin thought incredulously. I take it back. This is why Lee's so snarly. "Maybe I'm just one guy, but I like to think I'm a good friend. Lee was risking his life to give Toph a hand. Least I could do was make sure a bunch of kids didn't smash his plan to little pieces."

"It worked, too," Toph grinned.

"Kids?" Aang and Sokka yelped as one.

"I'm a warrior!" Sokka protested, voice almost cracking.

"Maybe you are," Huojin said honestly, "but your little sister? And the Avatar?" He shook his head. "Aang, I've got a daughter your age. What kind of father would I be if I let a twelve-year-old boy run smack into the Dai Li?"

Aang was staring at him like he'd turned purple and started spouting bad poetry. "But... I'm the Avatar."

"Right. From what people tell me, you're the bridge between our world and the spirits," Huojin nodded. "So you're a really, really, really powerful bender. Got it. But you're twelve. I don't know who you've been dealing with... no, actually, I know about some of the people you've been dealing with, I've heard a lot about the Council of Five, not much of it good. But any sane, responsible parent? They wouldn't be asking you to save the world. They'd be figuring out ways to hide you, so you get a chance to grow up." He shrugged. "I hate the war. But we've been fighting it for almost a century. We can keep fighting another few years, if that means we can finally stop it."

"...But I have to defeat the Fire Lord before the end of this summer," Aang said in a small voice. "Roku said Sozin's Comet is coming."

He did not just say what I think he did. "What?" Huojin croaked.

"It's this huge thing up in the sky-" Sokka started.

"I know what it is," Huojin managed. Though I haven't heard anything about it in decades. Oh, Agni... "You're sure?"

"Sure as spirit messages from dead Avatars get," Sokka said practically. "You know what it is?"

We'd never heard of it."

"I had a weird childhood," Huojin said wryly. Dug into memory for things a child of six had barely understood. "Oh, this is... not good."

"Not good how?" Toph pounced.

"You know what a waterbender can do on a full moon?" Huojin said bluntly. "Imagine a firebender a hundred times stronger."

The kids blanched.

Yeah. I'd kind of like to faint, too. "I knew you were in trouble," Huojin said honestly, looking directly at Aang. "I had no idea it was this bad. Is there anybody you can trust to help?" He glanced at Sokka. "I'm not talking about the generals. They keep Ba Sing Se safe, sure. But they think about the city, not the world. Armies and weapons and tactics, not people. Are there any grownups you know who would listen, and help? Help, not tell you what to do. Because... well, I'm just a Guard, what do I know about fighting a war? But I work the ghost watch. Kamuiy, I know. So I've got a funny feeling that saving the world isn't just stopping the war." He shrugged, and looked back at Aang. "If you're the Avatar, if you're really the guy who's supposed to bring balance back to the world - who do you trust to help you do it?"

Aang swallowed. "...I don't know."

"My dad," Sokka said firmly. "He's a good guy. I wasn't there long enough to hear the whole story, but Bato said something about a Fire Nation ship that didn't try to take prisoners-"

Uh-oh, Huojin winced.

"-They just threw out life-rafts and kept going," Sokka finished. "So... if Toph's right, and we need to stop everybody fighting - I think my dad would listen."

"If I'm right?" Toph rolled her eyes.

"Hey, even the Earth Rumble champion can miss something- Wait a minute!" Sokka shot Huojin a suspicious glance. "You're stalling us again!"

"What? Since when?" Huojin said, startled. And more than a little aggravated. "You're not just here about the bison?"

"No! We're here about my sister!"

"What about Katara?" Will not strangle teenager for mangled priorities, Huojin thought wryly. Oma and Shu know, I pulled some bone-headed stunts when I was fifteen.

"She's in trouble!" Aang insisted. As if he had doubted the boy. "The Fire Nation has her!"

"In the middle of Ba Sing Se?" Huojin said, startled. Held up a hand before the protests could break out. "We'll tell the captain, he can get word to the Army, we'll get people moving. Where? How? What do you know?"

"...I saw it in a vision," Aang admitted.

For a moment, Huojin had to just stare. "Oh, the captain's going to love this one," he groaned.

"Look, Aang saw what he saw!" Sokka said angrily.

"I never said he didn't," Huojin shot back. "I'm just saying it sounds crazy. I wouldn't believe it, if I hadn't seen some really weird stuff over the years." He shook himself. "Okay. Vision. Any details? Names, places... anything that can mark it in one of the Rings? At the Wall? Ba Sing Se's a big place."

"It's Zuko," Sokka said practically. "She could be anywhere by now. Just look for the angry jerk with the big scar." He gestured toward his left eye.

...Nah. Coincidence. "Hate to break it to you, but between the refugees and the veterans? There's a lot of people with scars," Huojin pointed out. Though most of them know they'd better stick to the Lower Ring. And Amaya said the Avatar's people were up in the Upper Ring. "Any other ways to pick him out? Young, old, what? Who is this guy? I didn't think anybody from the Fire Nation could sneak into Ba Sing Se." Not without Amaya's contacts knowing about it, anyway.

"You don't know Prince Ponytail," Sokka snorted. "He got into the middle of the North Pole once."

...Oh, no way. Because it really couldn't be. Lots of Fire Nation soldiers had attacked, right? And he knew Lee. Scarred and a great name, sure. Prince? The kid wasn't nearly arrogant enough for that. "Sounds serious," Huojin nodded. "You've met this guy before? How many troops is he going to have with him?"

Both boys looked taken aback at the thought. As well they should; if one Fire Nation infiltrator could make it inside, odds were there were more-

"Probably just Uncle," Toph said candidly. "They're fugitives. Something about General Iroh wrecking the whole North Pole invasion, by trying to save the Moon Spirit."

For a moment, nothing in Huojin's brain seemed to work. Fugitives... Moon... invasion fleet...

Urk.

No help for it. Next time he got hold of Lee, he had to strangle the kid. Just a little.

As if you could, the more practical side of him snarked.

Huojin told it to shut up, and took a deep breath. "You think the Dragon of the West is in Ba Sing Se?"

Well. He did say he was retired.

"If Zuko's here? Iroh's around somewhere," Sokka said practically. "But he's got a trick we've never seen from a firebender, so... Toph says you keep records of healers?"

A healing firebender. Oh Agni, they know what they're looking for.

"Or we could just talk to Amaya," Aang put in. "She seemed to know... something about the Fire Nation-"

"Huojin knows Lee's Fire Nation, Twinkletoes," Toph interrupted.

Sokka whipped his head around. "You said nobody could sneak in!"

"He didn't sneak," Huojin shrugged. "He came in on a ferry a month or so back, just like all the other refugees. Amaya took him on, and he's been working with her since. Quiet kid. No trouble." Except for wrecking teashops, freezing noble kids, and breaking into Dai Li headquarters...

laughing hysterically is not going to help. "But they're both gone. You'll have to try someone else." He gave the kids a sober look, hating what he was about to say would do to boys as... inexperienced as these, in what people did to stay in power. "They're gone. And so are the Wens."

"What?" Aang gasped.

"Luli and my daughters got out in time," Huojin said, trying not to let the banked anger seep into his voice. It wasn't easy. These were kids, just kids... but damn it, hadn't they seen what happened in Ba Sing Se? "If they hadn't, I think I'd really hate you right now." He made himself shrug. "That's the way it is here. Cross Long Feng, and you'd better hope you can dig a hole and pull it in after you."

"But the Earth King had Long Feng arrested," Sokka protested.

"Yeah?" Huojin raised a brow. "By who?"

From the uneasy looks, he already knew. Obviously, have to mince it up into little words, Huojin snarled silently. "Long Feng's ruled the Dai Li for twenty years. The last message Amaya got out, before that notice of a spiritual pilgrimage went up on her door... he still does." He looked away from the airbender, trying not to yield to the temper that wanted to break something. "You know, I know they chose to help you. Tingzhe. Meixiang. Amaya. Even Lee - and Lee was a wreck over that mess. I know why they did it, and I know they knew what they were risking. But they're gone. They're all gone, and if the Dai Li haven't caught them, they're running for their lives." He dusted off his hands, deliberately. "So if you want to put a missing persons report out on Katara, we can do that. You want to report there are Fire Nation infiltrators in the city? We'll do that too. But if you want to talk to city healers to find a fugitive firebender, you can read our records down in the station, in plain sight, so nobody in the Dai Li thinks they wanted to talk to you."

Gray eyes narrowed at him. "You said you wanted to help!"

Exactly when did I say that, kid? "Like you helped the Wens?" Huojin said flatly. "Meixiang told Luli about that. When she woke my wife up and told her to get our girls out." He looked straight at Toph; she might be blind, but the girl could read people better than a lot of Guards he'd met. "Tingzhe knows a lot of old secrets about the city. And Lee's one tough kid." But you know that already, don't you? You knew all along. "I hope they're okay. But the Dai Li... no one's ever brought them down."

Aang's hands gripped his airstaff, as he looked down, torn. Sokka frowned, eyes lifted as if seeing the outline of something blaze to life on the horizon.

Hello. I think I heard somebody's brain crank into gear.

"Forget the healers," Sokka said abruptly. "We need to head for the palace."

"We can't just forget about Katara!" Aang exclaimed.

"We're not going to," the Water Tribe boy said bluntly. "Remember what Toph said; think like Zuko. He wants to capture you. He's not going to hurt her, not if she's the bait. He'll use her to get to you - and that means he's got to let us know where she is. When he springs his trap, then we trap him." Sokka nodded to himself. "And the best way to do that is make sure everybody knows where you are. If we're shaking up the palace dragging Dai Li out of the walls, we'll kill two sea vultures with one boomerang."

"Right!" Aang brightened. "And if they're still working for Long Feng, we can make him tell us where they took everybody!" He dashed off the edge of the roof, and floated down; Sokka smacked himself in the forehead, and went for the stairs.

"They're wrong," Huojin said in an undertone, before Toph could follow. "Lee's not trying to catch anyone."

"But Katara knows what he looks like," Toph said, just as quiet. "And she hates him... and he knows it. If they ran into each other, she wouldn't stop until the whole city knew where he and Uncle were. And then what?" She shook her head. "I don't think he'd hurt her. Not really. But the spirits don't seem to want to clue Aang in that gee, Zuko really doesn't want to die."

Which was just what would happen, if someone believed that Lee was... well, what he was. What a mess. "A prince." Huojin shook his head. "I chewed him out... told him when he was whining..."

"He was happy." Toph gave him a wry grin. "He really was. He likes you." A lift of her hands, and stone rose to a platform she stepped onto from the roof. A push, and it sank back down, letting her step onto Appa's back.

A prince. Squinting his eyes against the gale as they took off, Huojin waited for his brain to stop whirling. No wonder he didn't know how to talk to normal people-

"As my brother's loyalty is beyond question, Fire Lord Ozai neglected to see that I appeared," Mushi's voice echoed in memory.

Okay, that did it. If he ever caught up with Mushi again? He needed to glare at the man.

He didn't lie. Exactly. Came right to the knife edge of it, but I don't think he ever lied-

More fragments of other conversations floated up; about Agni Kais, and honor... and just what the Fire Lord had done.

Lee's the Fire Lord's son.

Oh Agni. No wonder that kid is so messed up.

And if that hadn't been a lousy enough break from the spirits, now the Avatar's little bunch of heroes was about to set off a city-wide search for Prince Zuko. When Lee was already underground, literally, because something was wrong.

Not if I can help it.

Huojin frowned, considering that fiery impulse. Sure, well and good to think that. But would pitting himself against the Avatar - the so-called balance of the world - actually do any good?

Yeah. It might.

Granted he'd only met the airbender twice, but he knew a fair amount about people. Aang was the flightiest person he'd ever met, including one wild-haired older gentleman convinced he could train lizard-birds to deliver the mail. On top of that, Aang seemed to automatically assume people were going to help him. No matter what it cost them.

Which means he probably thinks this problem is solved. And he'll just flutter on to the next one. Huojin grinned darkly.

Report Katara missing? Sure, he could do that. Start a massive manhunt just because a flutter-brained boy had a vision?

I don't think so.

He might not know this Prince Ponytail Sokka had sneered at. But he knew Lee. The awkward, patient, stubborn healer who'd done his best to stitch parts of the Lower Ring together. The same Lower Ring that hadn't seen one tattooed inch of the Avatar until he needed something.

I want to follow Lee. Not just because I want to. Because - damn it, when you're out on the street, and the chips are down, you need somebody you can trust at your back.

He might have to trust Aang with the world. The world was a big place; there had to be a limit to how much any one bender could mess with it. But trust a boy Lim's age with something as fragile as a human life?

I hope Sokka's dad can help you out, Aang. But he's not here, so I'm going to have to do what your father should have done. I have to say no.

Oddly lighthearted, Huojin headed down the stairs.

"Young lady, how did you get here?"

"A lot of very unhelpful people, General How." Glancing at the small troop of soldiers around the edges of the general's private strategy room, Katara fingered the invasion plan still up her sleeve. She kept her face serious, despite Momo's chirps on her shoulder; given how the Council of Five had reacted to just a little laugh with the strategy pieces, she'd better get this right. Stuck-up, gloomy, over-decorated... Chief Hakoda didn't need fancy weapons and armor to fight. And he actually smiled.

Dad. I miss you so much. Why'd you have to go?

He'd left to protect their tribe, by helping the Earth Kingdom fight the Fire Nation. She had to be just as strong. She had to do what was right. What Gran-Gran and Mom and the other women would do, faced with people who refused to see what was real and what was crazy. No matter how confused she'd felt last night.

I have to do this. Jinhai's still young enough. Someone might choose to be kind.

It was going to be horrible for him. Knowing you'd lost your mother because she was insane, and your father because he was so lost to his tribe not to do anything about it... awful.

Amaya asks for permission? What kind of crazy lie is that?

Katara had soaked up every story her tribe had of waterbenders; everything Gran-Gran and the elders remembered, told and retold around winter fires. Waterbenders protected the tribe. They didn't need to ask. What chief would ever tell them no?

She's insane, and she's dragging them with her.

Katara hid a shiver. She'd heard plenty about that, though she'd never been so unlucky as to see it before. Usually everyone knew who was sliding away from reality, and sat on them until a healer could treat them. Or do... what had to be done. But those were lone madnesses. It was only in the winter, when one family might be snowbound alone for days, that... bad things could happen.

Horrible things, Katara thought grimly. Horrible things we have to do to our own people, because there are no benders left to give the Moon's blessing; to heal minds broken by winter, or the midnight sun.

She still remembered that silent summer day, years ago, when one-not-named didn't come back from gathering. She'd seen the glances and bowed heads of the men coming back from fishing, acknowledging they wouldn't need to... handle the problem. And she'd finally understood why Mom and Gran-Gran had insisted she and Sokka would gather sea plums with them, far away from the other women. With them, and with two little children who should have been with their own mother.

Only they didn't have a mother. And wouldn't, ever again.

She'd never forgive the Fire Nation for that.

She didn't know how someone could drag other people crazy in the spring, surrounded by other people, but Meixiang obviously had. Threatening her with a knife? The Avatar's teacher? Helping a Dai Li? Helping the Fire Nation?

Zuko deserves to go crazy. Spirits, he's already crazy. Just look at him! Tying me up with those pirates and asking me to help get his honor back? Like Aang was just some kind of pelt I'd trade for Mom's necklace?

And now this. Azula in the palace? Not a chance. The whole place would be on fire. And she was standing in it; she'd probably notice. So either Zuko was lying, and Iroh swore he wasn't...

Or he was seeing things. And Shirong was seeing them right along with him. Which was exactly what happened when the polar night pried open a family's nightmares.

Zuko's crazy. But... Iroh tried to help. Katara thought about that, and the way a man old enough to be her grandfather had knocked aside armored firebenders like snowmen. If Zuko's dragging him crazy... we can't have him getting any worse.

"All I know for sure is that they had a few earthbenders and a lot of blindfolds," Katara stated, looking again at the dozen or so soldiers standing at ease. "And they're working with the enemy. Prince Zuko is somewhere under Ba Sing Se." She winced. "We should probably start at the teashop. The Jasmine Dragon. That's where his uncle was."

"The exiled Fire Nation prince? And General Iroh?" How's dark brows shot up. "Oma and Shu! It wasn't just a rumor after all!"

"Rumor?" Katara asked, startled.

"Why, that a team of Fire Nation spies had somehow made it into the Upper Ring," the general declared, brush already stroking swift across paper to craft orders for a suddenly nervous subordinate. "You'd be amazed how much information a skilled saboteur can pick up in a teashop. We should have known something was amiss; skilled tea-makers just don't appear out of the Lower Ring! None of that debris that washes in from the ferries ever has the necessary refinement... Coordinate with the Dai Li, take as many squads as you think you can handle, and seize every employee. And all the customers... well, you know which ones to leave out. If the Dragon of the West is so foolish as to be in plain view, take no chances; if he has any possibility of escape, kill him." He handed the inked order over; the officer bowed, and half the soldiers followed him out.

"You're going to kill him?" Katara said uneasily. She didn't like the old firebender. She wouldn't mind seeing him locked up in solid rock. For, say, a week, so someone had the chance to set him straight about his jerk of a nephew. But... "He tried to save the Moon, once. He's... not all bad." I'm a healer. Maybe I can save him.

"He's lethal," General How said flatly. "If the Fire Lord ever convinced him to take the field again, if he ever pulled out of that slump his son's death put him in... Spirits, that was a fortunate fatality for our side. I would like to take General Iroh alive. He'd be a valuable source of information. But not worth half an army!"

Half an-? Katara stared at him. "Are you serious? He's just this... harmless old man..."

"That harmless old man held our city under siege for six hundred days," General How said bluntly. "I can still see his command tent sitting out there, inside the Outer Wall, taunting us..." He snorted, obviously shutting away an infuriating memory. "Infiltrated as Kyoshi Warriors working with the Dai Li, indeed!" He lowered his voice, confidentially. "Of course, we investigated. A threat to the Earth King must be looked into, no matter the source. But one of those so-called spies is laid up in her rooms outside the palace with a stomach flu, and the other two are discussing Kyoshi Island with his majesty. Hardly the behavior of deadly saboteurs!"

"Unless they're really good ones," Katara said reluctantly. Crazy or sane, she wouldn't believe Zuko as far as she could throw him. But before Sokka had left for Chameleon Bay, he'd said that professor's bit about strategy and Chin the Conqueror made sense; and if it weren't for their plans on the eclipse, it'd really make a difference. "Are you sure Long Feng's locked up? That the Earth King's safe?"

"He's in a metal cell," the general said confidently. "No bender can get out of that." He smirked. "But I suppose it wouldn't hurt to go gloat at the man. Perhaps now he'll finally know his place." He waved at the door. "Shall we?"

No one here. Dao over his shoulder, Zuko prowled the empty Upper Ring house, looking for any trace of Toph. He didn't know exactly how Uncle had gotten the address from Katara, but what he'd said about Toph's supposed letter raised the hackles on both their necks. She might not act like it, but Toph Bei Fong was a lady. Daughter of a rich and powerful merchant family; Uncle had well recalled the name, from various dealings when their fast but hopelessly antique ship needed yet another repair. General Iroh had the authority to requisition parts and supplies, but reality was a little trickier. Between Zuko's own exile and the emergencies suffered by a ship combing the far corners of the world... sometimes it was just easier to deal with Earth Kingdom merchants. They hadn't pulled Gaoling as a potential site out of a hat.

So he knew about upper class merchants. And what Uncle had learned about that letter was just wrong.

Katara said the letter was addressed to Toph. But Toph's blind.

A respectable merchant lady always remembered the proprieties. The letter should have had salutations not meant for its recipient, but for its reader.

Of such fine details were made clan intrigue, and the narrowed glance in the war room, and death.

We could be wrong. I hope we're wrong. Even if that means I left Shirong with... with what I helped the spirits do to him, just for a wild turken-geese chase.

Though he'd also left Shirong with Amaya. He had to be grateful for that, even if he really, really wanted to kick some spirit's tail for making him an unwitting accomplice.

"I still don't know what happened," Amaya had admitted earlier that morning, examining Shirong's chi in fine detail. "I've healed wounds almost as deep before, and I've never had any other bender claimed by the Moon..." She'd frowned, thinking. "The haima-jiao's injuries... you told him to fight?"

"Not exactly, but..."

Amaya glanced at Shirong. "And when I first touched Zuko's spirit with water to heal him, he accepted for his uncle's sake. For family."

"He reached for water, and I reached for fire." The agent shook his head, face set in the kind of numb shock Zuko was all too familiar with. "Are you saying we did this to ourselves?"

"No!" Zuko exploded. Grabbed Shirong's shoulder, forcing shocked eyes to meet his. "You didn't ask for this! I didn't ask for this! This isn't your fault!"

"But your uncle did ask for a way to save your people," Amaya said quietly beside them. "And as he is your family, who loves you... the Moon could answer that plea." She looked at Shirong. "What did you ask Agni for?"

Shirong glanced at Zuko, and looked away. "Something I shouldn't have."

Zuko let go, and took a careful step back. "Because you knew I was Fire Nation. And we've been your enemies for a century." He nodded, knowing what tore the man. Spirits, he knew it too well. "You knew it was treason."

"I suppose I did," Shirong said bleakly. "But who can live without the sun?" He shook his head. "I've cursed your nation for years. But Agni himself? No. I didn't have any fondness for him or his, true... yet there you were, trying to put right what Long Feng had set wrong. And I couldn't help. I'm Dai Li. It should have been my responsibility. So... I prayed. I prayed that you would get the help you needed, for all our sakes." He laughed once, bitter. "I've dealt with spirits all my life. I should have known better."

Heartbreak. Zuko could hear it in Shirong's voice, the same depthless pain he'd felt realizing Azula didn't love him, couldn't love him, not the way brother and sister were supposed to care about each other...

He didn't need Amaya's sober look to act. "I'm not sorry."

Shirong looked up, startled out of gloom.

"I'm sorry I hurt you," Zuko went on. "I didn't want to get anyone... caught between, like I am. When you're not sure what to do or say or even be next. I didn't mean to do that to you. But I did it. I gave the spirits an opening. It's my responsibility." He paused, and let out a breath. "And I'm not sorry for saving your life."

Shirong started to speak. Hesitated. Glanced at Amaya. "You've only had him for a month?"

"Some people are born to destroy," Amaya said simply. "Others learn to build, and heal. No matter what it costs them." She smiled wryly. "I don't think either of you are traitors. But I was born to water, and you are my family now. So I think I'll let you two work this out."

Shirong watched her turn the corner out of earshot, and sighed.

"You're not a traitor," Zuko stated, before the man could dig himself any deeper into pain. "I'm not here to take the city. I don't want to damage the Earth Kingdom. Uncle and I are fugitives." He smirked. "If the Fire Lord wants us captured, wouldn't it be more treacherous to help him?"

"Are firebenders supposed to use logic?" Shirong said archly.

"You'd be surprised," Zuko said dryly. "Just because we want to jump into a fight, doesn't mean we-

Oh.

Zuko let out a slow breath. "It took days for things to settle down in my head," he said honestly. "I'm still surprised a little, sometimes. You're - are you having trouble with your temper?"

"No," Shirong said quietly. "Not temper, exactly. I suppose that's why I didn't realize something was wrong before." He shivered a little. "I've felt - are you always this sure? This... spirits, I don't even know how to describe it..."

"Determination," Zuko nodded, relieved. "This is what I want. This is what I won't do. Yes." He sighed. "You have to be careful what you want. It's what drives you. Fuel for the fire. So if you're smart, every day you stop and meditate. Clear the noise out. You have to know what you want, and why you want it. Otherwise you can run right off a cliff." He grimaced. "Uncle can tell you about the time I ran a Fire Navy blockade to chase the Avatar."

Shirong eyed him.

Sometimes I'm an idiot? Zuko almost said. But Shirong's distress was too raw. Too familiar. "It'll get better," he promised. "You're still you. Just... focused a little different."

"I want to be angry with you," Shirong admitted. "I want to be angry at something. But it's like cursing an earthquake. It happened. What I knew is over. And it's... oddly fitting, in a way. How many lives have I shattered, serving Long Feng? At least I still have my own life, and my own mind."

Zuko winced. "You should be angry. I would have been, if I hadn't been in shock. If I hadn't... realized..." He swallowed, and had to look away.

"You can't be the heir," Shirong breathed. "You did lie to Mai."

"No," Zuko said wearily. "Azula needs me dead. The Fire Sages aren't stupid. Terrified of her and Father... but they'd have a window if Fire Lord Ozai were dead, and she knows it. She'd pretty much have to prove in front of a whole war meeting I was a waterbender before they'd stop trying to weasel out of it. It's so much easier just to kill me." He lowered his head. "If I were crowned, and the waterbending came out - and you know it would, you can't hide your element - it'd be worse than letting Azula take the throne. Everybody would flock to her, appalled by the tainted exile." Zuko drew a breath. "It's better this way. I've lost... what I thought I wanted. I can't save the Fire Nation." He looked Shirong straight in the eye. "But I can save part of it. With Uncle's plan, we can make somewhere for the people who don't fit."

"Your plan," Shirong stated. Tone mild, but gaze intense as high noon.

"Our plan," Zuko admitted. Thought about what he'd said, and who he'd said it to, and wanted to kick himself. "It's not going to be another Fire Nation colony. Not if I can help it."

"Oh?" Shirong lifted a brow. "You intend to evacuate Fire Nation refugees."

"And their families," Zuko said firmly. "Professor Tingzhe's students; he's already working on a list of people we can trust. And the Dai Li families. I was serious. Azula wants to take Ba Sing Se? She'll probably take it. But we don't have to make it easy."

Shirong looked pensive. "I'd say you were a hopeless idealist to think Earth and Fire could coexist, if I didn't have blatant proof we can. And still... I've never wanted to be anything other than a loyal subject of Earth King Kuei."

"So what's the best thing a loyal subject can do?" Zuko said soberly. "Fight a losing battle here? Or fall back and regroup, so when Azula leaves, you have a chance to take the city back?"

Shirong frowned.

"I need you," Zuko said simply. "Who else is going to train Min, if we get him back? He wants to be Dai Li. He should be Dai Li, doing what you were always meant to do: protect your people from kamuji malice. Who else is going to understand how torn up he is? Born to Earth, a brother to Fire... He's in the same mess you are. And he's hurt, and confused, and... young."

Shirong regarded him narrowly. Leaned back against stone, a ghost of a smile flitting across his face. "You are like your uncle."

Zuko blinked.

"When it comes to the safety of your people, you don't fight fair."

Zuko reddened. "A great name must be noble, and benevolent, and honorable beyond reproach," he quoted old lessons, "because the great names lead and defend the clans in war. And war is none of those. War is death."

Shirong nodded slowly. "So if you'd been in command at the North Pole...."

"Send out the Avatar to provide cover from the air, and have the waterbenders hole each ship below the waterline," Zuko said simply. "You can't fire catapults when your ship is sinking."

Shirong eyed him.

"We were on a raft for three weeks," Zuko said, cross. "There's only so many times you can count the sea vultures."

Which was when Shirong had started laughing.

I hope he's all right, Zuko thought now, circling into the front room he'd previously avoided. He said he was all right-

There was scarring on the floor.

Zuko froze. Scanned the room at eye level. Dropped into a crouch, and scanned it again. Looked down bare inches from the floor, and stepped with the same light, silent tread he'd use to elude alert guards.

No tripwires. That you see. Don't get cocky.

He circled the gouged wood, just close enough to confirm the pattern of interlocking metal teeth. A trap box!

Looking up, he could see where the pulley and counterweights had been attached near the ceiling. It took an effort of will not to sear the marked beams.

"She's alive," Zuko made himself whisper. "You've got to assume she's alive."

It was the most logical conclusion. You didn't trap a bender in a big iron box if you didn't want them alive. Not when there were so many easier ways to end a bender's threat... permanently.

In his mind's eyes Zuko could see half a dozen of them, all ending with Toph lying pale and still in crimson. She was so small....

You have to believe she's alive.

Zuko swallowed dryly, and forced himself to study scarred planks. Not fresh. Probably a few days old.

Which meant Toph had gotten her letter and walked straight into a trap, and he was going to see Long Feng burn for this....

And Katara didn't even notice. His fists clenched, sparks flickering to life before he snuffed them. Why am I not even surprised?

Time. He was working against time.

Need to find the owner, or a neighbor, Zuko thought, slipping out and up onto the roof for a moment to think. Someone had to pay to rent this place. And someone's going to be mad as hell about that floor.

He had to move fast. Spending any more time aboveground than he had to was risky. The dao gave him a silhouette that Azula shouldn't recognize - but if she got close enough, that wouldn't matter. Though at least the Dai Li seemed to be ignoring him. Either that, or he really had done a good job sneaking today.

Sure. And what are the odds of that.... Oh no. Agni, please, no.

But it looked like the spirits were sticking their shimmery little fingers in their ears, because the Avatar's bison was on a direct heading for the palace.

That... that idiotic, blinder than Toph, insane-

He couldn't afford to white out from rage. Could not.

Breathe. Focus. Think of Toph.

Which both helped, and didn't. Toph considered that airbending idiot a friend. And maybe she understood temporary alliances... but a friend was a friend.

Not my problem. I need to get my people out. He's the Avatar. He can handle Azula.

Except it wouldn't just be Azula. It'd be Azula and the Dai Li. And those earthbenders were used to fighting spiritual power.

It won't be enough. I've seen him in the Avatar State. Even Dai Li won't be enough-

"If the world learned one of the royal family killed an Avatar...."

Uncle's voice, ringing through memory like a death knell. Zuko held his head in his hands, and shivered.

This is a bad idea. Worse than breaking into Pohuai Stronghold. Worse than breaking into the North Pole - and you got damn lucky just to live through that one. Don't do this, it's not worth it-

Aang was going to kill his sister.

Simple logic. Azula would think she had overwhelming force. Might actually have it, for once. And she was bound and determined to prove herself the worthy heir to the throne. To show she could succeed, brilliantly, where her brother had only failed. She would kill the Avatar.

And if she didn't, the Avatar would kill her.

"You're a big brother...."

Zuko swallowed hard. Closed his eyes, and remembered the chill wind off an icy sea, and the burning focus that had let him face a polar night with only a kayak, rope, and his wits.

First, I need to find a messenger. Then....

I'm sorry, Uncle. I tried.

Long Feng frowned at him as Quan opened the metal-sheathed cell, glancing past him to the guards studiously ignoring the whole affair. "Isn't this a bit premature? Unless the Earth King has reconsidered his sentence, based on new evidence."

"Not exactly," Quan said warily. "Sir, I have reason to believe you and his majesty may be in grave danger."

"In danger?" Long Feng stepped out onto welcoming stone with unhurried grace. "Is the Fire Nation Princess not cooperating?"

"More than cooperating," Quan said bluntly, heading down the corridor toward the surface. "She's really taken charge. She's terrifying and inspirational all at the same time. It's hard to explain." He met that calculating green gaze, worried. "Sir... I think some of the other agents are slipping."

"Slipping?" Long Feng said archly, matching him stride for stride.

"I said it was hard to explain." Quan shook his head. "She... I'd swear she's not spirit-touched. But there's something. I don't like it, sir. I just don't." He hesitated, picking his words. "And I was just able to confirm information I obtained from one of Shirong's former contacts. General Iroh has been declared a traitor to the Fire Nation, and there's a bounty on his head. Prince Zuko has not been declared a traitor... but there's a bounty on his head, as well." Quan gave his superior a sober look. "Not a reward for capture, sir. The Fire Lord wants them dealt with. And Princess Azula's already made one attempt."

Long Feng almost hesitated. "She attempted to assassinate her own uncle?" His voice lowered, as he opened stone above them to rise into the palace. "Devious girl."

"I know Army Intelligence states that the Dragon of the West was shattered by his son's death," Quan said deliberately. "But that she tried to deal with him, and he was apparently unable to turn the tables on her... I have doubts about allowing this person to remain near our king."

"Do you," a precise voice purred from the shadows, gold eyes glinting above the princess' outfit of Dai Li green. "My, whatever would those be?"

"Katara's fine," the Earth King reassured them. "You have nothing to worry about."

Sokka eyed him, and the bear, and wondered if they were living on the same continent. Between the Fire Nation outside and the Dai Li inside, how could anybody in the city be fine?

"But in my vision... I was so sure she was in trouble." Aang was trying not to fidget, Sokka could see that; just as clearly as he could see Aang wanted to snap open his airstaff and fly off somewhere.

"Well, she met with the Council of Generals to plan the invasion," the Earth King said thoughtfully. "Then she was gone most of yesterday, I think off with your friends, the Kyoshi Warriors... but one of my staff just brought me a message from General How. He said some of his troops needed to perform a flanking maneuver and conquer a teashop, and he and Katara were going to question Long Feng again." The young king frowned, nudging up his glasses. "I wonder if the general needs a day off. Why would you need troops to storm a teashop?"

Toph winced.

Sokka cleared his throat. "Some of your Earth Rumble buddies in town?"

"I don't think so," Toph said innocently. "I haven't seen any of them."

"Oh, good. Then I guess- Why do you keep doing that?"

Toph grinned at him.

The Earth King chuckled behind his hand. "She couldn't know either way, Sokka. The Jasmine Dragon only opened a few days ago. Or so the message said."

And Toph winced again. Though Sokka was pretty sure anybody who didn't know her wouldn't have noticed a thing. It was the way she tried to look just a little more innocent, helpless little blind girl.

Okay. Now I know she's up to something.

Then again, last time what she'd been up to had been Appa, so-

"I'll go check on Katara," Aang said in a rush. "Just to make sure." A gust of wind, and he was out the massive doors.

"Okay, spill," Sokka said seriously, once the dust settled. "I know you felt like you had to get Appa back yourself, and I guess I can't blame Lee for wanting to stay out of Katara's icicle range. But I want to help this time."

"You know Lee?" The Earth King looked interested. So did Bosco, in a slightly nervous and trying to seem innocent way. "No, I suppose there are thousands of Lees..."

"Waterbender, breaks out sky bison, Fire Nation?" Sokka said wryly. "Probably not many of those."

"Fire Nation?" The king stood, alarmed. "That's impossible! Amaya would never help our enemies."

And if he were dangerous, Bosco's animal instinct would have sensed it."

"Really? Wow, that's cool!" A Kyoshi Warrior somersaulted across the room, landing bare inches away from Sokka, smiling wide as Toph. "Didn't expect you back so soon, cutie."

"Uh, I'm kind of involved with..." The walls opened and spilled Dai Li, and Sokka swallowed, even as Toph raised her fists and got behind him. "Suki?"

It was hard to tell under the warpaint, but he thought she looked surprised. "Who?"

Oh, this is not good...

Getting the bad guys to turn on each other seems so easy when Sokka does it! Katara retreated back down the corridor, dodging, water a shimmering arc in front of her. "But that's Azula! You've got to know she's after the city for the Fire Nation-"

A wave of deadly azure blazed toward her head; only a hasty whip of water deflected it enough for her to duck.

How can she fight when there's no room in here-!

Momo squeaked, soaring off to squirm behind a wind-ruffled tapestry. Sweating, the waterbender flung a razor-sharp ring of liquid, clipping a strand of black hair. She'd always fought Zuko in the open, where she had plenty of room for sweeping moves that shaped water into weapons. Where she could keep the scary, armored firebender at a distance. The most close-in she'd ever really had to fight Zuko had been in the Spirit Oasis, and there...

Azula didn't care how close the walls were. The princess could punch and kick from every angle, shooting flame that sliced down the corridor with blistering heat.

She's going to boil away everything I've got. There's got to be more water around here somewhere... maybe a well outside?

A yell, a rumble of stone; General How was down, trapped in the Dai Li agent's iron chains and Long Feng's sink of stone. And with him immobilized, they were looking at her...

Three on one wasn't just not fair. It was terrifying.

Bits of stone gloves zipped past her, lethal as arrows; Azula's blasts kept coming-

The curtains she'd thought were just another tapestry blasted open in a gust of wind, and Aang was there. "Katara! You're okay! Long Feng's not in his- Whoa!"

Smirking, Azula pounced.

Chapter End Notes

The Water Tribe has warriors. The Fire Nation and the Earth Kingdom have soldiers. The gap in ethics and acceptable tactics between the two can be as wide as the Great Divide... which is an episode worth looking at more closely. Instead of comparing notes on the two Earth Kingdom tribes, Katara and Sokka are each fiercely partisan toward the people who fed and sheltered them. And Katara's been in Ba Sing Se for a month, dependent on the largesse of people who, Long Feng implies, are hurting Aang by keeping Appa away from him. The cognitive dissonance, plus reminders of her mother in the time of year, has to be twisting her right around the bend.

On that note, let's speak of madness... and evil.

In the very first episode, Sokka refers to midnight sun madness. In fact, humans have an extremely difficult time dealing with polar winter and summer. Your average person needs a fairly steady day and night cycle to stay healthy. It's built into our biology, in the form of the circadian rhythm (alias, the biological clock). Someone whose ancestors came from more southerly climes moving to, say, Alaska, puts a fair amount of stress on their body. That can exacerbate all kinds of bad things, such as heart disease and mental illness.

Some northern people, such as the Inuit (Eskimos), can get around that particular stress, because their biological clock is broken. Physically, the months of complete darkness and midnight sun of summer have far less impact on them.

Mentally, though, is a whole 'nother Pandora's Box.

The legend of the Wendigo, a fearsome, once-human cannibal, originated around the Arctic Circle for good reason. Wendigo is as valid a diagnosis in the Far North as fox madness is in Japan, or changeling was in Ireland and Scotland up into the 1800s.

And susceptibility to mental illness often runs in families.

Follow, if you will, the chain of logic. Fred down the road killed his neighbors and ate them. Most of us would agree Fred is Evil. The solution, in a world without insane asylums, is obvious: Kill Fred. Problem solved.

Except ten or twenty years down the road, Fred's children crack, and also become cannibals. Whoops.

Now add, oh, a few centuries of observation and oral tradition that gee, this happens over and over...

Tribes are built to survive, on the ragged edge. Never mistake tribal for nice. Tribes can't afford nice.

And so, consensus emerges: Evil people have evil children. Handle the problem. Before good people die.

Zuko does not see the world the way the Water Tribe does. By Katara's standards, Zuko is insane.

Interestingly, this would affect the Northern Water Tribe far less than the Southern. Despite its name, the Northern Tribe can't be nearly as close to the North Pole as the Southern is to the south. In the opening eps of Avatar, the sun never sets, indicating complete polar summer when it's still weeks before their (southern hemisphere) summer solstice. The Siege of the North is maybe two months after the northern hemisphere winter solstice, and yet they already have the sun coming up on a regular basis, long enough for the Fire Navy to attack for hours before withdrawing for the night. Besides waterbenders, the Northern Tribe also has politics, an indication beyond the other obvious wealth of the city that they do have spare resources; a necessary buffer if you're going to try and help someone who's ill instead of protect yourself with lethal force.

Katara is not being immature. Katara is being very mature, by her tribe's standards. Mature women - and this is usually the women, not the men - decide who the tribe can save... and who has to die.

Chapter 24

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Iroh studied the two asleep in the sunlight, young man holding a blanket-wrapped young lady, and had to smile. Even in the darkest hour of Ba Sing Se, hope could flower. "Good morning, Mai. Min."

The boy's head shot up first, no surprise; but Min barely spent a second gaping at him before ducking back down to listen to Mai's breathing-

"Oh," Iroh breathed, dropping to one knee beside them to check her pulse, and feel a feverish forehead. "Oh, Mai. Never would he have asked this of you."

"I know," Mai whispered hoarsely, rings under her eyes as she looked at him. "That's why I did it." She blinked. "General. You shouldn't be here."

"I may not have my nephew's skill at sneaking, but I was not seen," Iroh assured her. Smiled gently. "Rest, now. The worst is over. You will feel chilled for some days, and... fragile. But your will was strong, and your need great. It was enough."

Mai blinked again, eyes suddenly wide. "You...?"

"How else could I have broken the siege of Ba Sing Se? Azulon wished it burned, if it would not surrender." Iroh regarded Min soberly. "I know one does not survive the crisis alone. We are in your debt. So I am pleased to be able to tell you your family is well; though arranging for Jinhai to greet the sun will require some degree of care. Are you well?"

"I... but... you..." Min stammered. "I'm... sorry?"

"A good start," Iroh said dryly. "Fortunately, I have some experience with desperate young men." He raised a mildly scolding finger. "Do not do it again."

"No, sir." Min swallowed. "You're General Iroh?"

"Retired," Iroh said simply. "I was a different man, then. I hope I am a better one now." He handed the young man a scrap of paper. "Memorize those, destroy it, and scatter the ashes. One of those names should be able to help you contact your family, whatever you decide." He regarded Mai. "As for you, young lady. Your calligraphy is still to court standards?"

"My parents would accept nothing less," she said evenly.

Ah, poor girl. At least his nephew had the leisure to hit things, once in a while. "Then you will need new brushes, if you remain here," Iroh nodded. "Perhaps you might ask Min for advice on certain shops. Or, if not, I am certain Agent Quan would know." He shrugged. "Or, of course, Azula might simply order some brought to the palace."

Mai nodded slowly. "I understand."

"I don't," Min said warily.

Mai smiled slightly. "You are innocent. It's kind of cute." She reached up to flick the tip of his braid. "The general just identified three likely power centers. If I decide to pick one to ally with."

"Oh, right," Min nodded. Frowned. "Huh?"

"We'll talk politics later," Mai promised. Glanced at Iroh again. "I can't abandon Ty Lee. And she's..."

"She may not be so loyal to Azula as you believe," Iroh said mildly. "Let us say, you are not the only one with irregularities in your genealogy."

Mai lifted a black brow, obviously poised to ask more-

"Message for Mushi!" a sing-song voice called. Knocked briefly at the apartment door; then a dusty runner, one of many messengers in Ba Sing Se, pattered inside, still panting a bit from the stairs. "There a Mushi in here? I better have gotten the right address... well, hello, sweetie-"

Steel gleamed between Mai's fingers. "You're looking for him."

The runner gulped, and turned toward Iroh with a weak grin. "Ah, your nephew didn't have time to write it down, so... he said the bison's heading for the palace."

Iroh felt the world drop out from under him. No, not so soon, we are not ready-

"Oh, and he's going to do something stupidly heroic," the runner nodded.

Iroh clapped a hand to his forehead in disbelief.

"No," Mai said, voice edged with dread. "He wouldn't."

"I kind of think he would," Min gulped.

Iroh sighed. And smiled at the runner. Who paled, and started backing up.

"Forgive me for the unpleasantness," Iroh said politely, snagging the man by the collar before he could escape. "But I fear I will need a distraction."

There's got to be some way to distract her! Determined, Sokka pitched Boomerang in what should look like a near miss-

Giggling, Ty Lee dodged it. And cart-wheeled at him again as he dodged her, leaping and poking and jumping again as Boomerang hit a pillar, then the wall, then another pillar, and whistled through air straight back-

Ty Lee swirled around it as it sang through, flirting with the razor edge like a kid dashing into summer surf. "It's like we're dancing together!"

Surreal, Sokka decided. Grabbing Boomerang, and trying not to listen too hard to the crunches as Toph swatted Dai Li like a polar dog in the middle of a swarm of weevil-rats. She was better than any of them, but he had a bad feeling she might not be better than all of them. I'm just a guy with a boomerang, he thought desperately. I didn't ask for crazy spirit magic, and saving the world, and bouncy... sort of evil... crazy girls.

Fighting Ty Lee was like fighting a nightmare. Not the silly ones he told Katara about, where penguins sang and food ate people. The frustrating, serious ones, where he was just try to get Aang to slow down, slow down and listen...

Toph backed into him. Deliberately, given her listening feet. "Don't start seeing dancing mushrooms on me, Snoozles!"

"Hey, the cactus juice wasn't my fault!" Sokka protested. "Um. Kind of?"

...Were those Dai Li snickering?

Oh, that is just not fair. I'm from the South Pole! It was a plant! Plants have water in them!

Although the cactus juice was water the way Ty Lee's cute little fists were punches, and a smart man stayed away from both of them, 'cause here she came again.

And somewhere in the middle of the punching and dodging and rocks sailing around like crazy avalanches, there was a quieter rumble of stone, and a cleared throat. "I'm sorry, your majesty. But given the situation with the generals and Princess Azula, I have to get you to safety."

"What?" the Earth King yelped. "Put me down! Bosco!"

"Grr-yipe!"

Stone flipped over, taking bear, king, and one apologetic Dai Li with it.

Which just leaves a dozen or so, and Ty Lee, Sokka thought, skittering back to bounce off a pillar a few seconds before Ty Lee's jabbing fingers could intersect his shoulder. "So much for animal instinct. Trade you?"

"Sure," Toph gritted out. "I'll take Bouncy, and you can stop rocks with your head!"

Point. Oh man, this was so not good.

Where the heck is Aang?

Tumbling out through wind-blasted curtains into the palace courtyard, Katara reached toward the hole in earth Aang had opened with a strike of his staff-

Water!

She pulled up a wave, smashing it down on Azula-

Blue fire erupted. Steam had barely cleared before whirling disks of azure flame sliced through, aiming for her heart.

Go ahead and grin, Katara thought defiantly, sliding fire aside with walls of ice as Aang hopped, air-blasted, and earth-trapped various Dai Li. We're in the open now. We can beat you.

Weird. Fighting Azula was terrifying... but she felt so much better. For weeks she'd behaved, behaved, behaved in Ba Sing Se; hemmed in by rules and smiles like a brook channeled meek and mild into the fields outside the Inner Wall. Now she was riding the strength of the waves, of the ocean itself...

And no one was going to tell her Azula wasn't evil.

She might get hurt. She might die. But she was fighting for her family, and herself. Azula was going down.

Oh. And while she was at it, she just might save Ba Sing Se, too. And then she and Aang could sit on General How, and lock Zuko up somewhere safe, and talk Iroh onto their side. Who said Sokka was the only one who could make plans?

Katara whipped a flying rock-glove into mud, and slung the whole mess back toward Azula. Who ducked... but not quite enough.

Mud splattered over the pristine green uniform, and gold eyes narrowed in fury.

Katara stuck her tongue out.

And just missed biting it, as Azula kicked and punched a fiery blizzard of blasts her way. This isn't going to be easy...

But it looked like she'd finally gotten the Fire Princess mad. And like Master Pakku had told her, anger was a weapon in your opponent's hand, not yours. A waterbender raged, but it was the ocean's rage; cold and cruel and merciless, dragging the foe down. Not the quick, hot flares she'd seen from Zuko, there and gone like a cascade of fireworks-

Like fire.

Uh-oh. Maybe this wasn't a good idea-

Azula leapt and whirled, heel striking earth to blast a wave of fire Katara's way, and there was no more time to think.

If these were regular Army earthbenders, or even the palace guard, Toph was sure she would have flattened them all minutes ago. As it was...

Dai Li are good. Really, really good.

The rock gloves, the earth shoes - they blended into stone, making the wearers feel more like ants moving across the earth than people. Which didn't stop her; Toph could feel ants moving. But trying to concentrate on tremors her bending told her should be one size, while her head told her they were a lot bigger... ugh. It was easier to read the earth they were bending instead. Which meant she was reacting, not flattening them first. She hated that.

Worse, Sokka was getting tired. She could feel it in his breath, in how heavy his steps were getting. And if Ty Lee put him out - well, that was it. She'd have to cut her losses, drag Snoozles out on moving earth with her, and hope they could make it to Appa.

Gloves zipped at her like flutter-hornets. Toph slammed up a wall, crooking her fingers in to yank that rock deeper into her own stone. Chi fighting chi. Bending against bending. And she was better than them, she was the best. But there were too many.

Guys. I know I like to take care of myself. But I could really, really use some help right now...

Running footsteps. Familiar ones.

No way!

Oh yeah. Toph grinned like a fiend; fingers, fists and feet a symphony of shattered rock-gloves and pillars and sailing shields of stone. She couldn't see the flames, but she felt the blast of heat, and heard the fiery roar and shouts of dismay from agents swept aside by something that flexed and crackled.

"You!" Sokka yelped.

"No, don't!" Toph felt Sokka throw, stamped up a shielding wall, feeling Boomerang clatter off stone.

Ty Lee giggled.

She's in the air, I can't see her-

"Down!"

Toph dropped. Felt Zuko's hand push her farther down and away, heard Ty Lee's yelp, Zuko's grunt-

Fire went out.

But Ty Lee was on the ground, everyone was on the ground, and without earth shoes shielding muscle twitches and breathing from the rocks, she knew where they were-

Stomp and thrust her arms up, pillars of earth pinning every enemy to the ceiling. Cup her fingers and slash, curving up and down, growing pillars and ceiling together like stalactites and stalagmites.

Toph dusted her hands off, and grinned. Nobody was getting out of that on their own.

"Ah, Toph?" Sokka said warily, picking up Boomerang. "You missed a bad guy."

"No, I didn't." Toph stalked over to where Zuko was swearing under his breath, and planted her fists on her hips. "That was so dumb!"

"No." Zuko gritted his teeth, obviously biting back even worse language. "Tactical sacrifice. You're a master bender. And if you can't bend, you can't see." He took a deep breath, braced himself-

And stood up.

"You- how- what?" Sokka sputtered.

"Wow." Ty Lee's voice held rueful admiration. "You didn't forget a thing!"

"Trust me, Ty Lee. You're unforgettable." Zuko took a step, and hissed. "Agni, that always-" He bit it off.

"Well, it wouldn't hurt if you didn't dodge-" Ty Lee gasped. "Oh. Your face... I didn't know it was..."

"Yeah, yeah, we've all seen it before," Sokka said impatiently. "You do know each other! Where's Katara?"

"With General How," Zuko said impatiently. "I hope. Unless she didn't listen to Uncle, and did something stupid... Of course we know each other! She went to school with my sister. You remember my sister? Who's not exiled? Who wants to kill you, and me, and Aang, and probably half the Earth Kingdom if she can get away with it?" Steel rang, as Zuko drew his blades and turned toward the shouts of guards just a few corridors away.

Sokka yelped. Tried to disguise it as a manly cough. "Since when do firebenders use swords, oh high and mighty jerkbender?"

"Since I keep ending up in disasters where I can't bend." Zuko leaned back enough to look Ty Lee in the eye. "Where is she, Ty Lee? Where's Azula?"

Outside, something exploded.

"...Forget I asked."

The element of adaptability, indeed, Azula thought, smirking behind her facade of rage as she attacked Katara again, her loyal Dai Li holding off the Avatar. Oh, please. Her attacks are right out of the textbooks.

Give the ex-general and traitor that much credit. While Iroh had been a loyal soldier under Azulon's command, he'd gone to great lengths to study the remaining bending styles of their enemies. His compiled observations were still useful tactical manuals, so long as you ignored all the cultural musing junk mixed in.

On top of that, the little waterbender still fought as if she were facing a smaller, lighter version of Zuko. A firebender with no skill, no perfect economy of form and motion, and a temper explosive as blasting jelly.

Disgusting. But oh, so useful.

Simply "slip", a little. Send a few fireballs slightly awry. Allow her face to show some of the narrowed eyes and flared nostrils of a firebender in a tooth-grinding rage...

Ah. Yes. There was the betraying smirk, on the water peasant's face. And... yes. Now Katara was starting to take the offensive, hurling razor ring-waves of water that clipped hair and a robe's fringe, forcing Azula back.

Just where Azula wanted her.

Airbenders are pacifists, little girl. Have you thought about that? Do you know what dagger is drawn at your back, and his, every time you fight?

No, the waterbender didn't know. She couldn't even guess. She would have crafted her battle strategies against firebenders based on facing Zuko. And the Avatar would never have hesitated to fight Zuko. Master airbenders, the ancient scrolls said, knew the truth from lies...

And the disgusting truth about Zuko was, he never wanted to kill anyone.

Weakling.

A slash of the Avatar's airstaff sent Long Feng flying into a wall. Bone snapped.

Yes!

Sacrifice one tile to win it all; Azula saw the airbender flinch from the injury, gray eyes seeking out the young girl who mothered him-

Cool and calculated, Azula stepped into the line of Katara's water whip.

The world slowed.

Water arced at her like ribbons of ice.

Azula breathed deep, calm as the heartbeat before flashover.

The airbender saw oncoming death - death about to be dealt by someone he loved - and leapt into the air to escape reality. Turning his back. Just for an instant.

Perfect.

Flames blasting her back out of the arc, Azula parted yin and yang. And let cold fire fly.

"He can't be dead," Sokka gulped as they ran, Toph's moving earth carrying them past guards and Dai Li too fast for most to do more than try wild strikes. In his mind's eye, he could still see that small smoking figure fall. "He can't be dead, he can't-"

"Toph," Zuko said grimly.

"Way ahead of you," the earthbender nodded, yanking hands apart to drop them all into a pit-tunnel, and would she mind warning a guy first?

No. Not all of them. "Zuko!" Toph hissed up at the sky.

"You're going to need a distraction."

"What?" Sokka yelped.

"Dai Li don't read the ground," Toph told him. "Not as good as me, anyway. If we go underground-"

"We can get right to them and call Appa," Sokka realized. "Good plan." He glared at her. "Except for the part about trusting Zuko to distract Crazy Blue Fire over there!"

"Oh, she wants to kill me way more than she wants to kill you." Zuko's smirk had a bitter edge. "It'll work."

"Oh yeah," Sokka nodded, glaring up at the opening. "Except for the tiny detail that gee, you can't bend." He flung his hands up. "She'll fry you in under a minute!"

"Solves all your problems, doesn't it?" The smirk didn't change. "Move fast."

"Are you nuts?!" Sokka demanded. And why was Toph looking like that, sad and scared and biting her lip?

Zuko took a deep breath, and let it sigh out, smirk fading into something that looked... sad. And determined. "Sokka. Your sister wouldn't listen, but... If the Avatar dies, my people die. Because the next Avatar will be Water Tribe."

Well, yeah, so he'd heard, though he didn't like to think about- Oh. Oh.

The North Pole, Sokka realized. It'd be that all over again. Everybody knows the Fire Nation is evil. They don't know Iroh, or Jeong Jeong, or that old man who believed me in Gaipan. If the Fire Nation killed Aang, killed the Avatar, there'd only be one way to stop them...

"I'd stop them, Sparky," Toph whispered.

"I know you'd try." Zuko smiled at her, faint as a ghost. "Tell Uncle... tell him I said to look after you, okay? For him." His face hardened. "Go!"

And Toph had Sokka's hand, and the earth moved.

"That jerk's going to die on us," Sokka breathed, as Toph collapsed the tunnel behind them and burrowed them through the ground like the badger-moles who'd taught her. "He's... it doesn't make sense! He hates Aang!"

"No, he doesn't." Toph sniffled, and set her jaw. "He told the truth, Sokka. And that's why we're going back for him." She swallowed. "After we get Aang."

"We're going to wha-?" Sokka choked on a mouthful of earth. Spit it out, and decided maybe he'd just shut up for a minute.

Toph wanted one jerk of a firebender? Fine. First they'd get Aang and Katara, then they'd call Appa and see if Azula had left any pieces to pick up.

And maybe somewhere in there, the world would start making sense again.

Some kind of water-octopus? Zuko wondered, seeing translucent tentacles lash at any threatening Dai Li as Katara hovered protectively over the fallen Avatar. Don't know that form...

It didn't matter. There was only one form he had to get right, exactly right - or nothing would matter, ever again.

If he could. There was barely a trickle of chi moving when he breathed, and even what he'd learned from Amaya about lightning-injuries might not be enough...

Zuko stepped into clear view, swords still drawn, and let his voice carry. "Azula."

She started, as if surprised. Turned toward him with a half-smile, gold eyes calculating. "Zuko. How fitting to find you here, in our moment of triumph-"

"You mean the Fire Lord's moment of triumph." Zuko kept his gaze off battling water, and waiting Dai Li. If Uncle was right, nothing he could say would sway those loyal to Azula. But given what Quan had done, and Bon...

Some of them might listen. Maybe.

Twenty yards. Zuko stopped in settling dust. Close enough she'll think I'll try to rush her. Far enough she's sure she can stop me.

"Father's triumphs are ours, Zuko. After all, we are his humble servants."

Zuko saw that hint of a cruel smirk, and shook his head. "That's the only way you could do it, isn't it? The only way you could stand wearing an honorable uniform. You played with Kuei, the same way you did cricket-mice." He clicked his dao together, sheathing them. "Only instead of legs, you're going to tear off his hopes."

He saw agents tense in his peripheral vision, braced himself to move-

Azula held up a hand, halting them. "You look tired, brother." Gold eyes were shadowed with concern. "Life as a fugitive can't have been easy. But your quest is over. We've won. We have the Avatar. Your honor will be restored, and Father will welcome you. You can rest now. You can come home."

Spirits, she knew him so well. He knew she was lying. And he still wanted to believe...

Always remember who you are.

Time to see if I really can irritate anything. Zuko drew a breath, and settled into the deceptively easy stance. "Mom loved you."

Gold narrowed, just for an instant. "Mom's gone, Zuko. We have to obey and please Father now. And he will be pleased-"

"She asked me to protect you."

Azula smiled, humoring him. "That was a little too much to ask, given you were exiled on pain of death if you ventured back into Fire Nation waters. Oh, wait; you did do that, didn't you? And it wasn't for me."

"Yes, it was," Zuko said simply. Trying to read the tension in cold golden eyes, in the stance that could whip from young noble lady to lethal in a heartbeat. "I wanted to protect you from the greatest threat to the Fire Nation, and the world." He drew a breath. "That's why I have to stop you."

Azula stared at him, false concern darkening into cold-blooded hate. "You're defying me."

I know.

"You're defying Father!"

I know.

"Traitor," Azula breathed, eyes alight with poisonous joy.

...I know.

Azula laughed. Loud and rich and-

Spun crackling arcs of blue, crashing together in a bolt that reached out and struck-

He was blind. There was just a wave of power; crashing through his chi, drumming in his ears, shoving him across open ground like holding back a hurricane with his bare hands. He held the pattern, breathed the pattern, praying everything he'd learned about lightning was enough to keep his chi intact. Praying Uncle was right, and you only needed a trace of energy moving to guide the lightning away...

In, down, up - oh, damn.

If he lived to do this again, he'd have to remember to pick a target first.

Agni, please let me not kill anyone.

He let go.

Lightning crashed, and he savored the utter, absolute shock on his sister's face. Before she faded, and everything faded, and earth dragged him down.

As the sun went out, he could have sworn he heard a breath of fire.

Agni, let him live, Iroh prayed, swatting aside the last few dazed Dai Li between himself and that too-still form. It has been two years since I last lectured him for something so lethally foolish. And that has obviously been far too long.

Though from a purely tactical perspective, his nephew had been working with limited options. Azula, the Dai Li, and the Avatar all in the same place - that was a recipe for disaster. And not only for the Earth Kingdom.

The general in him recognized that. The uncle and adoptive father...

Six years, it has been, since last I tore a strip off a junior officer. I believe I am looking forward to this.

Dark humor, to distract himself from how very still Zuko was. Still, and pale; breath shallow, pulse fluttering like moon-moth wings when Iroh felt it.

And he was cold. Cold as shock, for ordinary souls; far, far too cold for a firebender.

Zuko. No.

Rubble stirred, and Agent Quan coughed, looking around in dazed shock. Beyond him, Iroh saw Azula wince, fumbling hand touching what was going to be a most unpleasant lump.

Not dead. Iroh sighed. Almost tempted to smile, however bittersweet. So Lee is born of Water, after all.

Lee might be, but he was not. "I suggest you move, Agent Quan," Iroh said levelly. "I only seek to deal one death today." Forgive me, Ursa. I must.

The Dai Li paled, but held firm. "She is Long Feng's ally," Quan said hoarsely. "I'm sorry, General. No."

Iroh inclined his head in deep respect. "I pray Long Feng knows how deeply he is honored, to have such loyal men." He breathed in-

Earth collapsed under him.

Iroh gripped tightly to Zuko as a sideways landslide dragged them through the darkness. He kept himself from panicking, breathing slow and even. If the earthbender decided to trap them underground, his own breath might be the only air they had...

Earth lifted them back into sunlight, inside a raised wall of trembling stone Toph held with outstretched hands. "Got you!" she crowed.

"You've got to be kidding!" Katara sputtered, cradling a small form on Appa's back.

"Believe me, she's not kidding," Sokka griped, helping Iroh manhandle Zuko up onto cream and brown fur. "We can drop them off later, okay? Toph, come on!"

Grinning, Toph bounced herself up on a pillar of stone, and swarmed across fur to nestle beside his nephew. "Yip yip!"

"Ack!" Sokka clung for dear life as the bison took off, not quite in position on the massive neck. "Toph!"

"You snooze, you lose, Snoozles!" Toph's smirk faded as she gripped Zuko's hand. "He's cold. He's not supposed to be..."

"He redirected lightning," Iroh said quietly as they flew past startled guards on the Outer Wall. Taking off his own outer robe, he wrapped it around the singed prince. "Stay with him. Help me keep him warm." He looked up, about to ask how Aang was; lethal as Azula's strikes usually were, he did not think one of the Water Tribe would carry away a corpse...

He is not breathing.

Katara bit her lip, and unstoppered a vial. Glowing blue water circled above her hand, before sinking into the Avatar's wounds.

Spirit water. Iroh didn't dare to move. Aang needed more than healing, and there was no other chance-

The airbender coughed, and blinked at Katara. Smiled faintly, before sagging back into unconsciousness in her arms.

Thank you, Yue, Iroh prayed, sincerely grateful. Thank you, brave lady.

It had been a desperate gambit, indeed. But somehow, his nephew had won.

And now it is my turn to fight, Iroh knew, summoning healing flame. Sinking heat into chill flesh, and a tattered spirit. Hold on, nephew. Hold on.

There wasn't much fuel on a bison's back. As they soared through the day into afternoon, Iroh drew small bits of flame from coal shards in Zuko's firepot, knowing from his own experience his nephew needed a steady fire far more than an intense one. Still. It wasn't enough. "I would not object to our being set down, somewhere," Iroh said mildly. Anywhere, so long as there is shelter, and something I can burn.

"How about we just throw you off?" Katara snarled, pulling water from her waterskin to try and heal more of Aang's burns. But water wavered around her hands, and the glow of healing was faint.

"The cold-blooded fire rages through the body's chi like an inferno," Iroh said soberly. "It is not easily healed. You have fought quite a battle. A healer must know when to rest, or risk harming her patient further."

"I would never hurt Aang!" She glared at them both, obviously weighing the merits of smacking them off the bison's back with a whip of water. "Sokka, take Appa down so we can-"

"They're not leaving."

Toph gripped fur and his nephew, equally tightly. "They helped us out, we help them out, right? Like the ghost town-"

"No. This is different." Still holding the reins, Sokka turned toward them, face grim. "This time? You've got something we need."

Ah. Unfortunate, that. "I have only the very basics of fire-healing," Iroh said plainly. "I can mend bruises, little more. I will be no help to you."

"But you know lightning." Blue eyes held his, determined. "You said you wanted to bring balance back? Aang needs everything you can tell us."

Intelligent young man. Which narrowed his options for getting Zuko away from the Avatar considerably.

"Guys," Toph started.

"I can heal him, Sokka," Katara said, voice hard. "We don't need their help."

"Guys-"

"Katara. I believe you. I do. But I never even saw lightning until we got to Kyoshi Island! You think Yugoda ever did?" Sokka shook his head. "I'm not risking Aang's life when we've got someone who knows it right here."

"Hey! Idiots!" Toph yelled. "Either you let them off, or I try bending earth I can't see to make us land." She took a deep breath, and swallowed. "Zuko's cold."

Katara snorted. "Oh, please, like the firebender's going to catch a-"

"My nephew is ill," Iroh said bluntly. "Very ill. Please. Set us down."

"He's what? He was fine just..." Sokka narrowed his eyes, looking them over. "You're keeping him warm."

Truth had worked with Toph. Not with Katara... but her brother seemed a bit more willing to listen, rather than judge. "It is the only chance he has," Iroh said soberly.

"Uncle?" For once, Toph's voice didn't sound strong. "You sound like Sparky's going to..."

"He has a chance," Iroh said quietly. "But I need wood. Coal. Something that will burn."

"I thought fire was the superior element," Katara sniped. "Because you don't need anything but yourself."

"To heal, we do," Iroh said simply. "Just as water draws from you to heal, so fire draws from us. There is not enough chi to both create the fire and heal with it."

"Fine." Sokka turned back to steer Appa again, toward a sky-piercing forest, and raised his boomerang. "Get ready to catch."

Green pine branches were not the best of fuel, but they would do. He could keep Zuko warm, keep him alive...

Yet now they were over the waters of Chameleon Bay, and there was no reasonable chance of escape-

Coal smoke. He could taste it.

"I don't believe it!" Sokka's yell made the words a curse, as he stared down at the supply ship steaming through salt water. "How'd they get around the stink 'n sinks?"

By paying attention, Iroh thought dryly, peering at the crew suddenly animated on the deck below. The distance was great, but there was something familiar about-

A familiar gray head turned up toward them, spyglass in hand. Not panicked, despite what must be widespread knowledge that the sky bison meant the Avatar's presence.

Not panicked... but trebuchets were being brought on line, and the ship itself was being trimmed to flee.

Standing on a furry back, Iroh set the sky ablaze with fire.

Chapter End Notes

And this should be the last major intersection with canon. (Slumps with relief.)

Okay, a few canon notes: Most of "The Guru" episode did happen. Aang did get to the Eastern Air Temple to see Guru Pathik and try to master the Avatar State by unlocking his chakras; that's where he had the vision of Katara. And Toph was captured in Ba Sing Se by bounty hunters paid off by her overprotective parents: her official earthbending teacher Master Yu, and the Earth Rumble tournament host Xin Fu. Only too bad for them, she is the greatest earthbender in the world, invented metalbending, and turned the tables something fierce. (Aang and Sokka caught up with her on her way back to the city. She figured out something had gone badly wrong at the palace.)

By the way, people have wondered about Toph bending iron versus steel. The fact is, steel is not purified iron. Steel is, mostly, an iron-carbon alloy which may have traces of other elements, depending what you made it for. Sword steels can have some very interesting stuff in them. So the Fire Nation wouldn't use steel instead of iron because of earthbenders; remember, Toph is the only one we've seen bend metal of any kind. They'd use steel for the same reason anyone does - it's got properties of strength and flexibility regular iron just doesn't have.

And at one point someone wondered about Zuko bending blood, due to it being hot. Um... no. Firebending hot as in near-boiling water, sure. Lurid literature aside, nobody's blood ever actually boils.

Now, a note on why Zuko never just went, "Dear Fire Lord Ozai. Hate you. Hate your quest. Joining the Avatar."

Children see dolls as mini-people. Firebender or not, Azula setting an unwanted doll on fire is not normal behavior. Put that together with her canon tendency to torment animals and her flawless ability to lie without changing pulse or respiration... Azula is a psychopath.

Given Ozai not only accepts but encourages her behavior, and that last plot of his against the Earth Kingdom, he likely is too.

Canon, Iroh was at least in his twenties when Ozai was born, and off serving Azulon in the war. It's likely he simply wouldn't have been home often enough or long enough to realize there was something drastically wrong with his younger brother. Not until it was too late. Psychopaths are charming... and masters of bending other people's reality.

Which, unfortunately, explains a lot about Zuko.

Anyone so massively screwed by Fate as to be in a relationship with a psychopath - much less raised by one - will come away with two things: a bent moral compass, and a severely damaged ability to test reality. Both of which, ironically, are in part caused by an accurate perception of the psychopath: this person holds my life in his hands, and does not care.

Right, wrong, every fact and supposition that make up reality - for the survivor, all are first tested against, will this keep me alive?

All too often, if it doesn't agree with what the psychopath wants, the answer is no.

Zuko chasing the Avatar for three years, canon, isn't surprising. Zuko realizing he could stop - that took a bone-deep courage, and at least as much guts as Suki facing off with Azula to cover Appa's escape. And as acts of pure, unadulterated bravery go, for me, that one puts Suki up with Yuya Shiina facing down Demon Eyes Kyo, or Vice-Captain Renji Abarai trying to take out Captain Byakuya Kuchiki to stop Rukia's execution.

As for Katara's behavior... she is not going to change her mind, not without confirmation from her own culture that changing her mind does not mean she is going insane. Anything else would be counter-survival.

Chaper 25

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Standing on the observation deck of the supply ship Suzuran, Captain Jee lowered his spyglass. Fiery script had faded from the air, yet it still burned in his mind.

Truce. Injured firebenders. Children.

No doubt in his mind who had blazoned it on the sky. Really, what other firebender would be on a sky bison?

General Iroh.

Traitor Iroh, officially. Which meant his orders were clear, as they were for any member of the armed forces. Traitors must be brought to justice. Either by Agni's hand, or another's. And yet...

Children.

"Captain!" Lieutenant Sadao gave a fidgety salute. "Coal-balls are hot! Ready to fire!"

The telescope snicked together in Jee's hand. "Douse it, and secure the trebuchets."

"Sir?"

"Follow the bison," Jee ordered the young lieutenant. "No offensive moves."

The lieutenant's face fell, and he swallowed hard. "Yes, sir." Shoulders slumped, he headed off to give the order. "Oh spirits, we're all gonna die..."

Jee managed not to bury his face in his hands. Misfits and screw-ups, his whole crew. That hadn't changed, promotion or no promotion.

Crew and captain, a critical part of his mind pointed out. Don't forget that.

True enough. He'd done more than his share of grumbling, following Prince Zuko's orders. But the truth was, he'd never have been on the prince's ship in the first place if he'd had enough sense to keep his mouth shut around... higher-ranking officers.

I thought he was a reckless fool, risking all our lives to pursue one airbending child. Jee shook his head, remembering the moon gone dark, and a glowing thing that had smashed its way through the invasion fleet. Thank Agni they'd been near the fringe of the assault; full steam had powered their flight, while some of the crew who'd played Pai Sho with the general had dropped to their knees and prayed to the Moon to rein in her enraged lover...

Reckless, yes, Jee thought, recalling the angry young prince. But he wasn't a fool.

Reckless, and dead, as the flaming wreck of his ship had made clear. His ship, and never mind the Wani was Prince Zuko's; Jee had captained her for months, and seeing her broken had struck him to the heart as much as the prince's death. They hadn't deserved it, either of them. Ship and prince had survived everything the world could throw at them, only to die at the hands of honorless wharf weevil-rats...

And Zhao hadn't even ordered a cursory search for the perpetrators. The Fire Lord's invasion came first.

How obedient of him. Jee smirked darkly. Why, a suspicious man might even wonder if he didn't want them to be found.

Well. Speaking of suspicious people... Jee dropped down the ladder to the main deck, walking over to a lithe figure in armor standing out of the way of the trebuchet crews, gold eyes narrowed to watch a creature out of myth fly. "Lieutenant Teruko."

"Sir." The marine officer came to attention, granting him a brisk nod.

Jee hid a smile. At least Teruko was here because of her attitude. Not nerves, like poor Sadao. "I suspect we're going to need a shore party, wherever they come down. Preferably people who can keep a cool head under fire. And not fire first."

"Not firing first is almost against marine policy, sir." She didn't smile when she said it. But her gaze held concern, not objections. "You don't think the firebenders will be the only civilians?"

"I don't know," Jee said plainly. "But I suspect firing first would be... unwise." He nodded toward the bison. "That's General Iroh up there."

Her eyes widened. "He's been proclaimed a traitor, sir."

"For sabotaging the invasion. Yes, so I've heard," Jee said dryly. "Based on past experience, though, the Avatar alone could sabotage a dozen well-laid plans." He held up a hand before she could speak. "I believe the Dragon of the West has information on my commanding officer. Even if he did not - he may be a traitor, but he's never been a liar. Or a fool. If he's putting himself in a position where he knows we may capture him, then those children exist. And they need our help."

"Our heavily armed help," Teruko muttered under her breath, turning to carry out his order. And hesitated. "Sir. He's been a fugitive for months. Why would he have information on Admiral Kamijyo?"

"Ah. I should have said, my former commanding officer," Jee admitted. "Paperwork and bureaucracy; the Ocean didn't do us in, but between the scribes and the rice-counters... Some chains of command still haven't been straightened out." Which suited him just fine. It was good to have breathing space, in case you ran across an order you really didn't want to obey.

Teruko frowned, and braced herself. "The prince is dead, sir."

"I know," Jee said grimly. "I want to know by whose hand." So I can hunt them to the ends of the earth. "Take whatever precautions you feel necessary, Lieutenant. I am going ashore when they land."

Though it didn't seem as if the bison's riders were in any hurry to do that. Standing on the bridge, Jee felt another pang of loss for the nimble little Wani as Suzuran fell further behind. Suzuran was faster than some cruisers, but the Wani could have kept up, even if the beast was fresh. For a while.

"Sails!" came a lookout's cry.

Water Tribe. Jee opened his spyglass to see the beast hover near one of the wooden ships. It was too far to make out details besides flashes of blue and brown, but there seemed to be a great deal of arm-flailing going on.

Someone doesn't like what they're hearing. Jee took a deep breath, and judged everything he knew of General Iroh. Traitor or not. "Steady course. Reduce our speed; I don't want any collisions. Otherwise, follow the bison."

"Sir," Lieutenant Sadao protested, "this is the Water Tribe fleet! Chief Hakoda's men!"

"I'm aware of that, Lieutenant," Jee said levelly. "We will proceed. And we will not fire unless fired upon." He let his gaze sweep the bridge. "We've been offered a truce to assist children of our own nation. I do not intend to be the one who breaks it."

That straightened spines. Good.

The Avatar gave you hope, my prince. And you - you gave us purpose, beyond the knowledge of our failures. Because we saw you fail, over and over... but you never surrendered.

Jee had come aboard the Wani with a crew of failures and malcontents. He'd left it, on Admiral Zhao's orders, with a crew that was... well, still eccentric. But give them a job to do, and it would be done.

...Although he had needed to make more than one announcement about the proper naval traditions regarding firecrackers, squid ink, sparrowkeets, and portmasters' offices. Was it a bad sign that he'd started beginning with, don't get caught?

He'd half expected to lose that steel when his crew of thirty were swamped by the scores of newcomers needed for Suzuran. But they'd held, a breakwater against the storm, gentling new waves of angry and indifferent sailors and marines into something... well, more worthy of the Navy they served. Even Sadao had calmed down since he'd first come aboard. A little.

Though you couldn't tell that by the way the young man was fidgeting now. "Lieutenant," Jee said formally, "would you care to join me on the observation deck?"

"Ah... yes, sir."

Out in salt air again, Jee let himself sigh. "All right, Lieutenant. Spit it out."

"Sir, this could be a trap!" Sadao glanced behind them, as if he could see through the command tower's steel to where the messenger hawks were kept. "Shouldn't we wait for the rest of the fleet?"

So young. "Lieutenant," Jee said plainly, "springing traps is precisely why we're not with the rest of the fleet."

"...Sir?"

"They could use a cutter to search for the tangle-mines, but a cutter doesn't have a cruiser's draft," Jee said plainly. "Hakoda may not have waterbenders among his men, but he has excellent divers. We're here to mark clear channels for approach to Ba Sing Se, so future ships go untouched." He smiled wryly. "Apparently, my record indicates I have a knack for command in the midst of... unpleasant surprises."

"Sir." Sadao's voice was very quiet. "Are you saying we're expendable?"

"This is war, Lieutenant. We're all expendable." Jee regarded the young firebender seriously. "I can believe General Iroh might turn traitor to the Fire Lord. Loyalty between brothers is never certain, and from what I've heard, his feelings on the war... changed, after his son died. But I do not believe he would ever lure his own countrymen into a trap." He paused. "Though the Water Tribes might have plans he hasn't guessed at."

"Yes, sir." Sadao looked relieved, if grimly aware of how fast they were closing on the wooden vessels. "Thank you. For explaining."

Jee smiled briefly. So young. Agni, help me teach him enough to get older. "Back to your station."

The lookouts were keeping their own watch. But Jee unfolded his telescope anyway, watching the activity on the two nearest blue-sailed ships. If they want to start a fight, all they have to do is not move...

They were moving. Grudgingly, sails angling to catch the wind and open a gap for the larger steel hull. Though the warriors on board did not look happy about it.

Let's see how this plays out.

The sun sank away. Jee tried not to tense, all too aware that every firebender could feel Agni's strength weaker within them. If the Water Tribe intended to attack...

Ahead, the bison was landing.

"Don't provoke anything," Jee ordered as the ship made anchor. "Don't allow yourselves to be provoked. This is a useful opportunity to gain intelligence on our enemies, and I don't want it cut short for anything less than legitimate self-defense."

"You said we're under truce, sir," Helmsman Tobito frowned.

"I know that, and you know that," Jee said wryly. "But I'm not sure the Water Tribe knows that."

That sparked laughter, from most. Lieutenant Teruko was all business. "The river steamer is ready, sir."

Jee nodded. "Lieutenant Sadao, you're in command." And let's hope the ship is still in one piece when I get back.

Which wasn't quite fair. Sadao wasn't that bad.

...Well, not anymore.

The water crossing was short. Jee kept half an ear on Teruko's quiet orders, detailing who would guard the steamer and who would go ashore. His gaze was fixed forward, on the small, tense crowd of blue-clad warriors awaiting them. Where is he, where...

A smaller, familiar figure in blue pushed to the front; the boy who traveled with the Avatar. Behind him was a somber-looking warrior with blue beads on his right side braids... and a smaller, stouter, gray-haired firebender, clad in a fine green robe of the Earth Kingdom.

He's lost weight.

Jee drew a quiet breath, and walked to the very end of the ramp, stopping just before damp sand. "It is my understanding that we are here under truce, to aid-" don't say civilians, the Water Tribe doesn't recognize that status, "-noncombatants."

The boy snorted. The beaded warrior gave him a look of mild paternal disapproval, then glanced back at Jee. "So I've been told," he said levelly. "Someone was a little less than clear on exactly how this is supposed to work. Or why we should trust any of you, after what happened at the North Pole."

Jee felt his men bristle behind him, and kept his own temper with an effort. Children. Remember the children.

"They did not know of Zhao's plan," Iroh said gravely. "I did not know of it, until it was too late. He was a treacherous man, but not a fool. He knew I respected the spirits; he knew I might have been able to stop him." The old general shook his head. "He was bent on glory, and that madness nearly doomed us all."

"Are you kidding me?" the boy demanded, shooting an angry glance at Iroh. "Do you really expect us to believe Zhao tried to kill the Moon Spirit, and you weren't all in on it?"

"Admiral Zhao what?" Jee exclaimed, shocked. Hearing that same shock, in the rustles of armor behind him. Yet not - quite - disbelief. He shouldn't have believed it. No true sailor doubted that spirits existed, but - that a great spirit could be harmed by human hands? That Zhao would dare to even think of harming it in the first place?

The moon went dark. And the very ocean attacked us.

"You didn't know." The young man looked as if someone had slapped him. "But... that doesn't make sense, you were attacking us..."

"That is true," Iroh said plainly. "But enemies or not, Captain Jee and his people are sailors, just as you are. And no one who lives and dies by the sea's will, even in the Fire Nation, would attack the Moon." He held Jee's gaze in the deepening twilight-

And dropped to his knees. "I seek the shelter of dragons' wings."

Jee felt the blood drain from his face. He can't be serious. "General. No one uses that anymore. No one's used it for a hundred years."

"Over two hundred," Iroh admitted. "But it is still law. And old customs should be dusted off, from time to time, to reassure them they have not been forgotten."

"It's only still law because the Fire Lord doesn't need to ban it!" Jee exclaimed, too stunned to be exasperated. "Every clan has clear lines of loyalty, straight to the Dragon Throne! The only way any firebending child could claim shelter is if..." Words died on his lips.

The only way a child could claim shelter until his loyalties were sure... is if he broke the line to the Dragon Throne itself.

And only one firebender could have done that.

"He's alive?" Jee whispered. "How? I saw the ship... we saw the explosion!"

"Luck, and skill," Iroh said gravely. "Young Toph is minding the fire in our shelter. But we have all fought a great battle, and I am tired. I will need aid, if he is to have a chance." He paused. "And my nephew is not the only young one who needs help. If Sokka and Chief Hakoda's men will trust you to aid them."

Jee raised a brow, considering Iroh's words, Sokka's wary and hopeful look, Chief Hakoda's cautious readiness...

A firebending child considered family by the Southern Water Tribe. That makes no-

Swift as lightning, the answer hit him. The Avatar's bison was here, which meant the Avatar was here. And technically... "General?"

"Captain?" Iroh regarded him mildly.

"That's one of the most... creative interpretations of regulations I've heard since one of my old chief engineers got caught with a feather boa, a hog-monkey, and six dancing girls." Jee shook his head slowly, almost tempted to smile. Here we go again. "Shelter is granted."

"And what does that mean?" Hakoda gave him a measuring look.

"For you and your men? A truce." Jee glanced at Iroh as the man stood. "Where is the prince?"

"Don't answer that." Sokka jabbed a thumb at the general. "Does the truce hold for him?"

Smart. Jee frowned. "That's not your concern."

"Unfortunately, it is." Iroh gave him a sympathetic look. "Their friend was struck by a lightning bolt. And there are not many with experience treating such injuries."

Jee kept his face calm, even as his heart sped up. Legend said the Avatar was in touch with the spirits. Which implied the boy would not be struck by natural lightning. And if that were the case...

"So I am afraid Sokka has insisted my nephew and I remain." The general gave the Water Tribe boy a reassuring smile. "Do not worry. One does not cut even a storm-thrown tree, if it shelters a sapling."

"Poetry," Sokka groaned. "I thought we left that in Ba Sing Se."

"The general is correct, poetry or not," Jee said dryly. "He's the only clan the prince has to protect him. He's as safe as you are." He eyed the older firebender, relieved when the man started heading inland from the shore. "What were you doing in Ba Sing Se?" How were you in Ba Sing Se? he wanted to ask. Everyone knew the Dragon of the West could work miracles on the battlefield, but even he had needed a whole army last time.

"Hiding." Iroh walked briskly toward an odd, triangular shelter that seemed to have grown out of the sand itself. "Or we were. Until the Avatar crossed paths with certain very unpleasant people, and we were forced to intervene."

"Forced to?" Sokka sputtered. "Hey, we never asked for the jerkbender to show up!"

"Lieutenant," Jee sighed, not turning around.

"Yes, sir." Teruko's voice held just a hint of glee.

"Ow!"

More surprise than pain; Jee hid a smirk, wondering exactly how Teruko had managed to smack the boy in the back of the head. She had a positive gift for that.

"Hey!" And that was definitely surprise, not pain. "You're a girl!"

Oh no. Jee tried to suppress a wince, knowing exactly what had gotten Teruko dumped into his chain of command.

"I," Teruko said in a voice that surfaced from the faceplate like magma, "am not a girl. I am not woman. I am not missy. I am not your little sweetheart who cuts up seal meat in the igloo kitchen, iceboy! I, am a Fire Navy marine."

With a temper that reminded Jee all too much of a certain banished prince. Although he rather doubted Prince Zuko had ever burned down a waterfront tavern on shore leave. "Lieutenant," he said firmly.

"Sir." Still angry, but with the grudging respect he'd won from her over the past months of service.

It'll do. Ducking, Jee followed Iroh into sand-walled shadow.

Hot in here. Jee drew in a smoke-touched breath, eyeing the sandstone hearth aglow with hot coals and heated rocks. Some of which moved, suddenly; lifted with a wave of a little girl's hand to nestle under blankets atop a sweating, black-haired young man.

Thinner. Hair. And restlessly limp, instead of standing proud and straight and angry. If it weren't for the scar, Jee doubted he would have recognized the boy.

My prince. What happened to you?

He could only hope the young man lived to tell him.

"Captain Jee, Lieutenant," Iroh said formally, "this is Lady Toph Bei Fong, the greatest earthbender I have ever had the fortune to meet. She has been a most honorable opponent, and trustworthy in a temporary alliance."

Jee's brows shot up, seeing the blind eyes, the shelter shaped from sand, the casual way she'd moved blistering hot stones. An honorable enemy? We might have a chance to hold this truce after all.

"Toph, this is Captain Jee, who was the lieutenant captaining my nephew's ship before the North Pole," Iroh went on. "And his marine Lieutenant...?"

Politely, she took off the faceplate. "Teruko, sir."

"Ooo, you're the one who got Sokka a good one." Toph grinned. "I've gotta try that." She straightened, more serious. "You left five guys out there. You sure none of them are gonna start anything?"

Teruko's jaw dropped. "How did you-?"

"Hey, blind. Not deaf." Toph touched the sandy wall, frowning. "But you better sit on that fire, hot stuff. Right now, Sugar Queen's fretting over Aang. I'd be fretting over there too, but I can't help him. And... nobody else here is going to..." She swallowed. "Anyway. You blow up like that around her, she'll fill you full of ice knives before you can yell truce. She hates firebenders. She hates the whole Fire Nation. Big time."

"Katara is the Avatar's waterbending teacher, and Sokka's sister," Iroh informed them, sitting down by the unconscious prince. "I do not know the whole of her story, though the fact that she is Chief Hakoda's daughter makes much clear... Apparently a firebender killed her mother. I would advise you avoid her, whenever possible." He lowered his voice. "How is he?"

"He keeps shivering." Toph stepped away from the wall, dropping down to feel the ground itself. "A-and a couple times, his pulse was all fluttery... Uncle, is Sparky going to...?"

Uncle? Jee thought, stunned. What have you been up to, General?

"We will do what we can," Iroh said soberly. "He has survived this long. If we can bring him to sunrise... do not give up hope." He rested a hand on the young girl's shoulder. "It would be good for Sokka, for you to visit him and Aang. He has risked a great deal, convincing his father to shelter two firebenders, and offer peace to more."

"He's risking it for Aang, not for Sparky." Toph touched the blankets again, and visibly screwed up her courage. "You need to talk to these guys in private?"

"That, too, would be helpful," Iroh admitted. "Thank you, Toph. Without your help, my nephew would be far closer to the edge."

"He took a hit from Ty Lee for me. I ought to owe him. A lot." She stood, face fierce. "But I don't. And you tell him that, Uncle. You tell him, friends don't owe each other."

Slowly, Iroh smiled. "You are welcome any time. Whether or not you choose to use the door."

Toph smirked. "Works for me."

Clapped her hands, and vanished into the sand.

"A very refreshing young lady," Iroh observed, hand on the prince's forehead. Withdrew it, and reached for the fire with both hands. "I suggest you watch closely. But do not attempt this yourselves, without a healer present. The flow of energy can be very dangerous to a firebender trained in the classic techniques."

"Classic techniques?" Jee frowned, and knew by Teruko's carefully blank face that she was just as puzzled. "There's only one firebending style."

"Officially, that is so. But it appears Lady Ursa knew of another." Smile wry, Iroh gathered up flame-

Light shifted, flickering red and yellow shimmering to a summer-dance of gold-flecked green, wrapping the general's hands like sunlight.

"General," Jee said uneasily, "what is that?"

"It is a cruel irony," Iroh said quietly. "The only firebender I know who has truly mastered this technique, is the one who needs its help the most." He cast a glance at them both. "This flame does not kill. It heals."

Jee felt his jaw drop, the utter impossibility reeling through his mind. And yet the general was moving, stroking emerald flame over sweating skin-

Even in his fever, the prince leaned into it, breathing less ragged.

Iroh worked on him a few moments more, then released the flames with a sigh. "I cannot heal deep injuries, not as my nephew can. And so I believe my best course is to reserve my strength, so I may aid him a little at a time, when he falters." His jaw tightened, fingers curling in quiet fists. "I pray I am making the right choice."

"Fire... that heals?" Eyes wide, Teruko took off her helmet; as any student would to a master whose wisdom they sought. "The prince can heal?"

"He is quite good at it." Iroh gave them a quiet, proud smile.

Teruko turned to her captain, eyes still wide and wondering. "Sir-"

"The Fire Nation needs this technique, desperately. Yes." Jee didn't take his eyes off the general. "But it's not that simple, is it?"

"No," Iroh allowed. "No, it is not." He held Jee's gaze. "You have already guessed whose loyalty my nephew has broken."

Jee nodded. And what could have driven the prince to that, when even that Agni Kai and three years' fruitless search did not... Agni, I'm not sure I want to know.

"He did so for our people," Iroh said levelly. "My nephew and I have seen... many things. The Ocean's acts at the North Pole are not unique. Other spirits have interfered with our world. In more subtle ways, but they may eventually be far more damaging." He paused, weighing his words. "I do not believe the Fire Nation will win this war. I believe, in the next few months, or years... we will lose. Badly. And that loss will unleash horror such as even the murder of the Air Nomads did not wreak upon our world."

"We won't lose," Teruko began hotly.

"Lieutenant. The general was one of our chief strategists for decades. I would like to hear his view of the situation. Accurate or not." Jee eyed Iroh. "So you've chosen to ally with the Avatar's forces?" Not the most honorable position, no. But understandable, for a clanless man desperate to protect his only allied kin.

"No!" Iroh slashed a hand across, heat shimmering. "The Avatar is surrounded by counsel that will turn him against our people. Toph may be able to persuade the boy to sense, but if we are here, Katara will stop at nothing to fill his ears with her hate of us. And the airbender listens to her, before all others. No. We will remain only until Prince Zuko is well enough to travel, and we have started Avatar Aang on the road to recovery." He smiled then, like a cat-owl about to pounce on an unwary meadow vole. "Once we are away... my nephew has a plan."

"A plan," Jee said doubtfully.

"I believe it is a very good plan," Iroh said judiciously. "Though there have been some complications I did not anticipate."

"Princess Azula?" Jee said dryly.

"She would be one of them, yes."

"Princess Azula?" Teruko almost yelped.

"There are a limited number of people who can bend lightning," Jee informed her. "Fire Lord Ozai has never left the Fire Nation, I doubt the general did it, Jeong Jeong was last reported half a continent away... and given what I do know about lightning, I can't imagine Prince Zuko is capable of it."

"No, he is not. Not yet." Iroh looked grim. "She struck the Avatar down, and then..." He touched black hair. "Twice she has struck at him. The first, months ago, I deflected. This one... he managed the form himself. How, I can barely imagine. Toph says Ty Lee had struck him only minutes before, and while I know my nephew has practiced to dodge chi-blocks..." His fists clenched. "This is the second time she has tried to slay him, before my very eyes. There will not be a third."

"Sir." Teruko was rigid. "The princess is the blood of Fire Lord Sozin, our great hero. She would never be so dishonorable as to attack the crown prince."

"Unless that was the will of the Fire Lord," Jee said heavily. Frightening, how fast the solid ground of duty could turn to lake ice underfoot. "He wasn't supposed to come back, was he?"

Slowly, Iroh shook his head. "I know I ask much."

"If he lives?" Jee let out a soft breath. "You ask everything."

"If he lives," Iroh agreed.

Jee bent his head, striving for calm. "Lieutenant Teruko. Would you be willing to assist the prince's uncle?"

Teruko blinked. "Of course, sir." She eyed the general. "Such a serious charge must be investigated. Even if it cannot be accepted from a... dubious source."

"Very wise," Iroh nodded. "I am glad to have your assistance." He lifted a brow. "And you, Captain?"

"I need to keep both sides from killing each other," Jee said dryly. "We've brought fuel. I'll see it comes to Lieutenant Teruko." He bowed his head. "Good luck."

Somehow, when Jee stepped outside the earthbender's shelter, he wasn't surprised to see Sokka and Chief Hakoda standing just out of threat range of the marines. "What's wrong with him?" Sokka said bluntly.

Tell a Water Tribe boy of broken loyalties? I don't think so. "It's not your concern," Jee said levelly.

"It is if it's catching!"

Jee blinked. "No," he said at last. "It's an... injury."

Sokka crossed his arms, obviously not buying it. "Aang got hit by Azula, and he's not freezing."

"How fortunate for him," Jee said dryly. Lifted his gaze to the chief's. "We've brought burn medications." It was the most common injury for young firebenders, after all. "May we transfer them to you, while we discuss terms?"

Considering him, and the shelter, and who knew what else... Hakoda nodded.

"This," Sokka said numbly, "has been one of the weirdest days of my life. And hanging around Aang? Trust me, that's saying something."

He paced the length of his father's tent in dim lantern-light, all too aware of Bato's tolerant smile. Aang was off in the healer's tent with Katara fussing over him. Toph was hanging around her to fidget and shape sand into anything Katara might need, like the solid, dry bed she'd already lifted under Aang's bedroll. And anchored out there in the night was a Fire Navy ship, with half a dozen of their marines guarding Iroh and Zuko. Politely.

Oh. And one of the faces behind a firebender's skull mask was a girl. Or, maybe more than one. How the heck would he know? He'd never looked. Girls didn't fight, anybody in the Southern Water Tribe knew that...

Except people on Kyoshi Island didn't know it. Mai and Ty Lee and Azula sure didn't. And Toph - oh boy, better not even go there.

Yep. Weirdest day. Ever.

"Second thoughts about talking me into it?" Hakoda stood out of the way of his frantic path, a concerned frown on his face.

"More like third and fourth," Sokka confessed. "I don't know, Dad. Iroh... well, he seems okay. Toph trusts him, and a lot of the time? She's right about people. But all I know about this Captain Jee guy is he used to be on Zuko's ship."

"Hmm." Hakoda considered that.

"But that's not the weird part!" Sokka protested.

"So what is the weird part?" Bato chuckled.

How do I say this without sounding crazy? Sokka thought desperately. Swallowed, and looked his dad in the eye. "I'm kind of... wondering if... maybe Zuko's not the real bad guy."

"The Fire Nation prince?" Bato said in disbelief.

Oh, I knew this was a bad idea...

"The same young man," Hakoda pointed out, "who apparently put his life on the line for Sokka and the others." He nodded at his son. "Tell me."

Sokka waved his hands. "Just - tell me something, first. I don't know about the Fire Nation, and maybe you do... If Zuko dies. And the Fire Lord dies. Who gets the job? Who's... chief?"

"That would be Princess Azula," Hakoda answered.

"And - that's it?" Sokka burst out. "No council of elders? No women thumping their husbands that the guy they're thinking of picking doesn't listen to his wife - or he does, and she doesn't know enough about the good gathering times, and babies, and everything? Just, bam, that's it?"

"Crazy, huh?" Bato shrugged.

"That's not the whole story," Hakoda said thoughtfully. "According to some of our Earth Kingdom allies, everyone was expecting Fire Lord Azulon to name Prince Iroh as the heir in his will. But Azulon specifically named Ozai. Something to do with Iroh's failure at Ba Sing Se, and not being the son who would lead the Fire Nation to further glory." He rolled his eyes. "Which apparently means burning more innocent villages down to the ground."

"So... Toph could be right." Sokka gulped. "Oh man, if she's right..."

"Right about what?" Hakoda raised interested eyebrows.

Sokka threw up his hands, about to spell out the whole last frustrating weeks-

Wait a second. Think about this. Get it right.

Sokka chewed on his lip, and finally sighed. "The first thing you've got to know about Zuko is, he doesn't give up. Ever."

"Firebenders are determined," Bato nodded.

"I'll see your determined, and raise you a guy who broke into the middle of the North Pole, at night, fought his way past Katara on a full moon, tied up the Avatar, hauled Aang off into a raging blizzard, found shelter in the middle of nowhere, and was still alive when we caught him," Sokka said impatiently. "Zuko does not give up. He doesn't quit. He doesn't get bored. For all I know, he doesn't even sleep. You can smack him with a boomerang. Freeze him in ice. Dump him in the ocean. Blast him into a wall hard enough to leave little Zuko-shaped dents! And Aang's done that. Lots of times. He. Doesn't. Stop." Sokka paused to breathe, waving his hands to indicate the sheer scope of Zuko's crazy unstoppableness. "But I did see him stop. Twice. The first time? He chased us into a storm that turned into what the old fisher guy called a typhoon, and I still don't know how he got out of that one. Never saw a storm like that before, hope I never see it again... He didn't follow us. This is the guy who always chases Aang, and he just kept his ship in the clear spot and watched us fly off."

"The eye, people call it," Hakoda informed him. "Storms like that apparently head for the Fire Nation every fall. Which is one reason they haven't taken the whole Earth Kingdom. Any supplies they might need from back in the Fire Nation can get... delayed." He frowned, serious. "We've been on the fringes of a few, these past two years. Even I wouldn't try to take a ship through one if I had any choice."

Okay. Anything that could stop Dad? Pretty serious weather. "The second time? Was... different." Sokka dragged up scary, half-asleep memories. "We hadn't seen him in months. Not since the North Pole. We brought him back off the ice... well, Aang asked us to, so we did. And somewhere between the Ocean Spirit smashing up the Fire Navy, and everything going quiet? He and Iroh-" Sokka shrugged. "Poof! Gone. Aang and Katara got trained, we headed back south, found Toph to train Aang in earthbending... and on the way, we ran into three really scary Fire Nation girls." He counted them off on his fingers. "Mai's this kind of sour-faced knife thrower; I didn't see her at the palace, which kind of makes me worried. Ty Lee, she's this giggly acrobat who hits you so you can't move. She can take people's bending away for hours; you can guess how much that scares Katara. She was in the palace, and that was a close one. And then, there's Azula." Sokka whistled. "You know, if Toph didn't swear they were family, I couldn't see it? Not looks. It's... something else. Zuko's got a temper. Blows up at the drop of a boomerang. Azula? Ice-cold. When she's setting stuff on fire."

Hakoda nodded, thoughtful. "So you were in the Earth Kingdom?"

"And the three crazy ladies were following us," Sokka agreed. "Turns out they were following Appa's fur... anyway. Stuff happened, and the next thing I know? There's six of us backing Azula into a corner. Me, Aang, Toph, Katara - and Zuko and Iroh."

"They what?" Bato exclaimed. "Why?"

"Didn't know, didn't care," Sokka admitted. "We thought we had her... then she blasted Iroh and vanished. And - it was bad. I saw people hurt like that at the North Pole, and without a good healer, they would've..." He swallowed. "Then Zuko's pulling this crazy thing with fire, and Katara's helping him with water, and... Iroh made it. And then? Zuko says he owes Katara, and goes on to tell us all the nasty details of how his crazy sister is going to hunt us down and hurt us to get to Aang. Figure that out."

Hakoda's brows climbed toward his hair. "He gave you tactical information on your enemy?"

Sokka's jaw dropped. "He - what - wait..."

"That's what it sounds like," Hakoda said seriously.

"You mean Iroh was right? He was trying to help? Because seriously, you couldn't tell that from the yelling, and the fire..." Words died in Sokka's throat.

"Son?" Hakoda asked, as the silence stretched.

"...Idiot." Sokka smacked himself in the forehead, remembering a nightless day and shattering ice. "I'm an idiot. Zuko's a bender."

"We'd noticed," Bato said wryly. "Fire Prince - and in the Fire Nation, firebenders have the power."

"No, no, you don't get it!" Sokka sketched some of Katara's sweeping moves. "Things happen when benders get mad. Katara shreds icebergs. Toph slides rock sideways. Aang blasts roofs off! And Zuko's a firebender." He reached back to memories of a dusty street, flames flaring... and dying, with Iroh's warning words. "He didn't want to kill Aang. He wanted to strangle him!"

Bato gave him a wry look. "You sound like there's a difference."

"You've never been on the pointy end of one of Aang's 'every life is precious, enlightened people don't eat meat' speeches," Sokka said practically. "Trust me. You'd want to strangle him too." He pictured the street again, and barely kept himself from another smack. "Man! I should have taken them with us."

"Fire Nation?" Bato sputtered.

"They were worn out, they were hungry - I swear, Zuko looked like a zebra seal after a late breakup," Sokka shrugged. "Iroh said they were fugitives. Dressed like Earth Kingdom peasants, Zuko even cut off that stupid ponytail... Toph told us later the only thing that kept Zuko from falling over was he just wouldn't let us see it. And Iroh helped us before. Took down five of Zhao's firebenders like that. Damn it, I should have hit the jerk on the head and kidnapped them, or something..."

"He cut his hair?" Hakoda said carefully. "We've run into a few Fire Nation traders," he explained at Sokka's look. "That topknot's some kind of... mark of a warrior's pride. Something bad must have happened."

"Iroh's a traitor for helping us out?" Sokka offered.

"I suppose that'd do," Bato said wryly.

Hakoda nodded. "You were saying this was the second time Zuko stopped chasing you?"

"Yeah," Sokka agreed, putting that together with some of the other stunts Zuko had pulled. "It's like... he's willing to get himself killed. But not Iroh. And if you say Iroh's the guy who should have been Fire Lord..." He checked everything he remembered again, and let out a slow breath. "I know it's crazy, but from what Toph said? What I saw Zuko do to get us out of there? He's trying to protect the Fire Nation." Sokka eyed his dad. "Okay... why don't you look surprised?"

"We've had a few discussions with firebenders," Hakoda said frankly. "Friendly or otherwise. Zuko's hunt for the Avatar's no secret. If he doesn't carry out the Fire Lord's will, he's banished forever."

"Which is as good as dead, and Azula gets the throne," Sokka realized.

"Yes," Hakoda said thoughtfully, "and even though the Fire Nation doesn't talk to outsiders, I have a feeling not everyone looks forward to that."

"So they're not all idiots," Sokka snorted. "Zuko wouldn't shoot Aang with lightning. Aang likes everybody, and Zuko knows we hate him. He doesn't want a Water Tribe Avatar coming after them." Wait. Something important in there.

"We'll double the men watching over the Avatar," Bato said quietly to Hakoda. "Katara's right; we can't afford to allow the firebenders near him."

There. That's it. "We're going to have to, if we have to sit on my sister to do it," Sokka said seriously. "Iroh's a powerful bender, but when it comes to healing? He says he's barely gotten started. Zuko's the one who figured it out. In Ba Sing Se? Katara says Iroh was working in a teashop. Zuko's the one who trained with a healer. For weeks." He winced. "I don't know what Katara said about the North Pole, but she only learned from Yugoda a few days. The rest of the time, she was with Master Pakku. And he may be a master waterbender, but I never saw him heal anybody." He gulped, and stood his ground. "I know Katara hates Zuko. I know she'd like to dump him in the middle of Chameleon Bay in the middle of his own iceberg. Though I'm not sure that'd stop him... I know it's crazy. But Zuko wants Aang alive." He spread his hands. "I think he's Aang's best chance."

"Your friend's best chance is dying," Bato pointed out. "I've seen that look on Captain Jee's face before."

"No." Sokka shook his head, determined. "Zuko chased us all the way from the South Pole to the North, and back. He is not going to die on us."

Hear that, Zuko? Don't die. Aang needs you.

...And if that wasn't proof the world was broken, Sokka didn't know what was.

"Let's go over this one more time." One hand gripping Bosco's lead as they walked through green-lit stone, Earth King Kuei rubbed his nose above where glasses probably pinched. "The Kyoshi Warriors were actually Fire Nation spies."

"Yes, your majesty," Agent Bon sighed. Took his stance, and blasted the tunnel they were in a bit farther.

"And not just any Fire Nation spies. One of them was actually Fire Princess Azula." Kuei gave him a narrow glance. "Who my trusted advisor, Long Feng, conspired with to overthrow my throne, take Ba Sing Se for the Fire Nation, and kill the Avatar."

"It seemed to make sense at the time, sir," Bon said apologetically. "At least, for most of the Dai Li."

"But you're not most?" Kuei stopped, weighing him with eyes that looked years older than they had this morning.

"No, sir," Bon said humbly. "I can't really explain why. Most of my fellow agents... when the princess spoke, they were enthralled. It was - I don't know. As if they finally felt our sacrifices had been recognized. Honored."

"Sacrifices?" Kuei frowned. "You serve the greatest city in the world. How is that a sacrifice?"

You don't know. You've used our lives for years, and you don't know. Heart aching, Bon prostrated himself before the Earth King. "Your majesty. You are the center of spiritual power in Ba Sing Se. Through your right conduct and actions, you purify that power, holding off the evils of the spirit world. Koh the Face-Stealer is a great darkness, yet he is but one of those spirits who would seek to destroy our city. If he could." Still on his knees, Bon lowered himself again. "Yet for all your efforts, there are many, many people in Ba Sing Se. It became clear centuries ago that the Earth King alone could not ensure our people's safety. And so Avatar Kyoshi created us, to hunt small evils created by malice and bitterness, before they could offer entry to greater darkness. She asked the first of us, and we in turn have asked each of our recruits, to give up normal lives. And we do, as we always have. And now, despite our efforts, because of the orders we have carried out for our leader, our own people hate us. It... hurts."

"Orders such as brainwashing innocent civilians." Kuei's voice was unusually hard.

"We had to maintain the peace," Bon said quietly. No excuses. This is your king. "The war presses closer and closer; the malice of the spirits grows ever stronger. We fought as we knew how, and as we were ordered." He swallowed. "We always thought you knew."

"I didn't!" Kuei flung up his hands. "Why doesn't anyone tell me these things?"

"Because that was Long Feng's job?" Bon muttered.

Kuei looked away for a moment. Glanced back, and stepped closer, frowning. "What do you mean, normal lives?"

Bon winced. "We are touched by the spirits, your majesty. All of us are."

"Of course," Kuei said, puzzled. "You're earthbenders."

"This is different." Bon sighed. "We fight spirits, your majesty. We pit our bending and iron and will against creatures not born of flesh. It changes you." He looked up. "We touch spirits, and they can touch us. Far more than ordinary mortals. We... people notice. They don't know why, but they know we're... not right. Not safe. Even when we're out of uniform. Even when they have no idea what we do." He glanced down, sad. "Many of us never have a chance to marry, to grow old with our children. When any woman you court can feel you're dangerous..." He sighed again.

"Sometimes we're lucky. Those who survive spirit attacks can find themselves just as fey as we are. You'd be amazed how eager proper heads of households are to rid themselves of a spirit-touched daughter."

"Are you telling me the Dai Li followed the princess of a nation we're at war with because you're all lonely?" Kuei sputtered.

"No, your majesty." Bon stood. "I'm saying that when Long Feng put us under the princess' command, and she said our own people feared us, and intended to kill us all - we believed her."

"I never would have allowed-"

"Sir, with all due respect!" Bon broke in angrily. "You'd just ordered us to arrest our own leader! You were planning to strip massive forces from Ba Sing Se - we're under siege, in case you hadn't noticed! - to launch an attack half a world away! And all of this on the word of a twelve-year-old boy!" He took a breath, fighting for calm. "How could any of us know what you wouldn't allow?"

"That twelve-year-old boy is the Avatar," Kuei reproved him.

"The very dead Avatar, from the messages I've overheard in the stone," Bon said pointedly. "Unless you think he somehow managed to survive a lightning strike." He dropped his head, regretting the pain on his king's face. "I'm sorry, your majesty. Whatever you intended to do to the Dai Li, we were meant to serve you and Ba Sing Se." He swallowed. "We failed."

"Oh, I wouldn't say that yet," a familiar voice stated, amused.

Hope surged - but Bon took a ready stance anyway, as a thin layer of rock crumbled into their tunnel. He'd failed the king once. Never again. "Shirong!"

The older agent gave him a wry smile, and bowed to their king. "Your majesty. It's good to see you in one piece." He turned back to Bon. "So, are you stumbling this way by accident, or...?"

"Agent Quan asked me to take his majesty somewhere safe," Bon said, faint with relief. Shirong had been Dai Li almost a decade longer than he had; if anyone knew where to find bolt-holes in the city, he would. "He also said, if I found you... Lee's plan will have all the help he can hide."

"But Lee's Fire Nation!" Kuei objected. "How could Amaya...?"

"The short version?" Shirong looked rueful. "Lee was a refugee, like many others. And Healer Amaya has a very kind heart."

"And what's the long version?" Kuei demanded.

"That, you should hear from the lady herself," Shirong said thoughtfully. "Briefly put? In some ways, Lee isn't like any other refugee." Green eyes narrowed. "And if he's managed to get himself killed before we pull this off, I am going to hunt him down in the spirit world and strangle him."

Bon stifled a snicker. "You really do like that kid."

"He'd make a good partner," Shirong mused. "We have a lot in common."

Bon tried not to start. One of the reasons Shirong was a recruiter instead of a regular agent was... well, partners tended to die on him. Not any fault of his, the most suspicious agent knew that; Shirong's spirit-wounds just ran too deep. He'd pretty much given up pair work with other Dai Li years ago, unwilling to risk inflicting his bad luck on any other soul.

Lee's teacher got grabbed by a haima-jiao right out of her own clinic, Bon remembered. I guess Shirong's luck can't make his any worse.

"A Fire Nation waterbender?" Kuei exclaimed in disbelief.

"Healer Amaya and Professor Tingzhe Wen can explain things better than I can," Shirong said plainly. "If you'd be willing to come this way, your majesty-" He cut himself off, closing his eyes to listen down the tunnel.

Bon frowned, reaching for rock-

"No. Some of the older agents might feel your chi, if you reach too far." Shirong frowned. "I need to get Mushi to explain how that trick of his works... You'll have to close the tunnel. I'm not up to much more than pebbles."

Ouch. Bon strode into stance, and sealed the opening behind them with a plug of stone. "And you came out here alone?" he murmured.

"Not quite." Shirong cleared his throat. "Madam Wen?"

A matronly woman stepped into view; Bon's practiced eyes picked up the subtle outlines of knives up her sleeves. "Your majesty," she bowed. "Will you honor my family with a meeting?"

"I'd love to," Kuei smiled.

He has no idea she's armed, Bon realized, as Bosco walked forward to sniff her curiously. Why me?

"Relax, Bon," Shirong murmured. "Lee left us a plan."

"I know what happened with his last plan!" Bon hissed back.

"Ah, but this one's better." Shirong almost grinned. "No man-eating water spirits."

No. Just one murderous lightning-bending princess. Bon sighed. Remember your duty.

He'd gotten the king this far. There was no way he'd give up now.

"What we have here," Captain Jee stated to the crew assembled in the main hold, "is an... interesting situation."

Oh spirits, we're all gonna die.

Sadao tried, very hard, not to fidget. And hoped he didn't look too obvious to his far more experienced superior officer. Jee was calm, correct, and poised; even though they were surrounded by enemy forces, with a known, powerful traitor on shore. Anybody would be biting their fingernails.

Hands down. Keep it together. Just breathe.

...Oh Agni, why couldn't I just have been a glassmaker?

Though actually, he knew why. A firebender with a constant case of nerves, working with the delicate glass meant for noble use? His family had tried their best, but Father and Grandfather really hadn't needed that third explosion to pack him off to the army. "If he has to blow things up," Grandfather had said sourly, "Agni, let him do it in the Earth Kingdom!"

...Well, he was supposed to have ended up in the army. But the paperwork had gotten tangled, and then he'd ended up on the wrong recruiter's boat, and then - well. Navy it was. Even if a firebender with a knack for blowing up things nobody thought would blow wasn't exactly the best fit for shipboard life.

At least he could swim. Which always came in handy, when the latest exasperated superior officer threw him overboard.

Only Captain Jee hadn't thrown him off the ship, yet. Only eyed him, at that first fireball with stray coal bits, and quizzed him up one side and down the other about when, where, and why his nerves caught things on fire when he really didn't mean to.

He hadn't had nearly as many stray sparks since. Which was really, really strange, given prior to this assignment the only time his nerves seemed to calm down was when someone was shooting at them. Combat, after all, was all about the worst thing that could happen, happening. Why worry then?

The captain cleared his throat. Sadao jerked back to strict attention, sweating.

"I'm certain you've all noticed that since coming aboard this vessel, your mail has been censored," Captain Jee said candidly. "More so than usual, that is."

Quiet chuckles whispered in the background, though everyone kept a straight face. You had to observe the proprieties. Even if the captain didn't mind.

"I believe I finally know why." Jee paused, and swept them all with a look. "Prince Zuko is alive."

He's what? Sadao barely heard the mass intake of breath. The prince was dead, assassinated by pirates; everyone had heard that before the invasion!

"Which means you can probably blame me for the holes in your mail," Jee went on. "When Admiral Zhao first requested that the Wani's crew abandon the prince for the invasion... well, I suppose I didn't refuse as politely as I should have." The captain's smile was wry. "I wouldn't slander the war hero who ordered us to join such a glorious venture. I'd certainly never suggest the man held the kind of grudge that gets incurable, possibly traitorous troublemaker lodged in your personal file." He paused. "Although anyone who was there one afternoon a few months back could tell you how Commander Zhao tried to strike Prince Zuko in the back... after the commander lost their Agni Kai."

The room seemed to freeze. Sadao swallowed dryly. That was - you just didn't do that!

Though he'd heard that did happen. Especially in units where people... got ahead, and didn't care much how.

Not something any of us has to worry about, Sadao knew. Jee hadn't commanded Suzuran long - but everyone knew. If you were here... well, you weren't criminal enough to wind up in prison, but no one really wanted you anywhere else.

But the captain wants us. It was the only thing that let him face the day, sometimes. Captain Jee didn't ask you to be perfect. Just to do the job, one way or another. As long as they could do that...

We're the screw-ups. But if we get something done, even if it's just running supplies - we haven't failed our country.

"Whatever the reason, we seem to be lacking critical information on the military status of certain individuals," Jee said bluntly. "I know Prince Zuko. He's young, impulsive, and as hot-tempered as any firebender I've ever met. But he has always tried to act in the interests of the Fire Nation. If he's traveling with the Dragon of the West, as it seems he is - I intend to wait until he can explain himself." Jee looked grim. "If he can. Iroh has asked for the shelter of dragons' wings."

Sadao blinked, and saw similar confusion on a host of faces. "Ah, sir? I don't think I've heard of that."

"Schools these days," Jee muttered. "It's old. But it is still legal." He swept the crew with a sober gaze. "Before all of the great names were unified under the Fire Lord, while we were still at war with ourselves, it was possible for a child to break loyalty and have no one left to protect him. Our custom was that an afflicted child, or surviving kin, could claim shelter - and remain unharmed, until the crisis passed." He smiled ruefully. "Don't think of it as simple compassion. Who shelters you from the storm is your ally, after all... and surviving children were usually quite loyal to those far-sighted enough to protect them."

Helmsman Tobito stepped forward. "Will the prince make it, sir?"

"Ordinarily, I'd say his chances were slim," Jee said plainly. "But apparently Prince Zuko, and his uncle, have uncovered... well. It sounds crazy, but - how many of you have seen Love Amongst the Dragons?"

Hands shot up across the hold.

Jee nodded. "Princess Ryouko's healing fire is not a myth."

Sadao's jaw dropped.

"Either the prince will survive, or he will not," Jee stated. "If he doesn't, the truce is over, and we will acquire the Dragon of the West. I don't expect that to be easy, but traitor or not, he is of the royal line, and I'll be damned if I let the Water Tribes execute him." He snorted. "That's our job."

...Yup. All gonna die, Sadao thought morosely.

"If Prince Zuko lives... things become complicated."

"Complicated?" Sadao sputtered. "Sir?" he added, belatedly.

"Apparently, the Avatar was injured in Ba Sing Se," Jee informed them. "How injured, we don't know. Which is why we are going to move very carefully." He shook his head. "It seems Chief Hakoda's fleet intends to hold both General Iroh and Prince Zuko until they can apply their own healing skills to the situation." He eyed his crew. "I don't approve of allowing our princes to be held hostage. It gives people ideas."

A low rumble from the crew; Jee quelled it with a slight lift of his hand. "At this time, Prince Zuko is too fragile to move. So we'll let the situation stand. For now." He smiled slightly. "But tomorrow, is another day."

Sadao gulped. "Sir," he managed. "We don't want to be the first to break a truce."

"We won't be." Jee's voice was iron. "The Water Tribe vessels are running light. They're not carrying heavy loads of supplies. Meaning the Earth Kingdom will be bringing them assistance soon. If the fleet hasn't sent them a message already, naming exactly who they've caught." He stood straight, fire glinting in gold eyes. "Once the Earth Kingdom learns the Dragon of the West and the Fire Lord's heir are there for the taking - this will no longer be an interesting situation. It will be a rescue." His voice dropped. "And Agni have mercy on anyone who gets in our way."

Normally she'd slam open a square door in rock, announcing to one and all that the Blind Bandit was in the house. This time? No way. Toph parted sandstone like a curtain, rippling it back together behind her before too much hot air could escape.

"Mini-sauna, huh?" She kept her voice down as she stepped over to Iroh and Zuko, aware of the firebenders asleep and on watch outside. Particularly aware of Teruko, a quietly snoring lump on the floor, resting up so she could spell Iroh later. "I think it's helping. His heart feels better."

"And the moon should rise soon." Iroh spoke just as softly. "Sunrise is what he truly needs... but I believe the moon may help."

Toph frowned and sat. "The moon? Why- oh. Because-"

"They do not know. Yet." The shift of Iroh's weight was a nod toward the other firebenders. "The healing was a shock in itself. More... might be too much."

Ouch, yeah. Sparky hitting someone with a water whip probably would go over about as good as her dropping a tornado in the middle of Ba Sing Se. Only with more explosions. "Aang's hanging in there," Toph told him. "I think Sokka finally got Sugar Queen to 'fess up she needed sleep. She didn't want to, but their dad promised someone would keep watching Aang."

"Someone who is not you?" Iroh's tone was mild, but curious.

"I checked on him," Toph whispered, throat tight. She was going to be strong. She was. "He's breathing, his heart's okay... I can't do any more, Uncle. I'm the greatest earthbender in the world, and there's just..."

"Ah." Iroh reached out toward her. "You know, it has been a very frightening day. I could use a hug."

Oh. Well, if he needed one... Toph leaned into him, and only sniffled a little. He was strong and warm and there... And she didn't miss her parents and their stifling mansion and stupid guards and frilly dresses. She didn't.

Scrubbing her eyes, she poked Iroh in the arm. "I bet Zuko could use a hug, too. When we were getting Appa... He feels like Aang gets stuff handed to him, and he always gets kicked in the teeth."

"In a sense, he does," Iroh sighed. "We are of Sozin's line. And many of the spirits are very, very angry with us."

"Oh," Toph said in a very small voice. "Lots of hugs?"

Iroh chuckled. "A very good prescription, yes. I have been trying."

Toph sighed. Go figure. Zuko should have been born into her family; he got "rocklike" the way Aang got breathing. "You know, Aang doesn't always have it easy, either. Earthbending runs right into all that air in his head. He just... he doesn't know how to work. And maybe I'm not such a great teacher, 'cause it seems like I can't show him how. Or why. Or, I don't know, something."

"There is only so much any teacher can do if the student is not ready," Iroh said patiently. "Be a good example. Have him watch what you do, and try to explain why. Give it time."

"We don't have time." Toph shook her head. "If Aang doesn't beat Fire Lord Ozai by the end of summer, Roku says-" Belatedly, she shut her mouth.

She felt Iroh's regard shiver through the ground, before he sighed. "I would like to know what Avatar Roku said to you."

"Um..."

"I would like to," Iroh emphasized, "but I will not ask. You have kept secrets for my nephew. Honor demands that we not pry into those you keep for others." He stroked his beard. "If time is against you, I suggest that you ask supplies of Chief Hakoda - and Captain Jee, if your friends will allow that - and find someplace to... focus Aang's attention." He chuckled. "I would advise somewhere away from people. A place where there is only earth and sky and water, so he may hone his skills in the hearts of the elements themselves."

Toph nodded. "Is that what you did for Sparky?"

"In a way," Iroh said thoughtfully, reaching out to touch a restless shoulder. "We were forced to fall back on our own resources. In so doing, we had to learn what would work, not just what was expected. And so I finally realized that part of what I had tried to teach Zuko was wrong."

Toph frowned, sitting up. "But you're the Dragon of the West!"

"And a master of the inner fire. Yes," Iroh nodded. "But Zuko's skill lies not in the inner fire, but in flames outside himself. In a sense, his bending is more akin to that of a waterbender. Or to yours."

Huh. Kind of cool. And- Whoa. "So... if Aang's lousy at the fine stuff, but good at big and flashy?"

"I would say, go with it," Iroh agreed. Stilled. "Ah. Soon, now."

Toph scrunched up her face, feeling his anticipation in her toes. "You're a firebender. How do you know when the moon's coming up?"

"Practice," Iroh said simply. "Moonlight is the sun, reflected. It is too frail for most firebenders to draw strength from... but to those who know, Agni and La have ever been brother and sister." He *hmp*ed. "Most firebenders are born in daylight; children of Agni alone. Zuko... my nephew was born in the depths of night. I wonder how long the Moon has rested her hand on him-"

Coughing, Zuko sat up.

"Sparky!" Toph lunged.

A trembling arm caught her, allowing her to support him, even though she felt his confusion. "Who are you?"

She almost slugged him.

Iroh cleared his throat. "Some confusion is not uncommon, with this... illness. Nephew? Do you remember where we are?"

"...You're not Uncle Kuro." Chilled and worried, Zuko wasn't letting go. Even if he did feel weak as a boiled noodle. "Where's Shidan? I've got to go, it's important-" Coughs cut off his words; his arm slipped free, as he tried to hold himself upright.

"You are in no condition to go anywhere," Iroh said firmly, moving in to put a supporting arm around Zuko's shoulder. "Rest, and heal."

"But they're going to die!" Zuko tried to struggle, making no headway against Iroh's grip. "Let me go! When Shidan finds me - well, you better not be here when he does!"

Which didn't sound like Sparky at all. Toph grabbed for a flailing arm. He's not fighting like Sparky, either. More like... a kid? "What's wrong with him, Uncle? Who's Shidan?"

"Shidan of Byakko, I think," Iroh said, distracted. "Nephew. Nephew, please! We will send a messenger hawk. Who is in danger? Where?"

"A hawk won't get there in time. Shidan can! Please, let me go! I have to warn Gyatso!"

Gyatso? Toph thought, bewildered. But that's-

Iroh drew in a sharp breath. "Uncle... Kuroyama," he said softly. "Of Byakko."

Zuko stiffened for a glare; it was ruined by more coughing. "If you... know him? Then you know who's going to be landing... looking for me. Let-

"Kuzon." There was a sad certainty in Iroh's voice. "You have done all you can. Rest now. Please."

"Kuzon?" Toph repeated, beyond confused. "But - he was Aang's friend-

Zuko gripped her sleeve. "You know Aang?" Desperate hope laced his voice. "Have you seen him?"

Okay, this was too weird. "Uncle?" Toph said warily.

"Wait," Iroh murmured, almost too low to hear. "We do know the young airbender," he went on, louder. "He is missing, then? He is a nomad."

"No; no, he left a note, the elders did something stupid, and he-" Zuko cut himself off. "We've flown everywhere he usually goes, we haven't seen Appa... but it's got to wait, you don't know what's going to happen, the hurricane that wiped out Joetsu last year, they're- It's crazy!"

"The Fire Sages blame the Air Nomads for the storm," Iroh said grimly. "And Fire Lord Sozin has not spoken against them."

Toph's jaw dropped. "They did what?" Zuko thinks it's Fire Lord Sozin's reign? Why?

"It happened some months before Aang disappeared." Iroh sighed. "Kuzon. Your uncle... left you in our care. You are ill, and... I do not think Shidan will be here, not for some time. The Air Nomads are great travelers, I am certain Gyatso has heard this ugly talk-

"It's not just talk anymore!" There was an awful catch in Zuko's voice; if she touched his cheek, Toph knew her fingers would be wet. "Please, the comet's coming. Someone has to warn them!"

"You learned of the attack." Quiet pain, in Iroh's voice, as he gathered Zuko close. "Kuzon. I am sorry. I am so sorry you came too late..."

"I - didn't." Zuko's voice was uncertain, hunting for memory. "We were there. Gyatso - he went to talk to Shidan alone. Well, not talk, but... Then he said, go. Aang - somebody he could trust, still out there, still-" He swallowed a sob. "I wanted to stay! I wanted to help..."

"You did help," Iroh said firmly. "You gave your word to Gyatso, and I know it was a comfort to him. You never stopped searching."

"But they're g-gone..."

"I know," Iroh said softly, easing that broken voice back to sleep. "I know. Rest now, Kuzon. You have done what you could. Now, the task falls to another."

Toph felt Zuko slip back into feverish tossing, and let out a breath she'd forgotten she was holding. "Uncle?" She stood up, the better to whisper over Zuko's head. "What the heck just happened?"

Iroh held his peace a moment, running flame over bare skin until Zuko sighed. Sat back, thoughtful. "I do not wish Aang to know of this."

"Zuko flipping out and thinking he's somebody from a hundred years ago?" Toph planted her fists on her hips in disbelief. "Yeah, Twinkletoes wouldn't like that. But if Zuko's really seeing stuff, maybe we need to bury some axes and get Sugar Queen in here."

"It is not a hallucination," Iroh said heavily. "His spirit is injured; his life, in danger. Under such circumstances, a soul will dig deep to protect itself. Even beyond the strength it could claim from only this life."

Toph thumped onto the floor.

"You understand why I do not wish Aang to know."

Toph swallowed hard. "He's- but that's-"

"Kuzon of Byakko lived a long time," Iroh said levelly. "He promised to search for Aang, and he did, for over eighty years. But he did not survive Azulon's plots. He never saw his own great-grandson born." He let out a slow breath. "Kuzon's death, Zuko's birth... the timing fits."

"Timing?" Toph said in disbelief. "That's what you got?"

"I also have reason to believe Kuzon had a dragon-friend, named Shidan." Iroh's regard of her shimmered in even breaths, still muscles. "And I know, from what my grandfather, Fire Lord Sozin, said in his last years... the destruction of Joetsu did indeed rouse the Fire Nation to hate, and then to murder."

"But the Nomads wouldn't have sent a storm after anybody!" Toph protested. "I know Aang. He never would!"

"Aang is the only airbender either of us have ever known," Iroh pointed out. "We do not know how many of them were like him. And airbender or not, Aang is the Avatar. It is known, in the Fire Nation, that an Avatar can create a hurricane. Storm, and fire, and water - all bend to their will, when they feel the need."

Not just can, Toph realized, feeling the old, old anger vibrating through Iroh's bones. Somebody did. "When... when did it happen?"

"Long ago," Iroh said softly. "Before the time our children are taught of, now. Before the Fire Lord was anyone more than head of the Fire Sages, serving our people and the Avatar." He sighed, deliberately turning from that memory. "But I believe you are right. From what history I have found, and Sozin's own words, the hurricane that destroyed Joetsu was purely of nature's doing." He shook his head. "Yet human malice did cause the disaster. For there should have been a warning that such a storm was on the move, brought by monks visiting the Western Air Temple. And no warning reached the people of Joetsu."

"But you know the airbenders wouldn't have..." Toph trailed off, feeling Iroh's sad regard. "Uncle? Who - who would they have warned?"

"From what I have been able to discover, the Air Nomads of that time disliked dealing with my people," Iroh said levelly. "There were rare exceptions. Kuzon, for one; though it would seem he had his own flying friend to bring him to the temples. But Byakko is not near Joetsu. It is most likely word would have been brought to Fire Lord Sozin himself."

Toph swallowed, glad she was sitting down. "You think... the Fire Lord...?"

"My grandfather was a very driven man," Iroh said sadly. "To rid himself of the Avatar's interference in our nation's hearts, and remake the world as he wished? Yes. I believe he would sacrifice even his own people." He winced. "And if he allowed ours to die... how much more would he be willing to lie, to destroy Aang's?"

Toph shivered.

"But I have no proof," Iroh sighed. "Only what I have studied of a people a century murdered, and the words of a man now dead and ashes. A man our history paints as the greatest of heroes, an example for all time. I have nothing I could lay before our people, or even give to my nephew, who wanted so badly for his father to be worthy of his love." He paused. "Though he might listen, now."

"Yeah," Toph said wryly, "if he remembers what century it is in the morning." She shivered again. "If - if that's how the war really got started... that's scary."

"It frightens me, as well," Iroh nodded. "Yet it also gives me hope. For if what I believe is true, then - well, I do not know how to stop the war. But if Aang can stop it, I believe Zuko and I may help prevent it from starting again."

"Yeah?" Toph rested her hands on her knees, listening hard.

"I would prefer to keep certain details private, while we are among Chief Hakoda's men," Iroh said plainly. "But I think disaster has wracked us all, again and again, because people depended too much on the Avatar to teach them of other nations. And so too few of us knew each others' ways, to be able to turn aside wounded pride when insult was not truly intended." He paused. "Zuko has a plan that may allow some of Earth and Fire to build lives together. If it succeeds, then those most lethal of weapons, hate and distrust, may be finally broken."

Toph rolled those words around in her head. "Sounds kind of... long-term."

"The war did not start when Sozin attacked the Air Temples, and it will not end when Fire Lord Ozai is defeated," Iroh said gravely. "The true war started with lies, and hearts twisted by bitterness. And it will only end when those of us whose spirits have been wounded reach out to heal each other, and ourselves." He sighed. "As I hope my nephew is healing, even now."

Something about the way he'd said that... "Zuko isn't hurt the same way Aang is, is he?"

Iroh was silent.

"He's not," Toph stated, sure now. "Because you think Sparky could get better at dawn, and... Aang won't." She swallowed. "What's really wrong with him, Uncle?"

"It is... private," Iroh said at last. "We do not speak of it to those outside the Fire Nation. Even the Avatar might not be taught of it, were he not of our people." He paused. "I can tell you that it is Zuko's spirit that is injured, more than his body. But I will not say more. The reaction, from most of other nations, is... not well intentioned toward us."

She scowled at him. "I'm not most, Uncle."

"I know," Iroh nodded. "But if you knew, you might show that by how you react to Lieutenant Teruko, and the others. And it would be far more helpful to Aang if Captain Jee's men trust my nephew."

Toph frowned, poking that from all angles. "Okay." She held up a warning finger. "But you said the war got so bad because people didn't get other nations. So maybe you better think about that, too."

Iroh chuckled ruefully. "You are right. And I will. But not while we have spears and firebenders glaring at one another."

Point. And he hadn't asked her not to tell Aang there was a secret. Which she would. Later. About Sparky... and what Iroh thought had happened.

Toph yawned, trying to cover it. "He'll be... okay in the morning?"

"I will wake you if anything changes."

Which wasn't a yes, Toph knew, settling down in some of Iroh's spare blankets. But Uncle felt like hope.

It was enough.

"And now, Princess, comes the moment I double-cross you."

Azula blinked, trying to get blurry double images of a steel ceiling to coalesce into one. Steel above her. Steel cot under her. Steel walls to every side; one - probably one - with a door, and a barred window in it, and Long Feng's smirking face.

"Bend all you like," the Dai Li leader went on, almost genial. "There's nothing in there to burn besides you. And no one would be foolish enough to unleash lightning inside a steel box."

Trapped. As she'd intended to have Zuko trapped. How... annoying. "Is this how the Dai Li treat their allies?" Azula said silkily.

"Oh, please. We both know you dreamed of doing this to me first." He shook his head in mock sorrow. "You and the Avatar are surprisingly alike. Both revered. Both powerful. Both such lost little children, playing grownup games."

Azula hid her smirk. You have no idea the kind of games I play. But you'll learn.

"I wonder if the Fire Nation hates you just as much as they hate him."

Azula sat bolt upright, and regretted it. Not the sudden spike of nausea; whatever had happened after she'd struck down the Avatar, something had hit her hard. No; moving meant she'd reacted, which told Long Feng he'd found a weakness-

"Oh, don't think we don't receive intelligence reports, even in the heart of Ba Sing Se," Long Feng smirked at her. "You're quite the little monster, aren't you? Just the sort of creature Avatar Kyoshi meant to wipe out, centuries ago. Such a shame she had to kill so many innocents as well." He bent nearly to the grate. "Though you know the real shame is she didn't finish the job..."

"Please, you're boring me," Azula yawned. "My own brother knew I was a monster." My own mother... "If I didn't care what the crown prince of the Fire Nation thought, what on earth makes you think I'll care about you?" She narrowed her eyes, ignoring the stab of pain from her throbbing head. "You, who came from nothing; who was born with nothing. And so you fought and schemed and connived your way to power-" like Zuko, my poor fool of a brother "-but all of it still means nothing. True power, the divine right to rule, is something you're born with."

Long Feng's smile slipped away, and something darker than hate glittered in his eyes. "Your brother must have hit you harder than you think, Princess. You seem to have forgotten which side of the door you're on."

"Oh, I forget nothing." Zuko? Little Zuzu managed to... someone will die for that. "You don't really think I'll stay in here, do you? It's so boring."

"Get used to being bored," Long Feng said dryly, and motioned behind him. "Or you'll see what the Earth Kingdom does to your allies."

A Dai Li's stone fist lifted a familiar braided head, and Ty Lee beamed at her. "Azula! There you are!"

No. Azula clenched her teeth on a hiss of rage. No, she's mine, how dare you touch what's mine-!

The green-clad girl twisted, feet lashing out to strike something that scraped fast as a mosquito-hawk through the slot under the door-

A lacquered wooden tray.

Gold eyes burning, Azula lunged. One foot slammed down to stand the tray on edge. The other pushed her off deadly metal, balancing on black wood for one critical instant-

Lightning blazed.

Strands of hair out of place, Azula stepped through the smoking doorway, gaze searching the blurred double-image of the corridor like a storm-dazed hawk. Door down; one very crispy body under it. A gray-faced Dai Li agent crumpled to one side, stone gloves in pieces around him, as if his bending could no longer-

Ty Lee wrapped arms around her in a vine-clingy hug. "You're okay! I was so worried."

Azula blinked, throbbing brain adding up how easily Ty Lee had turned the tables on two skilled earthbenders. "You... let them capture you?"

"Of course! It was the fastest way to find you." Grinning, the acrobat stepped back. "Oh, I know you didn't really need my help. But Mai warned me Long Feng would try something nasty, and you know how Mai worries. And I know you like it when she's just a little less gloomy. So! All done. Take the city! Your dad's going to be so proud."

"Yes," Azula said evenly. "He is." One more loose end here. "Agent... Quan, isn't it?"

Dark eyes looked up at her, rage and grief clear as daylight.

"Oh, don't look like that. I'm not going to kill you. Not yet." Azula smirked. "I should. You're not loyal to me, and I don't think you ever will be. Which is... interesting." She studied the man, reaching out with inner fire. "You have a killer instinct, pure as any firebender. You should feel my power, and bow before me. Yet you won't. Why is that?"

Quan stared back at her, swallowing grief. "I am loyal to the Earth King, and the city of Ba Sing Se."

Hmm. Only one lie in there. Interesting.

"Earth King's missing," Ty Lee whispered to her. "And the bear."

Azula smiled cruelly. "Your king is gone. Your city is in my hands. And the rest of your men are loyal to me. Why shouldn't I give you to the firebenders for target practice? Or worse... ship you out to a sea barge, until the lack of earth drives you mad?"

He twitched at that. Good.

But from somewhere Quan drew strength, and that was... not so good. "The Dai Li protect our city from the evils of the spirit world," the agent said hoarsely. "Do as you will with me. But if you take us from our duties - even the might of your armies will not survive the cataclysm."

The spirit world? The man was as cracked as Uncle.

Still. He actually seemed to believe it. "Well," Azula mused, sharp nails tapping on her robe, "you might be thinking of betraying me... but you haven't actually done it." She glanced, deliberately, at lightning-seared flesh. "I'm sure you can give me... assurances of your good behavior." She shrugged, corridor whitening out for a moment with pain. "You have until we get back to tell me what they are."

Head high, she stalked down the corridor.

Ty Lee was a skip and a jump behind. "You sure you're okay?" the acrobat whispered. "That's an awful lump."

"Right now, there are two of you," Azula said honestly. Two Ty Lees... now, there was a frightening thought. "It doesn't matter."

"Yes, it does!" Both Ty Lees had their stubborn look on. "We need to find somewhere you can sit down... ooo, the throne room! You can sit up there and give orders and look all regal and impressive, and I can scare all the servants into pampering you until you feel better!" The blurred acrobat cartwheeled, grinning.

Not half bad as a plan, at that. Especially given more details of the fight were filtering in; the waterbender she'd baited, the Avatar down, Zuzu a traitor-

Zuko is a traitor.

It thrilled through her; the sure knowledge of the choice her fool of a brother had finally made. And the consequences.

"Hey!" Ty Lee smiled. "You had a happy thought!"

"Yes," Azula purred, pain suddenly worth it. "A very happy thought."

The throne is mine. Now, and forever.

Chapter End Notes

A genealogy for Zuko, given people keep asking. Yes, this uses creative license and disagrees with canon in "The Avatar and the Firelord" ep. For real brain breakage, remember this is Azula's family tree as well.

Sozin & Wife - Azulon

- Ozai

Roku & Ta Min - Ilah

- Zuko

Unknown & Unknown- Shidan

- Ursa

Kuzon & Wife - Kotone

Wani - alligator. Suzuran - lily of the valley.

I know Aang doesn't lecture people about vegetarianism in the show. But he makes it pretty clear he disapproves of meat, furs, and a lot of other things you need to survive under arctic circumstances, where you can't grow vegetables. To Sokka, that probably feels just as bad.

From some of what was implied in "The Storm" and a few other eps, it seems likely Lt. Jee and most of the crew were new on board; that they'd only been there a few months or so. I've always thought being assigned to Zuko's ship had to be the punishment detail. Remember at one point Zuko accuses the helmsman of mutiny because the course changed without warning; what if that wasn't paranoia? What if a prior crew had mutinied, or threatened to? Ozai's the kind to make sure the gift of exile just keeps giving.

If you think about the episode "The Avatar and the Firelord", Sozin wouldn't have really been after the Air Nomads. He was after the Avatar; to seize and destroy him, or at least neutralize him, before he could become as powerful as Roku. So the question isn't, "Why did Sozin wipe out the Air Nomads?" It's, "what tools did Sozin have to kill the Avatar?" How could he ensure the Fire Nation would leave no stone unturned, no corner of the world not searched, to find that one Air Nomad child?

Hate.

Hate is not the opposite of love. It is its dark shadow, and it can move just as many mountains as that brightness. People have survived the most hopeless, impossible situations because they hated their captors and abusers, and refused to let them win.

Unfortunately for the Air Nomads, they were a very good target for Fire Nation hate. Detachment from worldly concerns works out okay, as long as you stay in temples on top of mountains. When you don't... remember how much Aang disrupted Katara's village life in the first two episodes? Oh, you're at war with the Fire Nation? Let's blow off the tasks the elders say are important and have fun! On top of that, let's break the village taboo and visit the Fire Navy ship, because you gotta conquer fear! Whee!

Now, take that attitude and dump it in the middle of a Fire Nation hurricane season. Warning - if I were you, I'd get behind a very big rock.

Ah, yes. That cavalcade of fireworks you just saw was all the great names exploding in incandescent fury at having their hurricane preparations disrupted, which directly impacts their honor by damaging their ability to protect their people. And the commoners exploding because the Air Nomads apparently have as much sense of the dignity of the upper class as your average hog-monkey (see Aang blowing up Long Feng's robes, among many, many other events), which implies the great names don't have the power to protect that dignity, which in turn implies the great names can't protect their people. And every Fire Nation citizen in general exploding because hey, this crazy Air Nomad says he's friends with us and with that other clan we really hate, and what kind of grinning sociopath is he...?

And if other Air Nomads were as quick to lie to "smooth things over" as Aang was with the warring Earth Kingdom villagers in "The Great Divide"... oh, boy. The Fire Nation keeps historical documents. One check of a scribe's records versus the words of friendly, cheerful people who are probably no longer there to suffer the fallout - they're nomads, after all...

Roku? Keeping the four nations separate, so they didn't know each other, when the Air

Nomads could apparently go anywhere they pleased? You were an idiot. Idiot.

Even so, even when a group is hated, it takes a lot to start a genocide. There is one common theme in real-life genocides: the perpetrators believe they are the victims. No matter how evil and all-powerful Sozin was, in order to make canon events match up with what we know from real life, certain things had to happen. Events had to work out such that the vast majority of the Fire Nation believed that 1) they'd been horribly betrayed, 2) the Air Nomads were responsible, and 3) unless they did something drastic, it would happen again.

Unfortunately for the Air Nomads... yes, Sozin could set that up.

In reference to Avatars, hurricanes and overkill - from the episode "Imprisoned", I quote Aang: "I wish I knew how to make a hurricane. The Warden would run away and we'd steal his keys!" Good, Aang. Good idea. And then there'd be no one to rescue, because the hurricane would have killed them all.

Chapter 26

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Ow.

Lying in fire-lit dimness, Zuko blinked, trying to sort out who, what, where, and was there anything lethal currently pointing his way.

Warm in here. He breathed in air that shimmered, basking like a gliding lizard in glorious, wonderful heat. Warm; warm from the tips of his toes all the way to his core. The warmth of life, driving out even the memory of killing cold...

Azula. The Avatar. The lightning.

...I'm a traitor.

It hurt. Inside, where he'd never stopped hoping that his father would - that somehow-

He doesn't want me.

And I... I don't want to be the heir he wants. Not anymore.

It hurt. But it didn't feel like he would die from it. Which was its own hellish flavor of grief. He'd tried so hard to be the crown prince, the heir Fire Lord Ozai and their people needed...

But to serve our people, I can't serve my father. Zuko swallowed dryly. I guess I have to live with that.

Well. Looked like treason wasn't going to kill him. Time to figure out what else wanted a shot today.

Warily, Zuko opened his eyes.

Firebenders!

The armor was as unmistakable as the sense of flame flickering within them. Only two things kept him still. First, he wasn't bound; meaning either he was dealing with a commanding officer of Zhao's level of idiocy, or his disguise as Lee was holding. Second-

Well, you couldn't mistake Uncle's snores for anything else.

Moving slow and quiet, Zuko slipped out from under sweat-soaked blankets, not bothering to dress. Clothes could wait. He needed to know.

Uncle slept like a rock. A noisy, warm, completely unharmed rock.

The relief was so intense, he almost sat down on Toph.

She's okay!

No. He didn't know that. She wasn't injured, but she'd been trapped, and Long Feng had been behind it, and Katara hadn't known about it-

Toph. Forgive me.

Zuko swept his hands through steamy air, gathering just enough water to glove one hand before he laid it gently on her sleeping face. Reaching through the water as Amaya had taught him, searching for any sign of that unnatural, light-induced smoothness of a mindbent spirit...

Nothing. Just the rough, lumpy edges of pride, and gleeful stubbornness, and little cracks of fear she'd never give up to anyone so long as she could stand on her own two feet. Just - Toph.

Zuko lifted his hand away, ashamed to have pried. He'd just been so afraid...

I'll apologize. When she wakes up.

Hopefully, after he'd gotten cleaned up a little. Ugh.

Firebending marines, Zuko thought, looking over the armor and insignia of the two napping near the entrance. Sandstone shelter on top of sand... Toph must have made this. And Uncle and I aren't chained up.

Meaning the most likely scenario was that Uncle had used the "lost colonials" story again. Okay. He could work with that.

Marines, and the air tastes salty. Zuko closed his eyes and reached out, feeling. Yeah. Definitely a lot of water that way.

Time to find someplace for a bath.

Cover as a colonial didn't even begin to enter his calculations. The colonies were civilized, and civilized people were clean. Even at sea, every ship used its boilers to distill enough fresh water to scrub down with. Whatever story Uncle had come up with, they'd need respect to pull it off. Every little bit would help.

Zuko had to pause, gathering up his robes. Last he'd seen them, they had been a respectable set of green, hems neat even after he and Uncle had sewn them back up. Now, stray threads had flashed to ash, and a fine pattern of black scorches laced over each sleeve, like veins in a flutter-hornet's wing.

That was the lightning I didn't deflect. He swallowed dryly. Agni. I almost died.

He had to duck his head and breathe, until the shudders went away. Okay. He'd almost died. Again. It was Azula. What did he expect?

Why didn't I just kill her?

But he knew the answer even as he asked. Azula might be murderous and vicious and insane... but she was his sister.

Family. Community. Zuko smiled wryly. I guess Lee is part of your tribe, Master Amaya. I just... can't.

Which was oddly freeing. If he couldn't kill Azula, if he knew he couldn't-

Then I fight to stop her. And I don't hold back.

Lighthearted, he turned his attention back to the familiar task of sneaking past armed, alert firebenders. Which wasn't nearly as hard as their commanding officer probably wished it was.

Rotated watches or not, it was just before dawn, and every firebender was at a low ebb. A moment of glances elsewhere, and he was outside, and out of sight.

What the heck?

Years of experience fighting in the most bizarre situations let Zuko keep moving, even when what he was seeing was impossible. Water Tribe blue tents pitched above the high-tide line. A Fire Nation river steamer anchored in the shallows, armed sailors on watch. At least one Water Tribe ship pulled up on the shore, not too far away, with armed and obviously disgruntled Water Tribe warriors guarding it. A Fire Navy cruiser, likely the steamer's mothership, anchored offshore, with a watch standing guard at the rails, just as grumpily put out. And nobody was bleeding. Or on fire.

This? This is not good.

Either he was looking at mass treason - not damn likely - or a whole Water Tribe fleet had gone over to Ozai - even less likely - or...

The Avatar.

The Avatar, or spirits out to help their chosen child. Right now, he didn't care which. This was bad.

And he had an awful feeling it might be his fault.

Yāorén.

Uncle had managed to tell him a few things, that morning before he'd gone looking for Toph and the world had blown up in his face. Legends. Spirit-touched benders. People once meant to help the Avatar.

When cow-pigs fly. Zuko smoothed the snarl off his face as he ghosted down the beach away from the oddly mixed camp. I warned him about Azula. I warned him about Ba Sing Se. I helped Toph get Appa back. And I faced down Azula and nearly got fried covering his skinny airbending butt. I. Have had. Enough.

Steam was rising from the sand around his feet. Zuko sighed, and gathered it around his hands before any betraying wisps could escape. I could really, really go for a tub right now...

Stripping down, he streamed seawater into a ball, wringing it between his hands as Amaya had taught him to drop out salt and creatures too small to see. Drinkable fresh water sloshed around his fingers; he took a few grateful swallows, before moving on to getting clean. Just like a ship-scrub. Move fast, be thorough, try not to think about anyone watching.

At least it was hot, bubbling hotter as dawn broke and sunlight washed over him. Zuko buried his face in hot water for a long, bracing moment...

Sighed, let it flow down into sand, and dressed with the speed of midnight raids. He'd wrung most of the water out of his hair, but not all; a little dampness would go a long way toward answering questions on how he'd cleaned up. Not like I can do anything with hair this short, anyway, Zuko thought ruefully, forming a palm-sized ice-mirror to check. Not that I know if I even should. I have no idea what Uncle's told them-

Gold gleamed, and he almost dropped frail ice.

Breathe. Look again.

Not his imagination. Amaya's concealing blue... was gone.

Sozin's eyes.

So he'd been told, all his life. The pale, pure gold found only in a few great names' families; and never, never supposed to be gifted to one whose firebending would only be... mediocre.

Though one could be a great bender without it. Uncle didn't have it. Azula didn't have it.

It ached, to look in a mirror and see Ozai's blood.

It doesn't matter. I won't let it.

And at least now he knew the spirits were sticking their glowing fingers into this mess. Only another waterbender should have been able to move that thin layer of bent water. And Katara never would have done it.

I could put it back. Zuko grimaced. But if Toph's here, and the Water Tribe's here... no. Better find out what's-

He almost moved, before sand boxed him in. "Stay put!" a familiar voice demanded.

Zuko raised his brow, hearing the worry under the order. "Toph? Are you okay?"

"You're sane? Yes!" Sand splashed away as Toph slugged him in the arm. "Don't you ever scare me like that again, Sparky!"

"Ow." Zuko winced. "I hope I never do that again, either." He sighed, and mustered his courage. "Toph? I'm... sorry."

"You darn well better be." Toph rubbed at her nose. "You scared Uncle, you know that?"

"I know," Zuko admitted softly. "But that's not... I found the house where you were trapped. I thought it might have been the Dai Li, I was so worried-" He gulped, and got it out. "I invaded your privacy this morning. I'm sorry. I had to know, you were right there with Uncle and those marines, and if something had set off a Dai Li trigger - I had to know. But that doesn't make it right." He bowed. "I have tread along the boundaries of your honor, and I am sorry."

The earthbender frowned. "You thought the Dai Li bent my brain?"

"Amaya showed me how to look for the signs," Zuko said plainly, not rising. "But it takes water. I don't know how to do it with fire yet. I couldn't risk getting caught."

She was silent. He didn't dare lift his head to look. Toph might be blind, but she could sense movement in ways he could never deceive.

"So what'd you do?"

Not forgiveness. But she didn't sound angry. Yet. "I... felt the storm of your mind," Zuko said, trying to put the feel of it into words. "A healthy mind has - I don't know, edges. Kind of. Someone who's mindbent... it's like someone polished the edges down. Flattened them. It really doesn't feel good." He swallowed. "The edges are... emotions. Things you really feel about. I don't know what you feel them about, but... they're yours, and I felt them, and that was rude."

Toph marched into his personal space, arms crossed. "So. You poked into my head to make sure nobody else messed around in there."

Still looking down, he nodded. "I did."

"Yeah, I think that's enough groveling." Toph grinned.

Groveling? Zuko straightened, a breath away from calling fire.

"Whoa!" Toph held up her hands. "Teasing! You know, what friends do?" She cocked her head, listening. "You... really don't like that word. Why?"

Friends. Zuko kept himself from shuddering. "I grew up in the palace. You know what kind of people got access there under Fire Lord Azulon? Friends always saw Azula first." Why waste time on the brat who couldn't bend, after all? Much less the one who'd never be a prodigy. "I'd rather have an ally. There are things allies won't do. Not without warning you the alliance is off."

"Got it," Toph nodded seriously. Grinned again, a little more wry. "Softie."

"What?"

"Temporary alliance? You were worried about me." Toph buffed her nails on her robe. "It wasn't the Dai Li. Just two idiot bounty hunters sent by my parents. Can you imagine that? What kind of family sends people out to drag you back in a metal box?"

"Wouldn't know," Zuko deadpanned. "The Fire Lord sent Azula with chains." He grimaced, and shook his head. "How'd you get away?"

Toph smirked. "How much do you want to know?"

That set off every nerve that had ever listened in on ministers and merchants negotiating. She's got something good. And she knows it. "What are you asking?"

Toph lost the brave smile. "Aang's hurt. It's bad. He's breathing, he's not dying... but he's not waking up, either. Sokka got his dad to give everybody a truce so Uncle can help." She crossed her arms. "I'm betting you can do better."

...The spirits really, really hate me. "Maybe," Zuko said levelly. "I know what Uncle's taught me about lightning. And I studied what Amaya had in her scrolls. But I'm an apprentice."

"Yeah; it's amateur night all over," Toph said wryly. "You up for it?"

"Healing takes concentration," Zuko said flatly. "I'm not working near Katara without someone to watch my back. In case she decides to put a knife in it."

Toph frowned. "You're gonna be helping Aang. She won't-"

"She called me a monster, Toph!" Agni, it still hurt. He'd treated her as an honorable opponent, he'd wanted to believe anyone who could defeat him deserved that much respect... and she'd flung it in his face. "She looks at me, and all she sees is the man who murdered her mother!"

"But you didn't," Toph objected, stunned.

"You want to use logic on Katara?" Zuko smirked. "Go ahead. I'll watch."

Toph scowled at him, lifting a finger to jab-

Stopped. Thought about it. "Okay. Maybe you've got a point. I'll try and get on her good side-"

"Don't waste your time," Zuko said grimly. "It's better if you don't try to talk her into anything. If she thinks you're only on her side, she won't get prickly when you watch me to make sure I'm not doing anything evil to Aang."

"Twisted," Toph said thoughtfully. "Pretty smart, but twisted." She frowned. "You really don't like Sugar Queen, do you?"

"Why should I?" Zuko said flatly. "I saved Katara from running into Azula, and all she can think is that I'm just like my father. Just like some Fire Nation murderer I've never even met." He drew in a snarling breath. "Sokka at least listened."

Toph brightened. "You are going to help!"

"Yes," Zuko admitted quietly. "But I don't want Katara to know why."

Toph's toes felt the sand. "Because of this plan Uncle doesn't want Chief Hakoda knowing about?"

Chief Hakoda's here? Oh, wonderful. "What do you know?" Zuko said warily.

"You've got a plan to get Earth and Fire people living together, to try and fix things if the war stops," Toph said seriously. "Is Huojin part of the plan?" She tilted her head when he hesitated. "Hey, I know Fire Nation voices when I hear 'em. Huojin sure sounds like Ba Sing Se on the surface, but under that? He's kind of... crackly. Like you. And Uncle."

"He might be," Zuko admitted. "It's his decision. We have a plan. Uncle thinks it can work. But it won't, if we're anywhere near Aang. And Katara hates us. If she knew, she'd try to wreck it. No matter how many people got hurt."

"You don't want to be near Aang?" Toph said carefully. "That's going to make catching him pretty hard."

"Doesn't matter," Zuko said simply. "It's over. Taking the Avatar won't save my people. I'm done."

Blind eyes got round. "But if you don't bring Aang back, Azula-"

"She's going to be the heir, no matter what I do," Zuko said bitterly. "Fire is the superior element. That's what everybody's taught. If the Fire Sages find out what I can do..." His fists clenched. "It's over, Toph. I can never regain my honor." He let out a breath. "But I don't want Katara to know that. Or anyone in the Water Tribe. If they think I'm still after Aang, they think they've got a hold on me. Which means they won't try for..." He couldn't say it. The thought was too horrible.

"Uncle," Toph gulped. "You think Katara would let someone hurt him?"

"He's the Dragon of the West," Zuko bit out. "The Earth Kingdom wants him dead or in chains. Who do you think is supplying Chief Hakoda's fleet? And if it comes down to keeping a truce or helping her people - yes. She would. And she'd have the right. She's a waterbender."

"You lost me, Sparky," Toph admitted. "They're Hakoda's kids, sure. But I thought they got treated like everyone else."

"Sokka is Hakoda's-?" Zuko shook his head as it suddenly ached. "I was up against... no wonder he halfway knew what he was doing." He snorted, memories of months on the ice shimmering like air over embers. Fishing, gathering with the women, hunting seals with a flash of red scales... He'd listened to anyone who would talk to him, trying to understand the people Aang might have gone to. Southern waterbenders weren't all arrogant, but far too many would just as soon freeze an outsider as look at him. He remembered one particularly vicious young lady who'd almost iced him over; Hama, wasn't it...?

Urgh. Need breakfast. Did he honestly think he was remembering seal-hunts at the South Pole? Figuring out Sokka must have been more of a shock than he'd thought. Uncle would never let me hear the end of this, Zuko thought wryly. A couple thousand history scrolls, a couple years at sea reading when there's nothing else to do, and you're dreaming you were there.

But the point remained, no matter where he'd dragged up the facts from. "No wonder she thinks she's got the right to judge," Zuko muttered. "Chief's daughter and a waterbender. Who's going to tell her no?"

"Still lost me," Toph said impatiently. "So she's a waterbender. Big deal."

"It is," Zuko said plainly. "You're Earth Kingdom. Oma and Shu were human. Benders know it's something anyone could learn, if they had the gift. The Water Tribes worship the Ocean and the Moon. Waterbenders are blessed. Nine hundred years ago Avatar Kuruk said women were born to heal, and the Northern Tribe has kept that up ever since. They don't train women to fight. Even when they know the Fire Nation is just biding their time to take them out."

"You know about an Avatar nine hundred years ago?" Toph took a step back, startled.

"I studied every Avatar I could find scrolls on," Zuko said impatiently. "Roku, Kyoshi, Kuruk, Yangchen, Hirata... I had no idea what might help me find Aang. The point is, Katara's Southern Tribe. The Northern Tribe can get something off the land, even if it's just pasturing reindeer-yaks on the tundra. Katara's tribe lives on the raw edge; everything they have is what they win from the sea and the ice. Families waterbenders liked thrived. People who crossed them never made it back to shore. That's the stories Katara grew up with. That's what she thinks waterbenders should be." His shoulders slumped. "I guess I thought she might be different. That she might have learned something, traveling with the Avatar. But... it doesn't look like she has. And if she can't believe I'm not trying to capture Aang when I'm trying to save you from Azula-" He blew out frustrated steam. "Then she might as well keep thinking that. Instead of believing I'm up to something even more evil."

Toph's toes drummed the sand. "Okay, I buy that. But there's something else you're not telling me."

"Lots," Zuko deadpanned. "Live with it."

"Lots of things don't make you panicky when you think about hanging around near Aang," Toph shot back. "You want to grab Uncle and head for the hills, plan or no plan. And I know you're a good guy, where it counts. You wouldn't just leave Aang hurting without a reason. Talk."

Zuko kept his fists from clenching. "I don't like spirits tampering with my life. Aang's the Avatar. Being within a mile of him is like hopping on a mountaintop in a thunderstorm, in armor, sticking your tongue out at the lightning-spirits. Does that answer your question?"

"You? So need a vacation." Toph cracked her knuckles. "Okay, you convinced me. So if you're going to pay up... let me tell you about iron, earth, and the greatest earthbender in the world."

"I swear, Lieutenant, nothing got past me!"

"Well something must have, or he'd still be in there," the armored woman growled back. "Damn it, the captain is going to-" she cut herself off, visibly steaming.

Panicking firebenders, Hakoda thought, watching from what he hoped was a reasonable distance. Not as much fun as I thought.

Certainly not fun when his two children were in the same camp, and most of his warriors were either asleep or desperately wanted to be. The Fire Nation custom of being up at the crack of dawn was crazy.

And here you are, just as crazy, making sure you're here to catch the sparks, Hakoda reminded himself ruefully.

Though there hadn't been any sparks. Yet. All the Fire Navy men - and however many women - had behaved... politely. Which didn't make sense.

Katara had told him about the Fire Nation's hunt for the Avatar, words sluicing out of her like a spring thaw before she could finally sleep. Prince Zuko had been their most ruthless hunter, but any Fire Nation force within sighting distance of Appa would surge after the young airbender like a leopard-shark spotting a bait-ball of marlin-tuna. The Fire Lord wanted Aang, alive or dead. Wanted him badly enough to risk an entire invasion fleet trying to take the North Pole; ships and men that could have guaranteed taking Ba Sing Se, without the incredible net of treachery and deception woven by Princess Azula and the Dai Li.

Yet here was the Avatar, helpless, with only his daughter, little Toph, and Hakoda's fleet to protect him. And the Fire Nation was doing nothing.

Not quite true, Hakoda admitted to himself. They're keeping vigil.

Which also didn't make sense. Prince Zuko might be his daughter's own personal grudge, but as far as the Fire Nation was concerned? Not only was he banished, with no honor, he wasn't even a good firebender. How could he be, given he'd been unskilled enough to be scarred by fire? True, some in the Fire Nation might not want Azula as the heir, but no one doubted her power. Zuko was a match; she was an inferno. Everyone knew it.

Everyone but Sokka.

Hakoda frowned, considering that. Usually, if he'd gotten reliable news from a host of people, with only one dissenting voice, the loner was looked at suspiciously. But Sokka wasn't relying on secondhand traders' tales or relatives' advice. His son had fought Prince Zuko. And no matter what everyone knew, Sokka believed the young firebender was as dangerous as an ice viper who'd just found her nest of eggs shattered.

If this Captain Jee was on Zuko's ship... he'd know it, too.

Which didn't even begin to take into account the fact that Hakoda knew - knew - Sokka had his father's gift. The gift that had made their line chiefs for generations. The knack for seeing things not as everyone wanted them to be, but as they truly were. And, at times even more important, as they might be.

So tell yourself a story, Hakoda thought wryly. In this story Sokka is right, and the boy's a far more dangerous firebender than anyone realizes. Except for his uncle - who was once the heir himself - and the captain of his ship. Spirits, go ahead and make it a truly wild one; say the captain's as honorable as Zuko tried to be in that desert. And he doesn't want Azula as the heir either.

In that story... what would an honorable Fire Navy captain do?

Protect his nation. By protecting the only sane heir Ozai had. Even if it meant leaving the Fire Nation's most deadly enemy completely untouched.

Aang's injuries were severe enough to make Hakoda wince at the thought of moving him, even with Katara's care. The Fire Lord might not care if the Avatar died... but Zuko needed the boy alive.

I could be wrong. Sokka and I could both be wrong. But if I'm right...

Then the situation was both safer and more dangerous that he'd realized. This wasn't an ordinary Fire Nation force, arrogant and deadly but prone to withdraw rather than suffer massive casualties. These were desperate men, willing to skirt the edge of the Fire Lord's own orders for their prince's sake.

I need to warn Bato and the others. Until I have a better sense of these soldiers, we need to be very careful. Hakoda straightened his shoulders, and approached the shelter. "Is there a problem?"

"No." A massive yawn, as Iroh walked out of Toph's shelter. "Relax, Lieutenant Teruko. My nephew has most likely just taken a walk. It is a habit of his, when he is worried."

"Took a walk?" Teruko sputtered. "We've been on watch!"

And so have my men, Hakoda frowned.

"He walks very quietly," Iroh said cheerfully. "It is all right, Captain Jee knows of his habits... ah. Chief Hakoda?"

Bending over sand near one edge of the shelter, Hakoda raised an interested brow. "Very quietly," he agreed wryly. The trail was faint. Sandals, not the boots he'd expected. And it stuttered, in a way that didn't quite look human-

Hakoda stopped, and looked, as the young man he was following would have looked. He saw the sentries. And they didn't see him.

Intrigued, the chieftain went back to the trail, building a fresher picture of the prince than either the unconscious boy he'd seen in Iroh's arms, or the supernaturally determined firebender Sokka had sketched with words and waving hands.

He didn't just see the sentries. He knew they'd be there.

Not a surprise, from a military-trained firebender. But the patience and stealth needed to turn that knowledge into a successful stalk and evasion... that was startling.

This is a prince?

It didn't fit the image he'd formed of a royal heir after meeting a few too many arrogant Earth Kingdom nobles. Which made Hakoda wonder what else might not fit.

You hesitated here; you saw the camp. You were startled, but you didn't attack anyone. Not exactly the hot temper Sokka had warned him of. You're meandering, but only enough to avoid sight; you have a goal. What?

"So, you think, if we heat up the sand...?" Toph's voice echoed around the next dune.

"Worth a try." Young, but with a low, rough edge that came from snapping out orders over the roar of battle. "Later."

"Aww. I was hoping we'd spook them." Toph grinned at them all as they rounded grassy sand.
"Hey, Uncle. Guess who's back in this century?"

Who, indeed. Hakoda took a long look, as Teruko muttered under her breath and Iroh beamed. No-nonsense green robes, unremarkable as any Earth Kingdom traveler, if you ignored the singes. Dark hair, just shaggy enough to shade pale gold eyes, and soften the edge of the worst burn scar Hakoda had ever seen on a living man. Taller than Sokka, and lean. Too lean; an eye trained by polar winters could mark almost to the day how long the prince had been on short rations, and when the universe had finally decided to ease up a bit.

Sokka's right. If he'd jumped this boy a few months back, he could have held him.

Not now. The prince's stance was proud, Fire Nation to the core... yet there was none of the stiff arrogance he'd seen in so many firebenders. Zuko was still. Waiting.

That, is a very dangerous young man.

A dangerous young man currently sizing both him and Teruko up, as if they each posed their own threat.

His own military? So. The prince really is a fugitive. Which made Captain Jee's actions all the more interesting-

"How did you get past the sentries?" Teruko demanded, steam rising from her breath.

Zuko didn't even twitch. "You blinked."

Iroh, Hakoda noted, looked quietly amused.

Toph wasn't quiet at all, cackling like an arctic hen. "Come on! Doesn't everybody know how sneaky you are?"

"Those with sight often do not watch as carefully as your feet," Iroh declared. Gave Teruko a tolerant glance. "Truly, you have no reason to be shamed. My nephew has much practice in finding a way past insurmountable odds." He turned directly to the prince. "Nephew, this is Chief Hakoda, father of Sokka and Katara, who has offered a truce so we may work toward parallel goals. Chief Hakoda, my nephew, Prince Zuko, son of Ursa and Fire Lord Ozai."

Fire Nation formality. Hakoda had had a few brushes with it, and hadn't liked any of them. Though it was interesting to realize how much hinged on what the speaker didn't say. I've offered a truce. But Iroh hasn't said the prince accepted it. This could get sticky.

Zuko inclined his head. "Your son honors your name," he said formally. "He is usually outmatched in training and numbers, but he is persistent and inventive." A bare hint of a smirk. "Ask him to tell you about the dress."

Hakoda blinked. "Dress?"

"Ooo, that's just mean," Toph snickered.

"He helped execute a skilled ambush and strategic withdrawal," Zuko stated wryly. "A soldier's superiors should know all the pertinent details, so his accomplishments can receive their just reward."

Hakoda added everything up, and started to chuckle. The prince might be an untrustworthy, vicious firebender he'd just as soon punt out to sea in a block of ice, but... "My son fought you off in a dress?" Oh, Sokka. You're going to have to share this one.

"For his first time wearing armor, he didn't do too badly." Zuko's face went cold, all humor gone. "Your daughter is a powerful and determined bender, and she's going to get herself killed."

Iroh held up a warding hand before Hakoda could tense. "That is not a threat," the retired general said swiftly. "My nephew has no skill at diplomacy. But he is honest. Please, listen."

"You'd better have a very good reason that's not a threat," Hakoda said evenly.

"I don't want to have to kill her," Zuko said quietly. "Is that good enough?"

Truce, Hakoda reminded himself as Iroh sighed. We have a truce. "You're not very convincing at not threatening my daughter."

"Man!" Toph flung up her hands. "What is it with you, Sparky? Do you just look scary, or something?"

Sparky? Hakoda thought, incredulous. The girl was Earth Kingdom. She had to know the prince was an enemy. No matter how benevolently Iroh might smile over tea.

"Yeah," Zuko said softly. "I do."

She's blind, Hakoda remembered. It was easy to forget, given how well the young earthbender moved. She has no idea how awful he looks. Even Bato's scars aren't that-

Hakoda's eyes narrowed, examining that thought. Bato had gained his scars in combat, and they looked it; ragged, wavering, clear sign he'd tried to dodge. The prince's... the closest he'd ever seen was the heart-wound on executed Earth Kingdom soldiers. One precise blast of fire.

It looks... wrong.

"So much for seeing," Toph said impatiently. "Okay, so he's scary. He's right. Katara, Sokka, Aang - they're my friends. But back in Ba Sing Se? Katara said stuff, did stuff..." She winced. "I'm worried about her. And Zuko met Katara way before I did. So he kind of does know her."

"Met her, by threatening my mother," Hakoda said pointedly.

Zuko grimaced. "Would it help if I said I regret that?"

Teruko stirred. "Sir-"

"It was inadvisable, Lieutenant," Zuko said formally. "The Wani was my ship, not a ship of war. The village was just civilians, and one young man who should have stuck to his boomerang instead of trying to use a spear in his first combat. Starting out by going face-to-face with lethal intent? He was just asking to freeze up..." He shook his head. "I have a temper, and I didn't think. We're at war. But it was less than honorable to threaten someone who turned out to be carrying no weapons."

"Turned out to- she's an old woman!" Hakoda exclaimed.

"I see you have never met a Fire Nation grandmother." Amusement glittered in Iroh's green eyes. "I advise that you tell Sokka to treat them as warily as he would Mai. After all, who does he think gave the girl her first knife set?"

Green eyes? Hakoda realized. But firebenders have... something's strange here. "Fine, then," he said levelly. "Tell me what you know, that I apparently don't, about my own daughter."

Pale fists clenched; slowly, loosened. "My orders were to capture the Avatar, alive," the prince stated, careful as a man picking his way over rotten ice. "Your daughter decided to make herself an obstacle. But I had no orders about her, so I could choose to avoid lethal force. We've fought. She's tried to kill me. She tried the same tactics on Azula and the Dai Li. Only they didn't want her alive." Zuko's jaw was set. "The Avatar could have taken Katara and flown away on his airstaff. He's done it before. I didn't see what happened, but I've fought Katara. And I know my sister. I'd guess Katara thought she could take Azula... and Azula let her think that. Long enough to keep Aang fighting, until he was exactly where she wanted him." He let out a slow hiss of breath. "I warned her. General Iroh warned her. She doesn't listen."

Hakoda gave the young man a skeptical look. "And you expected her to listen to an enemy?"

"It is the custom among our people that when two deadly foes are faced by an even more powerful enemy, they may make a temporary alliance, until the danger has passed," Iroh said levelly. "Such cooperation brings no dishonor to either side. Indeed, in our past, such alliances could prove the basis for a long-lasting truce. Even an end to hostilities, if circumstances and honor permitted." Short and gray, he gave Hakoda a look that reminded the chief of his own father. "Yes. We hoped she would listen. And so we warn you now, as one honorably holding truce with us." He glanced at Zuko. "I believe there is breakfast."

"Good," Zuko said wryly. "I was wondering if I was going to have to fish-" Hand tucked up one sleeve, he froze.

"Nephew?" Iroh said carefully.

Slowly, Zuko brought out his hand, holding a blackened lump of metal. Looked at it. Swallowed.

That looks like... melted fishhooks?

Iroh drew in a sharp breath. "Lieutenant Teruko. I believe this may be the proof you asked for."

"Proof of what?" Hakoda gave the armored firebender a narrow look as she accepted blackened steel. "They're melted. He's a firebender."

"Not melted," Teruko said soberly. "Welded. That takes extreme heat, or..."

"Lightning," Zuko said levelly. Glanced at his uncle, a sudden hesitance behind the formal mask. "Did anyone... when I redirected...?"

"There were several concussions, I believe." Iroh's smile was kind. "Come. Let us ease the lieutenant's duties, so she may send word to Captain Jee."

Relief flickered in gold eyes, and Hakoda raised an interested brow. "He thought you were dead, too. Something about a ship blowing up?"

The mask slammed back down, and the prince regarded him coolly. "Yes. It did."

Interesting. That doesn't sound like what I'd expect, if it were enemy action, Hakoda thought. So either some firebending got out of hand - and from Sokka, Zuko's not that bad - or...

Fire Nation politics. Give the enemy points for consistency; they were as vicious to each other as they were to every other nation.

But would someone dare do that to the heir? Who? Why?

"Ow. That sounds like a nasty story- Oh no." Toph winced. "Heads up. She's ticked."

"I can see that," Zuko muttered under his breath, glancing out at the ships.

No, not the ships, Hakoda realized. The waves.

Waves suddenly half a foot higher than they should be, given the falling tide. Hakoda frowned, recalling what Sokka had said about anger, and benders. He'd heard stories about waterbenders, yes. But he'd always thought they had to be exaggerated. Angry wishes for vengeance, from a people who dared not admit they were dying.

Zuko's expression didn't change. He simply glanced at Iroh, and headed back to camp.

That's a firebender for you. Hit the enemy head on.

Even so, Hakoda knew the moment Zuko saw his daughter. He'd seen men stiffen like that before. When spears flashed, and blood flew.

"What do you think you're doing?" Katara demanded, fists on her hips.

"Being blackmailed," Zuko deadpanned.

"What?"

Hakoda had to hand it to the young man. Even faced with his daughter's scowl, Zuko just kept moving.

Katara kept ahead of him, pace for angry pace. "You lied to us."

Teruko... snarled, was the best Hakoda could describe it. If snarls included a geyser's puff of steam. "You dare!"

"Oh, you better believe I dare," Katara snapped back. "Look around! That's an ocean. And you don't have an army backing you up this time-"

"What. Do you think. I did?" Zuko gritted out.

"As if you don't know!"

"Actually? I'd say he doesn't," Toph put in. "Want to tell me, Sweetness? 'Cause I'm kind of thinking it'd be hard for Zuko to have done anything. There's this little fact that he's been out cold?"

"He told us he wasn't working with Azula," Katara snapped.

"Um, duh?" Toph shrugged. "She wants him dead."

Hakoda blinked, taken aback. Oh, Tui and La. If that was the case, if Princess Azula wasn't waiting for exile to do her competition in, but taking an active hand... His guests were desperate men, indeed.

"Really?" Katara studied the prince, then batted her eyes in mock concern. "Gee, and I thought Azula was supposed to be this horrible, evil, insane person. He looks awfully alive to me."

"Miss Katara," Iroh reproved.

"No! No excuses. No explanations. He just happens to show up just when Azula does? Just happens to survive lightning that took down Aang?" She glared at the prince. "He's the Avatar! And you, you're just a spoiled failure who-"

A foot around Zuko, sand roared into flames.

And out, before Hakoda could finish drawing in breath to shout. Zuko looked at his daughter, and the chained fury there made Hakoda long for a whalebone machete.

"Lightning is firebending." The prince's words cut like razors. "Aang doesn't know firebending. He doesn't know any blocks. I do. And Azula still almost killed me. Again." Zuko advanced; one deliberate, stalking step. "I found Azula the same way I find the Avatar; because I know how to track things. The Avatar's easy. You just look for the places only an idiot would go, and there he is." Another threatening step. "Azula's harder. She's smart. Much smarter than you. I usually can't find her before she finds me. But I know how to find her. Just look for the one place and time she can destroy everything you've worked for... and she's there ahead of you." He breathed, slow and deliberate. "I knew Azula was in the palace. I saw that damn bison!" One hand flung out like an accusation, toward the massive furry beast just lumbering back into camp after grazing dune grasses further inland. "Draw a map."

Hakoda made himself look away from that blazing, angry presence, watching Iroh, his own men, and tense dark-armored enemies. The old general looked calm, if not happy. Bato was keeping their men civil with a nod and a glance. And the Fire Navy people...

Angry. They're very angry. But they're holding back. We can still salvage this-

Hakoda stared in disbelief as Katara's hand dropped to her waterskin, and the prince tensed, and steel bristled in armored hands-

Iroh's voice snapped like flame. "Are you done insulting your chief's generosity?"

Bato's brows shot up, curious and wary at once.

"Yes," Hakoda said firmly, all too aware of his obligations as a chief. No matter how unpleasant their guests. "She is."

Zuko glanced at him, good eye narrowed. Nodded once, rigidly. Turned away from Katara, and headed for the sandbent shelter.

Katara reddened. "Don't you turn your back on-"

"Katara." Hakoda had never used the tone of a chief to a warrior about to get people killed to his daughter before. He'd never thought he'd have to.

At least the prince is as good as his word.

And the rest of those fire-breathing menaces were following his lead. Even Teruko, whose stiff shoulders shouted that she'd like to fry Katara on the spot.

And the worst thing is, I can't completely disagree with her. "Toph?" Hakoda said calmly. "Would you mind taking over from Sokka for a while? I'd like to speak to both my children about this... situation."

Toph grinned wryly, deliberately walking past him as she headed for the healer's tent. "Good luck," she muttered.

At least Katara still had enough respect for her father to follow him into his tent before she erupted. "Talk? What's there to talk about? Iroh said Zuko was sick. Obviously, he's not anymore, so why are they still here-"

"Let's wait for your brother," Hakoda interrupted.

Fuming, she crossed her arms and shut up.

Sokka pushed into the tent a minute later. "What's going on? Toph said the truce almost flew apart at the seams!"

"Yes," Hakoda said plainly. "It almost did." He raised an eyebrow at his daughter. "Do you want to tell me why?"

"Oh, man," Sokka groaned in disbelief.

"Oh, like you never went after Zuko with your boomerang," Katara shot back.

"Not when we were trying to get his help! Remember the ghost town?" Sokka's hands sketched empty streets, dust blowing in the wind. "Azula went after Iroh, and we all went after her? Zuko warned us about her because he owed us. You think he doesn't owe us now?"

"We don't need him!"

"Yeah, I think we do," Sokka said bluntly, obviously holding on to his own temper. "Every day Aang's out cold is one less day he's got to learn bending. We've got less than two months to get ready. Two healers have got to be able to help him faster than one."

"You want to trust Aang to someone who attacks you first?" Katara snarled back. "He hit me, Sokka! Right in the middle of the street! He didn't even give me a chance to fight back! He's insane, just like that whole little underground fan-club of his! All I wanted to do was help those little kids, break them out of that inner fire Meixiang was talking about - and she threatened me with a knife! Me! Aang's teacher! She said she'd try to kill me rather than let me heal them without asking! She-"

"Whoa. Whoa!" Sokka broke in. "Inner fire?"

"Some excuse Meixiang was using for why the Dai Li were going to follow Azula." Katara rolled her eyes. "She said some firebenders could do it. And since they had this crazy idea Zuko was trying to help them-"

"Not sure if you noticed, but the Dai Li did work for Azula," Sokka pointed out.

"So? We knew Long Feng was a weevil-rat, bending people's minds!"

Sokka let out a frustrated breath. "So what did you think Madam Wen thought you were?"

Katara gaped, then narrowed angry eyes at her brother. "I was going to heal them!"

"You were going after a crazy idea? Then you were going to bend their minds," Sokka said bluntly. "Who's the only people Ba Sing Se knows who do that?"

"I'm not Dai Li!"

"Yeah, well, according to Huojin? We're the reason they were running from the Dai Li." Sokka looked angry; with her, Hakoda realized, but most of all with himself. "Aang promised to help them. But did we ever do it? No. We just headed for the Earth King and trusted everything would work out. Well, it didn't."

"Oh? And whose fault is that, Mr. Positive Attitude?" Katara's voice dripped mock sweetness.

Both of Hakoda's brows went up. He hadn't heard that tone since... well, since his own mother had shredded a tribesman who frankly deserved it. Kanna, what have you been teaching her?

"You're right," Sokka said soberly. "It is my fault. Dad wanted me to look after you, and I should have done it. Which means I should have put my foot down a long time ago and gotten you two to listen to me. Aang's not a warrior. He's just a goofy kid-

"He's the Avatar!"

"And that's why he got to stop acting like a kid!" Sokka finally yelled. "He can't just promise things and expect someone else to fix them. Or make excuses why he shouldn't have to fix them. You're not his mother, Katara! Mom wouldn't let us get away with half of what Aang does!"

"Enough," Hakoda said firmly, planting himself between the red-faced siblings. "Enough." He glanced between them, face stern. "I see this has been building up for a while. And I want to talk to you both more, later. But at this moment, it has to wait. Sokka. As a warrior of the tribe, do you believe Prince Zuko will be willing to help Aang?"

"Toph says he already said yes," Sokka reported, angry red slowly fading from his cheeks. "Said she traded him talking about metalbending for it."

Metal bending? Hakoda thought, incredulous. That's no ordinary earthbender.

"Figures," Katara snorted. "He wouldn't ever help just because it was the right thing to do."

"Why do you care why he does it?" Sokka said, exasperated. "So he wants Aang in one piece to haul back to the Fire Lord. Last time I checked? He's tried that before. And we beat him. The important thing is, we'll get Aang in one piece. We can handle it from there. Unless you don't think a master waterbender can handle one Fire Navy ship."

"Oh, I can handle it, all right," Katara said grimly. "I'd like to handle it right now-

"No," Hakoda said firmly. "We have a truce. That's honored among our people, Katara. I don't care if their tribe was killing ours yesterday. Today we have a truce, and I'd be no excuse for a chief if I broke it."

"We make truces with people!"

Kanna, when I get back there, we need to have a long talk, Hakoda thought grimly. "And we've made one with these people, for the sake of your friend. And you are going to honor it, as the chief's daughter." He nodded toward the tent wall, in the direction of the Fire Navy's mooring. "In the Fire Nation, the commander's honor touches the honor of every man serving under him. They have to defend it. And the captain of that ship has ordered them to protect Prince Zuko." He drew a breath. "Stop insulting him. By all the spirits, stop threatening to attack him. And if you can't stand to look your enemy in the eye without drawing blood, then for all our sakes, just stay away from him."

Blue eyes stared up at him, wide with disbelief. "How can you take their side? You know what they did to Mom!"

It twisted in Hakoda's heart. He could only imagine how much it hurt his daughter. "A chief has to think of the good of his people," he said softly. "No matter what he wants. If Aang is the best hope for the world, then I have to do the best thing I can think of to help him. Right now, that means holding a truce with men I don't trust. Men I hate. Men I know are our enemies." He smiled at both of them, bittersweet. "I have to do that. And then I have to trust that together, we'll be clever enough to outsmart them."

Sokka gave him a determined grin, and a thumbs-up. Katara blinked, a fragile smile surfacing under watery eyes.

Something's wrong. Glancing at Sokka, Hakoda nodded toward the tent flap. "Would you go ask Bato what he thinks of that ship of theirs? You've seen the other ship the prince had; you may be able to tell him something we haven't noticed before."

"On it, Dad." Sokka vanished outside.

"Katara," Hakoda said gently, as cloth settled. "What's wrong? What happened in Ba Sing Se?"

"I..." Katara's breath hitched. She gulped. "I hate cities, Dad! They look so clean, and everyone dresses so nice, and it's all seal fur over razors. You should have heard what some girls said to us, and Toph is blind..."

It roared out of her like a breached Earth Kingdom dam; four weeks of being lost and alone in the most massive, lonely, proud city on the planet. Four weeks of being useless; what good was a woman of the tribe when food, clothing, and shelter was all handed to you? Four weeks of being helpless, knowing they couldn't fight in or even speak of the war inside the walls, not with Long Feng's threat about Aang never finding Appa hanging over their heads. Four weeks of being handled, knowing people were fighting and dying while the Earth King refused to listen...

Hakoda held her while she sobbed, heart aching. His daughter had been such a responsible little girl since Kya died. Long Feng couldn't have found a more vicious way to hurt her if he'd tried.

I wonder if he knew that, the scheming ice viper.

One way or another, a certain Grand Secretariat of Ba Sing Se deserved to suffer for hurting his little girl. Something to think about and polish ideas for on lonely nights, to use at just the right moment.

Still. There was something else in Katara's litany of hurt that made Hakoda frown. It's all about Aang, he realized. Sokka's her brother, and Toph's her friend, and except for those snobby noble girls, she's barely mentioned them.

Granted, the boy was the Avatar. And Katara had always believed in legends of the Avatar returning to save the world. But those were legends, meant for winter nights and hope. Sometimes, a man just had to stand on his own two feet and fight, even when there was no hope. Because you never knew. A rogue wave might turn a ship at just the right moment. A stone might slide under an enemy's foot, sparing you that final blow.

A banished prince might have the truth and honor Sokka swears he does, and agree to help. Even if he does plan to attack us later.

As Sokka had said, the firebender didn't give up - which meant as soon as Aang was well enough to move, all truces were likely to be over. And yet...

There's something odd about that young man.

An oddness that seemed to linger around Sokka, as well, once he'd started looking. Something that stirred the hairs on the back of his neck, like a ghost-wind off the ice...

Firebender. Of course Zuko upsets everyone, Hakoda told himself. If Aang didn't need them, I'd just as soon let Katara have her way, and give their ship and bodies to the ocean. If this is the prince, and General Iroh... they owe us blood.

Sokka hadn't asked why he and Bato knew so much about Prince Zuko, and Hakoda didn't feel inclined to tell him. Not yet. Not when he was still fitting together what he'd seen of the prince today with the story he'd pieced together from survivors of Ilaq's ship a little over a year ago, picking up burned and exhausted Water Tribe men from Fire Nation life rafts.

Boiled down, Ilaq had happened on a lone, small Fire Navy ship, and decided it was as good a target as any. Especially given it didn't seem to be in any shape to put up a fight. It'd pretty much sat there, smoke pouring out of a boiler, obviously having the kind of trouble wind and sails never suffered. Easy prey.

Except that easy target had had at least seven firebenders on board. Including an old man... and a scarred youngster Sokka's age, with the gold-collared armor of high rank.

Ilaq's ship hadn't survived that encounter. Neither had Ilaq.

Angry as that memory made him, what still struck him most about the aftermath was its strangeness. The Fire Navy ship had claimed they weren't part of the war, insane as that sounded, and that they didn't want to fight.

And then they'd won... and left without prisoners, and without executing those who'd survived.

They didn't even leave my men to die, Hakoda frowned. It doesn't make sense.

Unless they'd been telling the truth; at least, as the Fire Nation saw it. Warships took prisoners. Warships killed everything else in their path. If the prince's ship was not considered a warship, but just his, to carry him on his hunt for the Avatar...

He's Fire Nation. He's the enemy. But Sokka seems convinced he's not cruel.

Katara, though...

"And the worst thing about cities?" Katara gulped. "They fit Zuko like a glove! You should have seen him in the ghost town, he - he was pathetic! Tired and hungry and he didn't know what he was doing, if I hadn't helped him Iroh would have died - I actually felt sorry for him! Toph told us he was exiled, that he couldn't go home, and I thought about how awful that was, even if he was the worst person in the world. But in Ba Sing Se? Iroh had a teashop in the Inner Ring! They were rich! Right in the middle of the Earth Kingdom, just streets away from the palace, and the worst people in the world were living just like anyone else! Like they could forget their own war!" She tore loose from his arms, almost vibrating across the tent. "Zuko was working as a healer. A healer! They wouldn't let me be a healer. They wanted me to sit down and answer questions from this stuck-up old prune before they'd even think about it, and she couldn't even waterbend, what did she know? And they let him? Who'd his uncle bribe for that license? How many people has he hurt? What gave him the right?"

Hakoda pursed his lips in a silent whistle. I haven't seen this in a while. Not since just before Kya had been murdered, when his lovely but headstrong little daughter had had to be forced to give back a particularly favored playmate's doll. "So he had something you wanted."

"He had everything! When he should have been scraping along in a ditch somewhere, so he could see what happens to everyone else in the Fire Nation's war! Maybe then he'd understand. Maybe then he'd actually care about all those innocent people fleeing to Ba Sing Se." Katara flung up her hands. "Only I guess some of them weren't innocent at all. They were listening to Zuko! Can you believe that? They wouldn't listen to me or Aang, oh no, but the Wens actually thought he was trying to help them hide from the Dai Li. And from Azula. And whose fault was it Azula was even there?"

One eyebrow raised, Hakoda regarded his daughter.

"What?" Katara burst out at last.

"As you, Sokka, and Toph have all told me," Hakoda observed, "Azula is after Aang."

"And them!" Katara objected.

"Except that from what you've said, Zuko and Iroh were doing their best to blend into the city," Hakoda said wryly. "Not dodging Fire Navy warships through the Serpent's Pass. Or wrecking massive, wall-gnawing drills. Certainly not using a flying bison to invade the Earth King's own palace."

"We had to tell the king about the eclipse!"

"Of course you did," Hakoda agreed. "But in helping Aang do what he must for the world... Katara, you have to see you all made it plain exactly where the Avatar was."

Katara stared at him, wide-eyed. "You think it's our fault?"

"Anything you do in war can reveal you to the enemy," Hakoda said honestly. "We lay mines to stop the Fire Navy. It works," Well, until this ship, "but that means they know we're around here somewhere. That isn't anyone's fault. It just is."

"I... guess I didn't think about that." Katara glanced down. "Zuko... he just always found us, no matter what we did."

"You were riding a ten-ton sky bison," Hakoda said dryly. "I saw him at night, weeks ago, and I didn't even know what he was. People have to notice."

"That's what-" Katara bit the words off, grimacing.

That's what Zuko said? Hakoda wondered, recalling the prince's sharp-edged words. Now, that was worrisome. Not that the bison was visible; that the prince had noticed, used it, told his children, and they still hadn't caught on.

He'd faced several Fire Navy commanders these past two years. Some dangerously bright, some... not so bright. He had no idea how smart Zuko's father was, and no one seemed to breathe a word about whatever unlucky woman had granted the Fire Lord offspring, but given Fire Lord Ozai's brother still sent cold chills down Earth Kingdom spines... the young man could be very dangerous indeed.

Either that, or he's survived everything Sokka could throw at him through pure, dumb luck.

Hakoda wasn't about to count on luck. Not with his children in camp. "Better now?"

Katara bit her lip, and nodded. "But Aang has to show the world he's out there. People need to know the Avatar's back!"

"And they will," Hakoda agreed. "But not now. Not while he's hurt."

"You're right." Her chin came up, determined. "I should go look after him."

Hakoda followed her, just long enough to make sure she was heading for the healer's tent. Sighed, and headed for shore, where Bato was watching the Fire Navy steamer kick loose into the water.

"Where are they going?"

"To get the captain, they said," Bato said soberly. "No one's seen a hawk yet."

Hakoda nodded. You could intercept hawks, sometimes, though it didn't do much good. Fire Nation orders came in a script unlike any writing he'd seen anywhere else, and when they were feeling really paranoid, even that was in heat-sensitive ink. But there was a certain amount you could figure out just from knowing where the hawks were. And weren't. "He's stalling."

"Until reinforcements get here?" Bato frowned.

"The other way around, I think," Hakoda said thoughtfully. "If Princess Azula does want her brother dead..."

Bato whistled softly. "So is this Jee brave, or crazy?"

"I'm assuming both, for now," Hakoda admitted. "I want someone watching the prince, especially when he's near Aang." He tried not to wince. "And... someone's going to have to watch Katara as well."

"Oh?" Bato gave him a narrow look.

"Apparently, the prince managed to luck into some good fortune, and she's taken it as a personal slap in the face from the spirits." Hakoda couldn't hide the wince this time. Bato was his best friend, but - it was hard to say this about his own family. "She's acting like she's eight again. A spoiled eight."

"The boy's a wanted fugitive, his sister wants him dead, and he got hit by lightning," Bato said incredulously. "If that's what she calls good luck, I'm not having her bless my spears. No matter how good waterbenders are in with the Moon."

Hakoda sighed. "He really was a healer in Ba Sing Se."

Bato was silent a long moment. "Well, that's torn it. She wants his head on an ice spike."

"What? Why?" Hakoda asked, startled.

Bato chuckled ruefully. "That's right, you can't be anywhere near a birth, or..." He mimed falling over.

"No man's brave about everything," Hakoda said ruefully.

"True enough," his friend nodded. "But it means you didn't hear some of the talk, around those difficult times before we left."

Difficult births. Yes, they'd had a few. "Kanna handled them."

"She did, but you didn't hear what she said during them," Bato said soberly. "Being fair, I'm not sure Kanna heard what she was saying; you say anything to get a mother through, when she thinks she can't take anymore. But Katara? She's that age. She heard everything."

"Everything?" Hakoda asked pointedly.

"Your mother blamed it all on the firebenders," Bato said bluntly. "No waterbenders to give the Moon's blessing before the birth. Or ease it while it was happening, when things went wrong." He gave Hakoda a pointed look. "She never said a real waterbender could heal, but she came that close."

Damn. Damn it all. He'd begged Kanna not to tell the stories of healing waterbenders. No point in reminding the tribe of what they might never have. No point in rousing anger, when men and women were injured and sickened and his little untrained daughter could do nothing. No point in loading Katara's shoulders with guilt for something even Kanna admitted would take her years to learn, if she could ever find a healing master.

It didn't matter how unlucky the prince was. Zuko had what she wanted. She'd never rest until she had it. Which had never been a problem so long as it drove his daughter to excel, but given what she now wanted belonged to a Fire Nation prince... Hakoda felt a headache coming on.

"I'll make sure there's a friendly eye on her," Bato assured him. Smiled wryly. "We're lucky, you know. All we have to deal with is a teenage girl who misses her mother. If Kanna had been right about master waterbenders and the will of the Moon, we'd have a real problem on our hands."

No kidding. Though how Kanna could be so certain waterbenders were beloved by all when firebenders had proved so well they didn't care-

"...Fire's the opposite of water," Hakoda murmured.

"Yes?" Bato gave him a curious look.

"They haven't told us everything," Hakoda stated, putting together facts and legends into an unsettling new shape. "But apparently Ba Sing Se upset her because it was the first place no one listened to her. Tui and La - Sokka said she got an entire earthbenders' prison barge to revolt!"

"She is a chief's daughter." But Bato's voice was uneasy.

"And would you expect Sokka to talk a prison barge into revolting?" Hakoda said pointedly.

Bato's silence was answer enough.

"Water is family and community," Hakoda thought out loud. "If waterbenders can sway most people's hearts..."

"But not firebenders?" Bato's brows drew down. "You don't think we're dealing with anything as simple as two teenagers who happen to be mortal enemies."

"I think we're dealing with two master benders," Hakoda said soberly. "And according to Sokka... things happen when benders get mad."

Keep an eye on him, you said. He'll surprise you, you said, Teruko thought grumpily, arranging herself between the prince and the shelter opening as her two charges sat down to breakfast. As if that had done any good last time. Damn it, Captain, you didn't say he was a damn ghost.

Jee hadn't mentioned the dao still lying by the fire, either. Or the calluses on the prince's hands that spoke of long, determined practice with steel most firebenders wouldn't deign to touch. You couldn't hide sword-practice on a cruiser. On the tiny Wani... there was no way Jee would have missed it.

Doesn't eat like a prince, either, Teruko thought, eyeing him. Not that Prince Zuko ate like a local; he kept his chopsticks to the side, never diving into a mouth where a sudden blow could stab them lethally deeper. Gripped the side of the bowl, not the bottom, where he could let it fall rather than have someone splash hot soup into his eyes. Correct. Proper. But those chopsticks flashed with the speed of a hungry recruit, and the single-minded determination of a sailor bent on downing one more hot meal before he dove back into the storm.

"Tea, Lieutenant?" Iroh offered. With an utter lack of concern at the absence of small talk that reminded Teruko of some of her own instructors. The good ones; men and women who knew exactly how hard they'd pushed their trainees, and just how much more they could take.

He knows the prince hasn't hit his limits, not yet, Teruko judged. But he also knows we've got a long way to go. "Yes, sir. Thank you." And never mind she was already sweating under her armor, she could use the calm...

Prince Zuko blinked at her, rinsed his bowl with a splash of hot water, gulped it down, and set it aside. "You've got to be roasting." Standing, he drew the fingers of his left hand through air, flowing into a sweep of his right up toward the opening.

Heat swept away like throwing off a set of blankets. Teruko stared as air shimmered over her head, flowing out the door like the draft off a volcano.

"Is that all right?"

Teruko dragged her gaze back to the prince. The very quiet, earnest prince, who'd just pulled off a firebending move she'd never seen in her life. "Yes, sir," she managed. "Fine."

"I have not seen that form used in some time." Iroh stroked his beard thoughtfully. "You have been in the scrolls when I was not looking?"

"...I guess," Prince Zuko muttered, glancing aside. "Should have used that on Azula's firestorm. I guess I just didn't remember it." He eyed Teruko again. "You're not moving, are you?"

"With all due respect, sir? Not a chance," Teruko said dryly. "The last time you were out of the captain's sight, the ship blew, and the captain thought you went with it. That's not going to happen on my watch. Sir."

"Good luck," the prince sighed. Inclined his head to her in respect, before turning back to his uncle. And switched to flawless High Court. "Uncle. About what happened at the palace... I know I disappointed you-"

Iroh held up an imperious hand. "When I saw you fall, I looked forward to this moment," he said dryly. "It gave me hope, to consider in the most delicate detail how I would tell you of your foolishness, your rashness, and your recklessness. Will you now convince me I was mistaken?"

Ooo. Teruko tried not to wince, remembering her own training sergeant's scathing lectures. So that was the legendary Dragon of the West. Kid, you are so in for it.

"No, Uncle," the prince said quietly. "The situation was... I have no excuse. If Azula had killed me, or I'd killed her - our people wouldn't like it, but it's happened before. They'd understand. But if Azula killed the Avatar, the world and the spirits would rise against us - and the next Avatar would most likely be born in the Northern Water Tribe. We've already seen what the Ocean was willing to do there with an Avatar involved. And if the Avatar killed Azula, the Fire Lord's current legitimate heir, destroying the line Avatar Kyoshi herself ordered our nation to give loyalty to..." He swallowed.

Teruko gulped herself, and hoped the pair of princes thought it was just the tea. They knew she was listening. Every Fire Nation officer had to master High Court for secure communications, noble-born or not. They wouldn't be even talking if they didn't mind her overhearing.

Right now, she was almost wishing they did. The Avatar, destroy the linchpin of loyalty for the entire Fire Nation? That was... that'd be...

"The war wouldn't stop, Uncle," Prince Zuko said, echoing her terrified thoughts. "We'd have nothing left to lose. I couldn't... I couldn't think of a better plan. I tried."

"Nor could I," Iroh said softly.

The prince's eyes widened. "Uncle?"

"You had no resources," Iroh said quietly. "No one else to call on, with the power to face Azula, or the Avatar. No one, who could hope to get there in time. You sent word to me, which was wise - but if you had not cleared Ty Lee from the field, I myself might have been in difficulty. I have not practiced to dodge chi blocks." He sighed. "Your duty to our people is to live, yes. But for the survival of our nation, at that moment, you made the best possible choice." He smiled. "I am proud of you, nephew. Well done."

The prince brightened, and Teruko glanced hastily away. She'd seen that look before, and it didn't belong on a prince. Captain, we need to talk.

The guards murmured a warning, and Teruko stood, prepared to give her charges time to compose themselves. But they were already on their feet; Iroh's expression as polite as Prince Zuko's was wary.

"Good morning." Captain Jee paused in the opening, casting her a quick glance. Trouble? That arched eyebrow seemed to say.

She tried not to roll her eyes. Oh, just a little.

"Prince Zuko," the captain nodded, stepping inside. "I'm glad to see you're alive."

"We tried to find out if you were," the prince said plainly. "But then we had to make a... strategic retreat." A wry smile touched his face. "You got promoted. Congratulations."

"And you managed to get assassinated," Jee said, just as wry. "Or so the admiral said. I suppose he failed to consider that if you were stealthy enough to make it into Pohuai Stronghold, you were probably sneaky enough to make it off the ship before someone could blow it up."

He thinks the admiral-? Teruko thought, aghast. Wait a second, what'd he say about Pohuai Stronghold...

"You knew about that?" The prince looked like he wanted the earth to open up and swallow him.

"Your uncle and I had a discussion about the good ropes going missing from the ship's supply," Jee said dryly. "How on earth did you manage to get past firebending guards without giving anything away?"

"...A bucket."

Iroh stifled a snicker.

They're seriously talking about- "You broke into Pohuai Stronghold?" Teruko choked out. "With a bucket?"

"There was a good reason?" Prince Zuko tried to look innocent. And failed. Miserably. "I didn't bring the bucket in with me..."

"Don't let him fool you," Jee advised her. "Since I've known him, the prince has managed to survive clashing with the Avatar-"

"He's a monk," the prince grumbled. "He'd probably only kill me by accident."

"Rescued the general from the Earth Kingdom Army-"

"There were only five of them, for Agni's sake!"

"Ran a Fire Navy blockade..."

"I was an idiot."

"A desperate one," Iroh agreed cheerfully.

Agni, Teruko almost groaned. Not a pampered noble youngster. A too-young recruit, with enough rank to get him into trouble and barely enough luck to scrape by out of it. Captain? When I get out of this duty, I'm going to hurt you.

"And I can't imagine what he's been up to since the pirates missed blowing him up," Jee finished.

"...They didn't miss."

The captain straightened, sober. "What happened?"

The young man shrugged, and the hairs on the back of Teruko's neck went up. No one that young should be that matter-of-fact about almost getting killed. "Heard a noise, went up to the bridge, saw their lizard-bird - saw the blast coming, and wrapped the fire around me. Ended up in the harbor." He swallowed. "Uncle Iroh found me at the tide-line."

"You would have made it," Iroh said firmly. Looked soberly at the captain. "As Admiral Zhao wished so much for my nephew to perish, we allowed him his illusions of success. I went as an adviser, and my nephew snuck onto the Admiral's ship as a common firebender. Once we reached the North Pole, the prince left the ship by night, followed turtle-seals through the ice into the city-"

He what? Teruko thought, stunned. A firebender in cold water was in trouble. Swimming in polar ice? The prince should be dead.

"-Found the Avatar, defeated Katara to take him, and made quite some distance before the Avatar's allies caught them... and Zhao attacked the Moon Spirit's vulnerable form." He bowed his head. "Princess Yue of the Northern Water Tribe should be recorded in the annals of heroes. She gave her life, for the Moon's sake."

And that was a thought that made Teruko uncomfortable even thinking it. A Water Tribe woman was the only reason the moon was still in place, balancing the sun and ocean? It made her feel... small.

"If you'd said it was anyone else, I wouldn't believe you," the captain admitted. "But Zhao... spirits, what was he thinking?"

"That history would record him as the conqueror of the North Pole, and the Moon's slayer," Iroh said grimly. "It is not wise to trifle with spirits. Glory is poor comfort for widows and widowers who have only watery graves for their memorials."

Jee's eyes narrowed. "You didn't let him get away."

"He did not get far," the retired general admitted. "My nephew caught him."

"We fought," Prince Zuko said quietly. "Then... the Ocean Spirit took him." Gold eyes looked haunted. "I couldn't help him."

"The distraction of the retreat covered our escape, and we spent three weeks drifting to shore," Iroh picked up the thread. "Unfortunately, Princess Azula then found us."

"She said Father wanted me home," the prince whispered. "I fell for it." He shook his head, pained. "I can't believe I fell for it, Azula always lies..."

"Unless the truth is worse," Iroh sighed. "That is when we learned my brother wished us both brought back as prisoners. Myself for acting against Zhao... and Zuko, for failing to catch and hold the Avatar." His eyes narrowed. "Which, I merely wish to mention, even Admiral Zhao, with a fleet at his command, could not do."

The captain looked gray. "But - for the prince to return, without his banishment lifted-"

Iroh inclined his head, as the prince looked away.

Death, Teruko knew, trying not to shiver. Or yield to the burning anger that always simmered under the surface. He's just a kid.

Old enough for an Agni Kai, sure. Old enough to be recruited, if just barely. But... to ask the prince to die, just because he couldn't stop the bridge to the spirit world? Not fair. Not fair at all.

Not just not fair, some of the political sense her instructors had tried to pound in pointed out. Downright stupid. Maybe he's an exile, maybe he's not as good as Princess Azula-

And given what she'd seen Prince Zuko pull off, how scary was his sister?

-But he's Sozin's line. Anybody who's served with him might... still be loyal....

The captain. Censored letters. The Dragon of the West, obviously attached enough to the prince to stay with him through three years of exile. She didn't have all the pieces yet, but the picture wasn't looking good.

"We were dealing with the royal escort," Iroh went on, "and Prince Zuko was... er...."

"Getting kicked all over the deck by Azula," the prince admitted grimly. "At least it got her talking."

"You could think of it as a compliment," Iroh said dryly. "She thought enough of your tenacity to choose to strike you down, rather than try to bring you back in chains alive."

"She probably just wanted to show off," the prince said darkly. "Oh, look! I can shoot lightning out of my fingertips, just like Dad." Fingers curled into fists; he breathed, obviously wrestling down his temper. "Uncle blocked her, and we ran." He met the captain's gaze squarely. "We cut our topknots, and we ran."

Teruko didn't bother to hide her shiver. To disagree with your clan, and cast yourselves upon the waves.... It was the last resort, for a great name.

No. Not the last. The last is taking your loyalty back. Even if it kills you.

Only it hadn't killed the prince. Spirits, what a mess.

"And now we come to a bit of deception on my part," Iroh admitted. "I was unable to shape it myself, but I have known the healing fire exists for almost seventeen years." He regarded his nephew. "You were lucky to be born. Never doubt that."

The prince swallowed dryly, and Teruko hid a sudden frown. Temper, difficult birth, those eyes....

Royal, remember? He's probably never even heard of Byakko.

Which was just the way her relatives liked it. Byakko might be odd and old-fashioned in a thousand different ways, but it didn't make trouble. Byakko was a nice, quiet, friendly place, of pleasant breezes over teosinte-buckwheat fields, hot forges for water-marked steel, and stone guardian walls to keep Mount Shirotora's ice-slides out of the orchards below. Byakko did their duty, sending people and supplies to the war and deeply glad for every child who lived to come back. Byakko kept to itself, thank you, and prayed that someday the war would be over.

And if some people who just happened to look like those on Azulon's list ended up scattered in little villages away from the harbor... well, that was nobody's business but Lady Kotone's. If there were a few spiritual people up the mountain taking care of shrines, that was tradition, older than Lord Kuzon and Lady Ran, and who'd argue with tradition? And if even stranger people turned up from time to time, and settled down - that was Shidan's business. And nobody in their right mind would cross him.

"Through perseverance and some luck, Prince Zuko discovered how one could guide the fire from merely helping to true healing," Iroh went on. "We had some interesting adventures, which I will tell you of at a later time... I fear we have continued the family habit of burning things down to gain a strategic advantage when pressed...."

"Azula was in that building after the Avatar," Prince Zuko said bluntly. "Fighting her on a deck was bad. Inside walls? I'm not suicidal." He looked at the captain. "I know. A loyal citizen, even an exile, should have helped her capture the Avatar. I know. But she told me the Fire Lord didn't want the Avatar captured anymore. That she was going to kill him." He shook his head. "We couldn't let that happen. We fought, we had her cornered... she shot Uncle with a fireblast. It was - bad."

"Katara helped Prince Zuko heal me, and my nephew repaid the debt by warning the Avatar's allies of Princess Azula," Iroh said plainly. "A warning they seem not to have heeded.... We had quite a few more adventures, and then we managed to slip inside Ba Sing Se as refugees, where unexpected aid helped us hide."

"Hide?" Captain Jee drew back in disbelief. "You're firebenders. How could you hide-" He started to gesture toward his own eyes, and froze.

Stunned, Teruko studied the general. She hadn't looked, she'd just assumed...

Green. No firebender should have green eyes!

"A waterbending technique," Iroh answered their shock. "There is a person of great courage in Ba Sing Se, whom I very much hope you will meet. Great courage... and great forgiveness, to aid those fleeing from war. Many of whom were ordered to flee, rather than allow themselves to be sacrificed for no reason but Azulon's suspicion." He let out a slow breath. "Unfortunately for all of us, the technique touches the spirit as well as the body. And the Moon... knows us. It seems she chose to..." Iroh sighed. "Captain. Whatever your personal feelings on what we must tell you, I beg you to think of your people. If you wish to aid us no further, at least let us deceive Hakoda's fleet into believing you still do, long enough for us to cover your retreat."

"Why do I get the feeling this is worse than running Zhao's blockade?" Captain Jee muttered.

"Because it is," Prince Zuko said quietly. Drew a hand through air again, something shimmering around his fingertips...

Teruko saw water flow down his fingers into a globe in his palm, and backed up until she hit bent sandstone. "Agni!"

"Agni's sister." Fearless, Iroh put a hand on the prince's shoulder. "The spirits are moving, Captain Jee. My brother has no heir but Azula now. Even if we win this war... we have lost."

Princess Azula's the heir. Teruko's heart beat like a trapped bird. She'd believed the princess was of the blood of heroes, but given the prince's proof... Oh Agni. No.

White-faced, the captain nodded. "My prince... I'm sorry. I know you tried."

"Tried wasn't good enough," Zuko said bleakly. Water froze hard in his grasp... then melted away as he sighed, wisping into steam. "But there is something we can salvage out of this, Captain. If the spirits are bent on wrecking the succession, if the spirits want us to tear ourselves apart in a civil war and let the other nations pick the bones - damn it, Avatar Kyoshi's decree can freeze and die!"

The captain looked as though someone had dropped ice down his spine. "Destroy the authority of the Dragon Throne? That's-"

"The only way some of our people will survive." Iroh's voice was iron. "If the great names defend their own domains, if some of them defy Azula, so the Avatar has no excuse to stand aside and let his allies destroy them - some of our people will live."

"I know it's treason," Zuko said hoarsely. "I know. And I know I'm already a traitor. So I will do this, for our people. I will establish a settlement - a domain - outside the Fire Lord's authority. I will challenge that authority, as a great name. I will make this work." He was trembling; fear and anger and hope clear as the sparks flickering off his fingers. "If one great name can do it, the others will know it's possible. The Avatar - the Avatar and his allies are planning to kill the Fire Lord. If they do, if Azula is the Fire Sages' only choice as heir... All the great names have to do is refuse to confirm their loyalty." Anger melted into grief, and awful mourning. "It's going to be horrible. So many of our people are going to die..."

"But not all of them," Iroh said firmly. "With Agni's blessing - not all of them." He swept that odd green gaze over them both. "We will do this, with your aid or without. We will rescue innocent civilians - Fire Nation civilians - from Azula's grasp on Ba Sing Se. We will bring them to the place my nephew and I have chosen, and those of the Earth Kingdom who wish to come, and we will at one stroke both damage the Ministry of War and secure the best chance for restoring airbenders to the world. We will make it clear to my brother that he has a choice. Retreat to the Fire Nation, and live - or continue the war, and die."

Captain Jee shook himself, like a man stepping out of snow. "You know he won't retreat, General."

"That," Iroh's voice was cold steel, "is no longer my problem."

Teruko swallowed hard. This was the man Fire Lord Azulon had passed over as heir. Spirits, why?

Iroh weighed them in his gaze, and inclined his head. "Do not decide now. Think on it. Tell us when you are ready."

"There are many things to decide," Jee acknowledged quietly. "But one is not a decision at all." He bowed to Zuko, hands in the Flame. "My prince. You are still my commander. Nothing will change that."

"But - you - I didn't-" The prince gulped, mustering scattered wits. "Why?"

"Because you were right." Jee straightened, face sober; barely a hint of rueful amusement in his eyes. "You were reckless, rude, and about as warm to the men as a frost-nipped komodo-rhino, but you were right. It was worth our lives to pursue the Avatar. All of our lives. Including yours." A smile bent his mustache. "You never sent us into danger, Prince Zuko. You led us there. I've been in this navy over thirty years, and I can tell you... if you find a commander like that, it doesn't matter if you like him."

The prince's lone brow had climbed almost to his hair. "That's why you were on my ship," he muttered.

"Excessive honesty," Iroh chuckled. "I have always believed an officer is far better served by that, than the other extreme."

"If it's honesty you want, General... he's too young for this." Jee turned a sober look on the prince. "You are, you know that. Our people are used to following mature leaders. You're young, you've got a temper that can melt steel, and this is going to be a bloody, awful, inglorious mess. Spirits, it's going to be worse than Nara..." He looked away. "I'm sorry, General. Of course, you were at Nara."

"We have seen your wife Ayame's name inscribed on the list of Home Guards lost," the general said compassionately. "She was brave... and even so, I well know you and your children wish she had been a bit less brave, and still here."

"You have to go out," the captain said quietly. "You don't have to come back." He blinked, surfacing from memory. "We?"

"Father put me in Uncle Iroh's care the day he returned from the Earth Kingdom," Prince Zuko said simply. "I've traveled with him for years. I was there. I remember. And I know this is going to be worse." He swallowed dryly. "We're out of time, Captain. Someone has to do this. And - we're it."

Captain Jee nodded slowly. "How many people do you need to get out of the city?"

"Over three thousand, of the Fire Nation," Iroh answered. "We are still unsure how many Earth Kingdom citizens will wish to come."

"Over-" The captain groaned. "Of course. Why would you ever think small... I don't have to remind you Princess Azula is still in that city?"

"Of course," the prince smirked. "It'd be crazy to go back there."

Jee started to speak. Stopped. Gave the prince a narrow-eyed look that somehow made Teruko want to giggle. "So it would." He glanced at the general.

Smiling, Iroh ticked off names on his fingers. "Pohuai Stronghold. The North Pole. Dai Li headquarters." Another smile. "It can be done."

"We're going to need some planning sessions," the captain muttered. Bowed again. "I need to lay some groundwork with my men. Lieutenant, if you'll come with me for a few minutes?"

"Yes, sir." Teruko tried not to step on his heels. She was still caught between giggling and wanting to pound her head against something hard, heavy, and immovable. Preferably, until she passed out. The prince is a waterbender. The spirits... our prince is a waterbender. And a firebender.

La? Agni? I know family's supposed to share. But this is kind of out of hand.

"You handled that very... diplomatically, Lieutenant."

Teruko eyed the Water Tribe warriors trying not to look like they were listening to every unintelligible word. Smirked at them, and followed the captain on a walk around the shelter's guarded perimeter. "Sir, just because I have a temper, doesn't mean I'm going to take it out on a hurt youngster."

"Oh?" Her captain's tone was curious. "Even given the... obvious interference? Some might well consider it... tainting. Even without the option the general has discussed."

"I suppose a lot of people would, sir. But... well, back in Byakko? We've had people come in from the colonies before. I've seen a lot of mixed-up kids. Not that mixed up, but damn if he doesn't remind me of-" Careful, Teruko, keep your mouth shut. "-people I know."

"That's right," Jee mused. "Sometimes I forget you're from Lady Ursa's home domain-"

Teruko grabbed his shoulder, armor and all. "Lady Ursa?" she demanded. "Our Lady Ursa? He's Shidan's grandkid?"

Jee eyed her hand until she let it drop. "You didn't know?"

Teruko shook her head, heart racing. "Lord Kuzon and Lady Ran... I was, spirits, nine? All I knew was, our domain was - was making a great sacrifice for the Fire Nation. And the Lady Ursa was leaving. Wasn't even a year later we were mourning Lord Kuzon's death. I thought I heard something about Lady Ursa having a heir, but nobody believed it. Who'd keep a grandkid away from Shidan? That'd be like telling Lieutenant Sadao to go play near the blasting jelly..." She paled, implications crashing down like lava. "Princess Azula's a... oh, monkey-feathers."

"Princess Azula is-?" Jee prompted, brow arched.

Teruko tried not to sweat. "Sir. Um, we don't talk about this, outside Byakko-"

"Lieutenant. Tactical information. Now."

"Well... people say... Shidan appeared. In a sun-shower." She let a heartbeat pass. "But they teach you in school that's just a legend. Sir."

Jee stared at her a long moment. "I'm... going back to the ship." He rubbed at what must be a throbbing headache. "Just... try to keep them alive."

Ride herd on a dragon-child. Oh, sure. And for her next trick, she'd swim a moat of ice. "I'll do my best." Teruko shook her head. "But with all due respect, sir? Somebody's father really screwed up."

And now we've got to pick up the pieces, Teruko thought, exchanging bows with her captain before she headed back to her charges. Damn it, Agni, why'd you let La stick her hand in like that? That kid may be young, and in over his head, but he was the best chance for a Fire Lord we had...

Unless that wasn't what Agni wanted.

Bring down the Dragon Throne. Break us back into domains again, the great names fighting and allying as they see fit.

If it worked, a lot of people would die.

But Byakko would survive. Taking up her post outside the shelter, Teruko nodded to herself. A lot of us would make it.

Cold comfort to the widows and widowers of the Siege of the North. But it would be life. And life was precious. Always.

Agni gives us life, and breath, and the fire to never give up. He never says it's going to be easy. Teruko let out a quiet breath. I'm with you, Captain. I don't know how we're going to do this... but lead on.

And if this worked, if Sozin's decrees were cast down... then maybe, just maybe, her children would see dragons fly.

Chapter End Notes

Given Zuko's usual paranoia, I imagine the first thing he thought on seeing just one teenager to guard a village hosting the Avatar was, "trap". Obviously, Sokka was a decoy to get him into position for someone (or several someones) much, much more dangerous. And given Zuko's experience with Li and Lo - yes, Gran-Gran does look like a viable threat.

And in a sense, she may have been much more damaging than anyone realized. According to "The Puppetmaster", Hama's best friend was Kanna. And Hama's idea of proper behavior (admittedly, after breaking out of years of abuse in a Fire Nation prison) is to use her waterbending to torture, and - it's implied, at least - murder innocent Fire Nation civilians. So, if she thinks that's okay... what are the odds Kanna shares some of that attitude? Especially toward the people who took away every waterbender in her adoptive tribe, and murdered her daughter-in-law? Put that together with what Gran-Gran says in the second episode, which ties Katara bringing her hope to her being a waterbender and destined to help the Avatar, not because of Katara herself... Houston, we have a problem.

About Azula and Zuko... recall, Meixiang said that some of the Fire Nation's greatest heroes and blackest villains came from dragon-blood. They're extraordinary people.

One way or another.

And if you suppose that, the custom of the Agni Kai makes a lot more sense. Let me reference a bit of Texas history here... at one point, it was somewhat settled but beyond the reach of ordinary U.S. law, making it a popular destination for bandits, murderers, and villains of all kinds. In recognition of this, there used to be a law to the effect of "he needed killin'". As in, if you killed a man, and a jury of your peers agreed he needed to die, you were off.

Unfortunately, a system like that only works if you have other equals to judge you; in this case, other firebenders, or other great names. As soon as Kyoshi centralized authority under one Fire Lord, that "weeding out" of more sadistic types ground to a halt. The effects might not have been noticeable right away, but given a century or two... and then, they got Sozin. Hello, Law of Unintended Consequences.

Yes, Kyoshi had a reason for what she did. The Gaang will find it out later.

For those wondering... thwapping the Knowledge Spirit with a book definitely counts as fighting spirits!

"You have to go out; you don't have to come back." - Unofficial Coast Guard motto. A large part of the job is rescue; you go out knowing you'll risk your life to do it, and there are no promises you'll make it home.

Chapter 27

Chapter Notes

Okay, writer slip-up; I never meant to imply that Kuzon's wife was a dragon. I ran across "Ran" as a Japanese name that implied tumult, upheaval, and rebellion, and thought that'd be perfect for the background of Byakko. "Ran and Shao" slipped my mind completely. To be perfectly clear, Lady Ran was not a dragon, but a human firebender. Thanks to all the reviewers who pointed that out!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

It was dark and scary and lonely... but at least it didn't hurt here. And the last thing he remembered was hurting. A lot.

Wake up, Aang.

Not words. A feeling, like Shidan had sometimes filtered into this head with the touch of a feeler; like Fang had, even as a spirit. Feelings, and images: Himself, pale and still on Water Tribe furs. Toph with a hand on his pulse. Sokka murmuring serious words he couldn't hear.

Wake up. Hands wanting to prop him up. Cups of cool water, and a steaming waft of seaweed-touched broth, flavored with would-be, will-be-

But thirst and hunger were part of the pain back there - and he didn't need them, he needed blue eyes and kind hands and a smile just for him...

Spirit-damned stubborn airbender strangle dig dig find-

Something was clawing through the darkness. Coming for him. He needed help. Needed-

"It's all right, Aang," Roku's voice echoed through the darkness. "I'll handle this."

Standing on her mountaintop in the spirit world, Avatar Yangchen watched the earthly scene play out, and shook her head. The rest of the children had scattered out of the tent as Roku swirled out of the mist that had been Aang, but one angry young firebender stood his ground. This isn't going to go well.

"You!" Prince Zuko snapped in High Court, jabbing a finger Roku's direction. "Get back where you came from! No one's going to hurt Aang. There's no temple to bring down on our heads. Aang needs healing, which means I need his body here, which means you need to be gone. Go!"

Yangchen almost collapsed in giggles.

"Now, that's the spirit." Another young firebender sat down beside her, watching through the same shimmering mist. "Have to admit, I was worried when Yue grabbed him. He's a tough kid, but..."

"He'll do fine as a yāorén," Yangchen said firmly. "You did, Kaze."

"Yeah, but that was lifetimes ago." Lu Ten grinned wryly at her. "Should I feel sorry for Roku?"

"Yes, you should," she nodded. "Poor man. No yāorén to help him... and even with Fang, he never truly knew dragons..." Words caught her attention, and she winced. "Oh dear. Did Roku just-?"

"Yeah, I think he did. Cover your ears."

Even under her palms, Zuko's roar was clear. "I am not my great-grandfather!"

"Ooo." Lu Ten stroked score points in midair. "Zinged. Three times."

"Shh," Yangchen murmured. "I suspect we need to hear this."

"You are the heir to Sozin's legacy," Roku said sternly. "War. Hatred. Murder. The world hates and fears the Fire Nation, and its destruction will be on your head. You think my successor young and foolish? Ready to allow others' hates to flourish, and rage unchecked? Who spawned that hate, boy? Who shattered all the world Aang knew? Sozin led you all to murder; it was your choice to follow, or refuse-

"And die!" Zuko snarled back. "Agni! Are you a firebender or not? Though I guess not, Uncle said Avatars aren't bound by loyalty... People did refuse, you bastard! People died refusing! Uncle Kuroyama died! And Father, and Mother... I couldn't save them! I barely saved Ran!" Angry tears glittered in pale gold. "Avatar Kyoshi forced the great names to bind themselves to the Fire Lord. Disloyalty is death!"

"Kuzon?" Lu Ten murmured. Gave Yangchen a look askance. "You cheated!"

"Perhaps a little," the nun smiled. "Azula granted us a storm. It seemed a pity to let the chance pass unused." Gray eyes were sober, reflecting on the needs of the spirits, and frail, too frail mortal flesh. "Aang may fail. Aang may succeed, and yet still perish before he can find and train any born of air. Zuko? With all the odds against him, he survives."

"He's fire and water," Lu Ten reminded her. "Not fire and air."

As Kaze had been, once. Yangchen nodded. "Bender or not, he yet knows air." She moved her fingers in a silent prayer. "It may be enough."

"Fear of execution," Roku was saying.

"You really don't get it." Zuko's shoulders slumped. "I betrayed the Fire Lord. It almost killed me. No death sentence. No execution. Fire is loyalty - and when you break it, your fire goes out." He swallowed, and looked Roku in the eye. "What the Fire Nation did, what Sozin led us to do, is horrible. Some of us should suffer. I've seen what some of our armies have done. But if you and your four nations have to stay separate says a kid like Jinhai has to die to make up for what his ancestors did - damn you! I'm not Sozin! I'm going to fix this!"

"Really?" Roku drew himself up, arrogant as any firebender born. "How?"

The gesture Zuko made left Yangchen gaping, and Lu Ten clapped his hands over his eyes in disbelief. "Oh, Agni," Lu Ten groaned. "He's gonna die."

"Not today," Yangchen said firmly, reaching out to where Roku was already summoning a fireball. We need him, my friend.

We do not need an arrogant, crude, insolent child of Sozin's! crackled back to her.

And of yours, Yangchen pointed out. Which is fitting; the guilt rests on you both, does it not? Both your actions led to this war. She reached out to the firebender. Perhaps a less involved view would serve Aang better.

Perhaps...

The mortal world pulled, and she breathed with borrowed lungs.

Zuko blinked at her. Set his jaw, and braced for impact.

Yangchen regarded him mildly. "You don't truly think you would survive if I meant you ill, do you, young one?"

Pale gold didn't flinch. "I'd try."

"You do remind me of Kaze," Yangchen mused, sitting down on Aang's bed. "This far, and no further." She held out her hand. "Come. I have much to tell you, and no time."

"Me?" Wary, Zuko sat, politely away from her skirts. "Shouldn't you tell someone Aang trusts?"

Yangchen laughed softly. "I doubt you want them to know what you are, young yāorén."

The prince froze.

"Peace, young friend," Yangchen said calmly. "Yes, you are meant to give Aang aid, and advice. But however deeply you have been touched by the spirits, you are still human. No one can demand your aid." She smiled faintly. "Kaze was born of fire, and gifted with air, and my dearest friend. He was with me to the end. They all were." She looked down, saddened. "Perhaps it would have been better for the world if they were not such brave friends. If Kuruk had had others to aid him... if Kyoshi had had those of earth and fire to bridge the gap and know your people... so much would have been different."

"I'm sorry," Zuko whispered. "I am so sorry, Lady Yangchen."

"The guilt is Sozin and Roku's, not yours," Yangchen said steadily. "But Roku was not wholly wrong. You are prince of the Fire Nation, and of Sozin's line, and the fate that will now befall the world is your responsibility." Gray eyes were level as a blade. "Knowing that, and I believe you do know that, young prince... what will you do?"

"I can't bring back the Air Nomads. They're gone." His tone was even, practical. Barely flecked with grief, like fire-glints on steel. "But there are still people in the world who love the wind. There are still scrolls, left by Avatar Kyoshi with the Dai Li." Knuckles whitened against his robe. "Even if it works - they won't be your people. I know that. I'm not a spirit. I'm not even really a prince anymore. But I am a great name of the Fire Nation, and if hard work and courage can put right any of what Sozin destroyed... I'm going to build a place of freedom. And hope."

"Firebenders, teaching airbending?" Yangchen arched a delicate brow.

"If you have any better ideas, I'm listening," Zuko shot back. "If Aang makes it - and that's an if, I know my father - he's one kid. A child, who made master before he was twelve. Who knows airbending like he breathes! How is he going to teach anyone the basics? How is he going to deal with teaching people who can't pick up bending in a week? With having to look for people who can bend in the first place? All the Air Nomads were benders. We don't have that! We're going to be looking, and listening, and praying... spirits, I don't even know who looks after you!"

No, you wouldn't, would you? Even though Gyatso considered you a true friend, he would have waited until you were a master yourself. "We are children of the mountains, and the Eternal Blue Sky," Yangchen stated. "Should you succeed, they will find the names." She regarded the young man before her, already feeling her hold on this world weaken. "For all her flaws, Kyoshi almost found the answer. If only she had crafted for herself what she gave the Earth King-

The world shimmered.

"Call your fires," Yangchen ordered, turning so he could access the wounded chakra. "Draw off the poisoned chi-

And forgive me.

The world shattered into fire.

"Let me in there, Sokka!" Toph said impatiently, blind eyes glaring through him as he stood between her and Aang's tent. "Nothing's happening! I'd know."

"No disrespect to the feet, but Roku's dead," Sokka pointed out. "Might put a crimp in your bad-guys-want-to-fry-me sense. You've never seen - I mean, you've never been around Aang when he's... not Aang. It's spooky. And things tend to go boom. Last time I saw Roku? Whole island, bam! One big volcano. So, could we wait a little? Until spooky dead Avatar either fries the angry jerk, or goes away?"

"If you think I'm letting Aang fry Sparky when Zuko's trying to help him - come on! Nothing's-

The world exploded.

Sokka spat out a mouthful of sand, ears still ringing as Toph wriggled out from under him. The earth wasn't moving. What was left of Aang's tent on this side was a few fiery shreds, flickering into ashes. And he could have sworn he'd felt a massive ball of fire swoosh overhead, ending up just about...

Zuko wobbled to his knees, sand blackened under him. "...Ow."

Tent. Fireball. Zuko. Sokka added up burn patterns and trajectory, and gaped. "How did - why did - you can do that with fire? Just make it like an air-blast, so something doesn't flatten you-"

A bleeding hand gripped his tunic, and gold eyes bore into his, narrowed and furious. "This," Zuko hissed, low and deadly, "was not part of my orders. Find the Avatar. Capture the Avatar. The. Implies one. One Avatar! One very alive, crazy airbending child of an Avatar! Not dead Avatars who show up and lecture you for things you never even did!"

"Okay, you've kind of got a point," Sokka managed, trying to pry loose hot fingers. And getting exactly nowhere. "Toph, a little help here?"

No Toph. Out of the corner of his eye Sokka glimpsed green herding Katara away from them and in to check on Aang. Good idea. Probably. But he was feeling just a little outnumbered here.

"I did not sign up to chase Roku!" Zuko was snarling. "Roku's dead! He's been dead a hundred and twelve years! It's not right for him to be showing up like that! It's not decent! Ancestor spirits are supposed to show up in dreams! Or at family shrines! Though I pity any family that has that arrogant, self-righteous, smug know-it-all in their family tree! Ghosts aren't supposed to walk in broad daylight, damn it!"

Technically, Sokka would say they shouldn't walk at all. But shouldn't and spirits seemed to get tangled up around Aang, so even a guy who wanted nothing more than seal-hunts and boomerangs had to learn to roll with it... and could Zuko maybe let his feet touch the ground?

"And it's not enough that Roku shows up! No; I get an airbending nun! Do I look like a girl? Aang's got wounds on his back, where I need to get to them - it's not decent for me to ask a lady to disrobe without a chaperone! It's not civilized! How could he do that to me?"

Sokka saw Bato and a few of the men twitching... and Teruko and a few of the other soldiers ready to twitch back. No, he mouthed. 'Cause honestly, this wasn't fun - but it was just yelling. He'd seen Zuko fight. The firebender was focused, deadly, and usually quiet.

Crazy as it sounded, a yelling Zuko might actually be a safe one.

"If Kyoshi shows up, I quit! I'm not doing this anymore! You hear that, Aang? Yangchen is bad enough! You want an earthbender to chew me out, wake up and tell Toph to do it!"

Weird. Was it Sokka's imagination, or had every firebender in sight twitched when Zuko said Kyoshi?

"And when I do get at what Yangchen asked me to heal-" Zuko let go, waving unsteadily at the charred tent. "Oops? What kind of Avatar goes oops?"

"Besides Aang?" Sokka snorted. Blinked, and re-ran exactly what Zuko had said through his mind. "Oh, man. It's not just Aang?"

"Avatars are crazy! Spirits are crazy!" Zuko was definitely weaving now, gritting his teeth to stay standing. "Before I found all of you, I'd never even seen a spirit! Now I can't go a week without tripping over one! Whose bright idea was that? Ocean spirits and plague spirits and man-eating seahorse-dragons and Guard-strangling umbrellas and moon spirits that drown you to do you a favor... I didn't ask for this!"

"Me neither," Sokka muttered, feeling a weird kind of sympathy for the angry jerk. Before Aang, he'd barely seen benders; just Katara, and the odd Fire Nation raid. He'd certainly never lived with people who took bending for granted. The North Pole, the whole Earth Kingdom - they were different, in a way that kind of scared him sometimes. The way people like Jet tried to use Katara because she had power, the way Aang threw himself off cliffs with a smile, the way earthbenders made solid ground - not solid. Even little things Toph and Aang did, like slide him sideways because it was the easiest way to get him out of their way, or swamp him with water, or blow-dry things when he'd really just rather sit by a fire, thanks. And... not so little things, like not counting him in a fight, when two out of three they were up against couldn't bend either.

It was just so bizarre, knowing Zuko felt the same way about anything...

Wait. Hold on. Backtrack. "You saw Yue?" Sokka demanded, gripping green cloth.

"...I shouldn't have said that," Zuko muttered.

"Was she okay?" Sokka tried for a glare, but suspected it came off about as intimidating as a saber-moose lion cub. Zuko knew glares.

"She was the Moon," Zuko said reluctantly. "Does okay even fit?"

Darn. He hated it when Zuko made sense.

Behind him, Teruko cleared her throat. Loudly.

Right. After all the time he'd spent making sure Dad knew to keep Katara away from Zuko, this probably didn't look good. Though just letting go because a Fire Navy marine told him to kind of grated-

"He woke up!" Katara beamed through the tatters of blue cloth. "Just for a minute, he's still out of it, but... he's going to be okay!" She dove back into the shadows.

"You're welcome!" Zuko snarled at the tent, brushing off Sokka's grip casually as he might a spider-fly. "Oh, what I wouldn't give to dump her in Basic..."

Teruko actually chuckled. "What, you want to give her a vacation? Nothing to do but slog through mud, get screamed at by drill sergeants, pounded on by sadists, and try not to fall asleep standing up?"

"Sounds nice," Zuko agreed wistfully.

Sokka blinked at them. Added up the amount of chaos, panic, and pain he'd gone through on a typical day running from bad guys. Fire Nation or otherwise.

...Come to think of it, that did sound nice.

"Yeah, they don't let heirs get that lucky," Teruko sighed. "Come on, sir. Let's get that hand taken care of."

Shrugging at Bato, Sokka followed them.

Iroh was tending a fresh fire in front of Toph's shelter, coal throwing off waves of heat Sokka could feel yards away. "What happened?"

"Not sure yet." Zuko sank down by the flames, almost absently kneading fire in his left hand before pressing it over bleeding fingers. And reached out again, passing flame over himself; breathing markedly more even, as if he'd gotten a second wind. "Not the usual kind of lightning trauma."

"There's a usual kind?" Sokka pounced.

A swarm of gold eyes stared back.

Huh. But Dad swears Iroh's were green this morning. Which they might have been yesterday, come to think. So... how had that changed? And why?

Act normal. If we know one thing about Zuko, it's that he expects attacks. "Look, I just want to know what Aang's in for," Sokka said bluntly. "Katara says he woke up. You should be happy. You don't look happy. How bad is it?"

"Bad," Zuko answered, just as blunt. "This wasn't regular lightning. Azula aimed it. She meant to kill him. She did." He frowned. "Normal lightning's bad enough. A lot of people die-"

"Kind of handled that already," Sokka said flippantly.

"-And a lot of people who don't, wish they did," Zuko said grimly.

"Okay," Sokka said after a moment. "Listening."

Zuko eyed him. Glanced away, almost chewing his lip. "You know everybody's got bits of all the elements in them, right?"

In point of fact, he hadn't. Sokka shrugged.

"A lot of benders don't know this, but my teacher tried to fix people the Dai Li had hurt, so... Our bodies have lightning in them, too. Very tiny lightning." Zuko waved a hand toward his head. "The brain is like... like a shadow of a lightning storm, all the time."

Sokka frowned. "So, if we're supposed to have lightning in us... why's Aang hurt?"

"Can you drink a whole sea?" Zuko said wryly.

Oh. Ouch.

"Your body's built to carry lightning, but it's like a field, with thin irrigation ditches," Zuko went on. "A lightning bolt sweeps through like a tsunami. Sometimes there's still a field left afterward - but what happens to the channels?"

Sokka winced, thinking of Gaipan. "They get filled in."

"Or torn up, or just - in really bad shape," Zuko said soberly. "That's Aang, right now. There's a burn on his back where the bolt went in, and on his foot where it blasted out, and Katara's been working on those. And she should. But that's the obvious damage. I'm trying to get at all those little channels, before they scar up." He waved at his own face. "This? This is nothing, compared to scars inside your head."

Sokka swallowed. "You could be putting me on."

Zuko smirked. "I'm a lousy liar."

"So...?" Sokka prompted, dreading the answer.

"He could go blind, or deaf, or both," Zuko said bluntly. "He could get amnesia. He could be paralyzed, or have seizures, or lose all the dexterity you need to bend in the first place. That's just some of the things you can see. The subtle trauma? That's what really scares me. People hit by lightning, if they're not healed... they lose their concentration." He ticked doom off on his fingers. "They can't remember things you tell them. They can't get at things they already know. They can't do a lot of things at once - and trust me, bending is doing a lot of things at once. They're distractible, irritable, angry, depressed... and we're talking about Aang. Who already had a problem with most of that, and who blows people up when he gets mad." Gold eyes narrowed, worried and angry at once. "I think I can fix him. I'm trying. But this... it's not as simple as healing Uncle Iroh was. Not even close- Hey!"

"Just hold still, sir," Teruko said matter-of-factly, faceplate set aside as she gripped Zuko's right hand and wielded a razor edge of glittering black. "You'd have a hard time trying to trim these yourself."

Sokka had to blink, watching the lieutenant set to work on nails that had been torn into the quick before Zuko had healed them. "Can't you use scissors, like normal people?" Gran-Gran guarded her own nail scissors like a starving raven-wolf - and having had to trim his own with a knife on the run, Sokka couldn't blame her.

Once again, he was a focus of gold stares, and Iroh's amused, tolerant smile. "Okay, this is something Fire Nation-y, right?"

"It wouldn't be proper to use steel on the prince," Teruko said neutrally. "Obsidian is the custom. Though in the field, any edged stone will do."

Sure someone was trying to pull his leg, Sokka eyed Zuko. Who just looked back, blandly, as if this weren't strange at all. "You guys are weird."

And because he just had to, Sokka gave the firebender a look askance. "And you just happened to know all this lightning stuff?"

"I assure you, there was no element of chance involved," Iroh said soberly. "We have known Azula was capable of lightning for some months. She attempted to take us prisoner... and when it seemed that would fail, she chose to try to take my nephew back dead." He *tisk*ed softly. "She may be a firebending prodigy, but she does not understand what it means to be a master. One never stops learning."

"You said it, Uncle."

Sokka jumped bolt upright, landing to look down at a grinning earthbender. "Would you not sneak up on people whose feet don't have ears? It gets you boomerangs in nasty places... Why are you smiling?" he fired at Teruko.

"It's nice to see somebody's daughter has some good habits," Teruko said bluntly. Batted her eyes, and adopted a frail falsetto. "Oh, I am a delicate Earth maiden, I must prevail upon some strong man to save me!" She let go of the prince's hand, storing black stone away. "Pathetic."

"They're not all like that," Zuko said quietly. "Some of them are strong, where it counts. They just don't have the tools to fight with."

Sokka looked at Teruko, and Toph, and remembered gleaming knives. "Whoa, hold on. You mean Mai and Ty Lee are normal?"

"They are highly skilled; Azula would not settle for less," Iroh said plainly. "But if by normal you mean do most of our people learn to defend themselves, then yes."

Sokka flung up his hands. "Why?"

"Ignorant peasant," someone started to mutter.

"Stop." Zuko's voice was cold. "You haven't seen the South Pole. It's not his fault he's never been in a library."

"Oh, yes he has," Toph smirked. "Almost got buried in it."

"Is it my fault Wan Shi Tong thought we were the bad guys?" Sokka said indignantly. Zuko was defending him? From another firebender? Why?

"You're the guy who lied to him," Toph pointed out.

"You lied to He Who Knows Ten Thousand Things?" Iroh looked as if he couldn't decide whether to shake Sokka's hand or slap him silly.

"Now? I'd guess it's ten thousand and one," Toph smirked. "You could hear that book hit all the way outside."

"You fought a knowledge spirit?" Iroh studied Sokka narrowly.

"He was going to stuff my sister and add her to his collection of specimens... Why are you looking at me like that?" Sokka said warily. He'd seen a lot of expressions on Zuko's face since that first meeting at the South Pole. Mostly, angry ones. Horror, and what looked like grudging sympathy? That was new.

"Stay close to the Avatar," Zuko managed, still pale. "He's probably scaring most of the malicious spirits off. The small ones, anyway."

"Malicious spirits?" Sokka sputtered. "You're kidding." He looked at a bunch of neutral and wary faces, and listened to Toph's startled silence. "You're... not kidding?"

"It's well known in the fleets that General Iroh is... concerned about spirits," Teruko said carefully. "Respectfully, sir."

"It is known that I fear them, or so Zhao said," Iroh said dryly. "I believe you know what happened to him."

"Actually, sir? Yours is the first report any of us has heard on just what happened," Teruko offered. "Would you mind telling it again for my people? The firebenders with the Admiral said you defeated him, and no one saw him after that."

"I did," Zuko said quietly. "We were fighting. He admitted to hiring the pirates. Then the Ocean Spirit took him." He shuddered. "I hope he's dead."

Which was not, Sokka realized uneasily, I hope he's dead as in, I don't want him trying to kill me again. More like, I can think of a thousand nasty things the Ocean Spirit could be doing to the guy that killed his wife, and I'd rather be dead.

"I do not fear the spirits, Lieutenant," Iroh said plainly. "I respect them, as I would any armed opponent. Some are cruel. Some mean to be kind. Some are simply so different from us that without the Avatar, even the strongest bender has no hope of not offending them. Or of escape."

One of the still-masked firebenders stirred. "Sir. The Fire Lord's position on the Avatar-" He cut himself off.

"That boy is no enemy to our nation," Iroh said firmly. "He has opposed us, yes. He has caused great damage, and loss of life. But I do not think he wishes to be anyone's enemy." The gray-haired firebender let out a slow breath. "And I have hopes of persuading him that he need not be."

Sokka stiffened. No way was Aang not going to take on the Fire Lord-

Toph shifted her feet, and a rock poked him in the butt.

Okay. He could take a hint. But she'd better have a really good reason.

"So, why do girls get to fight?" Toph asked. "My dad never wanted me to."

"Your father likely never expected your children to face assassins in their very cradle," Iroh stated. "When you are the last defense for those you love, you learn."

"Oh, come on!" Sokka burst out. Waved a hand at Zuko. "Who's going to send assassins after the Fire Lord's son?" He hesitated. "Besides Zhao. Right, never mind..."

"I wasn't born the Fire Lord's son," Zuko said coldly. "The Fire Lord was Azulon. I was just another prince. Insurance. Some people thought our family tree didn't need any extra branches."

Sokka tried not to stare. How could- that was- damn, he didn't know what to think.

"You mean, your mom..." Toph swallowed hard. "How? No, stupid question, we met Mai..."

"Actually, I've heard Lady Ursa was more of a swordswoman," Teruko spoke up. "But first of all? She was a firebender of Byakko. We may not look like much, but we've got punch when it counts." Flames crackled above her hand, just for an instant.

Zuko's mom learned to fight. It chilled Sokka, down to the bone. If my mom had... if she'd...

She'd been up against a firebender. Who could fight that?

I do. Mai and Ty Lee, they fight benders. They're Fire Nation. They never stop fighting.

"You knew my mother?" Zuko glanced at Teruko, startled.

"No, sir," Teruko shook her head. "I was too young before she left. But I do know your honorable grandparents." She smiled, and rubbed at the corner of her jaw, as if soothing an old bruise.

"Shidan makes sure he kicks every fledg- ah, youngster's butt before they sign up. And Lady Kotone? She's solid as Mount Shiroto." Teruko frowned, hunting through memory. "You've got some aunts, too. Mostly in the Home Guard and volcano-watchers. I haven't heard if any of them have finally kidnapped some unsuspecting guy and settled down yet."

"Husband-stealing?" Iroh looked delighted, and amused. "I have not seen that custom followed in some time. You may wish to watch your step in Byakko, nephew."

"Yeah, right," Zuko muttered. "Only if she's blind."

"Husband stealing?" Sokka yelped, before Toph could even start to smirk. Maybe he'd never heard of betrothal necklaces before they'd hit the North Pole, but everybody knew guys arranged with their bride's father to "steal" a wife... And why was Teruko grinning at him like that?

"You know," the marine said speculatively, "he's still a little on the scrawny side. But given his father, that should work out in a year or two. And his sister's a bender. So half his kids have a good chance."

"I am certain we have red cord," Iroh nodded. "Wine may be a bit trickier, Captain Jee usually reserves that for use as needed... but he is likely to make an exception." The retired general's grin was just as toothy.

Sokka gulped. "I've got a girlfriend I think my dad needs me for something I gotta go!"

And ran for it, muffled snickers and Toph's cackles pursuing him.

He fetched up against the comforting wood prow of a ship, heart still beating like after they'd gotten past the lake serpent. Spirits, he'd be safer with the serpent!

"Sokka?" Hakoda strode over to him, obviously worried.

"I'm okay," Sokka said quickly. "It's fine. Honest. Argh." He knocked his head against the hull a few times, trying to thump out Teruko's grin. "Crazy. She's- Fire Nation are crazy!"

"She?" Hakoda chuckled. "Sokka, all women are crazy." Losing the smile, Hakoda looked past him. "Suzuran is signaling us that they're putting someone ashore. I wonder why?"

Suzuran? So the ship had a name now. Like the enemy had faces, and stories, and what Sokka was pretty sure was trying to be a sense of humor. Even if it was a warped and twisted one. "Dad?" Sokka managed. "I'm confused."

Hakoda frowned at him, as if staring at a patch of snow that had resolved into a readable trail. "You might want to keep your distance from Zuko."

"What?" Sokka shook his head. "Look, you know someone's got to keep an eye on him so Katara doesn't worry-"

"Your sister might be right." Hakoda glanced inshore, toward Toph's shelter. "He's a fugitive, Sokka. Princess Azula tried to kill him; that means she thinks the Fire Lord won't mind if he dies. And Iroh is a known traitor. Those two should be in chains. Or dead. But Jee is protecting them. Does that sound right?"

"No, it sounds crazy," Sokka said honestly. "Half the stuff that happens around Aang is crazy. I got kidnapped to the spirit world once, and I don't even remember it; Katara had to tell me how Aang got me back from the Hei Bai spirit. Which, I've got to say, was at least half luck." What the heck is going on? Yesterday he was agreeing with me.

Then again, yesterday Zuko hadn't blown up a tent, proven he could out-heal Katara, and yelled about Avatars loud enough to freak out the whole camp. The guy was hard on your nerves.

Firebender, heading this way, Sokka told himself, peering at the small boat cutting through the water. Figure out what's up with Dad and Katara later... oh heck, I left Toph with Zuko!

He tried to freak out over that. Really. But Toph and Iroh were getting along like a house on fire... and Zuko actually seemed to trust Toph.

Besides. When it came down to the angry jerk versus the world's greatest earthbender? He'd bet on Toph.

Zuko crouched on dry sand, eyeing it with suspicion. Teruko was an unshakable shadow behind him, and Iroh was calmly sipping his tea. A few yards away, Toph smirked, and cracked her knuckles. "Okay, Sparky. Show me what you've got."

"I'm not sure this will work." Flattening his hands on the shore, he breathed out, long and hard. Studied thin wisps of rising steam, and the shimmer of heat over his hands. "Heats up faster than water, at least."

Closing his eyes, Zuko concentrated, feeling for that elusive sense of fire-in-other. There, and there, and there...

Pull, he told himself. But gently. Sand felt different than water or leaf-bits. But fire was fire, and what worked for one should work again.

Eyes still shut, hands out, Zuko rose.

"Urk."

Teruko. Definitely. Daring, Zuko opened his eyes.

Sand formed thin streamers from his fingers to the ground, a fine dust falling as bits cooled and slipped his grasp.

"Loses heat faster, too," Zuko observed, balling what was still hot between his hands and breathing flame into it. Sand rippled between his palms, flexing and sifting as he played with it, just like streaming water. Very heavy, stubborn water.

Uncle beamed, delighted. Toph looked like someone had someone had handed her her very own bowl of fresh apricot mochi. And Teruko...

The marine was swearing under her breath; unintelligible curses that flung up words like crazy and genius, and seemed to promise something potentially fatally embarrassing to Captain Jee.

"Can't move a rock, but you can move lots of little rocks." Toph nodded, decided. "So. What if I do this?" She lifted her hands, sand flowing up at her command to merge into his ball-

And yanked.

Oh, you are so on.

A proper firebender would have yanked right back. But that would have ripped the fire from the earth, leaving each of them with only their own element. And that wasn't the point of this game. Zuko snapped out a whip of flame instead, tangling it deeper into sand as he added push to her pull.

She's really rooted.

And she still almost overbalanced, before sliding sideways and shoving the sand with her.

Direct. Not like firebending, exactly. But I wonder...

Earthbending was neutral jin. Listen, wait, and strike. So what was the answer to that?

The mountain takes the blow. The dragon avoids it.

Fire needed sharper movements than water. But he could still drag his fingers through, splitting hot sand into a noodle-nest of shimmering strands, fire swirling in with each pass.

Earth was the mountain; the lone, proud fortress. How would the world's greatest earthbender deal with endless flickering flames?

Grinning, Toph leapt, landed, and wrenched her hands like turning engine bolts. Still shimmering hot, sand began to fuse into braided strands of stone.

We'll see about that.

Zuko tamped down his own smile, reminding himself of what was really at stake here. Not winning. Testing. Seeing what would work, and what wouldn't. And in the process, getting a good look at Toph's unusual style. He'd seen a lot of earthbenders, and Toph wasn't quite like any of them.

Accidentally or not, he'd dragged Shirong right into the middle of the spirits' plans for the Avatar. The least he could do was try to bring back a few new moves to help the agent survive them.

Damn it, Shirong, stay alive. Let me have one thing I did right. Stay alive - and stay away from

This, Shirong thought wryly, stepping out of stone into Quan's new rooms in the palace, is, quite possibly, the dumbest thing I've ever done.

Spirits, the sunlight felt good.

As Tingzhe closed the wall behind them, Shirong swept his gaze over the room's company of rebels. Min, that dangerous girl Mai, and... Quan. Looking like a spirit-slaughter warmed over.

Shirong crossed the room in a few strides, looking squarely into devastated brown eyes. "What happened?"

"She killed him." There was a horrid flatness to Quan's tone. "I protected her from the general because she was Long Feng's ally... and he thought we had the upper hand, and she killed him." The senior agent shook his head, still in shock. "It happened so fast..."

"The Fire Lord always did like her best." Mai's voice was stoic, as Min left her side to bow awkwardly in front of his father. "She's deadly. Zuko's... not. Not if he can find another way."

Tingzhe didn't wait for his son to rise, wrapping the teenager in a fierce hug. "Apologies later, young man," he said firmly. Voice low, in case there were watchers Quan hadn't distracted elsewhere. "You owe quite a few of them... but later. Stay alive. Do you hear me? Don't make your mother break out the sleeve knives to hunt someone down. Spirits, a week ago I didn't even know what 'Flight of the Moth-Owls' was."

Mai's brow arched up, intrigued.

At least someone's life is rising from the ashes. Shirong focused back on Quan. "The message we received said something about plans to bring the Outer Wall down?"

"I had to convince her I was worth keeping alive." Quan swallowed dryly. "If she's close enough, then..."

"No!" Shirong said fiercely. "We've lost Long Feng. We can't lose you, too! The Dai Li need a leader; our city needs the Dai Li. Don't throw your life away. Not when there's a better choice!"

"Speaking as a citizen myself, I would have to second that," Tingzhe frowned. "If his chosen heir dies inside these walls, Fire Lord Ozai's wrath will know no bounds. And if what friends of the Avatar say is true, soon even the walls of Ba Sing Se will not protect us."

Quan blinked, as if reluctantly dragging himself back toward life. "But... if she's gone..."

"Sozin's Comet is returning," Shirong said plainly. The jolt he'd felt hearing that from Huojin had mostly subsided. Mostly. "That's the power Sozin used to destroy the Air Temples. In one day." He shuddered. "I doubt our walls would fare any better."

The power of a hundred suns. Will I feel it too? It's already too much, I don't have any training- what do I do?

Quan shook his head again, as if to deny the faint hints of color coming back into his face. "You don't understand. Long Feng is dead. She has to die!"

"I believe I do understand," Tingzhe mused. "You were loyal to the Grand Secretariat. His loss wounded your spirit. And that wound is compounded by seeing your fellow agents follow his murderer." He paused. "But think of your duties to this city, and your people. We need you alive far more than we need her dead. For the Earth King's sake."

"Bon did it?" Quan looked slightly less ghastly. "But - the Princess' plan-"

"Isn't that bad an idea," Shirong said thoughtfully. Held up his hands as Quan glared; secretly relieved to see that anger, instead of bleak determination. "I've studied the Fire Nation. If they take territory, it's considered theirs. If Ba Sing Se is occupied, it won't be destroyed." I hope.

"The spirits will be angry," Quan began.

"Any angrier than they were because of Lake Laogai?" Shirong said pointedly. "We can't let her know about... something that spiritually dubious." Mai had broken her loyalty to the princess, she likely wouldn't betray them - but better safe than sorry. "We need you still in charge. You have the best chance of steering the other agents away from mentioning it." He smiled slightly. "And if there are openings in the walls, Lee's plan gains certain advantages."

"The general took him and left," Quan bit out.

"He'll be back," Shirong said fiercely. Paused, still shaken by that certainty. "He's a great name, and he has promised his people. He will come for us."

The words hung in the air, condemning him from his own mouth. Oh, damn.

"Us?" Quan's eyes narrowed.

"Allow me," Tingzhe put in, before Shirong could try to stammer an excuse. "Apparently, mingled heritages can crop up at unexpected times. I assure you, from everything I've seen, Agent Shirong has never intended to be anything but a loyal Dai Li. Unfortunately, Lee learned under Amaya." He gave Quan a significant look. "She has quite a way with spirit-touched wounds."

All of which was true. Only the implications were a lie. "He has to know," Shirong said impulsively. I can't live another lie. I won't.

"He most certainly does not," Tingzhe said harshly. "He is in Azula's company, and from what her brother has told me, the only safe way to keep a secret from her is not to know it at all." Hazel narrowed at Quan. "Agent Shirong is a good man, and what he intends will not only help this city, but strike a subtle blow the Fire Princess will never recover from. Which would you rather have? Her death, knowing it will devastate this city? Or the chance to sabotage the Fire Nation and give the Avatar time?"

"The Avatar," Quan said bleakly, "is dead."

"So she's proclaimed. But lightning doesn't always kill," Tingzhe shot back. "And he left with two healing benders. He has a chance." The professor's voice softened. "I can't imagine how you must feel, Agent Quan. But there is hope. For us, for the Earth Kingdom, and for the world. Don't give up."

"And if you really want to hurt Azula, you won't kill her," Mai said levelly. "You'll do something she can't control."

"I thought she was your friend-" Min cut himself off.

"I know Zuko," Mai said simply. "If he wins, if he can, Azula will still be alive. If she does..." A minimal shrug. "That's always been the Fire Lord's hold on her. Do what I say, or your brother might be heir again." She glanced down. "I knew she hated that. I didn't know she hated him. It's not Zuko's fault he was born first." She met Quan's gaze, dead level. "She's still royal blood. I'm still Fire Nation. If you try to kill her, I'll stop you. But if you want her to suffer... I'll help."

"And Ty Lee?" Quan said raggedly.

"My parents can protect my brother. Ty Lee has six sisters. They're... vulnerable." Mai shook her head slightly. "I don't know. I think she's covering for me. But she likes Azula."

"Let's not borrow trouble." Shirong handed Quan a list they'd compiled. "What do you think?"

Quan started, and Shirong knew which item he'd hit. "You want a whole cache?" Quan said incredulously.

Airbending and all. "We do," Shirong nodded. "Can you think of anything that would cut her deeper than undermining her ancestors' efforts to destroy primitive bending styles?"

A smile slashed viciously across Quan's face. "Some of this, we can do. The rest..."

"Min knows how to find people who can contact us," Shirong said plainly. "Let us know when you can."

A few more moments for Tingzhe to hug an embarrassed teenager again, and they slipped back into concealing stone. "I had no idea so much of the palace wasn't solid," Tingzhe said soberly.

"The problem's not getting in, it's slipping in and out without being noticed," Shirong nodded, keeping his voice down. "So long as all I do is listen, I can guide us past the watchers Quan won't know about. I just hope the princess isn't as good as her uncle at listening for fire."

About to earthbend a door open, Tingzhe paused. "The watchers Quan doesn't know about?"

Shirong gave him a bleak smile. "Azula's not a fool. She has to know he wants her dead. But she also knows if she kills or imprisons Long Feng's second in command this soon, anyone with uncertain loyalty might desert her. She's setting a trap for him. Waiting to catch him betraying her, where the others can see. I can almost smell it."

The professor frowned. "And Quan doesn't see... no, he wouldn't, would he? He's in too much pain."

"You may have hated what Long Feng did to the city, but he led us well," Shirong said soberly. "I just hope we've convinced Quan to lull her suspicions. If we can buy a little time to get Kuei up to speed, and persuade him to order Quan underground..."

Tingzhe nodded. "And if Lee shows up?"

Not if. When. I hope. "Then things get interesting." Come on, kid. Find a way to get word to us. A runner, a messenger hawk... spirits, even a smoke signal.

"Indeed," Tingzhe snorted.

Shirong eyed him. "Oh?"

"I don't believe his majesty has ever met anyone of equal rank before," the professor said dryly. "It will be... unique."

Earth Kingdom meets Fire Nation. Shirong pictured it, and winced.

Oh, well. That was the future. For now... Prince Zuko might attract trouble like a lodestone, but he shouldn't be in the midst of that particular sticky mess, yet. Lee knew how to keep his head down, his mouth shut, and not look Fire Nation at all. He should be fine.

Why can't I believe that?

Heading for Teruko with the bad news, Sadao had to stop. Blink. Rub his eyes, and look again. Huh. Grandpa never made glass that way.

Beside him, the Water Tribe's second in command swore under his breath. "What does that crazy little girl think she's doing?"

"Playing, sir," Sadao said honestly. The captain had said to be polite.

"Playing?" Bato turned a furious look on him. "Your prince is taunting a helpless little blind-"

"Master earthbender," Sadao said firmly. "You have to be a really good bender to make it look that easy. Sir." We're the ones who should be worried. If she decides to just sink the prince... Sadao tried not to shiver. The captain said Lady Bei Fong was an honorable opponent and temporary ally. Which meant she probably wouldn't. But she was also the Avatar's friend. And everyone had seen what he was capable of.

We've got a truce. Don't break it.

He wasn't a violent man. Never wanted to be. But he was an officer in the Fire Navy, he'd sworn oaths - and knowing the prince needed this truce didn't make him any less terrified of being anywhere near the young airbender.

Or any less determined to... do what he had to do. If the captain ordered. Even if the airbender was just a child. He'd seen the North Pole. That wasn't a child.

Sadao was an officer, and an officer had to use his own judgment. But for right now? He was going to trust the captain knew what he was doing. Because right now it was taking everything he had to push the panic into a corner and think, he really didn't want to be setting the camp on fire by accident-

"Damn bitch hen!"

And... he was supposed to be warning the prince's camp about the approaching caravan. Couldn't he ever get anything right?

Yelps, swears, and screams spread through the Water Tribe camp. Prince Zuko and Lady Bei Fong broke off their contest in almost the same instant... though the earthbender took one moment to poke a stiff finger twice, and then curve it, leaving a smiley-face in a tall lump of cooling white glass.

Prince Zuko ignored it, listening to the rising chaos. Eyes widening, he stood straight, and whistled.

Chirruping a battle-cry, a night-black ostrich-horse surged past scattering blue-clad tribesmen, bloodied claws stomping to a halt in reach of one young, smirking, about to be mauled royal firebender-

"Hey, sweetheart," the prince crooned.

The hen ducked her head and whistled, nudging into scratching fingers. Rolled her eye at Teruko's cautious approach, raising one threatening foot.

"Asahi, no," the prince said firmly, looking over the heavy-laden packs on her gear. "Lieutenant Teruko, the last I knew, Asahi was with an Earth Kingdom caravan master who made a circuit near Ba Sing Se..."

"Yes, sir," Sadao got out, and could the earth please open up and swallow him now? "We saw the caravan coming in, about five men and a lot of ostrich-horses. Chief Hakoda confirms it's probably their supplies." He swallowed. "Sir, the captain says he'll await your orders, but he thinks we're just going to have to bluff?"

"He is right," General Iroh said ruefully. "It is not their numbers that are the threat, but the word they will carry. Still, I believe- oh, dear."

Tall, was Sadao's first impression of the young lady getting off another of the caravan's mounts. Followed close by, cute.

Okay, so she was Earth Kingdom. He was a guy. And they'd all been at sea for quite some time, and... was that an angry guy with a spear in a green Army uniform following her?

Darn. Boyfriend.

Xiu walked through the carnage left by one ticked ostrich-horse, shaking her head. Huizhong had promised her a little excitement, all right... though he'd been thinking along the lines of safe excitement. Everyone knew the Water Tribe had taken on every Fire Nation force that'd dared to swarm toward Ba Sing Se, and held them back. And one little hen had dropped them like Pai Sho pieces?

Granted, Asahi apparently had a temper that bordered on incandescent. Which fit, given the young healer Xiu knew had last owned the hen. And what could have parted a war orphan from one of the few creatures in the world that actually liked him-

There he is! He's...

The weaver stopped dead in her tracks, jaw dropping. Lee. Mushi. Fire Nation uniforms. Asahi, leaning into Lee. An odd glass sculpture behind him, radiating heat, and an even odder little girl dressed like she'd come straight out of an Earth Rumble. Fire Nation uniforms. Ships, both wood and metal, Water Tribe blue surrounding this small knot of black and red...

She looked at Lee. Pale, thin Lee, who walked like a noble and didn't know anything about people and had a temper like a forest fire. And felt the world flip upside down.

Pale. Black hair. Gold eyes... dragon's eyes...

Fingers buried in Asahi's feathers, he stared back.

"Oma and Shu, it's an invasion, come on-" Huizhong grabbed her wrist.

Xiu twisted loose, a move Dad had taught her years ago, and kept on staring. "You know, with most people who weren't raised by raven-wolves," or Fire Navy firebenders, oh spirits, how? "This is where they say, 'I can explain everything'."

Lee blinked. Reddened slightly. "How could I possibly explain this?"

Yep. That was definitely Lee. "Or, this isn't what it looks like?" Xiu suggested.

"No, it's pretty much what it looks like," Mushi said thoughtfully. Glanced at his nephew. "What do you think it looks like?"

Lee clapped a hand to his forehead, groaning.

"Worse than it really is," the girl said firmly, striding forward. "Toph Bei Fong, of the Bei Fong family."

Xiu bit back a whistle. Everyone knew that particular Gaoling merchant powerhouse. Though she'd never heard they had a daughter.

"I know it's weird, but Lee and Uncle Mushi helped my friends get out of a really tough spot," Toph went on. "And one of my friends really, really needs Lee's help. So... could we just not tell the Army they're here? Just for a few days?"

"Not tell the Army?" Huizhong sputtered.

"Your superiors will have far greater concerns than our simple presence under truce," Mushi said seriously. "Ba Sing Se has fallen, taken from the inside by Princess Azula and her allies. The Earth King, if he is fortunate, is in hiding. Your forces, and your supply lines, are about to be drastically compromised."

Ba Sing Se has fallen. Xiu swallowed dryly. That... that couldn't be, everyone had heard the Avatar was in Ba Sing Se, surely he would have-

The Avatar is twelve years old!

Lee's own words, resounding through her head with a fury and frustration she hadn't understood... then. But if Lee was Fire Nation...

"That's impossible," Huizhong said uneasily. With a glance at her Xiu knew meant he believed them... and didn't want to. "The Dragon of the West couldn't take Ba Sing Se."

"Not from the outside, strength against strength, by the principles of High War," Lee said levelly. "Azula used those of Low War, and exploited the city's weaknesses from within. They may be fooling people on the outside right now, but they're gone. You need to retreat and regroup, or the earthbenders she's suborned will just work outward from the walls and take you all down."

Xiu eyed Lee... though if that was his real name, she'd set her next warp with spider silk. "You just can't do normal, can you?"

"Nope!" Toph grinned, latching onto an arm as Lee flushed red. "Sparky's one of a kind."

"Would you not do that, little girl?" One of the Water Tribesmen winced. "It's... just not right."

Letting go, Toph cracked her knuckles. "Bato? We need to clear a few things up about little."

"It's all right," Lee said levelly. "Earth's supposed to be level-headed, right? We could use that in between us right now."

"Yes," Mushi mused, peering past them all. "I believe that is the caravan master heading this way." A hint of calculation slipped into his smile. "If he gives you any trouble, remind him that our terms were that Asahi was only loaned into his care, until such a time as we left Ba Sing Se."

"Ooo, terms." Toph's grin was pure dealing merchant. "Let me at 'im."

"We're going to talk," Xiu said firmly to Lee, as Huizhong tugged her gently away behind the tribesmen. "Later."

"Fire Nation. Sweet earth and sky," her spear-wielding boyfriend finally murmured as they got out of earshot. "We need to get you out of here - we need to get a message back-"

"I think you should talk to Chief Hakoda, first," Bato said soberly. "You're in charge of the other guards?"

"Sergeant Huizhong," he nodded, "and yes, I am, but-"

"Toph's telling the truth," Bato said bluntly. "We don't like it any more than you do, but right now we need... Lee." He shook his head in disbelief. "Lee?"

"It's a common name," Xiu shrugged. And had to smile. "I knew he'd be a good healer."

Bato choked in mid-step. "A firebender?"

"What? He's not..." Xiu swallowed, remembering a candle flickering without a draft, and a healer who wasn't bending the water up, but using a cloth to move it, soaking it again and again in... "That little mischief."

"Xiu?" Huizhong gave her a questioning look. He'd heard her story of the two refugees; he knew what she'd thought.

"Hot water," Xiu chuckled. Fire Nation, sure - but he was a kid. And that had to have taken the kind of sheer nerve you only saw in spirit-tales. "Almost boiling hot."

Her boyfriend had to whistle at that, worry easing into a reluctant smile. "Smart kid." Huizhong grimaced. "And if he were Earth Kingdom, that'd be good, but..." His voice trailed off, as they approached a serious-looking Water Tribe man with blue-beaded braids and the faintest laugh lines around blue eyes.

"Chief Hakoda," Bato introduced him. "Sergeant Huizhong, and the young lady's apparently met our two... guests... some time ago. As Lee, and Uncle Mushi."

"Have you?" Hakoda gestured, beckoning a teenager some distance across the camp. "Would you mind telling us about that?"

"Chief Hakoda, with all due respect, you have the Fire Navy here," Huizhong said firmly. "And they say Ba Sing Se's under threat. We need to inform the Army!"

"About Ba Sing Se, yes," Hakoda replied. "But I doubt Lee would do that much healing in chains. And that's exactly where he'll be if the Army gets involved. There, or dead. I have a desperately injured child on my hands, and for the moment, we need Lee."

For the moment? Xiu narrowed her eyes. Lee might have been lying about who and what he was, sure; but wouldn't anyone, if they were caught in enemy lands? He's just a kid.

Granted, a kid who... knew how to deal with bandits. But that didn't make him a bad person. Just sad.

"And we need his uncle, and with that man comes that... collection of armored menaces he guided in." Hakoda shook his head. "I'm not saying we shouldn't inform your superiors. But we need more time."

"He's not healing anyone right now," Huizhong observed. With a glance her way that said he knew what she was thinking, and kid or not, Lee was the enemy. And he was sorry, but that was the way the world was.

We're going to talk about that, later, Xiu eyed him back.

"Apparently the body needs time to rest between sessions," Bato shrugged. "If they're all as explosive as the last one, my nerves could use the break." He nodded at Huizhong. "Let's go talk your men out of anything drastic."

Huizhong touched Xiu's hand before he left, giving her a wry smile. She gave him a rueful one back. I'll be fine. Honest.

"Is it true?" she fired at Hakoda before he could ask any more. "Has the Fire Nation taken Ba Sing Se?"

"They told you?" The chief frowned. "Why would they do that?"

"Maybe because they're decent people?" Xiu eyed the man skeptically.

"You have no idea who they are, Miss-?"

"Xiu. And no," she admitted, looking back toward those distant spots of red. "I guess I don't." But I think I know more than you.

You could tell a lot about somebody by how they treated animals. Asahi hadn't run from Lee. She'd run to him.

He looks out for a hen who doesn't like anybody, and he worries about a little boy everybody else wants to save the world.

Kindness. That was hard enough to find in the Earth Kingdom. She couldn't imagine how a firebender had kept that part of himself alive, and walked away unscarred...

Except he didn't, Xiu knew, as Hakoda's youngster joined them. I've seen refugees. I know what people look like when they've lost everything. And that didn't count the nightmares she'd had, putting together what she'd seen of wounded soldiers around her dad and Huizhong to figure out exactly what must have happened to Lee.

Let the Army take Lee in chains after he'd healed Toph's friend? Not exactly the noble Water Tribe warriors she'd heard stories of.

Wait. See what they want to know.

"Sokka," Hakoda smiled. "Xiu says she knows our... guest, Lee. And his uncle, Mushi."

"Lee?" Sokka started. "Wait a minute..."

"How did you meet him?" Hakoda asked.

"At an inn," Xiu said honestly. "My grandmother had one of her awful headaches, and the innkeeper said there was a healer who could help. And Lee did." She looked directly at Hakoda. "He wasn't a very nice young man. But he was decent, and honest. And if you're going to just turn him over to the Army - don't you think his own people have done enough to him already?"

"Yeah, he's an exile," Sokka said impatiently. "Fine, we get it, the Fire Nation thinks that's the worst thing that can happen to you-" He cut himself off. "But if you don't know who he is, how do you know that?"

Exile? Men! Sokka wasn't a short kid, but she was taller. And apparently Water Tribe men just did not expect a woman to attack.

Xiu had her fist in front of his eye before he could blink. "Think again, mister. Look at that scar Lee's carrying, and think."

Sokka jumped back, and stared up at her. "You're not dressed like a Kyoshi Warrior..."

"My dad came to the mainland to fight, and never went back," Xiu said plainly. "You're right. I don't know who Lee is, or what he did before he and his uncle washed up as refugees. But that's what I saw, helping my grandmother. Refugees. An old man worried he was going to lose his nephew before he could teach Lee to trust people again... and a scared teenager who was probably Toph's age when some bastard of a firebender stuck his fist in Lee's face."

Sokka gulped.

"So if you've got a good reason to hate Lee, you tell me right now," Xiu glared at him. "He's rude, and awkward, and he's got less manners than a cat-owl - but he's a healer. Do you know what kind of guts that takes, helping people instead of hurting them? When there was nobody to help you when you needed it?"

"Man, Master Pakku could have used you at the North Pole," Sokka muttered.

Xiu blinked, taken aback. "The invasion? I'm just a silk weaver. I don't think I really could have helped."

"No. Not what you can do. What you said. That healing takes guts." Sokka glanced at his father. "We fought the Fire Nation all the way to the North Pole. Katara used everything she'd taught herself, everything she could figure out, and we just made it there. She wanted to do more. She wanted to learn everything about waterbending, so we could help... our friend. She wanted to fight." He grimaced. "And then Master Pakku said it was forbidden, and she should go play nice with the little girls learning from Yugoda. And when he caught her learning from somebody else, and was going to throw them both out - she blew up. Wrecked half the audience chamber trying to fight him, until he said he'd teach her."

Hakoda winced. "That's why she never had more healing lessons?"

"What, and let Pakku change his mind?" Sokka shrugged. "He worked people into the ice, dawn to dusk, every day. A- our friend might have gotten away with just playing in the snow, but no way was she going to give Pakku a chance to kick her out... What's so funny?"

Xiu tried not to snicker. "It's called irony, Sokka. When you get to be my age, you'll probably look back on this and laugh."

"Laugh?" Sokka straightened from his slouch, blue eyes hard and dangerous. "Look, one of our best friends is hurt! A few days ago, he almost died! There's nothing funny about this."

"Oh yeah?" Xiu said dryly. "Your Master Pakku told Katara to go be a good girl and heal, and she tore up the ice to fight, instead." She jabbed a thumb back toward that knot of red and black. "What do you think the Fire Nation taught a firebender to do?"

Sokka gaped for a moment, speechless. "Lee is nothing like my sister!"

"Then maybe I should feel sorry for your sister," Xiu said quietly. "Because from what I saw? Even after everything that's happened to him, after being raised a firebender? There's a pretty decent kid in there." She crossed her arms, and eyed Hakoda. "And I'm going to go talk to him. Now."

"Yes," Hakoda said thoughtfully, "I suppose you are." He gave her a suspiciously cool look. "We'll go with you. I happen to know what men like these are capable of, when unarmed women are involved."

That stopped her cold, just as he'd intended. But Xiu swallowed hard, and marched on. Mushi said they were under truce. And I know what I saw.

And she was seeing it again, now, as Lee quietly talked Asahi into letting Toph and one of the firebenders offer hands to sniff.

...That one's a woman.

The firebender saw her looking, and gave her a flat look that needed no words. Yeah. Girl here. Want to make something of it?

Xiu gave her a shrug, and a half-smile, aware of the Water Tribesmen behind her. And the caravan master, Xiaobo, stomping away from the group with Asahi's packs over his shoulder, muttering under his breath.

"Did they cheat you?" Hakoda asked; keeping his voice low, though they were still out of earshot of the firebenders.

"Cheat? For that foul-tempered, sharp-clawed..." Xiaobo snorted. "Bei Fongs don't cheat. Shear a sheep-pig down to the skin, but they don't cheat." He frowned. "No, there's something about those two in green... swear I've seen them somewhere, besides Ba Sing Se..."

Toph caught at Lee's sleeve, lips barely moving.

"Eh, it'll come to me... Better shut of that hen, I swear! Tough as nails, maybe - but give me a biddable beast who'll let you check its nails, and never mind how many times you have to trim them!" Still cursing, he headed back to camp, casting nervous glances back every third step.

The gold-eyed woman watched him, her own voice low as Xiu and her escort approached. "Anybody else want to yell boo?"

"Lieutenant," Lee shook his head. "I don't think Chief Hakoda would appreciate it if we spooked the man's whole pack string."

"I can't say I much appreciate it now," Hakoda said dryly. "Where did you get that menace?"

Confused silence. "Menace, sir?" one of the men offered. No faceplate, but no weapons, either. Which meant firebender, if Xiu remembered what she'd heard right.

That's why I never saw it. Lee's a firebender, but he uses dao? How did that happen?

"Lieutenant Sadao." Hakoda's voice could have chilled flame. "You're not going to tell me that is a normal animal."

"She is pretty snarly," Xiu admitted, looking straight at Lee. "I was surprised you could talk her out of biting that stable-hand." She'd been out early that morning, getting a few more minutes away from Grandma. Just long enough to see Asahi measure up the strange boy for convenient clawing spots, and catch Lee's shy wave before he and his uncle headed out of town. When an ostrich-horse got that look in its eye - well.

"She's probably got skirmisher in her background," Sadao said thoughtfully. "A lot of Yonaguni stock does. My cousin Chiko looks after a flock over..." His words trailed off in the face of Hakoda's ever more incredulous stare, and he tried to shrug. "Well... she's probably not what anyone would want for a pack beast, no. Where'd you find her, sir?"

Xiu raised an eyebrow. Lee rated a sir? Weirder and weirder.

"It's a long story," Lee muttered.

"Not too long," Mushi said confidently. "We were some way north of here... we heard of a ranch afflicted with illness, and offered our services. Asahi was one of those most gravely ill. Unfortunately, it was not a normal illness, but sickness unleashed by a plague kami, in the wake of a great wrong by the ranch's owner. Things became very dangerous, very quickly... and once the spirit was defeated, we - er - were forced to leave without formal payment."

Plague spirit? Xiu swallowed. And they beat it?

"You stole her!" Sokka accused them.

Armored gold glared at the boy. Lee barely looked annoyed. "There was a mob coming. We had to leave before anyone got hurt."

"Yeah, right, like that makes it okay-"

"Gaipan," Lee said levelly.

Sokka stopped mid-word. "...I warned them."

"And for that I am glad," Mushi nodded. "I have always respected the honor of the Water Tribe. But the fact remains that your sister and her friend allowed themselves to be used in a plot to flood that village, and nearly cost thousands of lives. The damage will take years to rebuild, if they ever do; I myself would advise they do not, given the demonstrated danger." He regarded Sokka, one brow arched. "We burned down a ranch and stole one beast. To stop a plague that was already spreading beyond its source, and threatened great suffering to the whole of the Earth Kingdom. That sickness would not have stopped with only animals."

"How do you even know about Gaipan?" Sokka demanded.

Oh, didn't have an answer for that one, huh, kid? Xiu smirked to herself.

Lee snorted. "I tracked you, remember?"

Come on, don't let him off that easy! Xiu had to hide a shiver. Plague wasn't common, but when it happened... spirits. One ranch burned down? That was getting off light.

"Plague spirit?" Hakoda looked lost.

"They happen, when people... when something really goes wrong." Xiu shuddered. "How did you find a shaman? I heard they all went into the mountains years ago, and just never came out."

Waiting for the Avatar. Like everyone else.

Everyone but Lee. No wonder he had guts enough to heal. He wasn't waiting for someone else to fix the world.

"We did not," Mushi said simply. "Not all of them remain in the mountains. Some are near Omashu, advising King Bumi; I had the fortune of meeting them, many years ago. So I do know means of fending off lesser spirits. We could not cleanse the land as a shaman would, and bid a kami depart... but my nephew and I are healers, and any illness can be fought. We revealed the crime that had given it entry to our world, and the guilty were punished. It had no mortal form, but only one of spirit; sear that, and it was forced to abandon the physical world."

Sokka crossed skeptical arms. "Let me guess. You just decided to help Earth Kingdom peasants because you're really good people."

"Who said I was a good person?" Lee watched Sokka openly, hands still stroking black feathers. "People were going to die if somebody didn't do something. We were there."

And you weren't, Xiu could almost see Lee bite back.

"You... you don't make any sense!" Sokka sputtered. "We met Master Jeong Jeong. He said fire was just destruction and misery!"

Sadao looked startled; Teruko, outraged. "Always heard he was cracked," someone in armor muttered.

"General Jeong Jeong suffered greatly in the war," Mushi said plainly. "Fire has many uses, but my friend was most skilled at the most lethal. I do not doubt that weighs heavily on his spirit." He smiled gently. "I hope that we will find him, after we depart. If he could learn fire's other path, he might at last find peace."

Hakoda's eyes narrowed at that. Why? Xiu wondered. Doesn't he want them to leave after Sokka's friend is healed? It'd make things simpler for everyone. A lot simpler.

Unless the chief didn't want Lee to just leave.

In chains or dead. And those firebenders are calling him sir.

Not just a refugee. Lee and his uncle were important.

But Sokka says Lee's an exile. It doesn't make sense. "Why do you have to teach a general?" Xiu blurted out. Anything, to keep them talking. "If he's a master, doesn't he know all of firebending?"

Heavy silence. Lee swallowed. "This... this has been lost, Xiu. For a long time."

"At least two centuries," Mushi said gravely. "Our legends still speak of those who wielded the healing fire... but they are thought to be only legends. Stories for children. Not to be believed."

A legend. Lee found a legend? Xiu tried not to let her eyes widen. Suddenly, all the armor made a lot of sense. As did the chief's reaction. She liked Lee, she did, but the thought of the Fire Nation armies with healers on top of everything else.... Sorry, kid. Really. I just hope they don't hurt you.

"What, like the Avatar?" Sokka eyed Lee.

"How odd you should mention that," Mushi said, dangerously mild. "Do you wish to know our legend of the Avatar, Sokka? It is closely tied to the healing fire, and its extinction. Closely, indeed. Would you know of it? Or would you prefer to see the airbender as your sister sees him; a source of light and hope only, and not a font of misery, and grief, and devastation such as even you, who have seen the Siege of the North, have never witnessed?"

Xiu shivered. And didn't feel any better at the uneasy way the soldiers shifted, exchanging glances until Teruko gave Sadao a firm look. Sadao swallowed. "Sir. They're not...."

"It shames us to admit we could not protect our own, and we dislike showing shame to strangers," Mushi nodded.

Odd, Xiu thought, how Mushi could make dislike sound like I'd rather be hanged, drawn, and quartered.

"But as Toph has reminded me, part of this war resulted from the fact that we do not understand other nations. And they know even less of us." Mushi's gaze held Sokka's, not at all harmless. "The choice is yours. To hear - and believe, or not, if you hear. But you cannot unchoose it."

"Whatever he picks, somebody sure better tell me," Toph said bluntly. "I've got sand here, and I hear getting that out of armor bites."

Teruko blinked at the little blind girl, and suddenly grinned. "Sir, can we keep her?"

"Hey!" Sokka and Toph said as one.

Lee was actually shaking. Xiu drew back a step, wary-

Until she heard the first giggle.

Leaning on a chuffing Asahi, Lee shook with muffled laughter, wiping away a tear. "S-sorry, Toph," he hiccupped. "They think you're cute!"

"Cute?" Sokka yelped, as Toph's jaw dropped. "Have you lived with this girl? She's stubborn and short-tempered and destructive as a- Hey, wait a minute...."

"Thanks, Sokka. Thanks a lot." Toph poked Lee in the ribs. "Keep that up, you're going to hurt something."

"Too late," Lee snickered. "Oh, ow...."

"That was you!" Sokka burst out. "I knew I heard somebody laughing when we got the ship into the river... that was you!"

"Funniest thing I'd seen in months," Lee admitted, catching his breath. "All those pirates, chasing their own ship...." He sobered. "Then they stole our ship. That was a long walk."

An exile had a ship? Xiu shook her head. Sokka was right. Lee didn't make sense.

"Same pirates Katara stole the waterbending scroll from?" Toph asked, almost innocently.

"Yes; I believe they never did reacquire it," Mushi nodded.

"Stole?" Hakoda's face turned cold. "Truce or not, you have no right to insult my daughter."

He insulted her? Xiu thought, incredulous. Toph's the one who said it!

"It's... not an insult, Dad," Sokka said reluctantly. "She did. We didn't know until later. Man, you wouldn't believe how close that came to getting all of us killed..." He shot a suspicious glance at Toph. "How'd you know about it?"

She shrugged, and pointed at Lee. "We had some time to talk. And since Katara and Twinkletoes tend to leave stuff out that doesn't make them look good, I asked him what happened. South Pole on."

"You asked him?" Sokka said in disbelief.

"Why not? I know when people lie to me. I'm pretty sure Lee doesn't always know why you guys do things - he thinks Twinkletoes is crazy, and your sister's crazier - but just 'cause sometimes he's wrong, doesn't mean he's lying." She cracked her knuckles again. "So? Who's talking?"

"Him," Sokka pointed.

"Me?" Sadao gulped.

"If this is a tale of your people, you should know it as well," Hakoda said levelly. "And you just came ashore. So if Mushi is lying-"

"He's not," Toph said warningly.

"-Or shading the truth... you haven't had enough time to collaborate on a story." Hakoda eyed the firebender. Waiting.

"It's... well, I'm not a good storyteller, and-" Sadao made an abortive wave toward Xiu. "I'd rather not offer insult to the lady."

"Kyoshi," Sokka said suddenly. "This is about Avatar Kyoshi." He shook his head. "She's been dead almost two hundred years!"

"She has," Sadao allowed. "But we'll never forget. Even when you just read it in the history scrolls..." He swallowed dryly. "When we laid siege to the Northern Tribe - we're military, we know the risks. Nobody expected that, but... you go out to fight, everyone knows you might not come home. What she did..."

"I believe they need some background," Mushi said judiciously. "We are folk of the ocean, as you are, Chief Hakoda; for the Fire Nation is a land of islands, and some clans even live on shipboard, barely setting foot to land."

Fire Nation on the ocean? Xiu didn't try to keep her jaw from dropping. Everyone knew the Fire Nation invaded on ships, sure; but firebenders living on them? That was crazy. Wood burned...

Fire Navy ships are metal.

"And, just as your people have in the past when they were stronger," Mushi went on, "we have had our share of unsavory sorts who dealt in high-risk trading."

"Fire Nation pirates?" Sokka rolled his eyes. "Why do I have no problem seeing that.... Hey! We're not pirates!"

"Not now. History lessons, remember?" Toph said pointedly, before he could sputter more. "Some people say Chin the Conqueror got his start power-grabbing 'cause he set up coast watches that the Earth King wouldn't. For ships from all over the place. Not just from the West."

"Says the person books don't do anything for?" Sokka pointed out. "How do you know all this stuff?"

"You think poetry class is just for impressing people?" Toph smirked. "Poems get all kinds of stuff told. And I kind of doubt Fire Nation pirates ever came with," she scrunched her face in concentration, "Sails blue as deadly ice, howling as a blizzard, leaving winter in their wake."

"The Lay of Lan Hsi," Xiu blurted out. "I always thought he was just a cynical court poet. I mean, the Water Tribe's always been friendly to Kyoshi Island, and we're Earth Kingdom."

"Had to be friendly," Toph smirked. "They fenced a lot of their loot with you guys."

Xiu eyed her, not friendly. "You're not a proper young lady, are you?"

"Not if I can help it."

"Anyway," Sadao said hastily, trying to head off disaster, "the- Uncle is right. We used to have all kinds of water clans. Marsh clans, river clans, swamp clans... wave and mountain. That's who we used to be. And the waegu were pretty bad."

"The who what?" Sokka frowned.

"Water brigands," Lee filled in. "Pirates."

"History says they raided the Eastern Continent for decades," Sadao admitted. "They raided the rest of us, too, but that's what great names are for. Mostly, they only hit weak domains, and, well..." He shrugged. "You get together and fight, or you leave for a lord who will protect you. That's the way it was. Then."

"And the Fire Lord didn't try to stop these guys?" Sokka snorted.

Mushi's smile turned even milder, and Xiu winced. Oh, damn. I don't know what he set up, kid, but you just walked right into it.

"There was no Fire Lord," Mushi stated. "Not as you know them."

Xiu choked. "No Fire Lord?"

"It used to be only the title of the leader of the Fire Sages. Who served the Avatar." Mushi's smile never wavered.

Served the Avatar. Served the- Xiu felt faint.

"Uncle would know more about that than the rest of us," Sadao confessed. "But from what I learned in school, that's right. We weren't always a united nation. Just a bunch of feuding clans in the care of the great names." He swallowed dryly. "So when the Earth King kept sending messengers to us about the pirates... We didn't have a king. The pirates weren't the people of any loyal lord. The great names kept telling them that."

Mushi lifted a hand slightly. "I would only add that there were, in truth, one or two of the great names who did harbor the waegu. We were not all blameless. But the Earth King demanded of us that we hunt them down and destroy them, utterly. And that, no one had the authority to do." He nodded, yielding the story back to Sadao.

"There was no warning," Sadao said quietly. "There just... usually, when a hurricane hits, people can feel the way the wind shifts. Watch the birds, the animals. It's not much, but even a day to get people away from the water-" He shuddered. "The scrolls say one moment the sky was clear. The next, the storm was on us."

"Kyoshi walked on the wind, and threw down lightning," Lee said levelly. "She came for the pirates, and she showed no mercy." Fingers curled, white-knuckled. "And she got them."

"But a storm like that isn't just wind and rain," Sadao nodded. "It - it pushes the sea ahead of it. High as a tsunami, sometimes. This one was bad. Worse than any storm in the records. The waves were topping forty feet! And maybe that doesn't sound like much to you, but- Spirits, do you know how many islands aren't even thirty feet high?"

Xiu shook her head, trying to deny what she was hearing. No. Oma and Shu, no.

"You can still see the high-water mark in Byakko, where the storm surge shoved boulders up," Teruko said grimly. "Our clan only came off as good as we did because we're a mountain clan. Shirotona's one oni of a big one, and it broke the storm's force. For some of us."

"Scrolls I found said Kyoshi was taught by a mountain firebender," Lee stated. "Maybe she didn't know the wave clans. Maybe she had no idea how many of us she was going to kill. But she brought the storm. And we died."

"Her storm swept over the whole nation," Sadao said bleakly. "The best estimates... no one really knows. Maybe two hundred thousand deaths. Most historians think it was a lot more."

"The wave clans were eviscerated," Mushi said levelly. "And with them we lost much. Firebending was not one style, centuries ago. It was many. Every domain had their own, sharpening it against their neighbors. And as all great names were equal in dignity, so all styles had respect, and no one was acclaimed the sole and best." He paused. "Until the Avatar decreed otherwise."

"Avatar Kyoshi declared we had brought this on ourselves, by harming her people," Sadao stated, eyes grim. "And so she wouldn't have to ever come back, she decreed that the Fire Lord, the most powerful of all firebenders, touched by Agni himself, would now rule all the domains. The Fire Lord would be responsible for his people. All of them. Even the worst criminals." His gaze slid sideways, toward Lee. "Only an exile is outside that authority. By the Avatar's own words." Sadao shook his head. "Kyoshi only set foot in our nation for one day... and we were lost."

"People petitioned her for the rest of her life to take it back," Lee said bitterly. "Her answers on record pretty much fall into no, no, and hell no. When she died? The whole Fire Nation was drunk for a week. And then we got Roku. Who looked at the world and said, hey, everything's fine, I'm not going to change anything." Flames blazed from clenched fists, blooming and fading like venomous flowers. "Damn you! Damn all of you! People saw the war coming! They tried to stop it! But the Avatar said everything was just perfect, while my people were going insane!"

It can't be true. Xiu could barely hear herself think over her own heartbeat. It can't be.

"So when people like your sister tell the Avatar he's their hope, when the other nations cheer that the Avatar has returned - we remember, Sokka. We remember Kyoshi ripped the heart from us in one day. And she didn't even mean to do it." Lee's lips curled; a snarl, that had nothing human in it. "Just like Aang. Never. Wants. To hurt. Anyone."

Teruko's eyes narrowed, and she reached a hand through shimmering air to rest on Lee's shoulder. "Breathe, sir. Just breathe."

"So." Mushi looked from Sokka to Hakoda, with a glance of sympathy for Xiu. "Now you know. Kyoshi came, she destroyed, and she left, never lingering to see what she had wrought. Denying, for the rest of her life, the deaths we claimed; for as she swore, only criminals and outcasts lived in fetid, trackless swamps." He sighed. "Perhaps those of the Earth Kingdom could have mourned their losses, changed their lives, and moved on. But we are fire. We fight. And that we could not fight her, that we could not save the lives of those who had done nothing save live in the path of Kyoshi's fury... it has festered in us, ever since." Another searching glance. "As I have tried to tell your daughter, Chief Hakoda... yes, much of what the Fire Nation has done this past century is evil. And I believe the war should end. But the roots of that evil lie in pain. The pain of the mountain clans for their lost cousins of the sea. The pain of parents, knowing they are helpless to defend their children should the Avatar choose to punish us again." He looked straight at Hakoda. "The pain of children crying for mothers lost, and abandoned by those sworn to protect them."

Hakoda rocked back, eyes narrowed. "Let me guess," he said darkly. "Not a threat. Just a warning."

Mushi inclined his head. "I pray you will take it so."

"Then why help at all?" Hakoda said bluntly.

"Because I'm an idiot," Lee managed, fists finally loosening. "He's twelve. He was raised by monks. He doesn't know what people are like. How much damage he can do. How easy it is to hurt people. With bending. With fists. With words. And he doesn't know what he doesn't know." He glanced at Sokka, then back to Hakoda. "Your son is an honorable and determined opponent. You taught him. You are an honorable opponent. You've fought our nation without bending. Without waiting for the Avatar. Without trying to use him for your own ends, like everyone else on the planet." Lee blew out a breath, just slightly steaming. "You're Katara's father. And he listens to Katara." He swallowed. "Please."

An injured child, Xiu realized. A twelve-year-old Lee was healing... The Avatar is here?

"I've lost my wife to your war," Hakoda said tautly. "I've lost men I knew, and trusted. To you."

"When someone boards my ship to kill my men, I don't just let it happen," Lee said quietly. "You're risking that Captain Jee will hold the truce and not call in rest of the navy to wipe out your fleet. I'm risking that you're willing to teach Aang to be responsible. To think before he shoves people off a cliff." He shook himself, as if casting away hope. "Spirits, if an Avatar's going to kill my people, at least let it not be an accident."

Silence stretched between them. Xiu shivered in the wind.

"We'll think about what you've said," Hakoda said at last.

Lee inclined his head, gracious as a noble.

And he probably is, Xiu realized, as Toph silently joined a shell-shocked Sokka. "Who are you?" the weaver blurted out.

Lee smiled wryly. "Trust me. You don't want to know."

He might be right, Xiu admitted to herself, as the four of them headed back into camp. Fire Nation, after all. When had any of them been anything beyond misery and pain to her people? "They were lying, right?" She barely recognized her own voice, hurt and desperate. "Kyoshi wouldn't..."

"They weren't lying," Toph said quietly.

"Which doesn't mean it's all true," Sokka said, determined. "It was centuries ago. Nobody's still alive from then. If they know it out of books - books can lie too, right?"

"You get me to Byakko, I can tell you if Teruko's lying about her rocks," Toph said practically.

"Til then? My mom used to read me old jokes about Kyoshi kicking out Fire Nation messengers. Want to know one of the punch lines?" She grimaced. "Too bad the sea didn't get the rest of them."

Oh, spirits, Xiu thought. Not funny.

"Sergeant Huizhong," Hakoda nodded as they approached the caravan. "Are we agreed?"

"We'll tell the Army your news," Huizhong said formally. "Given its critical nature, we'll leave as soon as possible." He bowed respectfully to the chief, and held out a hand.

Grateful, Xiu took it, and followed.

"Are you all right?" her boyfriend asked quietly, as they headed for her mount.

"I'm not sure I'll ever be all right again," Xiu admitted. I thought I knew her. I thought I knew my own people. "Huizhong... where would I find books on Avatar Kyoshi?"

"Besides Ba Sing Se University?" Huizhong said wryly. "I'll ask the general's aide. He knows stuff like that." He studied her as they walked. "Did they hurt you?"

"No," Xiu whispered. And squeezed his hand tighter. "They didn't hurt me."

They just broke my heart.

Chapter End Notes

In regard to "divine right" in the Fire Nation and Avatar Kyoshi's actions in regard to the Fire Lord... in this AU, divine right adheres to all the great names (daimyo).

Zuko's listing of Aang's injuries - check out "keraunomedicine" in Wikipedia. Lightning is nasty.

Iroh and Jee's bit to Teruko last chapter? Trust me, that wasn't singing praises. That was a warning. From what I've read, there is nothing harder to keep alive under fire than a smart young officer. The slower ones, you can maneuver out of the worst danger. Smart ones think up plans nobody would consider, and then jump into executing them without double-checking whether a more experienced person would actually do what they're about to pull off.

Munkh Khukh Tengri - Eternal Blue Sky. The Mongol religion of Tengriism is still practiced along with Tibetan Buddhism in Mongolia and a few other areas, and seems a reasonably good fit with people who have sky bison (the religion itself has the "wind horse" as an image of the soul, among other aspects).

Some example of the devastation of floods and tidal waves: 1642 in China, 300,000 deaths. 1887, Huang He River China, 900,000 deaths. 1931, Huang He River China, 3.7 million deaths. As for hurricanes and cyclones, on November 13, 1970, Bangladesh had 300,000 deaths; several other events there have killed people in the ten thousand to two hundred thousand range. Given the Fire Nation is all islands... oh, yeah.

A reviewer brought up that, being an island nation, the Fire Nation really ought to be balanced between fire and water, not just fire. Yes. Exactly. Asia is full of "aquatic civilizations"; people who live in, manage, and harvest wetlands. We see one river community in "The Painted Lady", but it's obviously in bad shape. There should be more. A lot more. There should be people of the marshes, the swamps, the rivers; there should be people living on boats. They're not there.

There has to be a reason for that.

Also, given the Fire Nation is the dragons' homeland, and I imagine hatchlings spit sparks, it's most likely a fire ecology. Which also fits with wetlands. Most wetlands burn. On a regular, natural basis. And there are plenty of "subtropical forest" type of environments that do the same; check out the longleaf pine ecosystem of the American Southeast. Never mind the volcanoes; the whole Fire Nation probably goes up in flames on a timescale ranging from once a decade to once a year.

Fire ecologies are dynamic equilibriums. They have lots of disturbances; hurricanes, lightning, and fire being some of the most common. But over the long term and large scale, they are stable. Somewhere is burning; somewhere has just burned; somewhere will burn, soon.

If the people reflect the land, and their element... there is no way the Fire Nation would be an absolute monarchy. What they should be is a swarm of competing clans, going to war with each other on a regular basis. Aggression turned inward, not out.

And yes, in situations like that, you get pirates. Lots of them. Historically, the wako (waegu) of Japan raided all up and down the coast of China for well over a century under just those circumstances. The Emperor was not happy.

Canonically, Avatars are prone to overkill. And Kyoshi in specific seems to have had a short fuse. "How dare you defy your Avatar", indeed. And splitting off a whole island? What are the odds Chin was the only person killed, when Avatar-powered earthbending cut through miles of forest and farmland?

So. My take, in this AU, of the "darkest day in Fire Nation history". The hurricane came and went over a lot longer, but in those eight minutes, when Agni could not help... Kyoshi created the rule of the Fire Lord.

One of the scariest phrases, ever? It seemed like a good idea at the time.

There's one other thing about fire ecologies. Sooner or later, they will burn. And the longer fire is excluded, the worse the destruction.

Chapter 28

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Sokka sat in the new tent they'd put up over Aang, breathing in familiar scents of furs and lamp oil, and tried not to think.

Zuko's got a reason for chasing us.

He didn't want to believe it. He really, really didn't. But he'd seen Aang in the desert, rampaging away until Katara brought him back to earth. And Roku in the temple. And heard about Kyoshi's lethal dealings with Chin from... well, her.

"What kind of Avatar says 'Oops'?"

Aang did. Oh. Man.

Toph was checking Aang's pulse again, as Katara got broth ready for the next time Aang woke up. Both of them seemed steady as a rock. Katara was actually humming, stroking Momo as he clung to her shoulder.

The Fire Nation's got a reason for wanting Aang dead.

It scared him. In a way even staring into the face of an invasion fleet hadn't. What the heck was he supposed to do?

"Copper for your thoughts, Snoozles?"

"I... how can you be so calm?" Sokka burst out. "After what they said?"

Humming stopped, and Katara rolled her eyes, Momo peeking past her. "What did Zuko say this time?"

"Wasn't Zuko. More Uncle, and some other firebenders. And, tell you when Aang wakes up," Toph said decisively. "It's about Kyoshi. He ought to have a say." She shrugged. "Sokka, people don't do things without a reason. Maybe not a good one, all the time. But they've usually got one. The Fire Nation kept hunting Aang when no one'd seen the Avatar for a hundred years? Nobody does that without a really, really important reason." She frowned. "And one of those poems always kind of bugged me. Talked about an air monk dropping in on Omashu to tell the king not to worry, Roku kicked Sozin's invasion back out."

"But the Air Nomads were dead," Katara objected. "And so was Roku."

"Unless going after the Air Temples wasn't Sozin's first try," Sokka thought out loud.

"Gee, why would that not surprise me," Katara snorted.

Sokka opened his mouth to protest... and shut it again, sighing. He wasn't up to arguing with Katara. Not until he'd sorted things out in his own head. "Toph. When Iroh was talking to those guys about Aang not being the enemy-"

"What?" Katara interrupted. "How could you let him say that? They're Fire Nation!"

"Yeah, they are. But they're soldiers," Toph pointed out. "That means they follow orders. Like holding Captain Jee's truce, right now." She cocked her head at Katara. "So if Aang takes out Fire Lord Ozai - what if the next Fire Lord offers a truce?"

"Which would kind of be the smart thing to do, if Aang's on our side," Sokka nodded.

"You got it. Uncle wants the war to stop, too," Toph stated. "But how's it gonna, if people like Teruko think Aang wants them dead? Not just the Fire Lord, but the whole Fire Nation? Think about it."

"Aang never wants anybody dead," Katara frowned. "He's too nice."

"Trust me, nice is not what the Fire Nation thinks Aang is," Sokka said soberly. "So you think Iroh's trying to-?" He couldn't quite find the words.

"He's trying to tell them that maybe the war could stop," Toph said practically. "That's kind of a new idea. Scary. But if they listen, then maybe when Aang goes in and we win, they'll stop fighting." She lifted eyebrows at Sokka. "Think that's worth keeping quiet for?"

"Yeah." Sokka grinned suddenly, some of that nebulous fear of we might lose Dad again slipping away. "Thanks."

"No problem." Toph's head jerked up. "Hey!"

"Uh..."

Sokka didn't think; just dove for his best friend with the rest of them.

"Ow..."

"Give him some room," Katara directed, carefully propping Aang up on his side. "Hey. You're back."

"Bad dream," Aang whispered, still not opening his eyes. His hand brushed fur, before Momo nestled under it and chittered. "Bato? No... he went to join up with your dad, didn't he...?"

"You know he did," Katara said, startled. "Aang, that was months ago."

"Zuko said he'd be confused." Sokka frowned. "That lightning kind of... rips up channels in the body, like flooding a field."

"Zuko?" Aang blinked at him, just barely. "We haven't seen him since the desert. Have we?"

Sokka raised a finger to lecture, then paused to think. Come to think of it, in all that mess, when would Aang have had a chance to see Zuko in the palace? "You had a vision, we headed back to Ba Sing Se, we found Toph...?"

"A vision?" Aang shook his head a little, and winced. "I thought it was a bad dream... had to be..."

"You know, sometimes if you tell someone about it, it helps," Katara encouraged him.

Aang scrunched his eyes shut. "You were in it."

"Because of what Zuko did," Katara said grimly.

"No... Zuko wasn't there..." Aang gathered his courage, and looked at her. "It was you, and Azula, and you were... it was stupid." He smiled faintly. Winced again, coughing.

"Here." Katara helped shaking hands get broth down. "It's okay. We're all fine. With Dad."

"Seemed so real..."

"Might not be a dream," Toph said thoughtfully. "You guys and Azula and the Dai Li were really going at it, before you got hit."

"Uh-uh." Gray eyes lost focus as he smiled up at Katara. "I know you'd never do that. You'd freeze her, you'd stop her, but you'd never... you know death's not the answer..."

"I know what?" Katara choked.

"...Make a good airbender..." Eyes sliding shut, Aang leaned against her.

Sokka eyed his slack-jawed sister, and Aang's slow breathing, and stepped in to ease his friend back under the furs. Momo's ears drooped, but the lemur seemed to sigh, curling back up near Aang's head. "Let's let him sleep," Sokka said. "It's good for him, right?"

Katara nodded, eyes still wide. "He thinks... but..."

"He thinks you weren't trying to kill Princess Crazy," Toph said bluntly. "Boy, is he in for a rude wake-up call."

"Toph," Sokka frowned.

"What? Twinkletoes thinks your sister's the next best thing to a good updraft. She's all about positive reinforcement; I guess that is like an airbender. And airbenders don't kill."

"But- she was trying to-" Katara sputtered.

"I'm not complaining," Toph said bluntly. "She tried to fry me, I'd take her out too." Blind eyes looked lost. "I don't like to think about it. I've felt it when things go wrong in a rumble. When people get hurt. I don't want to. But if it was Azula, or you guys - yeah, I'd take her down."

"But Aang never wants to hurt anyone," Sokka muttered, uneasy. The pure, feral rage he'd seen on Zuko's face when he'd said that - a fury he'd never seen on the firebender in any battle, even when the Avatar had been tossing men like matchsticks...

No. He had seen it. Once.

"No matter. Sooner or later... he has to come out."

Sokka remembered it like yesterday, instead of almost half a year ago. Zhao's smirk, and the incandescent rage as Zuko had struggled against steel chains, helpless as the rest of them on the winter solstice-

Zuko was fighting. But he couldn't break the chains, Sokka realized, taken aback. Not until after Roku... seared the chains off of us. "Roku helped Zuko."

"What?" Katara looked at him as if he'd lost his mind.

"On the solstice," Sokka said soberly. "Not as much as he helped us, but he did. He could have left Zuko there, or broken up the temple so he had to end up back in Zhao's lap. But he didn't. He gave Zuko just enough help so he could break loose. Why did he do that?" Sokka eyed Toph directly.

"Why's Zuko asking Dad to look after Aang, if all he wants to do is drag him off to Ozai?"

"Because he's a lying, evil firebender," Katara shrugged. "You know he's only helping Aang to save his own skin. And theirs." She jerked her head toward the bay. "He knows what I can do to them, anytime Dad says the truce is over."

"You better not. Not while Uncle's still standing," Toph said soberly. "I can take Zuko, if we have to. Uncle? No way. Not if someone really ticked him off."

"You and General How!" Katara flung up her hands. "Do you believe he wanted to send a whole army after their teashop? And he told them to kill Iroh if they couldn't grab him?"

Sokka felt a chill down his spine, and saw his own alarm on Toph's face. "Katara?" he managed, grateful his voice didn't squeak. "Do us all a favor. Don't say that around Zuko."

"Why not? It's not like it's an insult," Katara said sarcastically. "If he can call me a thief and get away with it, we can tell him the truth." She frowned at him, worried. "Come on, Sokka. We've seen Zuko mad before."

"No," Sokka muttered under his breath. "I'm not sure we have." He sighed. "Let's just keep everybody calm for a few more days. Let Zuko handle the lightning-mess in Aang's head... What?"

His sister grimaced. "It's just hard to believe Zuko knows what he's doing."

"Maybe you should watch us bend sand sometime," Toph smirked.

"Bend what?" Sokka wasn't sure which of them yelled it. Though it was definitely him that went on, "I thought - glassy rock, you-"

"Zuko doesn't bend like other firebenders," Toph said plainly. "He's figured something out. It's part of how he heals. And it's got a lot in common with metalbending." Another smirk. "It's not easy, but if he can find fire in something? Like I can find earth in metal? He can move it."

"He can move hot sand?" Katara rolled her eyes, and went back to fussing with Aang's furs. "I'm so impressed."

What, did you think Toph lost Appa to sandbenders because they were easy to beat? Sokka almost said. And stopped, before the first words could leave his mouth. Appa. Moving things that aren't fire. And he was a healer in Ba Sing Se. With a license. "He's Lee."

"Come on!" Katara said impatiently. "Toph told us he was a..." Words died on her lips.

"A Fire Nation waterbender Amaya was training to heal," Sokka finished. "If he can move stuff that's hot - he can move hot water." He swallowed. Amaya knew. She had to know. Why? So what if he can heal; he's Fire Nation! "Toph, why?"

"Because we needed help," Toph shot back, just as blunt. "He knew where Appa was, and he knew what Long Feng was going to do, and he asked, Sokka. He asked me to help him get Aang out of Ba Sing Se, so it wouldn't be the North Pole all over again."

"You lied to us?" Katara recoiled.

"What part of we needed help did you not get?" Toph said impatiently. "They were hiding in the middle of Ba Sing Se; they were dead if they were caught! General How? Not joking! If he'd had a chance to kill Uncle, he would have!" She swung her head toward Sokka. "Zuko knew that, and he went down into Dai Li headquarters anyway. To help us help Aang. And yeah, a lot of why he did it was so Aang wouldn't kill lots of Fire Nation people. He's a prince. He's got to think of things like that. But part of why he did it? To help us." Toph took a breath. "'Cause crazy as it sounds, Katara... he wants to believe in Aang, too."

"Are you kidding?" Sokka said in disbelief. "After what they said about Kyoshi?"

"Will someone tell me what they said about her?" Katara said impatiently.

"Long story. If it's true, and I think it is - worst day ever." Toph shrugged. "I said he wants to, Sokka. Zuko knows a lot of stuff he wants is never going to happen." Her voice turned sour. "Like Aang figuring out that gee, Azula really wants to kill us, and maybe we're gonna have to kill her right back."

"Of course Aang knows that," Katara insisted. "He's going to kill the Fire Lord."

"No." Sokka's heart sank. "He's going to face the Fire Lord. That's what he always says. Face him. Stop him." He winced. "Aang's never said kill."

"But he has to," Katara insisted. "We have to finish the Fire Nation. We have to bring balance back to the world. No one else can do it!"

"Why?" Sokka said, half to himself. He was close to something, he knew it. Like that moment he and Ji the Mechanist had shared, staring at each other over the stench of a rotten egg.

"Why?" Katara glared at him, disbelieving. "Did you lose the last century somewhere? They murdered the Air Nomads, attacked the Earth Kingdom, invaded the North Pole, and oh, let's not forget, they killed Mom!"

"That's - not what I meant," Sokka managed, hurting inside. Mom. I miss you. A lot. "I mean, why does it have to be Aang?" He looked over them all. "Why can't it be us?"

"Go, Snoozles," Toph murmured, grinning.

"No disrespect to Boomerang, but you're not even a bender," Katara said practically. "How would you take on the Fire Lord?"

"The same way Zuko tracks us," Sokka stated, determined. "Using my head. Zuko's not a problem because he's a bender-"

"Were you even in the Spirit Oasis?" Katara interrupted. "Or did I just imagine all that fire coming my way?"

"That's not the point," Sokka argued. "He could have been one guy with blasting jelly. Or too many soldiers for you to freeze. The point is, how did he even get there?"

"By being really sneaky," Toph said bluntly. "He's good at it."

"Sneaky and evil. What a surprise." Katara rolled her eyes.

"Zhao was pretty evil," Sokka shrugged, "But I wouldn't ever call him sneaky." He pointed at Toph. "And you know something."

"Not exactly know," Toph said thoughtfully. "It's something I figured out. Playing with sand with Sparky."

"Would you stop calling him that?" Katara demanded. "You make him sound like a friend!"

"He is a friend," Toph said seriously. "He took a hit from Ty Lee for me. On purpose. Maybe he calls that an ally, but honestly? I trust him." She crossed her arms. "And maybe he's not the best firebender out there, but Zuko's learned something I just wish I could pound into Aang's head. He pays attention to other elements." She whipped her head toward Sokka. "When's the last time you paid attention to fire?"

"Um - ah - huh?" Sokka managed.

"Let me back up." Toph frowned. "Did Bato tell you about that whole High War and Low War bit?"

"Sometimes they fight straight out, sometimes they sneak?" Sokka shrugged.

"Pretty much," Toph nodded. "Did you know fire can burn underground?"

"It can?" Sokka said blankly. "How? There's nothing there to burn, it's all-" He halted, jaw dropping.

"The ground isn't frozen here, is it?" Katara shook her head, stunned. "It's not just thawed pretty deep. It's really not frozen?"

"You got it." Toph puffed a black strand out of her face. "People think about fires on the surface. They miss that sometimes, it just burns into the ground. Goes through tree roots, coal veins... all kinds of things. And it smolders in there, and inches past where you think it's safe - and maybe weeks later, it blows back up, and there's trouble all over the place." She nodded at Sokka. "You're right. Zuko's not dangerous 'cause he's a firebender. Though it helps. He's trouble because he's fire. Not the straightforward, blast furnace stuff. That little ember that hangs in there, waiting, keeping it together until he can get one good shot." She paused. "And he's not the Avatar, either."

Katara rocked back on her heels, defeated. "So that's it. We can't ever trust them. Any of them."

"That's not what I said," Toph insisted.

"I know," Katara said quietly. "But you've lied for them before."

Toph blanched.

"Aang's lied to us a couple times, too," Sokka pointed out, thinking of a crumpled map, and Zuko hunting them by a lost necklace. "Sorry, Toph. I get why you did it. And I guess it came out all right. And maybe Zuko's not such a bad guy... as long as he's helping you. But we've got a bigger problem than I thought, and I'm not sure how to help Aang out with this one. The Fire Nation teaches everyone to fight. If all the women fight - how can we ever trust them to talk the men out of starting the war again?"

Toph buried her face in her hands. "We're talking the same language, I swear... so why do I feel like when we say truce, none of us means the same thing?"

"A truce is a truce," Katara frowned. "Women decide they've had enough fighting and come to drag their husbands home. Or our men tell the other men that they're going to, and no guy wants to be embarrassed like that..." She looked aside, and grudgingly admitted, "Or the men decide they've got to take a break and patch each other up before they start hacking again. Though I don't know how Dad's trusting them to do that."

Toph was silent. Lifted her hands, raising a block of stone from sand. Hit it with her head, crumbling it back into bits. Raised it again, and hit it again.

"Toph?" Sokka said, worried.

"...Argh." A scrunch of fingers, and shards dissolved back into sand. "No wonder Zuko thinks you're all crazy."

"He's the one who's crazy!" Katara objected.

"Wait." Sokka frowned. "Toph? What's a Fire Nation truce?"

"Til today? I thought I knew. Now? Not sure." Toph growled under her breath. "And now I'm kind of wondering what Aang means by truce... In the Earth Kingdom? Women don't get a say. It's the nobles and the generals who say when people are going to stop fighting. And they don't stop just because someone's had enough. Either their army's really hurt, and they've got to pull men out - or the enemy's crushed."

And that was earth. Sokka tried to take Toph's advice, and think about that with fire. And swallowed. He'd heard Zuko talk about reclaiming his honor. Who hadn't? And he'd added that to the sheer number of times they'd bumped heads with the firebender, and the fact that, charcoaled villages aside, no one ever got burned, really...

I screwed up. Oh man, did I ever. "Hunting Aang's not about honor, is it? Because if it was - we keep embarrassing him. We even tied him up and rescued him off the ice! He owes us his life. That'd wipe out any honor he could win by beating us, ever."

Toph whistled. "You get honor by fighting?"

Sokka choked. Earth Rumble champion, best fighting bender he'd ever seen besides Katara, and... "You mean you don't?"

Toph flung up her arms. "Hello? Little blind helpless merchant daughter, remember? I'm supposed to honor my family by respecting my parents, never shaming them, and marrying whatever guy they want to build an alliance with when I'm old enough. Doesn't matter that I never wanted any of it. There's only a couple ways I could bring more dishonor on my parents than doing what I'm doing now. And they're all ugly." For a moment, she looked like she wanted to cry. "I told you. I gave up everything to come teach Aang!"

"But... he's the Avatar," Katara said, stunned. "He's the most important person in the world."

"Not to my parents," Toph said bluntly.

"Well, we already knew your parents were-" Katara cut herself off.

"My parents are what?" Toph challenged.

"I'm sure they were just worried about you," Katara reassured her. "Your bending's really surprising."

"You think my parents are selfish," Toph said, dead level.

"I didn't say that," Katara started.

"But you would have," Toph stated. "Anybody else, you would have. 'Cause that's what you really think. Anybody who doesn't help Aang, the most important person in the whole world, is selfish." Her toes dug into sand, blind green eyes scrunched and angry.

No way is this going to end well, Sokka winced. "Selfish or not, doesn't matter," he said bluntly. "Everybody who's not helping, is one more person we need to get around to end the war." He looked straight at Katara. "And everybody who is helping, makes it shorter. Doesn't matter why they're doing it."

Katara planted her fists on her hips, eyes narrowed-

"No," Sokka said soberly, before she could even start. "You can't have it both ways, Katara. You can't say you want the war to stop, and you want everybody helping Aang because they want to. We don't have time. Aang doesn't have time. We've got two months before the eclipse, and we're not going to get any help from the Earth King. We're going to have to make a new plan, and find anybody we can who will help. Anybody."

Katara glared at him. "So you'd take Zuko?"

Sokka's jaw dropped. "Are you crazy?" he managed. "Sure, we could use another healer. People are going to get hurt." And you're going to be right in the middle of it; who's going to help if you get hurt? "But he's the Fire Lord's son. If Iroh wouldn't even teach Aang firebending to go up against his little brother - come on, Katara. I just want Zuko here long enough to make sure Aang's okay. That's all." He held out empty hands. "You know I wouldn't do that to you, or Dad. What's wrong?"

"...You just both seem to like him." Katara glanced away.

"I do like him," Toph said bluntly. "He's got rock down pretty good, for a firebender. But he knows I'm on your side." She smiled a little. "That's kind of what I like about him."

"I don't like him," Sokka stated. "I just... I understand him, a little. Which is kind of weird, but..." He waved his hands, trying to put it into words. "He followed us all the way from the South Pole. He was in Ba Sing Se, just like us. He's... it's crazy, but I kind of feel better with him here. If he's the guy after Aang, we know what kinds of things he'll try. And we know what he won't do." Sokka blew out a breath. "All the time he's been chasing us? All the people he's fought to get to Aang? Nobody died, Katara. Nobody."

"That's not what Asiavik says."

Blindsided, Sokka shook his head. "What?" Why would the fleet's herb-healer say that? "Zuko's been chasing us since winter. The closest he's come to the fleet is almost running into Bato-"

"If that's what he told you, he's lying. Again." Katara's eyes were hard. "He's killed people, Sokka. He's killed our people."

"Yeah. Before he found Aang, and after your guys boarded him," Toph said bluntly. "Your dad mentioned it."

"And you like him?" Katara demanded.

"Hey, I like Aang, too," Toph shrugged. "And I've heard what he did at the North Pole."

"That's not the same, and you know it!"

"No. It's not," Sokka said flatly. "But if we end the war the way Aang wants us to - take out the Fire Lord, and get everybody else to surrender - there's going to be a lot of Fire Nation people left who killed somebody." He sighed. "Nobody's asking you to like Zuko. Spirits, go ahead and hate his guts! Just - if he's Lee, he trained with Amaya." And she'd claimed him as part of her tribe. Crazy. Trained healing, Katara. Even if he's doing it with fire. So can you listen to him tell you how he's healing Aang? Even if you hate him? So you can do it later?"

Katara bit her lip, looking down. "I don't like it." She sighed. "But for Aang? Of course I can do it."

Sokka smiled, relieved. And tried to hang onto that smile, as realization turned his guts to knots.

The worst day ever. And they couldn't protect themselves.

The darkest day in Fire Nation history. He'd bet on it. Which meant when they used the solar eclipse so Aang could face the Fire Lord-

It's going to be Avatar Kyoshi all over again. They're going to be madder than a swarm of vulture-hornets.

Not that he cared how mad the Fire Nation got. Not if the war stopped. But if Aang couldn't kill Fire Lord Ozai...

We'd better get this right the first time.

By the end of summer. Watching Zuko run through cold katas to mend tattered patience, Asahi curled in a feathery lump nearby, Iroh tried not to frown. He'd promised Toph he would not ask what Roku had said about Aang facing Ozai. He'd never promised not to speculate.

Sozin's Comet, the eclipse, or something only the spirits know of, the retired general judged. If the spirits choose to warn us, we will learn of the last in time, or not. If it is one of the others...

Sozin's Comet would affect the entire world. There was nothing he or Zuko could do to prepare for an angry Avatar on that day that they would not already be doing. The eclipse, though... that was quite another matter.

If the Fire Sages have calculated correctly, the effects of sun-shadow should reach from a bit east of Omashu, west through the very heart of the Fire Nation, Iroh recalled. Ba Sing Se is too far west to be affected, and our chosen sanctuaries too far north. We should be fine.

But the Fire Nation might not be.

Eight minutes, Iroh knew. And Ozai's commanders should know when it is coming. Aang is not Kyoshi; he cannot even have mastered earthbending yet. And there has been no one to teach him fire.

Still. Even if the Avatar's training was incomplete, his friends might well make the difference. Sokka, Katara, Toph; all had proven themselves against warriors. And while Chief Hakoda's fleet could only harry the Fire Navy as a whole, give it one defined target, and the man could cause incredible damage.

They would have a chance, Iroh judged. Not a good chance... but my nephew has faced worse odds, and lived.

Though never without a cost. And that, Iroh feared. Aang was young, and even now, frighteningly innocent. Should the Avatar lose someone he cared for in such a rash assault, even if it should succeed...

Iroh winced, all too able to picture that blind rage. So. If they have such plans... what should we do?

Little they could do, for now, he feared. His nephew's previous letter to Sokka had been worse than ignored, from the evidence.

Yet if what Zuko tells me of this healing is accurate, Aang should be coherent soon. Within a day; two, at most. If we can arrange to speak with him, directly-

Teruko cleared her throat. "Sir? Just thought you'd like to know Lieutenant Sadao is back on the Suzuran."

That was definitely a hint of relief, under the professional calm. Iroh raised an eyebrow. "I take it this simplifies your duties, Lieutenant?"

"Ah. Sir. Well." She hesitated, then sighed. "General. Sadao's competent, he listens to the captain, and he always tries to do right by the ship and her people." She paused. "And he lives convinced that somebody's going to forget a bolt in a trebuchet, and it'll collapse on top of him."

"Has one?" Iroh asked mildly.

Teruko hesitated. "Don't think I ever asked, sir. But it's not trebuchets specifically. He's nervous about everything." She waved a hand toward the camp. "And in the middle of this..."

Indeed. A nervous firebender, in the midst of a fragile truce? Unwise. "Perhaps we will be fortunate, and my nephew will have time to share tales of misery," Iroh smiled. "That might go far in easing his mind."

"The prince isn't nervous, sir."

Iroh chuckled at her polite confusion. "It is a matter of degree. Your fellow officer fears the world is trying to kill him. My nephew knows it is. And shapes his life accordingly."

"Polar ice tends to kill anyone, sir."

And if that wasn't a shy request for gossip, Iroh had never heard one. "It is a technique I developed decades ago, when I believed Fire Lord Azulon meant to mount another invasion of the Northern Water Tribe. Those plans never came to fruition, and I served in the Earth Kingdom instead. So I have taught the method to my family, but it does not seem to have reached the common style." He breathed deep, and breathed; not the roaring exhalation that had granted him his infamous nickname, but quick, shallow puffs of flame that were the only outward sign of breath lacing chi through blood to warm it. Reached out, and touched her hand.

Teruko's brows shot up; as well they might, at fingers suddenly fever-warm. "Sir, if you could show me that sometime... The prince is frost-proof?"

"One might better say, highly resistant," Iroh nodded. "It was still foolhardy and desperate, to try and infiltrate through ice. But as for dealing with ice, and other elements... My nephew expected to find and capture the Avatar. It is true, he is not the most skilled at facing firebenders. But against other benders? Of all our nation who have faced Aang, only two have truly given him a fight. My nephew... and Princess Azula." The retired general smirked, just a little, thinking of word brought by certain contacts. "Admiral Zhao once had Aang cornered on a riverbank, without means of escape... and the airbender managed to dodge in such a fashion that Zhao defeated himself."

"Not the best firebender?" Teruko arched a brow right back at him, subtly nodding toward where Zuko was steadily working through ever more advanced katas. "I've never even seen some of those before."

Nor have I, Iroh admitted to himself. "But you have seen many of them," he said thoughtfully, watching her reactions as his nephew moved. "They are of Byakko, are they not? Which may have begun as a mountain clan... yet now preserves remnants of what was once much more."

"You need to speak to Lady Kotone about clan matters, sir." She bit her lip. "But I've never seen Dragon Chases the Moon anywhere else."

"Is that what it is called," Iroh murmured, watching Zuko shift weight from his bent-kneed right foot to angled, retreating left; hands circling softly clockwise to cross before the sea of chi and spread wide again. He could picture the deceptively gentle fire it would raise; not the aggressive blocks common to firebending, but a swirling shield that would use its own currents of heat to shunt blows aside. "It is like the fire-shield that saved his life in the explosion..." Iroh paused, considering that. "Byakko trains with fires on the field?"

"Sir?" Her eyes weren't quite guileless.

"With flames raised from chi alone, that move would be a skillful block," Iroh observed. "Add another source of fire to draw from... That is what it is meant for, is it not? Circling draws fire in; calls it, as a waterbender her wave, or an airbender his breeze."

"I'll have to take your word for that, sir. Most people don't know anything about airbenders."

Iroh gave her a sharp look. Watched her try not to sweat.

And turned away, far more lighthearted than he'd been in months. "We really must find a way for my nephew to visit his grandparents. They seem most fascinating people."

"Good idea, sir. There's just this little problem called the whole Fire Navy--"

Fire exploded.

Lieutenant Teruko was as good as Jee had trusted her to be, thank Agni; she was between Zuko and the fires suddenly blazing on Suzuran before his nephew even knew he'd dropped out of kata. "No, sir," the marine said firmly.

"But Captain Jee," Zuko protested.

"Can handle this. Sir." She gave him a level look. "He's not alone, Prince Zuko. Give Sadao a real fight, and he's steady as a rock."

Zuko swallowed, as more fire bloomed and faint cries were carried on the wind. "Just exactly what is this, Lieutenant?"

"Nothing I did not expect," Iroh said candidly. "Though not quite this soon. Still, the caravan means our time here will be measured in days, so perhaps now is wise."

"What?" Zuko demanded, face pale with worry. "What is wise?"

Iroh sighed. "Nephew. You are his commander. There is not a chance in the world that Captain Jee would allow you to board his ship without being certain of his crew's loyalty." He met Zuko's gaze squarely. "And there is only one way to do that." A heartbeat, and he gave his nephew a wry smile. "Court manners, Prince Zuko. We are likely to have concerned hosts, and we must seem blamelessly ignorant."

"Don't worry, sir," Teruko said dryly, as Zuko tried to master himself. "All we have to do is mention Sadao and some misplaced blasting jelly. It's not the first time."

"But our own crew-" Zuko cut himself off, knuckles white. "Suzuran has more sailors than the Wani. Sailors... loyal to the Fire Lord." He winced. "I'm sorry, Uncle. I didn't think it through."

"No, you did not," Iroh said severely. "And you must consider that, in our future plans. We will likely encounter many loyal first to Fire Lord Ozai, no matter what arguments we bring in our defense. And to think that we can dissuade them all without bloodshed... no." He gripped his nephew's shoulder, comforting. "We will spare those we can. But to defend the lives of our people - a great name must never hesitate."

Zuko nodded, taking that hardest of lessons to heart. Straightened, and took a steadying breath, ready to face approaching, angry blue.

Iroh arranged his own features into artful innocence, and mentally crossed his fingers. Be alive, Captain. And be lucky.

"Timely action, Lieutenant," Jee nodded, eyes still on the singed and furious - or, for some, despairing - faces of their prisoners. "I'm afraid I'll have to ask you to stall any company for a bit..."

"Yes, sir." A bow, and a still-smoldering Sadao left him with the rest of the marines, heading above to the open deck. Delaying, just for a moment, to pat the shoulder of disbelieving Cook Luchan, who was still cupping ashes that had been a significant portion of their flour supplies. Before it had suffered an unfortunate encounter with Jee's need for a distraction and Sadao's... unenviable talent.

Sniffing, the cook burst into tears.

No fresh noodles for a while, Jee sighed to himself, as one of Luchan's assistants led him gently away. At least we have dried in storage... the prince's plan had better include how we're going to fund this madhouse. Sailors need to eat. Refugees, even more so.

Well. At least they'd be cutting the roster by an even dozen. Frankly, Jee was a bit startled the numbers hadn't been higher. Bad enough he'd flatly told his crew the truth about their princes' status, and what he didn't intend to do about it. Add in Prince Zuko's... unexpected gift...

"A waterbender," Seaman Koki spat. "You'd serve a mongrel instead of the Fire Lord?"

"I will follow wherever Prince Zuko leads, rather than see my people and my country ground under the heel of a woman who deserves, for her cruelty, the fate her brother has suffered for his mercy," Jee said levelly. "Princess Azula is a dragon-child. Our schools may not teach what that means, anymore... but if you've ever listened at your grandmother's knee, you know what evil a dark dragon is capable of."

That drew nervous looks from a few of the prisoners. But not Koki. "I challenge you! Blade to blade!"

"I do not accept." Jee's voice was iron. "You have proven yourselves enemies, you were overpowered, and you were taken. And our princes are still in danger on shore. I will not leave their efforts to founder if one of you should chance to get in a lucky shot." He raised one gray brow, gaze fixed on the seaman's. "Once they are on board, I will be free to accept your challenge."

Koki opened his mouth... and slowly shut it again, thoughts of imperial firebenders - one of whom, Teruko's marines had gleefully spread the word, was a swordsman - evidently waking a belated impulse towards self-preservation.

Jee nodded slightly. "The twelve of you present a problem. I have a fair idea how Princess Azula would solve it... but I have no stomach for abandoning men loyal to our nation to the Water Tribe's mercy. You'll be confined to the brig until such time as we can put you ashore. I won't guarantee that landing will be safe, but it will not be in the hands of our enemies."

"Sir." Chains rattled on Sergeant Aoi; a good man, and one Jee wished he didn't have to lose. "They'll execute you all."

Jee met his gaze squarely. "That may be. But as the general has illustrated... they have to catch us first." Stepping back, he nodded at the marines. "Secure them below."

That tended to, he made his way up to where Sadao was glumly waving at a ship off their port bow, full of disgruntled warriors. "What did you tell them?" Jee asked in an undertone.

"Nothing," Sadao said, even more glum. "They haven't asked us anything."

"Good, that makes things easier." Jee smiled at the wooden ship and its suspicious crew. "We can be properly polite, and send Chief Hakoda a hawk."

"A hawk- oh." Sadao brightened. "I can-"

"Stay here, in case our visitors decide to ask questions after all," Jee said firmly. "I'm not of the chief's rank, but I'll have to do." Still smiling, he headed back to the aviary. Ostentatiously wrote a note - shipboard dispute near flammables, handled now, our thanks for your understanding and forbearance - and slipped it into the message cylinder of a hawk held by grizzled Seaman Saburo.

And slipped a second message into another hawk's keeping.

The general's hands, to Teruko's, to Sadao's, to mine, Jee thought soberly. And now... "This hawk needs to find a person or place in Ba Sing Se," Jee said plainly. "I have information that will hopefully allow that."

Saburo took the offered sheet of paper, read it over carefully, and nodded. "It'll do." He stroked the hawk he was holding. "Her flight to cover her sister's?"

"And soon, if possible," Jee nodded.

"A few minutes," Saburo said tersely. Hesitated, and looked his captain in the eye. "A waterbender, sir?"

"We came that close to meeting the Ocean personally," Jee said wryly, thumb and forefinger a hair's width apart. "Apparently Prince Zuko did meet the Moon."

"Heh. Like Temul," Saburo muttered.

"Temul of Shu Jing?" Jee frowned.

Saburo started. "You know the story, sir?"

"I know there is a story," Jee said honestly. "General Iroh used to correspond with Master Piandao on a regular basis. But he said the town preferred not to talk about old defeats."

"Some defeat!" Saburo snorted. "Days, she held 'em... took Fire Lord Sozin himself to... well." A sudden smile split his weather-worn face. "Guess we can tell that story, now."

Jee looked at him for a long, suspicious moment. "Just how many would-be rebels are there on my ship?"

"Clear and bright, sir?" Saburo said honestly. "Suzuran's where they sent trouble, Captain. There's Lieutenant Teruko an' a few more from Byakko; there's me and a couple handfuls from Shu Jing, there's a good fifteen or so from Onishi, you an' a few more from Nara... I hear folks from there still remember this quiet li'l tyke in the gold, finding poor lost lion-dogs." He shrugged. "Thought you knew our roster, sir. How else did you pull out Koki and his like before they could make a move?"

He hadn't even thought of domain backgrounds, Jee realized. He'd just gone down the crew's list one by one, winnowing out in advance those he thought most likely to hold to the Fire Lord. "Sadao's from the main island," Jee objected.

"Yes, sir," Saburo nodded. "Fire Lord Sozin's domain. And the prince is here."

Oh. Spirits, that made a frightening amount of sense. "I'm not used to thinking of the domains," Jee admitted. "We've been one nation so long... I believe the prince's plan has merit. But as a man of Shu Jing, what do you think?"

"We've not warred with ourselves in living memory," Saburo said soberly. "It'll be hard, sir. Hard and painful." He sighed. "But if a land has to burn... rake the duff from the nest trees, soak what you can, toss that spark - and pray." He set down the bird for the shore, and let the other hawk grasp his gauntlet. "Good thing we're sending her now. There'll be rain with the sea breeze 'fore sunset, if my nose is right... A few minutes, sir, and I'll have her a course whistled. You go do officer stuff."

Jee lifted a brow. "Is everyone in Shu Jing like you?"

"Why, no, sir. Some poor, deprived souls are even polite."

"This," Hakoda said dryly, weighing the bland scrap of Jee's message in his hand, "is just too polite."

Perched on a tent pole waiting for a response, the hawk preened.

"Our guests claim to know nothing," Bato informed him. "Though Teruko said it could have been an accident with Sadao and blasting jelly." He paused. "And Zuko... well, he's cold as ever. But if he thinks no one's watching? He looks..." Bato hunted for words. "I hate to say it, but he looks like you. When some of us are going to do something damn risky and there's not a Moon-blessed thing you can do about it."

Like me? Hakoda frowned at the thought, eyeing the hawk, and then the sandbent shelter all but concealed by the blue camp in between them. Why on earth would Bato think a firebender looked anything like-

Tracks in the sand.

"Hakoda?"

The chief held up a hand; wait. Frowned more deeply, stalking around his own tent down to the tide-line, where the shush of waves could wash the noise from his mind. He spared one glance for the healer's tent, where his children were tending their friend as the airbender drifted in and out. And bracing for Zuko's next visit.

Aang's in good hands. Let it go.

Water and shore and quiet. And if the water was too warm, and the smells of the sea different... well, he'd gotten used to that, these past two years. Though it didn't stop him from fiercely longing for home.

If the exiled prince felt even a fraction of that desperate need, Zuko was a dangerous young man indeed.

He is that. And much more. "I don't think Zuko is a noble," Hakoda said thoughtfully.

"Prince," Bato pointed out, used to his old friend's odd tangents. "Even exiled, you can't get much more noble."

"He's not an Earth Kingdom noble," Hakoda clarified. "You've met them. Some of them make good leaders, but... they're not leaders because they're good. They have their positions because they're noble. The bad ones just tend to die at the Fire Nation's hands more often."

"Born to rank," Bato snorted. "Glad we're not that crazy. Sokka should be chief after you - Tui and La grant that's not for a long time! - but your son knows he has to earn it."

"And what has Zuko been doing, all these years of exile?" Hakoda said pointedly. "He's been searching for their most deadly enemy. The Avatar, who they believe could do... that."

Bato winced. Kyoshi's tale had raced through the camp faster than a rogue wave. Every man in the fleet had had a brush with those demonic storms. And every man knew what it was to live near shore with a wall of water coming down. "That's a long time to carry a grudge. If it's true."

"It's a grudge worth carrying that long. If it's true." Hakoda met Bato's scowl with a frank look. "Why else are we here? To make sure the Fire Nation never kills our wives and our children again. I'd fight them a hundred years, if that's what it took. And so would you."

"I might," Bato admitted. "But Kyoshi's dead."

"Is she?" Hakoda said bluntly. "Zuko said he'd encountered Roku and Yangchen, while trying to heal Aang. Sokka tells me he's seen Aang be Roku. And Kyoshi, when he needed her to speak the truth of a death almost four centuries ago." He paused, not liking where his thoughts had led. "If that's true... then in a way, so long as any Avatar is alive, Kyoshi still exists."

"It doesn't change anything."

"Doesn't it?" Hakoda said quietly. "I hate to admit a firebender's right about anything, but Iroh has a point. Facing evil is one thing. Facing men driven by revenge... that's a much harder fight."

"We always knew it'd be hard," Bato acknowledged. "All right. What's really bothering you?"

Hakoda sighed, looking over the water. Behaving water, unlike the crashing breakers any time Zuko and his daughter crossed paths. "Two things. First... I think Kanna was right about waterbenders."

"What?" Bato frowned. "You've seen how much Katara hates them. And none of us have attacked those firebending bastards."

"But we all want to," Hakoda said grimly. "Sokka told us Zuko saved their lives. We should at least be willing to hear them out. But it's like fighting the tide just to hold steady. And it's worse any time she has him in sight."

Bato started to protest... and let it die, unspoken. "You've told her we need this truce."

"And no one's broken it. Yet," Hakoda said bluntly. "But I wish Kanna was here. I'd like to ask her a few questions about waterbenders. And about why she left this Master Pakku to come to our tribe instead." He gave Bato a look askance. "The same Master Pakku who taught Katara."

Bato drew back a step, eyes dark. "You really think what we feel about these firebenders... isn't us."

"If I remember Kanna's stories right, a waterbender can't make you feel something you don't feel already," Hakoda stated, hunting through memory. "But they can pull on it. Like the moon on the ocean."

"Then she'd better stop pulling," Bato said bluntly. "We're not the only ones who know Kanna's stories. It's one thing to hate the Fire Nation; we all know what they've done. But a man's heart should be his own." He dusted off his hands; there's an end to it. "So what else is bothering you?"

Hakoda sighed. "Zuko's up to something." He was a father; he knew teenagers. That young man was too straightforward. He had to be up to something.

"He's Fire Nation. Of course he is," Bato snorted. "Capturing the Avatar."

"No. That's too obvious."

Bato eyed him, then marched in to put a hand on his forehead. "You don't seem delirious..."

"I'm serious," Hakoda stated, letting his old friend have his way. "Zuko's spent months chasing the Avatar. But who's been with the Avatar, all this time? Who do we know has been using every crazy scheme he can think of to keep Aang safe?"

Lifting his hand away, Bato let out a low whistle. "He's been outfoxing Sokka?"

"He's definitely been trying," Hakoda agreed. "Of all the Fire Nation who've gone after Aang, he's the only one who's managed to stay on their trail. That young man may well be a ruthless, lethal firebender, but one thing he is not, is stupid." Hakoda frowned at the Suzuran. "And neither is Jee. He knows we're not going to believe his explanation. But he also knows that as long as he does explain, we have no excuse to break the truce. Probably. Which implies that whatever happened on that ship is important to the prince..."

Oh. Spirits.

It was so simple. Daringly, crazily simple.

Prince Zuko was born the heir to the throne. But so was Iroh, and Azulon obviously chose Ozai instead... Spirits. He's not an Earth Kingdom noble. Birth isn't enough! He may not have a village to impress, only Ozai - but he still has to earn it.

I'm not facing an Earth Kingdom general. I'm up against a chief's son.

And while a noble might throw lives away like coins, a chief's son was responsible for his people. To the bitter end.

"He's not after Aang." At Bato's startled look, Hakoda elaborated, "I'm sure Zuko wants to take him. But no matter how much the prince may want his honor back... you heard Sokka. When does our unstoppable firebender stop chasing Aang?" He cast a glance toward Suzuran.

"When his men and his uncle are in danger." Bato turned a thoughtful look on the healer's tent, where a master waterbender waited.

"When those two go at it, Sokka says, it takes dawn or the moon to tip the scales," Hakoda stated. "Zuko gave his word to Toph to help Aang, and apparently he means to keep it. But if healing the boy will take days... His people are in deadly danger, every night." He let out a breath, thinking it through. "But if he keeps Katara focused on protecting Aang from him - from him, not the rest of them - he knows he has a chance to survive her."

Bato blinked. "You're saying he's using Katara's hate? To make sure she goes for his throat first?"

"We'd never expect it, would we?" Hakoda smirked.

"...Go soak your head," Bato sighed. "So if you're right - and I'm telling you, this wild idea is just plain crazy - what do we do?"

"Just what we've been doing," Hakoda said plainly. "We don't want him to know we've caught on. This has to be one of the riskiest moves he's ever made. He's got his head right in the leopard-shark's mouth; let's not jar anything."

"I think I'm going to go visit your daughter," Bato grumbled.

"Tui and La, don't tell her-"

"Spirits, no," Bato groaned. "I want an icepack."

"All right." Hands wreathed in water, Katara glared at the massive burn on a woozy airbender's back. "Just what are you doing, and why do you have me working down here?"

"Because his spinal cord didn't get torn up as bad as some of the nerves higher up," Zuko said honestly. Agni, please let her listen. "The damage that is there ought to be a lot more obvious."

"I've seen people hit by Ty Lee. I can tell when something's not obvious."

"And there wasn't anything we could do for people she hit, remember?" Sokka said, arms crossed. Behind him, Hakoda raised an eyebrow. Seated by them both, cheerfully aware Hakoda wanted him somewhere he couldn't cause trouble, Iroh only sighed.

Ichhi, ni, san, shi, go... "Lightning damage can be even more subtle than chi-blocking," Zuko said levelly. "I wish I had my charts. I wish we had a master healer here. But we don't." I wish Toph were here.

But Hakoda had asked the young earthbender to talk to Bato, so the fleet could get a better idea what kind of help they might be able to get from the Earth Kingdom army... oh, and by the way, what was this little discussion he kept hearing about?

Toph had been off like a shot.

You did that on purpose. Zuko tried not to glare at the Southern Tribe's chief. So he'd been stripped of an ally he'd been counting on. So Teruko was quietly fidgeting outside the tent, annoyed she couldn't keep him in sight, an armored tinderbox if any Water Tribesman decided to talk of women in the igloo. It didn't make a difference to his word.

Breathe. "This isn't fast healing. It has to be started fast; as soon as you can after someone's been struck." Forget pride. Your people need results. "If you hadn't been right on Aang right after Azula hit him, he'd be a lot worse off."

Maybe Katara's eyes weren't quite so narrowed. Or maybe it was just his imagination.

Act as if it's real. "But once you've got someone who's been struck stable, you have to slow down. All these little channels? They feed into each other. And when you clear one out, the whole flow can change. Fast." Zuko hesitated, searching for words to picture it. "It's like - if you caught a snowflake, and saw it - and then you're trying to bend it back together after it's half-melted."

That gave Katara pause. "A snowflake?"

"A lot of what we're working on is smaller than snowflakes," Zuko said levelly. Are you terrified yet? I am. This isn't a job for an apprentice! We could hurt him, so badly...

But they were all Aang had. He couldn't not do something.

"...What do you want me to do?"

"Be like an earthbender," Zuko said bluntly. Winced, and tried again. "Like - a mountain pool. Rest your hands right there, and be still. Quiet. Watching for the ripples. Watch Aang breathe. Breath moves your chi. Try to see the pattern of how his moves."

Katara frowned at Aang's back. "There's one knot, right there-"

"Don't!"

Her hand stilled, and she glared.

"That's what Yangchen had me draw off some of the blocked chi from," Zuko said soberly, still shaken. "You remember? The energy that blew me through the tent?"

"...Oh." Katara looked a little pale. "But it can't be right."

"It's not," Zuko agreed grimly. "But it's not hurting him, either. Not right now. I say we leave it until we've got the delicate stuff finished."

"Yangchen wanted you to fix it."

"And I tried," Zuko said flatly, avoiding the bait of her annoyance. "I got some of it out. But Avatar or not, I doubt Yangchen was a healer. And I know my teacher would say we need to fix his nerves first."

She frowned, but let it go.

Long minutes passed. Blue eyes closed, and Katara wrinkled her nose. "It's like trying to bend mist-

"Don't bend it!" Zuko yelped, alarmed. "Just - feel it."

Katara frowned, but kept still. "It is like mist. I'm not even sure it's there."

"Keep watching," Zuko said firmly, dipping fire from the pot of coals Hakoda had granted them. "I'm going to find some damage and fix it. Watch what happens." Hands at Aang's neck, Zuko shaped delicate circles, seeking places that whispered of hurt. Subtle, so subtle; torn brass, interwoven with healthy gold...

He wasn't sure how long he'd been working when Katara gasped. "It- that-

"Pulse?" Zuko asked, checking his work. "Shouldn't have been too big." I hope.

"Melt-water under a glacier," Katara said grimly. "You don't know what it's doing until it's almost too late."

"That's why we have to be careful." Zuko lifted his hands from skin. "Do you want to try, while I listen?"

"...Just move."

Zuko traded places with her, grateful the tent was large enough that one puff of exasperated steam wouldn't warm it. Temper, he told himself firmly, fighting down the sick roiling in his gut. Just hold your temper. You're a firebender. Holding flame is part of what you are.

Flames against skin, he closed his eyes and felt. "Up, just a little. Look under the surface flow... there. You've got it."

"Tickles," Aang giggled sleepily.

"You be quiet," Zuko murmured. "And stay still. This is tricky enough already." There, and there, and there... "Good," he nodded, and shifted back to plant fire-wreathed hands along Aang's neck. "Keep that up. I'm going to see if there's anything not fried in his brain."

"S plenty," the airbender yawned.

"Couldn't prove it by me." Zuko bit back anything more acid. He had months of idiocy to dissect. It wouldn't be nearly as satisfying if Aang wasn't awake to hear it.

Be calm. Like flowing lava. Like a ground fire, burning out what doesn't belong, readying the rest to grow and flourish in the rains...

Ever so slowly, dulled gold threads of chi began to brighten. Shocked muscle and tendons quivered; tiny ear-bones and the fragile surface of the eyes reclaiming should-be from wounded was. Seared, sparkling bits of chi, frayed and flying loose, were eased back into the ghostly lightnings of a healing mind.

Don't try to make it the way you think it should be. Just heal. The body's chi remembers the form it had before it was hurt. Your patient is healing. You're just there to fight for them, to help...

Odd. That reminded him of something-

Let it go.

The rhythm was like waves; like the beating pulse of a candle-flame. Sweep through to heal, then back to catch any frayed ends or knots uncovered by the flow of what was healed, then on again...

"Nephew."

Zuko blinked, weariness weighing him down like lead as Iroh's hand touched his shoulder.

"Enough," the older firebender said firmly.

Yeah. Stupid, Zuko berated himself. Shouldn't push this hard. Not when your people could need you to fight. A slow breath, and flames flickered out. Automatically he glanced around the tent; if Uncle had moved, who knew who else might have-

Someone had lit a lamp against the rain he could taste coming in the wind. The light danced over Toph's grin, where she'd pulled up a bit of handy rock to lean back by Hakoda... and Sokka, who was currently wrestling Momo for half a bunch of berries. Katara was rolling her eyes at her brother, a bit of sweat still beading on her brow as she crossed her arms and watched.

And on the furs, a gray-eyed airbender was staring at him, jaw dropped. "...You're really here."

What the heck is that supposed to mean? Too tired to try and follow Aang grasshopper-logic, Zuko shrugged, and strategically withdrew out of Katara's threat-to-Aang range.

...If anyone claimed he was hiding behind Uncle, he'd deny it.

"Where else would he be?" Katara stood, crossing to the furs to give Aang a smile. "Hey. You awake now? Really awake?"

"Am I awake? I don't know; I think I'm awake, but I thought I was dreaming before because, you know, you and Azula - but if I was dreaming maybe you don't know, and that had to be a dream, more like a nightmare - and if they're really here and this isn't a dream that's just weird."

"Please, make it stop," Zuko groaned under his breath. Caught a glimpse of Hakoda's stunned bewilderment, buried by an avalanche of words, and felt a hint of wry satisfaction.

"Kind of reminds me of Fong's energy drink," Sokka mumbled, yanking a few berries off with his teeth before Momo could snatch them. "Only he's not bouncing off the walls."

...I've chased them enough to understand Water Tribe mumble, Zuko thought, resigned. That's just wrong.

"But he always does wake up talking," Sokka went on, swallowing. "Planning to slow down anytime soon, buddy?"

"Slow down? They're right here, Sokka, and we don't even know how they got into Ba Sing Se, and-" Aang paused. "Um... this doesn't seem like Ba Sing Se..."

He was not going to bury his face in his hands, Zuko told himself firmly. The airbender had been lightning-struck. That Aang was making even this much sense was an improvement.

...Not that Aang had exactly been quick on the uptake before Azula had smacked him.

Be fair, Zuko told himself, remembering a night-dark fortress, an almost automatic teamwork that had surprised the hell out of him even as it'd saved his life. Put him where he's defending someone, he can figure out tactics on the fly. It's people he doesn't understand. And long-term strategy. And... forget it, you're the healer, be responsible. "We cleared a lot of the damage in his head. I think if you tell him this time, it should stick."

"We're near Chameleon Bay," Katara said firmly. "Azula hit you with lightning, and we got you out. Appa's out eating dune grass; I know he'll be glad to see you. But Ba Sing Se..." Her shoulders slumped, but somehow, she managed a smile. "Aang, this is Dad."

"Oh." Aang smiled. "It's an honor to meet you, Chief Hakoda, sir."

"And you," Hakoda inclined his head. "General, if you and your nephew are finished here for today..."

"Actually, we are not," Iroh said thoughtfully. "Aang asked a question of me when last we met. Unfortunately, prudence dictated that we all flee before I could fully answer it. And yet perhaps that was just as well, for I have now had time to consider it fully," he glanced toward Katara, just for a moment, "and with more knowledge of... unalterable realities." His gaze rested on Aang. "As the Avatar, you need a firebender to train you."

"Um, no, really," Aang started.

"But it is now clear that your allies cannot afford to trust any of the Fire Nation," Iroh said levelly. "So I will tell you of the first firebenders. The dragons."

"Oh, I know about dragons," Aang smiled, relieved. Then frowned. "They're firebenders? I know they breathe fire...."

"How were you not eaten?" Zuko groaned.

Aang gave him a look of curious amusement. "You know that joke, too? Wow; I guess some things don't change in a hundred years."

"Joke?" Zuko said blankly.

"Well... sometimes I guess I'd annoy Shidan a little, and Kuzon always said...." Aang looked between the two of them, suddenly serious. "He wasn't joking?"

Shidan? Zuko kept his face still, heart racing. Coincidence. Had to be. Lady Kotone's husband had been a wandering swordsman; it was perfectly reasonable for him to keep using a sword-name like Light off a sword, if he and his clan still had disagreements.

"If he warned you Shidan might eat you if annoyed too often? No. He was not joking," Iroh said dryly. "Though the tales say that when it comes to humans, they prefer to only chew in self-defense." The general stroked his beard. "And that is the first thing you must know about dragons, that I think you will find the most difficult to accept, should you choose to approach one. Dragons are predators."

Aang rolled his eyes. "I know that, I've seen their teeth-"

"Do you?" Iroh said quietly. "Airbending is negative jin. Retreating and defending. Firebending is positive jin. Attacking. The sky bison who inspired your people feed on what does not bleed. Dragons sink their fangs into flesh and bone, and stop a beating heart. Earth may be your opposing element, but fire is your opposing energy. Dragons are foreign to everything you know of your people." He paused. "Dragons have eaten sky bison, in the past. It is one of many, many quarrels between our peoples. Be cautious."

Aang gulped.

"Easy, Twinkletoes," Toph said bluntly. "You're not a pushover when it comes to Appa. And you won't be alone."

"She is right," Iroh nodded. "You must not face a dragon alone. And you must not be afraid. Dragons are predators, and all predators search for fear. For what is afraid of you... is your rightful prey."

Aang flinched again; Zuko felt his nails bite into his palms, and deliberately relaxed his fingers. He was not going to pounce on the airbender and shake sense into him. No matter how tempting it was.

"But dragons also respect clans, and the assistance of their kin," Iroh went on. "Face a dragon with your friends, and you will be safe." He paused. "Now, to find a dragon... Many in the Fire Nation will tell you that is impossible."

"What? Why?" Aang blurted out. "There's lots of dragons!"

"A century ago, there were," Iroh said plainly. "Sozin, and his dragon companion Makoto... they did not just kill your people."

Aang paled. "That's horrible..."

"And you're still surprised Zhao tried to kill the moon?" Katara said sharply.

"I was," Iroh answered. "Dragons may be Agni's children, but they are not the Sun himself." He turned back to Aang. "So. To find what is lost or hiding, you must be determined, and clever. And you must have aid. Sokka will be a great help."

"What, me?" the Water Tribe teen blurted out.

"You are a tracker, like your father," Iroh smiled. "And you know Appa, so you have some knowledge of tracking flying beasts." He glanced at his nephew. "You are a much better tracker than I, Prince Zuko."

What, you want me to tell them? You're the one who's actually- Zuko swallowed, and tried to put his thoughts in order. "I've never tracked a dragon," he said honestly. "But it won't be easy. You won't find kills. Maybe a spot where the ground's bloody, but... They eat everything. Bones, hide, you name it." He paused, hunting memory. "But they don't like to eat it raw. Sometimes you can find places they've roasted it with their breath. Or if they think they won't get caught - they'll dig pits, burn wood or herbs, stuff a kill in the coals, and bake it." He looked at Sokka's dubious expression, and couldn't help but smirk. "So be very, very careful, if you smell roasted meat."

"The universe hates me," Sokka said faintly.

"Though it is said that can be one way to meet a dragon," Iroh mused. "And was, in better days. To build a barbecue, or stew outside, and leave an empty place visible from the air, was considered an invitation." He grinned. "Not only do they prefer cooked meat, they have quite the taste for garlic, and other spices. The hotter, the better."

"But if you don't know where to start, work with Toph," Zuko stated. "Dragons need to keep their claws sharp. And for that, they need rock. Flint, quartz; obsidian's fragile, but they like its edges. They'll go out of their way looking for it."

"Wait," Sokka frowned. "Teruko had obsidian. And she was using it to..." He stared at Zuko.

"Ah, you do see," Iroh smiled. "Yes. The great names - those whose families are proven firebenders and leaders of domains - are, indeed, treated as if they were dragons. It is considered... polite."

Polite, ha. It's the only practical way to trim nails, Zuko thought wryly. Use scissors? What kind of scissors does the Water Tribe have?

Then again, he'd never tried one of the bone edges they tended to use for knives. Maybe it was better than steel. For some things.

"So we look for obsidian," Toph nodded. "That won't be too hard."

Zuko eyed her, hearing Iroh's muffled chuckle.

"What?" she huffed, obviously feeling something that told her he was staring. "We look for a volcano. There's not too many of those."

"Toph," Zuko said carefully. And had to stop, just for a few breaths, given the Avatar - who said he'd been to the Fire Nation - wasn't saying one word to straighten her out. "Every island we have is a volcano. Or was. Or will be. And every volcano has firebenders on it, watching it. Listening to it. So lava doesn't move without people getting warned." He couldn't stop himself from glaring at Aang. "Unless an Avatar decides to destroy a whole island, and not warn anyone."

"That wasn't me!" Aang said defensively. "Shiyu said the Fire Sages were supposed to serve the Avatar. But they were going to help Zhao give us to Ozai-"

"And for that we deserved to get the whole temple turned into a volcano under us, and have the rest of it fall on our heads?" Zuko said in angry disbelief. "Our heads, Aang! Mine, Sokka's, Katara's, that Fire Sage who was trying to help you - and oh, by the way, yours!"

"Roku broke the chains!" Aang protested. "Everyone got out!"

"And that makes everything better," Zuko said, sarcasm biting deep. "Molten lava, rocks the size of tents falling from the ceiling, the entire floor splitting open every way you turned... but at least we weren't chained there." He bit back a snarl, red flickering in the corners of his vision.

Katara rose like a flowing wave, eyes blazing. "That wasn't Aang's-"

Sokka was between them both, eyes hard. "Don't. Don't say it. 'Cause just this once? I have to agree with Zuko. Everything we've been through, every fight we've faced? Including the North Pole? On the solstice, I was sure we were dead. Dead, Katara. If Appa hadn't found us at just the right time, we'd have been melted." He shot a glance at Zuko. "But she's right too. That wasn't Aang, and you know it. Aang's never tried to kill you."

Zuko stared at Sokka. Flatly.

"He hasn't!"

"Polar. Water," Zuko snarled, steam hissing from his breath.

Sokka stopped talking. Swallowed, visibly. "...Oh, man."

"Would someone like to tell me what you're both talking about?" Hakoda said levelly. "If this is about your navy invading the North Pole-"

"It's not."

Zuko eyed Sokka. Who was eyeing him back, looking just as dubious. And who wouldn't be, having just echoed a deadly enemy?

Carefully, blatantly, Zuko took a step back and away, toward Uncle.

...That Sokka stepped back toward Hakoda in the same heartbeat, did not make him feel any better.

"The first time we got away from Zuko, Aang... well, the Avatar... swept everybody off the deck with this huge water-wall," Sokka said frankly. "Zuko grabbed the anchor chain - I still want to know how the heck you did that-"

"Training," Zuko said grimly.

"You trained for weird glowing-eyed waterspout... stuff? You're weird." Sokka shook his head. "Anyway. Zuko got back on deck. Everybody else... went into the water."

Hakoda sat up straight, face carefully blank of anything but sober interest.

"Yeah," Sokka said quietly. "I didn't really think about it. Until now." Reluctantly, he looked at Zuko. "How many men did you lose?"

"Lose?" Aang burst out. "It was just water! They were sailors! They could swim." At their sudden stares, the airbender flinched. "What? What's wrong?"

"Yep, that explains a lot," Toph said, half to herself.

"Explains what?" Aang demanded.

"How should I know? I don't swim."

"You don't?" Zuko said, blindsided. Toph seemed so utterly capable. How could she not know?

"No earth, Sparky. I hate it when I can't see."

"...Seawater has salt in it."

Toph's jaw dropped.

Zuko nodded to himself, sure she could take it from there. Toph could find earth in metal, for Agni's sake. She could definitely find salt. "Start with warm water," he warned her. "Don't stay in too long the first few times. Water that feels warm will still suck the heat out of you, fast." He didn't - quite - glance at Aang. "Water at the poles? Unless you've got good gear and special training... in minutes, you're too cold to move." He swallowed, remembering the bone-deep chill of the turtle-seal tunnels. "And then you drown."

Determined, Zuko looked Sokka in the eye. "We didn't lose anyone. But it was close. If we hadn't been able to launch the river steamer and go after people in the water, if we'd had to wait until we dug the whole ship out of the ice..." He shook his head.

"Yeah," Toph said into that painful quiet. "That does explain a lot." She waved a hand Aang's direction. "This is why you need to work on earthbending, Twinkletoes. You need to listen." She pointed at Zuko. "The day you two met, Sparky knew you tried to kill him." Her finger swung to Sokka and Katara. "And they knew you tried to kill him." Another swing, dead-on at terrified gray eyes. "Only one who didn't know it, was you."

"I didn't know!" Aang insisted. "I - how can just being cold do that to anybody? Snow's cold, and I can curl up in that just like Appa... and why is everybody looking at me like that, I didn't mean to!"

"No," Iroh said quietly, crouching beside the airbender's shaped-sand bed. "No, I believe you did not. For I have read of airbenders, and the chill of the upper air, which they endure without harm. You were trained to mastery from a very young age; many bending techniques, for you, come easily as breathing. And from what I have learned of Monk Gyatso, who raised you, he too had been a master for a very long time. It is likely he simply - forgot." Iroh smiled ruefully. "And without a teacher's advice that the other nations are different from your own, even fatally different... how could you have known?"

"But Katara buried Zuko in ice!" Aang protested. "And he was fine!"

"Fine?" Zuko sputtered. "You-"

Iroh held up a hand; wait. Eyed the airbender, until Aang started fidgeting.

Reached out, and poked Aang in the forehead.

"Ow!"

"Ah. I have your attention," Iroh said dryly. "Avatar Aang. I know you and my nephew have never truly talked. And so you, and your companions, must have learned of my nephew from... biased sources. But I distinctly recall that my nephew told you he had trained for three years to find and capture the Avatar. Fully expecting to find an adult, who had mastered every element." He paused. "So, yes. Prince Zuko is capable of surviving attacks that would kill other firebenders. As he has proved, facing you. Many times." He nodded, as if to himself. "Which is only fitting, for a great name. Dragons admire strategy, and intelligence. It is wise to show both in their presence."

Aang frowned, rubbing his head. "You almost make it sound like they're people."

"He's going to get eaten," Zuko sighed.

"You would be wise to treat them exactly as if they were people," Iroh said soberly. "Badger-moles and sky bison are wise animals, but they are animals. Dragons are far more. They can choose to do good, or evil."

"Shidan wasn't evil," Aang protested. "He was Kuzon's friend. And Fang was Roku's animal guide!"

"And Makoto was Sozin's lifelong companion, and helped lead the assault that destroyed your people," Iroh said levelly. "Evil dragons are not common. But they happen. And so our ancestors saw teeth and claws and flame turned against each other, and they have never forgotten. We honor that memory even today, with the Agni Kai; for like dragons, firebenders have tempers that burn within, and sometimes the only way to settle a dispute is with blood and fire."

"That's sick," Katara muttered.

Zuko snorted. "You push people off ice floes when no one's looking. We kill them in the arena, where everyone can see. Who's sick?"

"Everybody knows those you don't name have to die!"

"If someone gets killed in an Agni Kai? Believe me, everyone knows why they had it coming-" Zuko cut himself off at Aang's strangled gasp.

Aang was staring at Katara and her family, white-faced. "That's not true," he insisted. "It's not. You're a good person. You're a great person. You'd never kill anybody!"

Katara bit her lip. "Aang, you don't understand-"

"What am I supposed to understand? The Water Tribes kill people? Your own people? That's got to stop." Aang drew himself up, shaky but determined. "And it's going to stop right now-"

"No, it's not!"

On his feet, Zuko swallowed dryly, feeling the weight of eyes on him. Damn it, I never think first.... "No," he got out. He'd started; he had to finish it. "You are not going to do to the Water Tribes what Kyoshi did to us. I will not let that happen." Not while I'm still breathing.

"But-"

"You're not Water Tribe, you're not Fire Nation - you've never tried to understand either of us, or you wouldn't even be thinking it!" Zuko snarled. "Agni! What does it take to get through your skull? What do airbenders do when one of their own goes evil? When he hurts people? When he tortures animals? When he lies to people, just to get them to turn on each other and tear themselves apart?"

"That doesn't happen!" Aang glared at him. "The elders know when people lie."

"I don't care if they know," Zuko said bluntly. "Yangchen would tell you, it does happen!"

"Who?"

For a moment, Zuko could only stare at him. "They didn't even tell you who the last Air Nomad Avatar was?"

"She was?" Aang's eyes widened. "You mean that Yangchen? Wow. There's a big statue of her in the Eastern Air Temple, but nobody ever said she was.... What'd Kyoshi ever do to you, anyway?"

"You don't know?" Zuko said in disbelief. "You've been Kyoshi, and you don't-" He gripped his fraying temper in both hands. Airbender. He's trying to deflect you. Don't let him. "What Kyoshi did isn't the point! But what she did to us is part of why my people are at war today. Why people like Zhao are in charge, and those like Jeong Jeong are hunted criminals. Do you want to do that to the Water Tribe? Do you want to make them like us?"

Wide-eyed, Aang looked away. "Sokka?"

The Water Tribe teenager looked back, blue eyes sober. "You're going to have to ask Dad on this one, Aang."

"I'm asking you," Aang said firmly.

"And it's too big for me," Sokka admitted. "Aang - this isn't a little thing, like getting the village to have fun. This is how we live. Even Dad wouldn't try to change this without getting the whole village together. All the warriors, all the elders; everybody."

"And if I did, I could tell you what they would say," Hakoda finally spoke. "I'm sure you have the best of intentions, Aang... but no." He eyed Zuko, as if the firebender were a particularly intricate finger-trap that had just twisted to present a new lock. "Whatever Avatar Kyoshi did or didn't do, the Fire Nation believes her actions led to the current war. If we want the fighting to stop, on both sides... I don't think it would be wise to raise her ghost over any peace."

"Which kind of brings up something we've gotta figure out," Toph put in. "If we're going to end the war, we need something to say everybody's going to stop fighting." Blind eyes swung toward the firebenders. "So what do you mean by truce? 'Cause right now, Sokka and Katara think you can't hold one and make it stick, because Fire Nation women fight."

Outside the tent, Zuko heard a distinctly non-marine yelp.

"Oh, dear," Iroh murmured. "Yes; that is how warring Water tribes and villages are accustomed to dealing with hostilities." He frowned. "Historically, it was the great names who went to war, and arranged peace. Though a wise great name always took council with his people. These days... it is the Fire Lord, and the Council of Generals, with whom you must deal. Should a treaty be written, and signed, and published throughout our land - some few might fight on, but they would only do so as criminals."

"That's not the truce you've got going right now," Sokka argued.

"It is not," Iroh agreed. "The shelter of dragons' wings is older than any Fire Lord. It holds so long as an injured young firebender is in need of it to choose his loyalties... and more practically, it holds so long as those providing shelter are willing to risk their own lives for the child."

"Zuko's hurt?" Aang looked worried.

"He was," Iroh said levelly. "Azula struck at him, as she struck at you. My nephew knows a block, but he was unable to perform it fully. So, yes. He was... hurt." Iroh paused. "But that shelter is not being held for him."

Aang gulped. "I'm an airbender!"

"Born one, yes. But you are the Avatar, and you are also a firebender." Iroh smiled wryly. "It is a technicality, and Captain Jee is well aware of that. We are fortunate, that he thinks well enough of myself and my nephew to allow it." His voice dropped, as Iroh glanced at Hakoda. "Jee, too, is a widower, with children... though his are grown, and in service. I believe you can imagine how he worries. And no matter what his orders may say, or how firmly he may believe in the need for them - a true father wishes his children away from danger, and death."

Zuko hid a wince.

"You mean... Captain Jee's helping us?" Aang sank back into fur, eyes wide.

He's exhausted, Zuko judged. Damn it, it's still too soon. He needs rest.

"He was not ordered not to give shelter," Iroh said dryly. "He is a loyal officer, one of true heart. He will not disobey his commander. But there are things he can avoid doing. For a time."

"That's enough to get him executed, if Azula finds out," Zuko said harshly. "Sooner or later, she will." He glared at Katara. "I don't care what you think about me, but my people are risking their lives to make this work." Doesn't that mean anything to you? How can you see loyalty like that and not care?

But the other nations didn't feel loyalty. Spirits. He felt so alone.

"Easy, Sparky," Toph said firmly. "I think I get it." She nodded at the others. "Like Ba Sing Se. People can't break the rules, not without getting in big trouble. But Jee's trying to bend them." The little earthbender shrugged. "So I guess we just need to figure one more thing out. What's an airbender truce?"

"We... kind of don't have those, I guess," Aang said, tired. "I mean, why would we? We never fight anybody!"

Deep inside, Zuko felt chill. "At the Southern Village, you gave me your parole."

"Well, yeah," Aang shrugged. "Everybody was scared, and I didn't think I could beat you without someone getting hurt, and... it got you out of there, right?"

Cold. He felt so cold. "You made me a promise you never meant to keep."

"I said I'd go with you," Aang grinned. "I never said how far... hey!"

Out. Get out before you hurt someone. Everyone.

Zuko pushed out into the downdraft before the storm, soul shredding in knives of ice.

Silly Zuzu. Why would the Avatar think you have honor? No one else does...

"Lieutenant, follow him!" Iroh's voice snapped.

He didn't care. There was only the shore and the sea and getting away from people.

He didn't want to hurt anyone. He didn't. But he hurt, and it was just too much...

Away. Now.

Footsteps, following him. He tried to ignore them, feeling that fire flare whenever blue threatened to come near. And it was hard to think, but even if none was better than one, one was definitely better than lots, and there was a reason he shouldn't just burn everything blue to ash, he knew there was...

Away.

Rain and waves and only one breathing behind him. Sand was wet under his sandals, sliding chill along his tabi where unwary steps had scooped grains over his feet. Wind laughed in his face, and he loved the wind, why did he want to burn it now?

Move. Get the poison out.

This wasn't fighting. This was pain, and no kata could be enough.

Closing his eyes, he could almost smell a feathery mane, a touch of friend, feeling-pain, sharing-pain, share, show.

A deep breath, and he lunged into the dance.

I shouldn't be alone...

But there was no flash of red scales to echo his movements. No rumbling breath to warm him, to remind him someone watched, and cared. There was only the dance. The way dragons cried.

Slowly, aching, the chill loosened its grip.

Heartsick, Zuko brought the dance to its circling close, staring up into raindrops. Spirits, he still wanted so much for something to burn...

It's sand. Nothing will get hurt.

Relaxing his stance, he reached up with fingers and chi, one swift stroke down to catch the mist of lightning carried by even the mildest drop of rain...

Rain blazed, falling water wreathed in opalescent fire.

"Oh..."

Startled, he swung around.

Teruko had her hands open and harmless, gaze equally on him and falling fire. "Easy, sir. Just making sure no one bothers you." She looked at the sparks flowing off her armor, his robes, dashing themselves out on the sand. "That's some sweet bending, sir. Most people don't have the knack for fire-rain. Agni knows I never did, or I'd be home tending forests instead of marines."

Zuko swallowed dryly. "You've seen this?" He caught a droplet above his palm, bright as diamond. "You know what this is?"

Teruko drew in a sharp breath. "You don't?"

Wordless, he shook his head. Questions; he had so many questions, and he couldn't get them past the lump of no honor, not trusted, never...

"Breathe, sir." Worry drew black brows down. "Who do you need dead?"

Zuko stared at her.

She watched him just as intently, and suddenly smirked. "Feeling better?"

Yes, was the word that wanted to spring to his lips; he bit it back. "Ah..."

"Your grandfather does the same thing when he's had it with idiots," Teruko shrugged. "It's storm out or kill the bastards, and your grandmother gets cranky if she has to get blood out of the carpets."

Zuko blinked, stunned.

"Lady Ursa is from Byakko, sir," Teruko stated, obviously mincing it into small words. "Everything I've heard of Princess Azula says she's got Azulon's own temper. But you? You obviously got Shidan's."

"I don't even know him," Zuko managed.

"I don't know why that happened, sir," Teruko said bluntly. "My family may be on the domain council, but that's the elders... I know your grandparents. It had to be important." She paused. "And I know enough about Byakko to guess why they wouldn't want the Fire Lord's security poking around."

Zuko drew in a measured breath. "Can you tell me?"

"Not most of it," she said frankly. "But send a message to them, when you can. We have trade partners in the Earth Kingdom." She grinned wryly. "Some of them on the west coast are a little..."

weird. War's pretty much ignored them, though, which is good. Too spooky for the Earth Army, too wet for how most of our army gets trained for... sir?"

Heart in his throat, Zuko dug out a packet of papers that had survived Azula's blast. Thank the spirits he hadn't kept them up his sleeves.

Brows arched, Teruko moved close enough to shelter pages from the rain. Read through details of a carefully faked identity, overtopped by the impatient red stamps of a government functionary. And grinned, nodding for him to hide them back away. "Yes, sir. That's them."

Foggy Swamp, Zuko thought, stunned. "They're waterbenders."

"Who live in a swamp," Teruko said seriously. "Byakko's not just a mountain clan. Not for a long time. That's the only reason our domain's got enough leeway to be odd. Smart lords know eventually someone's going to screw up land so it needs to be soaked before it burns, and we're the only ones who know how to set fires with rain."

"That's what it's for?" Zuko caught another scatter of drops, sparks blazing and dying around them with a whisper of will. "I've never seen... I don't know how I'm doing this..."

"You're Shidan's grandson," Teruko said simply. "He's good, sir. The best." She smiled a little. "And he'll know you're his the minute he sees you. You have his eyes."

Zuko flushed, stung. "Sozin's eyes-"

"Dragon's eyes. Sir." Teruko gave him a stern look. "They don't teach that in schools anymore, but it's the truth. You've got a lot of dragon in your family. On both sides."

Face still burning, Zuko looked away. "I get enough stories from Uncle, Lieutenant."

"Sir-"

"Don't. Just - don't." He breathed deep, forcing down pain for what needed to be done. "I'm not special, Lieutenant. You want that, follow Azula. She's the prodigy. I'm just... someone who tries. And fails. A lot. I have a plan. I think it'll work. And no one's killed me yet." He shrugged, weary and heartsick. "That's all I am. You want a legend... the Avatar's back there."

"I didn't join the navy to serve legends, sir," Teruko said angrily. "I'm here to serve our people. Even if one of my commanders is acting like an idiot."

The idiots are all back in that tent- Zuko thought of that, and what he'd just said, and paled.

"Lieutenant. I am... so sorry." He bowed his head. "I never doubted your honor."

She studied him a bit longer, frowning. Sighed, and shook her head. "Let's get out of the rain, sir. You've got to see what Toph put together for us. That girl is solid..."

Letting words wash over him like rain, Zuko followed.

Chapter End Notes

Flour, as a finely divided powder, is a lot more combustible than most people think.

No, you're not imagining the "Dragonheart" quote. I couldn't resist.

As far as timelines go, I go by "spoken canon overrides written". So yes, I use Koh's dates.

Yes, Jee has his very own Ragtag Bunch of Misfits. (See also Reassigned to Antarctica, Reassignment Backfire.) Anyone fond of TVTropes should know Ozai is doomed.

Azula, however, is Dangerously Genre Savvy.

Everything we've seen Aang and other airbenders do - high-altitude flying, curling up in snow caves, being completely untouched when Zuko hauls him through a blizzard - indicates to me that airbenders have their own climate control. They're definitely very cold-resistant.

Why Roku would not have known about loyalty... as Iroh mentioned many, many chapters back, the Avatar belongs to the whole world, not one nation. Avatars are not bound by loyalty. They are the only firebenders who aren't.

Unfortunately, this missing bond is information the White Lotus Society has, but most people do not know. And the Fire Nation doesn't talk about this so much as feel it. See Meixiang's discussion with Suyin; she's being as blunt as she is there because her daughter was not raised in the Fire Nation - and, so far as Meixiang knew up to that point, was Earth Kingdom. Therefore, whatever Roku heard growing up, he would have attached to what he felt, in regard to friendship and all that went with it. And given the court used to be a lot more friendly place, traitors' deaths would have been rare, and definitely not talked about.

I've also been reminded that many people are not familiar with how large predators operate in regard to territory. Simply put - they hold as much as they can reasonably defend, and no more. This holds true for lion prides, wolf packs, what have you. There isn't one lion pride in charge of all of Africa; there isn't one wolf pack that "owns" all of Yellowstone Park. (And wolves do go to war as packs, by the way.) So no, in a normal situation, a Fire Nation great name would not try for more territory than a reasonable-sized domain. They may make alliances that involve multiple domains, but they wouldn't take them over. Any great name who did, normally, would be faced by a bunch of smaller domains who did not want to be taken over by someone they weren't personally attached to, thank you. And that alliance would in turn fall apart just as soon as it wasn't needed anymore.

"Dragon Chases the Moon" is a Tai Chi move.

Chapter 29

Chapter Notes

Warning, Azula shows up later. This is never good. It may, in fact, be Nightmare Fuel. Your Mileage May Vary.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

There shouldn't be lightning with this storm, Hakoda thought, calculating exactly how fast he could get to and douse the coals. But you couldn't prove it in here.

His children were quiet, feeling tension sing in the air. Toph was on her feet, still but ready.

Iroh was just as still, gaze fixed on a startled airbender. The stillness of a leopard-shark, the moment before the strike.

Firebenders make their own fire. Dousing the coals won't even slow him down-

"I wonder," Iroh said, very quietly, "precisely how well you did know Kuzon."

"Why would you say that?" Aang gulped. "He was my friend."

"I wonder," Iroh stated, just as quiet, "because to say what you said to my nephew, to imply that from the moment you met, you intended to treat him as if he had no honor - that, is either ignorance, or malice." Gold eyes burned, steady as flame. "Which is it?"

"He was attacking us-" Katara started.

Iroh's glare cut like shattered flint.

But in that breath the airbender rallied, and faced Iroh with a set jaw. "He attacked the village. I'm not going to say I'm sorry I lied to him. I'm not. Kuzon would tell you Zuko was the bad guy."

"Would he?" Iroh wondered. "And what would he say about Pohuai Stronghold?"

"Um... where?"

"See?" Katara settled her shoulders, satisfied. "Zuko would never rescue anybody."

Hakoda's eyes narrowed. Was it his imagination, or had Aang actually flinched?

"Oh, Twinkletoes," Toph said, dead level. "You better come clean on this one. Frozen frogs and all."

"It's not like he did it to help!"

Katara's smile slipped.

"Frozen frogs?" Hakoda raised a brow at Sokka.

"We got sick after that typhoon," his son shrugged. "I was talking to people who weren't there;

Katara was kind of out of it, too. Aang went to get help, came back with frozen frogs for us to suck on. Gross, but effective." Sokka eyed Aang. "So what else happened?"

Aang winced. "I got caught, okay?"

"You got caught?" Katara said uneasily. "By the Fire Nation?"

"Well - Zhao came after me with these crazy archers in facepaint! They shot through wind at me, they shot through ice - I jumped off a cliff and they just kept coming, shooting arrows with ropes, and they had nets, and... they caught me." Aang gulped. "And Zhao had me chained up, and I knew you guys were in trouble, and I was trying to get loose, but I couldn't - I didn't know it was him!"

"You didn't know it was Zuko?" Sokka said, amazed.

"He was wearing a mask, and using swords, and he didn't firebend at all - even when there were guards all over us! And we got out the gates because Zhao said he needed me alive, and he had swords at my neck and - I didn't know! Not 'til the archers knocked him out. And I took the mask off, and... even if it was Zuko, I couldn't leave him there. I didn't!"

"Fortunate for you both," Iroh said dryly. "I would not have appreciated rescuing my nephew from Zhao's clutches." He grimaced. "I doubt there would have been anything to rescue."

"He rescued you," Katara said numbly. "Zuko rescued you?"

"No wonder Zhao tried to kill him," Sokka realized. "Zuko got you right out from under his nose? That must have stung."

"It was not the first time Zhao lost to him," Iroh smirked.

"It doesn't change anything," Aang said, determined. "You know he didn't do it to help. He did it because if Zhao got me first, he couldn't go home. Where's the honor in that?"

Iroh sighed. "You see the Fire Nation as those who murdered your people. And many did. But I know of one who saw the storm-clouds gathering, and did his best to warn you all."

"Kuzon," Aang breathed.

Iroh inclined his head. "He came to Gyatso. It must have been soon before the comet came... Gyatso told him not to stay and fight, but to flee." His gaze rested on Aang. "You had vanished, and what Gyatso wished most of all was that one ally would survive to search for you, and give you aid. And Kuzon did search for you. For the rest of his life. Until... I was on campaign in the Earth Kingdom; I do not know what finally was one transgression too many for Fire Lord Azulon. But the outcome was... fatal."

Aang twisted away, gray eyes leaking tears. Katara hurried to his side, turning an angry look on the firebender.

Iroh gazed back, unimpressed. "Kuzon has a daughter."

Slowly, Aang looked up.

"Lady Kotone is in her eighties, but for a firebender of her strength, that is not old," Iroh went on. "She rules Byakko with her husband, to this day. I would have advised you to go there, for she remembers her father's quest, and would have honored it."

"Would have?" Sokka said, uneasy.

"Lady Kotone also has children," Iroh said plainly. "And one of the younger daughters - I suspect, partly to buy Byakko protection from Azulon - was given in an arranged marriage. As is common, among firebenders. We are jealous as dragons of our powers, and Sozin's line is most jealous of all."

He can't mean- Adding up what Iroh hadn't said, Hakoda winced. And bit back curses that would have turned the air blue.

Sokka was only a few breaths behind him. "Oh, man..."

"What?" Aang asked, eyes heavy with weary nerves. "What'd you do to Kotone's daughter?"

"Nothing," Iroh said bluntly. "Save stand as her friend, and her brother, when she would allow me."

"Her brother?" Aang said, bewildered. "What'd you do, adopt her? Kuzon said families do that for heirs, but your family's got heirs, you've got-" He cut himself off, paling.

Iroh nodded once. "If you were to seek aid in Byakko now, Lady Kotone would ask you how you have treated her grandson. I do not think she would like your answer." Heading for the door-flap, he paused. "For one who badly needs any ally he can find, you seem most determined to throw them away."

Rain swept in through the gap, and he stalked out of sight.

"He's Kuzon's-?" Aang leaned on Katara, shaking his head. "He can't be. Zuko's not - he just can't be."

"Ally?" Sokka was sputtering. "Where does he get off- Wait a minute..."

"An honorable opponent," Hakoda said grimly, looking at Toph. "And Azula wants them both dead."

"Yeah," she winced. "I think that's what Uncle was trying to get at."

"Then why not just say it?" Hakoda said, exasperated beyond all measure. Fire Nation!

"Because she's Zuko's sister." Toph's face scrunched up for a second, before she swallowed angry tears. "You didn't hear what I heard, before Zuko blocked that lightning. He promised their mom he'd protect her. Even if she tried to kill him... Zuko promised."

"Would one of you stop talking and make sense?" Katara demanded.

"Fire Nation customs," Sokka said practically. "If two people are trying to kill each other, and somebody worse comes along, it's okay to work together. Even if you're going to go back to killing each other later."

"Except you can only do that if both sides have honor," Toph said bluntly. "Sock him in the gut next time, Aang. It'll hurt less." Her fists clenched. "And you knew it! Uncle's right. You hurt Zuko, you blow me off when we're trying to train, you hung around doing nothing in Ba Sing Se while Katara was twisting her head up in knots, you don't listen to Sokka unless you don't have any ideas - you are trying to kick us out. Why? It's our fight, too!"

"Well, it shouldn't be!" Aang snapped back. "I'm the one who started this. I ran away, remember?"

Like you ran away. Only I let a war get started, and Kuzon's dead, and everybody's dead, and it's all my fault!"

"Aang," Katara whispered, heartsick, "it's not, it's really not..."

"Make room," Hakoda said quietly. Moved in, and scooped up the thin little boy. So light, to carry so much hurt.

Aang stiffened. But didn't break free, as Katara and Sokka crowded in, and even Toph let out a relieved breath and skipped over into the hug.

"It's all right to cry," Hakoda said gently. "Even men cry, when it's too much." The fate of the world, a century of war... that's too much for anyone. "Aang. I don't know much of spirits, and I know even less of the Avatar. But I know you. You, Aang, the airbender who's saved my children's lives. That's the young man I mean to help." He smiled into disbelieving gray eyes. "Do you have any idea how many people the Fire Lord's ticked off? It wouldn't be fair to leave them out of the fight."

"That's what I'm saying!" Sokka grinned. "Airbending's all about deflecting attacks, right? Like a shield. So, let us airbend for you. So you and Toph and my sister can kick his butt."

"But - I have to - Roku said," Aang stammered.

"Roku never said you had to do it alone," Katara said, determined. "We found you, Aang. If the spirits just wanted you to do it by yourself, why didn't you wake up decades ago?" She touched his face. "They knew you'd need help. They knew you'd need us."

"But you could get hurt," Aang gulped. "You could..."

"We know that, dummy." Toph's words were rough, but her grin was honest as good ice. "Airbending's about freedom, right? So you've got to let us be free. We're coming, Twinkletoes. This isn't a rumble match, or any kind of honor duel. This is us against the Fire Nation. And we're gonna win it."

Tears were trickling. "The Avatar's supposed to protect the world," Aang whispered.

"Given what I've heard of the Hei Bai spirit, and the Northern Air Temple, and a certain earthbender rebellion," Hakoda winked at his daughter, "no one said the world couldn't help."

That brought the tears, flooding free at last.

Shoulder damp, Hakoda stepped out of the tent, drinking in the clean wind of a storm passed. The youngsters could look after themselves for a while, Aang sleeping the sleep of a man who'd finally shared his burdens with family. And Katara promised she'd try her new healing technique, very carefully, as soon as the moon was high, so... Oh. Not good. "Trouble?"

"Not... exactly." Pale, Bato swallowed. "They didn't make trouble. Zuko tore out of camp like an arctic rooster with his tail on fire-"

"Zuko?" Hakoda interrupted, startled. What did the Fire Nation prince have to do with anything when his family was finally...

Anger stirred, like the first waves warning of storm. Shoulders stiff, Hakoda jerked his head down the shoreline. "Come on."

"What are we doing?" Bato asked.

"Getting away from my daughter."

With a drawn-out whistle, Bato followed.

Past the ships. Past the last tents, and fellow warriors on watch. Hakoda nodded, and exchanged a few words, but kept going. Testing himself, angry, reminding himself of his duty as a chief, which included keeping track of a-

Reluctant ally.

Hakoda crossed a few more yards of sand, and sighed. "I think this is far enough."

"Far enough for what?" Bato said, exasperated.

"To think," Hakoda said grimly. "I forgot about Zuko."

"You what?" Bato choked.

"Aang was upset," Hakoda said dryly. "And so was Katara. And nothing else mattered but putting their world back together." He shook his head. "Firebenders and earthbenders need to be close to what they're bending. It seems waterbenders are the same."

"She... spirits." Bato winced, looking away. "You can't let her do this, Hakoda."

"No, I can't," Hakoda agreed bleakly. "The Avatar may be the world's hope, but he is not the whole tribe. If I can't think clearly enough to remember the firebender Aang just insulted, someone's going to get killed." He eyed Bato. "You let it wait this long. I assume the prince didn't take insult as an excuse to breach the truce?"

Bato shook his head. "He tore out, and Teruko went after him. But all he did was get away from the camp-" Bato stopped. Looked around where they were, and peered into the distance, fingers sculpting locations and distances. "You know, I think he went about this far."

Hakoda took that in, and nodded slowly. "I owe that young man an apology."

"Apologize?" Bato said, aghast. "To him?"

"I didn't say I wanted to," Hakoda said ruefully. "But if this is what he's been up against to face my children, and he still hasn't tried to kill them? He has a better hold on his temper than Sokka thinks."

Bato was shaking his head. "That's Sokka and Katara!"

"And I love them," Hakoda said levelly. "But Katara stood behind Aang, and made us stand behind him, when he cut Zuko so deeply with words Iroh lost his temper. After Zuko stood between us and a fate even worse than the Fire Lord."

"What?"

Hakoda looked into the deepening night, gathering his thoughts. Trying to remember what had happened, not what he had felt. "He's very gentle, healing," the chief said thoughtfully. "I wish we'd had him talk to Asiavik before Katara did."

"Gentle?" Bato sputtered.

"Like a zebra-seal with her pup," Hakoda shrugged. "All teeth and snarl, but he was trying not to draw blood. Even when she goaded him..."

He tried to draw the healing for his friend, clear as a story-knife's symbols in the sand. The singing tension in the air, like a raven-wolf making itself small to approach an orphaned fledgling. The way Zuko's words had dipped into water, giving shape to the delicate battle they were waging for Aang's body and mind. The green-and-gold strength of high summer that had wreathed the prince's hands; the slow-breathed stillness as those hands moved, steady and patient as melting ice...

Hakoda paused, frowning. "It's not like Katara's healing. I don't know if it's his training, or the fire... She can heal and talk, and I would guess she can fight. Zuko... all that seems to reach him is the fire and the wounds." He drew memory closer, seeing the sweat on Katara's face, knowing his daughter would never give ground in the face of an opponent. Yet she'd stopped, trying to hide her trembling. While Zuko had moved smoothly on, drawing out veil after veil of the stars' own colors to work patience and flame into flesh. Until Iroh had seen something - a flicker of flame? A bead of sweat? - and moved.

Hakoda blinked, Iroh's words sliding into place like the block of snow outlining an igloo's base. "That's why Azulon didn't want him as heir!"

"Hakoda," Bato sighed. "Back up-"

"-And start from the beginning," Hakoda echoed the old refrain. "We've been thinking of the Fire Lord's son. We know what Ozai's done to the Earth Kingdom. But Zuko says he's not part of the war."

"Exiled with his uncle these three years," Bato recalled, thinking it through. "And it's said Iroh stopped fighting after Ba Sing Se..." He stopped cold. "Tui and La. You think it's true."

"He stopped Azula in the desert, he told the Avatar how to find dragons to teach him - spirits, he tried to protect the Moon," Hakoda breathed. "Even if stopping Zhao destroyed the entire invasion fleet!" He glanced at that silver glow, shaken. "What if he is telling the truth, Bato? What if he does want to stop the war, just as much as we do?"

"So what if he does?" Bato shrugged. Not objecting, Hakoda knew; just poking at the crazier parts of his friend's crazy ideas, to bring them down to earth. "He's in this for his nephew. Any man can see that."

"His nephew, who loves him like a son," Hakoda said quietly. "Who sees us - not Katara, but the rest of us - as honorable opponents." He let out a slow, angry breath. "Which is more than the Avatar's willing to do."

Bato looked at him soberly, gauging his seriousness. "What happened?"

Hakoda smiled without humor. "Did you know Aang believes none of his people were ever evil?"

"...How did that come up?" Bato asked faintly.

"You know how we deal with those not named. Apparently, firebenders do something similar," Hakoda said plainly. "Only they call it an Agni Kai, and they do it where everyone can see."

Bato shuddered in distaste. "Well, it's obviously not working."

"And would our way work, if one bad chief had the right to watch everyone dealt with?" Hakoda pointed out.

Bato paused. For a long time. "Oh, Ocean have mercy."

"That's what Zuko says Kyoshi did to his people," Hakoda said grimly. "That's what he stopped Aang from doing to us. And the Avatar wants to. Because Aang believes we're good people, and good people don't kill each other."

"We're good people because we deal with evil!" Bato sputtered.

"You know that. I know that. Zuko knows that. Aang?" Hakoda shook his head. "Zuko shielded us, Bato. He stepped between our tribe and the spirit of the world, and he didn't even think about it." He glanced back toward the camp. "He and his may have killed Ilaq and the others. But whatever he's done, whatever crime he committed to get himself exiled... that young man just saved more than our lives. He saved our people." Hakoda winced. "And I let him walk away bleeding."

Bato grimaced. "How bad is it?"

"Aang implied Zuko had no honor," Hakoda said levelly.

Bato swore, low and heartfelt.

"It gets worse," Hakoda said dryly. "When Zuko attacked our village? Aang promised to go with him, if Zuko promised not to hurt anyone. He lied, Bato. He always intended to escape. Sokka and Katara showing up wasn't a reason. It was just convenient."

Bato swallowed hard. "And Zuko didn't turn around and slaughter the whole village?"

"Lucky for us chasing the Avatar was more important than Fire Nation military policy, isn't it?" They'd both seen more than enough of that. The Fire Nation had a strict policy on rebellion: do it, and die.

"So the most powerful bender in the world lies when it suits him." Bato shuddered. "I thought it was just because he was afraid to lose Sokka and Katara. The boy didn't have anyone else; I didn't like it, but I could understand why. But it wasn't just once, was it?"

"Apparently Air Nomad elders knew when people lied," Hakoda stated. "But we don't. I wonder how old Aang was, when he learned other nations couldn't tell?" I wonder how many lies he's told. He's twelve, he's alone, he's afraid - but Sokka's right. Someone needs to tell Aang he can't get away with this.

Sokka was right... and hate it though he might, it looked as if Zuko was, as well. For all his power, the Avatar had less of a grasp on hard reality than Sokka had had at eight.

Or, as the prince would put it, Hakoda thought wryly, the Avatar is an idiot.

But Katara - spirits, his daughter was old enough to know better. She did know better. She was a trained waterbender, wasn't she? "I need to talk to my daughter. At noon."

Bato frowned; then, reluctantly, nodded. "Waterbenders are stronger at night... she's not going to like that."

"She'd like what I really want to do even less," Hakoda said wryly. "Water's the enemy of fire. When Zuko's angry with her - I can think."

Bato gave him a look askance. "Noon's good."

Well. That's the children settled, Hakoda thought. Time to see what an adult can mend. "So Zuko got clear long enough to cool down? Wise. How did the rest of his people take it?"

"They're not happy," Bato stated. "Hakoda... he didn't just stay out there cooling down."

Hakoda raised a brow, curious.

Bato shrugged a little. "He... it didn't look like bending. More like a story-dance." He swallowed, shivering a bit. "One of the heartbreakers."

Unsettling. But not nearly enough to spark this reaction. "And then?"

"Then... the rain caught fire."

Heart in his throat, Hakoda spun to look at the camp-

"Not here," Bato said hastily. "Just... around him. About ten yards or so. It all hit water or sand. Nothing burned."

Good. In a way. "The rain was burning?" Hakoda choked out. Everyone knew rain damped firebenders, how in the world-?

"Looked like," Bato said seriously. "Mind you, none of us got close enough to be sure."

"Teruko-"

"Just stood in it," Bato shrugged again. "Guess that armor's good for something... weird thing was? She looked surprised. But happy about it." He shuddered. "Spirits, if they can turn the rain on us..."

"I don't think most of them can," Hakoda said thoughtfully. Fitting together pieces of honor, and surprising mercy, and a will that would stand against the spirit of the world himself...

To protect us, his enemies, from something that would destroy us. Because that is what an honorable firebender does, for an honorable opponent.

Hakoda let out a slow breath. "I don't want him harmed."

"Rain on fire?" Bato said pointedly.

"I didn't say it would be easy," Hakoda said frankly. "But if we're not trying to kill him - I don't think he'll try to kill us." He looked over the ships, judging how well resupply was proceeding by their depth in the water. "I think Aang may be well enough to move soon. If so, we should consider leaving. I don't think I want to linger here if the Fire Nation is controlling the Eastern Lake."

"Good point," Bato nodded. "Spirits. If Azula's there, I'm glad I'm not in Ba Sing Se."

This is bad.

Pulling a thankfully quiet Jinhai along by the hand through the unsettled Outer Ring, Shirong judged the thinning scatter of restless refugees around them, the growing darkness of curfew, and the dark armor riding komodo-rhinos down the street. And grimaced. We're not going to find a better place. "Stay behind me."

Wide-eyed, Jinhai nodded.

Another breath, and they slipped into an alley. Casual. Almost subtle. But more than enough for the hard-eyed men still on the streets to know they were up to something.

Can't be helped.

Nor could the knife in the grip of yet another smirking alley weevil-rat, quick to grab an opportunity even in the midst of invasion. "Give me your-"

From the breath, the scrolls said. Shirong breathed and punched, knowing it wasn't smooth, wasn't quite right-

The stuttering bloom of fire was enough. Shrieking, the man bolted out past them.

"Um," Jinhai gulped. "Aren't those soldiers going to-?"

"Yes," Shirong grinned wryly. "But they'll be looking for a firebender." Planting his feet in stance, he flipped the street over. And them with it.

Ow....

Wincing, Shirong swayed on his feet in the tunnel. Breathed deep, and braced himself, waiting for the dizziness to pass. Amaya had said a few more days would see him right, but a little light bending should do no harm. And they all needed information, and he and Jinhai both needed sun, and given the Dai Li would be looking for him alone, and not with a young child....

"Amaya's gonna yell at you," Jinhai said firmly.

Shirong blinked at the glowing green light from the crystal Jinhai had taken out of his pouch. Practical kid. "Probably." He winced again. "We don't have to tell your father quite how close that was, do we?"

Jinhai looked dubious. Glanced back into the tunnel. Behind him, Shirong suddenly realized.

"Exactly how close was it?" an irritated Tingzhe Wen said dryly.

Bending his head, Shirong had to laugh.

And whirled, chains striking out like lightning.

"Dad!"

"That's not your father," Shirong said sharply, keeping himself between the boy and the chained spirit. "He's waiting for us in the Middle Ring, remember? There is no way he could be here." And if he is, I'll apologize. Later. "Shed that form! Now!"

"I have no idea what you're talking about," it said silkily, false glasses gleaming. "Come, now; let's be civilized and take these off...."

"You're not Dad." Pale, Jinhai hid behind Shirong.

"No," the Dai Li agreed grimly. "It's a trick some spirits use. Find someone you want, or someone you fear, and take their form...." Shirong narrowed his eyes, catching the flicker of a smirk over the borrowed face, the faint bulge of a scroll tucked up one wide sleeve. "And for this one it was easy, because it was already pretending to be a scholar." Shape-shifter. Couldn't resist playing with us. After knowledge- "Fox!"

It shivered, and glared at him.

"Fox," Shirong declared, certain of his ground. "Servant of Wan Shi Tong. You've got a lot of nerve. The Walls may be down, but the Earth King still holds the hearts of his people. You have no right to take knowledge not freely offered." He drew in a breath. "As Dai Li and loyal servant of the Earth King, I order you to release that form!"

Borrowed lips smirked.

"Um...." Jinhai shrugged at the obvious. "It's not working?"

"Release me now, and my lord may forgive your transgression," the fox chuckled.

"Release you?" Shirong said with deadly precision. Fire licked at the core of him, hungry to attack; spirits, he could feel the chains getting hot. "While you hold the form of this boy's father, draining his strength? I don't think so."

"What?" Jinhai almost dodged past him, keeping back only at a warning clank of chains. "What's it doing to Dad?"

"Amaya should be able to handle it," Shirong said firmly. "If a fox steals your form, you're usually bedridden with a fever. It makes things... easier for them." He eyed his captive. "If you won't recognize my authority-" and spirits, why is that not working? "-there's only one person who can render judgment." Reeling in the chains, he stooped, and pulled his furious captive across his shoulders.

"Ruffian! Unhand me at once!"

"Not yet," Shirong smirked. "We're going to see the king."

Oma and Shu, thank you for making me obsessed with the lost and the forgotten. He knew the hidden tunnels and back ways of Ba Sing Se; not in as much detail as Mushi's odd group of allies did, but in more breadth than any one of them. His shoulders ached like blazes, but they found their way back to the refuge caves before he had to put the chained fox down.

"Halt! Who goes there?"

We only got thirty feet past them, Shirong thought whimsically, rapping his restive captive on the nose with a few links of iron. They're getting better. Not that he could really blame General How's surviving men for missing them. They literally hadn't been trained to face Dai Li. And soldiers... well, soldiers on the Wall didn't have to think in terms of subterfuge. Wall, stones, and Fire Nation in obvious uniforms. No sneaking involved.

No wonder Princess Azula went through them like a hot knife through butter, Shirong thought. "I have an entity that requires the Earth King's judgment."

"An entity?" The taller of the two soldiers rolled his eyes. "You Dai Li really think you're something... we'll take charge of the prisoner-"

"It's not a prisoner! It's a fox!" Jinhai blazed. "And it's making Dad sick, and we've got to stop it!"

"A fox?" The soldier smirked, ignoring his older partner's hissed warnings. "Look, kid, I don't know what you're doing hanging around one of his kind, but foxes are just- mmph!"

Finally having gotten a hand over his partner's mouth, the older guard glared at them. "Mushu, use your head for something besides a place to hang your helmet. When a Dai Li tells you something's not a myth, it's not." He jerked his head toward the inner caverns. "Take it, get out of here, I don't want to know."

Smart man, Shirong thought wryly, managing an abbreviated bow.

"Why doesn't he want to know?" Jinhai wondered as they walked on past.

Nothing quite so shrill as a curious six-year-old, Shirong smirked, catching the guard's twitch out of the corner of his eye. "Most people think if they stay away from the spirits, the spirits will stay away from them."

"Oh." Jinhai frowned. "Does that work?"

"Only as long as the spirits want it to."

Sputtering erupted behind him.

Cheered, Shirong forged forward.

The tunnel opened up and outward, ceiling soaring up to give at least the illusion of not being trapped under tons of rock. Water flowed in shaped aqueducts along one wall, and a slight breeze told Shirong someone had made sure to open tunnels to let this ancient refuge breathe.

And there were people. A startling number of people.

Has it only been a few days?

He was still astounded by the breadth of Amaya's network, run right under the Dai Li's noses. Granted, her Fire Nation refugees seemed to be naturally closed-mouthed, and they'd all known the consequences if they were caught... but still. Decades, she'd been hiding them in the Outer Ring. And not only had not one talked, a fair number seemed to have hung onto the sharp wits and grim determination that had gotten them to Ba Sing Se in the first place. Like the Wens, they'd grabbed their families, made off with a surprising variety of supplies, and bolted.

And they hadn't come alone. As he and Jinhai made their way deeper in, they passed not only quiet refugee family gatherings, but worried neighbors' families, no few panicked university students and professors, and... well, at least three pairs of teens, various annoyed family members in tow, trying to explain to startled boyfriends and girlfriends exactly why their beloved's impulse was to rescue first and explain later. Without mentioning who - or what - they really were.

Not mentioning it where our loyal soldiers can hear, at least, Shirong thought ruefully. That won't last. Scattered in the farmlands and the Outer Ring, they could blend in. Grouped together? Even Kuei's going to notice something eventually.

Well. At least this little annoyance should be good for a distraction.

If I can find him before my back gives out... where is he... ah. One knot of guards. One harried young Agent Bon. And one Earth King, looking dubiously at a sword-smith explaining the realities of the invading army having seized the armories with liberal use of a hammer and a hunk of good iron.

"Forging takes time, your majesty," the smith growled, waving iron like an odd gray strand of light bamboo. "It takes time, it takes coal, it takes air - this isn't the Fire Nation. We forge by hand."

That's the law. We don't have foundries to pour steel. Why do you think the bastards up there have spears, not swords? You can't just pour a sword in a mold! But spearheads? Arrowheads? By the tons. So long as the walls held 'em, we could keep up, but now-" The man cut himself off, staring at wrapped chains.

"Your majesty." Shirong dumped the fox on the ground, chains and all. "I require a ruling."

Kuei blinked. "On Tingzhe Wen?"

"That's not Dad!" Jinhai yelled. "You stop hurting him, now-!"

Shirong snagged the boy in one arm before he could complete that sharp motion, feeling a wash of heat even through his robes. But no sparks, thank the spirits. "It's not Professor Wen, your majesty. It's a fox."

"A knowledge spirit?" Bon swallowed, and made sure he was between the Earth King and chains, obviously hunting in memory for the correct procedure. "Why haven't you forced it out of that form?"

"I tried. It didn't work." And he had the faintest of suspicions why, yet... it couldn't be. He was a loyal Dai Li. He was. "But my bending's still weak, which means I'm not exactly a force to be reckoned with against spirits." Shirong gazed at Kuei. "But you are."

"Me?" Kuei said faintly, eyes round behind his glasses.

"You've been trained for this, your majesty," Shirong said firmly. "You are the guardian of the spirits of Ba Sing Se, both of your people and the city itself. And this spirit-" he eyed the fox, not liking how it sneered back, "-has walked where it was not invited, and delivered harm upon one of your loyal subjects."

As he'd hoped, the formal phrases stiffened the king's shoulders, and Kuei gave him a short, regal nod. The Earth King frowned at the fox, eyes dark with displeasure. "Undo the harm you have wrought on Tingzhe Wen, and explain yourself!"

Poof.

Shirong dove and snatched the scroll, before the fox's jaws could close on it. Around them he could hear gasps and at least one shriek, as a sandy-red fox twisted in chains that had seemed to hold a man.

"Oh," Kuei said faintly. "Oh, my... what is that scroll?"

"A letter," Shirong said, surprised; unrolling enough to read the salutations. "An old one. To someone... visiting Ba Sing Se." Oh my, indeed.

"Someone?" Kuei said pointedly.

"A Fire Nation noble," Shirong admitted, lingering over that elegant, exquisite precision of address before he unrolled it to skim the contents. "Almost half a century ago, by these dates. Better times..."

-Your clan longs to see you home, Father. You should see Ursa pull herself up to try her first steps; she concentrates so fiercely! It's as well none of us bend this early, or she'd have set afire every tripping carpet. And you know how Shidan is when fledglings start walking on two legs; panicked as a lion-dog who's fostered a kitten-owlet! Yes, he's still like that, after all our children...

Shirong stopped. Ran his finger back to the top of the scroll, making absolutely certain of the names.

Kuzon. Kotone. Shidan. Ursa. Byakko.

"Jinhai," Shirong said, through what seemed a great roaring in his ears, "take this. Keep it safe."

Wide-eyed, the boy hugged the scroll close. "It's important?"

"Very important," Shirong said levelly. There was a good reason not to squash the fox into jelly with a pair of rock walls. He was sure there was. He just couldn't remember it. "It's Lee's."

The fox snarled.

"Apparently someone wants it," Kuei said plainly. "So I fear your master's claim must be denied." At his guards' start, the Earth King sighed. "Now what?"

"None of the rest of us can understand it, your majesty," Bon shrugged, trying for nonchalant. "We all know your dynasty stands between us and the spirits. We just don't usually see it."

"...Oh." Kuei swallowed hard. "Well. This could just be a mistake. He said his master has a right to unwanted knowledge-"

"He's lying," Shirong said bluntly. If the scrolls we have are right; Oma and Shu, let them be!

"Wan Shi Tong is a collector of knowledge. He'll take it any way he can get it. But he's a spirit, and this is human knowledge. He has no right to that unless someone gave it away."

The fox wrinkled its lips at him, and barked.

"It belongs to the Avatar's friend," Kuei said, troubled, "and the Avatar's friend stole from his master. He claims this is just recompense?" Kuei nudged his glasses. "That seems fair..."

The fox quivered in anticipation.

"Then that's a lie, too," Shirong said dryly. "Wan Shi Tong's a lot of things, but fair isn't one of them." He kept himself between Jinhai and any flash of white fangs. "Did Lee steal from Wan Shi Tong?"

A rumble.

"A Water Tribesman stole, and the Water Tribe must repay," Kuei said doubtfully.

"Did Lee, of the Northern Water Tribe, and some say the Foggy Swamp, steal from Wan Shi Tong?" Shirong said, voice edged with all the dire precision he'd honed on two decades' worth of spirits.

"Lee's not really Water Tribe," Kuei said grimly. "You know that."

"Yes, he is," Shirong replied. "It doesn't matter where he was born, your majesty. Amaya claims him as kin. He is of her tribe." The agent couldn't help but chuckle, some of anger's clutch loosening. "Which would probably drop their chief and half the waterbenders dead of apoplexy. So it's just as well they don't know. Yet." Oh, to be an ice-fly on that snowy wall.

But he could think again, and so he could realize the fox was studiously silent. "So it wasn't Lee," Shirong nodded to himself. Prince Zuko had as dire a respect for the spirits as any battle-scarred Dai Li. He wouldn't have crossed the Great Owl willingly. In fact, of all those Shirong had seen near the Avatar, the only one who might be reckless enough to try something that suicidal... "It was Sokka, wasn't it?"

Silence. A soft growl.

"He claims," Kuei said skeptically, "the Avatar owes He Who Knows Ten Thousand Things."

"Then collect from the Avatar's hide," Shirong said darkly.

Somebody choked. "You want to say that to Wan Shi Tong?"

"I'm not saying it to him. I'm saying it to one of his servants," Shirong shrugged. "And the Earth King, who is honored throughout the Earth Kingdom, including the Si Wong desert, has every right to be so forthright to one who has dealt harm to any of his subjects. Which Professor Tingzhe Wen certainly is." He eyed the fox narrowly. "If the professor had been on the surface near occupying troops when you took his form, and not below ground, that fever could have put him at risk of his life."

The fox did not look one inch repentant.

Whatever Kuei heard stiffened his shoulders, and he stalked right up to the chained muzzle. "You dare hold one of my subjects accountable for an outsider's actions? Simply because he, too, tried to help the Avatar?"

For the first time, the fox looked uneasy.

"The world has been out of balance for a hundred years! It's the duty of every righteous citizen - no, every human! - to try to restore that balance. And every spirit!" Kuei's hands folded into unpracticed fists. "And you would pursue a petty revenge, against one of those trying to end this war?"

The fox whimpered.

"I believe your master has forgotten whose tomes contributed to his library," Kuei stated, eyes hard as flint. "We shall see that he remembers it."

Almost against his will, Shirong found himself drawing back a step. He could feel something in the air, in the ground; like a landslide, moments before it let go...

"We find you and your master, Wan Shi Tong, have behaved with contempt to us, and to our people! We find that you have done us harm; willfully, pettily, and with full knowledge of our desperation, beset by enemies! We find that you have cast aside the virtues of civilized creatures. And so, we render our judgment!"

The fox was shaking in its chains, eyes wide and wild. Shirong held his breath. It was said the Earth King's line descended from ancient shamans, but spirits...

"You, your master, and all his servants are hereby banished from our lands," Kuei decreed. "Your master may petition Oma and Shu. Should they decide his punishment is enough, we shall revisit our judgment. Until that day - begone!"

Chains fell through empty air, clattering on stone.

"Oh..." Kuei wobbled.

"Your majesty." Shirong abandoned his chains to steady the pale young man in royal robes. "That was... I'm impressed."

"I didn't know I could do that," Kuei said shakily. Blinked, and looked across the cavern. "W-what in the world..."

Incredulous, Shirong let Kuei lean on him. It wasn't just the guards, and Bon; all of whom he'd expected to see on their knees, given their king was pronouncing judgment. No; there were hundreds - spirits, over a thousand! - with bowed heads, grass before the gale of the Earth King's command.

Grass... and the great mountain pines, Shirong thought, seeing all Amaya's careful plans undone in one instant. For every Earth Kingdom soul was prostrated, but every Fire Nation refugee...

Honor to a lord not your own, Shirong read in those bended knees. Oh. Damn.

Jaw dropped, Kuei turned to stare at him.

Shirong cleared his throat. "We can explain."

Kuei raised a brow. Stepped away, toward the sword-smith on bended knee. "Who are you?"

The smith ducked his head. "I'm called Pei, your majesty."

"I didn't ask what you were called."

The smith opened his mouth... and, slowly, closed it. "Maeda," he said quietly. "I was born Maeda, of Hinokawa."

Kuei swung around toward Shirong, obviously shaken. "And you can explain this?"

"I never said you'd like it," Shirong said dryly. "Your majesty-"

"Daddy!"

Shirong had to smile, as Jinhai hit his father with the force of a small fireball. And yes, there was Amaya looking serious, and Meixiang swooping in to help catch her little boy...

Out of the corner of his eye, he saw Kuei finally see Meixiang. And blanch.

No. I can still fix this. "Your majesty," Shirong said impulsively, remembering his king's long hours in the palace library, "do you remember the story of the lion-dog and the cricket-mouse?"

Kuei blinked, and slowly nodded. "Why should I spare you, who are my prey?" he said softly. "How can such a little thing as you ever help me in my hour of need?"

"Ba Sing Se is caught in the great net of the Fire Nation," Shirong stated. "These people, all of them, are here because they fled that army. Trust them. They will help."

"You trust them," Kuei said thoughtfully.

"I have personal reasons," Shirong admitted, trying to calm his suddenly racing heart. "Lee saved my life. More than once." Oh spirits, he knows.

No. Kuei couldn't possibly know. Paranoia might be part of the Dai Li job description, but there was no way in the world the Earth King could know he was a firebender.

I hope.

Spirits, he was tired. And just... unsettled, in ways becoming ever more frighteningly familiar. Not that he had any idea what to do about them.

Amaya. I've got to talk to Amaya.

Duty first. His own heart later. "Your majesty," Shirong said formally, "if it suits your wishes to call for your current military advisors, I would like to make my report."

Tingzhe paced the length of the rough family room he and Jia had shaped, building a private family shelter among the host of other earthbent enclosures. Thank the spirits Amaya was staying with them, to "teach" Jinhai. No one questioned that the healer would need privacy for her patients, and who could blame the Wens for shaping their own shelter along with hers?

When it's actually we who need the privacy, Tingzhe thought wryly, looking over his family. Jinhai was napping on a cushion, a pot of water abandoned to cool on a stone table. Suyin - and, surprisingly, Jia - had their heads buried in one of the books smuggled down by the university, lost in a great battle against waegu in the Western Lake. Min... was an absence, but at least word was coming down that he was all right. And Meixiang... well, Meixiang looked exceedingly proper, wafting a hint of incense over the family tablets in their makeshift altar alcove. Frighteningly proper, considering what she'd proposed.

Propriety is the only shield we have left, Tingzhe thought soberly. I've no idea what the Fire Nation folk here would do about a young firebender. Much less my own people! And considering Shirong... "Are you certain he'll come?"

Arranging three cups before the small altar, Meixiang nodded. "He'll come for Amaya, at least. You saw how he looked." She regarded him steadily. "Love. Do you want to do this?"

"You made a good argument that it's necessary," Tingzhe said plainly. "He's a good man, and he needs help."

"But it doesn't have to be our help," Meixiang said soberly. "Sooner or later others will find out he's a firebender. Another family could do this more... conventionally. You wouldn't have to..."

"I have no intention of doing this because I have to," Tingzhe stated. "I am doing this because he is a good man, against all odds. And I would be much less than that, if I turned him away." He crossed the room, taking her hand in his. "And because you are my wife, and I want our children to be ours. Not torn between. Not hiding." He smiled. "At least, not from us."

Meixiang smiled back, and reached up for him-

"Don't watch!" Jia whispered.

"I'm not watching!" Suyin protested. "Jia!"

Hands still entwined, Tingzhe joined his beloved in rueful laughter. "Hold that thought?" Meixiang murmured.

"I suppose we must." Shaking his head, Tingzhe turned toward the sound of irritable voices... or rather, one raised voice, and one trying to soothe what didn't want to be soothed.

"-Look, just - do something to quiet it for a while!" Shirong's voice neared the curtain and set of raised rock screens currently serving as a front door and entryway. "I have to do my job, we're at war-"

"And were you just a Dai Li serving under Long Feng, I might give you exactly what you ask for," Amaya said tartly. "But you are not. And we're not at war, we're hiding. Which means I can, and will, take the measures needed to heal you properly. Tui and La - that was a fox! What if you'd been a breath slower? What if it hadn't been alone? In."

"I'd like to know how that fox found you in the first place," Tingzhe said dryly, as the scowling agent rounded the last screen. "It's a very large city up there. What are the odds?"

"Better than average," the agent admitted, as Amaya followed him in. "Lee healed me. And any bending leaves a mark the spirits can read."

"What he's not saying is, given what Lee healed him from, he glows," Amaya said plainly. "If that fox were looking for anything connected to Lee, it couldn't miss him. Jinhai is the only other person in this city who might draw it as strongly." She gave Shirong a stern look. "So if you won't take proper care for yourself, at least think of him."

Looking at the sleep-mumbling young boy, Shirong drew a deep breath. Covered his face with his hands, and let it sigh out. "Forgive me. I'm just - it's - spirits, how do they stand it? I feel as if I'm going to jump out of my own skin-" He cut himself off.

"Or set something on fire?" Meixiang finished. "Sit down. Breathe. You're safe."

"No one's ever safe," Shirong muttered. But sat.

Suyin swallowed, letting Jia have the book. "Lee said his temper was his problem."

"It is," Meixiang nodded. "Lee has a dragon's rage. What he must fight every day to contain it, I can only imagine. But all firebenders have a temper. To someone who grew up solid as earth, I imagine it's quite a shock."

Shirong gave a strangled laugh. "That's one way to put it." Straightening his shoulders, he leaned back a little on the stone bench. "So how does Lee fight his?"

"He meditates," Tingzhe answered. And waited for the explosion.

"He meditates?" Shirong repeated, incredulous. "He said most firebenders do, but... Are we talking about the same young man? Lee? Snarls at Dai Li, glares down the Earth King over a bear, jumps deliberately into a haima-jiao's reach? And you want me to believe he meditates? When a spirit's not trying to eat him?"

"Think what he'd be like without it," Amaya said wryly.

Shirong paused. Paled. Shivered a bit, and looked over them all. "Lee meditates."

"You should hear Jinhai whine about it," Jia smirked. "Lee won't teach him anything unless he shows he can breathe, first." At her mother's look, she ducked her head. "Well, he does! 'I have bad habits, you need to have good ones'. Lee doesn't let him get away with anything."

"Which is not always the best way to learn," Tingzhe mused. "But we are not yet somewhere we can afford for Jinhai to make mistakes." He regarded the agent. "I can show you the proper form. Lee was very insistent that I know, in case... something went wrong."

Reluctantly, Shirong nodded. Glanced at Amaya. "But it's not just temper. If it were only being angry I wouldn't be asking for help. It's - spirits, I don't even know myself anymore. My heart moves and my mind scrambles to keep up, I'm not like this, I-" He took a breath. "I knew, when I saw it, exactly why your hidden folk knelt like that. I knew. And I've never..." His hands trembled, fisting on his lap. "Kuei's... not mine. I've served as a Dai Li for two decades, and I can't feel that he's... how could I do that?"

"Loyalty isn't logic," Meixiang said gently. "It's like love. You can choose who you associate with. You can keep people at a distance, long enough to know if they're worthy of a closer look. You can decide what you will do, if you feel that first pull toward another's fire." She smiled at her husband. "But sometimes you meet someone, and you see they embody all the virtues you've been raised to hold as sacred and honored. And you know."

Tingzhe gazed back, devoutly hoping he wasn't blushing like a schoolboy. He'd been a far younger scholar when he'd first met a beautiful young refugee whose calligraphy was clear, clean, and fast enough to win her a job as a library scribe. Younger, but not a young man, and painfully aware of how many wealthy students strutted like peacocks to catch Meixiang's eye. And also aware that he was a teacher of the university, and it would never, ever be appropriate to even seem to be pressuring a young lady who also served that institution...

The first go-between's letter had been like solstice dawn.

"On the purely practical side," Amaya put in quietly, "Lee is a very strong firebender. And he was there when you needed him." She paused. "And when I heal you... I can feel you're an orphan. Either they're dead, or they've kept apart. There's no one left to care what happens to you."

"The war took most of my family," Shirong said bitterly. "And go near the ones left, with my luck? I'm not that cruel. What has that got to do with anything?"

"We need clans," Meixiang explained. "It's horrible, to be unclanned. Loyalty to a lord helps, but without family? We're alone. We're threatened. We're afraid." She regarded him steadily. "And when you're afraid and angry... Shirong, let us help."

"Help?" the agent said warily.

"They've discussed it with me," Amaya nodded. "In my opinion as a healer of spirit-wounds - it can't hurt. And I think it could help."

"What could?" Shirong said, even more wary.

"Mom and Dad want to adopt you," Suyin blurted out.

Shirong blinked.

"You're already living here anyway," Jia said bluntly. "You're a firebender, Jinhai's a firebender - it'll be a lot easier to hide that we're weird if we're all weird together."

"Jia," Meixiang sighed.

"Well, it's true," Jia said defensively. "Think about Min, Mom! He tries to be like the other guys, but he's not. And I don't know if that's you, or Dad, or both. You know how many other fathers teach their daughters earthbending? Not many. Most boys Min's age? They can trap a girl if they want to, and they know it. So we never, ever go with boys alone. Min's polite. Maybe he thinks that's a bad thing now, but if he can keep his head a little longer? Smart girls are going to be pounding down Dad's door with matchmakers and go-betweens. If their parents are smart enough to let them."

Shirong chuckled. "They may be too late."

Tingzhe thought of an expressionless girl with hurt gold eyes, and shook his head. Like father, like son, they say.

Well. If that were true, Meixiang's proposal had even more merit than he'd thought. "Apparently this is a matter of instinct and emotion, as well as conscious thought," Tingzhe stated. "Firebenders need a clan; you and Jinhai are firebenders, and you have no family. Meixiang has suggested we create a clan, for both your sakes." He gave the agent a wry, sad smile. "You don't mind being our younger brother, do you? I lost mine on the Wall years past, and Meixiang lost... everyone. She knows your pain."

"Create a clan," Shirong repeated, stunned. "Is that possible?"

"We are born of war, as well as fire," Meixiang said soberly. "Every educated woman is taught this ritual. In case there are no survivors, of you or your love's people, and everything must start over." She raised her chin. "Though I am amending it. My husband is of earth. We will be earth and fire. None of my children should ever feel they have nowhere to go." She winked. "I promise, it'll only hurt a little."

Shirong looked at her, and the wine, and the clean blade wrapped in silk by the cups. "How long will this take?"

"Not long at all. It was meant for emergencies." Standing, Meixiang held out her hand.

Shirong considered them both a long moment more. Nodded, and crossed the room to join them by the altar.

Expectation makes it worse, Tingzhe thought ruefully, wincing at the sting as Meixiang pricked his finger, letting three drops fall into his cup of salted wine. Shirong, and then herself, and then she picked up each cup in turn, pouring and swirling and pouring between them, until no one knew which cup had begun where, and the rich summer scent of grapes hung heavy in the air. The prayer was already written, two precise copies in Meixiang's fine hand; one for the family to keep for Oma, Shu, and Guanyin, the other set afire for Agni with the touch of a match.

Ashes crumbled into their cups, and Meixiang sighed, relieved. Handed a cup to each of them, and raised hers high. "My brother, my husband - to Wen!"

"To Wen!" Tingzhe echoed, trying to ignore the gnawing feeling of stepping off a cliff. This was for his wife, his children, and a good man who was beginning to be his friend. Certainly, there was no reason to-

Blood and wine and salt, and the world crushed him.

"...Tingzhe?" Meixiang's voice, a breath from panic. "Oh Agni, I'll never forgive myself if you-"

"Ow," the professor managed, very precisely. Blinked at the ring of faces around him. "What on earth am I doing on the floor?"

"You all drank, I sensed something, and then..." Lifting a water-gloved hand from his head, Amaya frowned. "How are you feeling?"

Letting Meixiang help him to his feet, Tingzhe considered that. He knew this feeling. From earthbending. A sense of pressure, of being leaned on... and yet with that, came the oddest sense of strength. Support. Connection. "Like the keystone in an arch." Breathing in that strength, he opened his arms to his family.

Children swarmed him, and Tingzhe felt whole.

Min isn't here. He breathed out. But we will find him.

He opened his eyes at the touch of a hand warm as Jinhai's, but far larger. "Welcome home."

Entangled in family, Shirong looked utterly bemused. "I... thank you can't possibly be enough."

"You're among clan," Meixiang said gently. "You are always welcome among us." She swallowed. "Oh Agni. I missed this."

"My head feels all tingly," Jia said shakily.

"You'll get used to it."

"It's kind of like having Lee here," Suyin said thoughtfully.

"Yes," Meixiang nodded. "A clan holds your loyalty safe. Like a good lord. We protect each other. And so we do not fear our loyalty will be seized by one unworthy of it; for our clan watches for danger when we falter, and fights when we can fight no more." She looked down at the sleepy little boy clinging to her waist. "Jinhai?"

"So if Uncle Shirong's all better," he yawned, "can we go to sleep now?"

"Excellent idea," Tingzhe concurred.

Though it was a bit more complicated than that. There was an altar to clean, children to sort out and tuck into bedding, one still-stunned agent to get sorted out as well...

And one waterbender to grab for a quick whisper, before she sought her own bed. "I thought you said you'd considered what might happen!" Tingzhe hissed, keeping his voice low.

"I did. At least, what I'd seen of Agni's interference," Amaya said plainly. "I didn't realize that other spirits might be just as sympathetic."

"What?"

Amaya smiled wryly, humming a few bars of the catchiest, most annoyingly frustrating song that had ever gotten stuck in Tingzhe's head.

Two lovers, forbidden from one another. A war divides their people...

Cold floor, Min Wen registered, blinking. Wait, shouldn't be on the floor, was on spy duty on the audience chamber, watching the Fire Princess-Inhumanly wide gray blinked at him. Giggled, close enough to feel warm breath across his nose.

"Gaah!"

Ty Lee flipped off her hands and onto her feet, still grinning as he scrambled back as far as the hidden nook in the wall would let him, trying to calm his racing heart. "Oh good, you're okay!" She looked him up and down, and - impossibly - brightened further. "Better than okay! That's great!"

"Geh?" Min managed, trying to wriggle free of an insanely flexible hug.

Ty Lee let go, turning her smile down to moon-bright from blinding. "Your aura. It's so much brighter! Wherever your family went, they must be okay."

"How would you know if my family's-" Words died on Min's lips.

My family's okay.

Not just words. He was sure of it. Somehow.

They're okay, and they miss me.

Solid earth under his feet. A warm hearth. Home.

Min stood up, nerving himself. Ty Lee was the enemy, even if she was Mai's friend. But still... "Do you know what just happened?"

"Sure," Ty Lee said perkily. "I just found out why Azula can't pull you and Quan in. It's been bugging her."

Erk. Min swallowed dryly. Oh, this is not good, really not good-

"It's funny. And a little sad." Ty Lee shook her head. "Zuko came into the palace a couple of times, didn't he? And you both met him."

"Agent Quan already told the princess we didn't know who he was," Min said carefully.

"Oh, you didn't know know," Ty Lee nodded. "But you knew." She patted pink ruffles over her heart. "That's why it's sad. He'd dead now, you know."

He couldn't have just heard what he thought he'd heard. He couldn't have. "...What?"

"He got in Azula's way. He helped the Avatar's friends, instead of her. Against the Fire Lord's orders." She shrugged, a fluid flow of movement. "Zuko's a firebender. He's not like Mai, who can get better. He's dead."

Min looked into cheerful gray eyes, and felt chilled. "And you don't care."

"I said it's sad." For a moment, she glanced down. "But he got in Azula's way. That's what happens."

For a moment, Min tried to picture that. Tried to imagine what it must have been, to have for your sister... someone who made things happen.

"She tried to make it quick," Ty Lee went on. "But I guess he picked up General Iroh's trick... I feel sorry for him. Lu Ten died here, and now he had to watch it happen to Zuko, and traitors' deaths are awful. Poor General Iroh."

There wasn't room to get away. He edged back anyway, longing to bend his way out rather than stay.

I've got orders. Agent Quan's counting on me to help watch Azula. I have to.

And there Quan was. Mai behind him, he approached Azula as she sat on the royal throne, gold eyes glittering above her robe of Earth green. Bowed, stiffly, barely glancing at silent guards. "You sent for me, your highness?"

"You're still here," Azula mused. "I have to wonder. Is that bravery? Or stupidity?"

"You could consider practicality," Quan said levelly. "You hold the Dai Li. Where could I possibly run that you couldn't find me?"

"What a coincidence," Azula said silkily. "I was just wondering the same thing."

Even hidden by stone, Min shivered.

"Ba Sing Se is truly a marvelous city," Azula mused. "Above and below. Do you know, I've been questioning the Dai Li, and no two of them come up with the same map?" Her gaze sharpened.

"Where is Agent Shirong?"

"I don't know," Quan said levelly.

"And here's the interesting part," Azula said thoughtfully. "I believe you. You don't know where he is. No one knows where he is. So tell me. In an organization that obeyed the will of one man, where every Dai Li works with a partner, why does no one know where this man might have gone?"

Quan let out a slow breath. "Your majesty. Shirong hasn't worked with a partner in years. He has... bad luck. It's safer to keep your distance."

Azula's eyes narrowed. "Benders make their own luck, Agent Quan."

"Maybe firebenders can," Quan said levelly. "We're not that skilled."

"You could be right," Azula said casually. "It would certainly explain my brother. And I have a great deal of interest in explaining my brother, Agent Quan. He may have been a traitor and a failure, but my father will still expect a full and complete account of the circumstances surrounding his death."

"His death?" Quan's eyes were cold. "Did you kill him, your highness?"

"He killed himself, and you know it," Azula said levelly. "My brother always was an idealistic fool." Gold gleamed. "What I want to know is, how far did he spread his poison? How did he do it at all without the Dai Li realizing exactly what he was?"

"I don't know what you're talking about, your highness."

"And we were having such a civilized conversation," Azula sighed. "Don't start lying to me now. Fire is loyalty and life; the Dai Li well know that, having broken so many of the Fire Nation to die. My brother healed Shirong; Shirong chose him over Long Feng." Lethal red nails tapped the arm of the throne. "Don't tell me you never connected the dots."

Out of the corner of his eye, Min saw Ty Lee's jaw drop. In the audience chamber, Mai went still.

They didn't know, Min realized. Whatever Azula's talking about, they didn't know. And just what was she talking about? She couldn't mean what it sounded like...

"Your healers can touch a man's loyalty," Quan said, half to himself. "I'm surprised the Wall didn't fall decades ago."

"You're not that innocent," Azula smiled coldly. "You know exactly why the Fire Lord can't leave anyone with that power alive. So I'll ask you one more time. Who else did my brother heal? Besides the stupid bear." She sniffed. "I knew the Earth King was blind to his people's worth, but to miss my brother firebending in front of him-

Quan smiled bitterly. "He used hot water."

Elegant nostrils flared. "What did you say?"

Quan met her gaze squarely, grimly amused. "I'm saying, your highness, that you're not the only one who can use a disguise. No one noticed your brother because he made himself look like what he was; a refugee and an outcast, fleeing the Fire Nation. No facepaint, no weapons, no brave uniform. Just a waterskin and a firepot, and a story thin enough we all knew it was a lie. But we never came near the truth. After all, we know what the Fire Nation teaches about lesser elements. What great name would ever pretend to be a waterbender?"

Gracefully, Azula stood. Took a few steps down the dais, until her gaze was level with Quan's.

And smirked.

Spots flashed in Min's vision. He gulped air, making himself breathe.

"You really don't think you're the first person to try to goad me into killing him, do you?" Azula said, gently chiding. "Though I am impressed. A man in so much pain, so lost without the commander he was loyal to. And you're still standing." She shook her head slightly. "Someone must have given you hope. How very... cruel of them." Her voice hardened. "Ty Lee. Bring him."

"Do you want to walk?" Ty Lee said brightly. "Or, you know..." She wiggled her fingers.

"Walk," Min managed to get out. "I'll walk."

It felt like walking into acid. His heartbeat drummed in his ears, and all he could see were eyes. Dark brown, full of pain, made fresh by the realization there was something left to lose. Gold that should be his enemy, that he knew never would be again, shadowed by the same horror. And in front of him...

Gold as the sun, and far more pitiless. "You're not human," Min whispered.

"My, my. You have met my brother." Azula smiled, as if at a fond memory. "Do you know, he tried to tell people? But - well, you know, sibling rivalry. Fire Lord Sozin's line is the blood of heroes. Why, just look at all we've done for the world." She focused on him. "Where is your family, Trainee Min Wen?"

The only way to keep a secret from her, is not to know it. Spirits, if he lived through this, he was going to listen when Dad told him I told you so. And he was going to like it. "I don't know," Min got out. And didn't try to hide how his voice shook.

"I suppose it doesn't really matter," Azula mused. "After all, I don't need to find them. They'll find you."

Min froze. Swallowed, and made himself look at her. "My father's a historian at Ba Sing Se University. He knows what the Fire Nation can do. And he never wanted me to be Dai Li. He won't come."

"Yes he will." Ruby nails slashed out, caught his chin in a clawed grip. "You may call yourself an earthbender, but I know what you are. I can feel you."

Fire. Spirits, it felt like he was burning from the inside out, she was too strong, he couldn't bear it-
Help me!

A surge of strength, shielding his faltering heart. Min blinked. Breathed.

Gazed back into gold eyes, like staring into the face of an avalanche. If I'm going to die - spirits, let me do it standing.

"The strength of a clan," Azula said dryly. "My uncle left quite a mark. I'll have to speak with him about that, when I see him. It's so rude to create a line of loyalty that avoids the Dragon Throne. Why, even the Avatar would have said it was treason." Stepping back, she waved to the guards.

He managed to deflect the first stone gloves. But not the tenth.

"I asked for an assurance of your good behavior, Agent Quan," Azula stated, looking at the man now all but strangled in iron chains. "I think I'll take this one."

"What makes you think I care what happens to one boy?" Quan said coldly.

"You should." Azula raised a hand; a teacher, instructing a particularly slow pupil. "You have a firebender's killer instinct. And their weakness. You need to be loyal. And Long Feng is dead. You'd never stand against me... unless you were drawing strength from somewhere else." She nodded at the guards. "Mai. See that he's taken back to his quarters. I think the agent needs time to reflect on his duties. And his loyalty."

Stone shut behind them, and Min gulped. "Agent Quan will never betray our city. It doesn't matter if you kill me." Oh, damn, that was stupid-

"Oh, I have no intention of killing you."

Min stared at her, chilled to the bone.

"Fools believe in spirits. I believe in power." Azula smiled at him, gently chiding. "You really should meet my father. From the moment he knew I was his true heir, he taught me about the inner fire. How to seek it. How to use it. And how to know how others arrange theirs. You think you're Dai Li? Then you're not loyal to my uncle. Which means, at your age, it must be one of your parents." She shrugged, as if it were of no importance. "I'll have to kill them both, to be sure."

He didn't want to move. He didn't want to breathe.

"Then your brother and sisters," Azula went on, still smiling. "You're old enough to head a clan, after all. We can't have that. I wonder; should I give you a few days with them, first? Let you feel everything you were born to feel, everything you long to protect, before I take them away?"

Somewhere, Min found the will to whisper. "Monster..."

"Oh, you haven't even heard the best part!" Azula smirked. "Which comes when I leave you alive. And alone. With no one to be loyal to... but me."

No. Spirits, no.

"Take him out of my sight." Azula turned away, and shrugged at Ty Lee. "Well, that was fun."

How's the rest of the occupation going?"

The minute Huojin walked into the station and saw red-and-black armor, he knew it was going to be a bad night.

Fair's fair. The whole city's having bad nights. Ever since they brought the Walls down... spirits, I never thought that would happen.

Which was one reason why he and his family were still living aboveground, instead of vanishing like so many others. They'd made preparations. The Wens were holding a bunch of supplies for them for when they finally did bolt. But someone needed to be eyes and ears in the city as long as possible... and his fellow Guards needed all the help they could get.

He hesitated going past the soldiers to join the rest of the ghost watch. Who wouldn't? But Captain An Lu-shan was there by a cold-faced, salt-and-pepper haired Fire Nation sergeant; grumpy and grim as Huojin had ever seen him. Damned if he'd let the captain down now.

The intruder waited as a few stragglers filtered in, hand on a stack of papers that looked suspiciously like the station's personnel files. "Is this everyone, Captain?"

"Yes," Lu-shan said flatly. "We can call roll, if you like."

"That won't be necessary tonight," the soldier stated. "Tomorrow. So anyone who might have had unavoidable business elsewhere has a chance to hear we're not inclined to roast you all alive."

Huojin squinted, but still couldn't tell if the man was joking.

"I am Master Sergeant Yakume," the Fire Nation soldier announced to the crowd of Guards. "I've been detailed here to ensure the laws of Ba Sing Se continue to be enforced, as they have been in the past."

Huojin raised an eyebrow.

"This isn't my first such detail, so I'll clear a few things up right now," Yakume said grimly. "I don't like you. You're Earth Kingdom. You have habits and customs I, and all of my people, find offensive at best. On the other hand, I am well aware you find us unnatural, and you tell your children to behave or the firebenders will roast and eat them. That, is false. We are not murderers, we are soldiers. If I had my way, no child would ever be on a battlefield." Gold eyes swept them all, measuring and grim. "We are also not fools. Anyone who hides behind a child to perform acts of sabotage or sedition is condemning that child to death with them. Do we understand each other?"

You could have heard a pebble drop.

"Good," Yakume said quietly. "Do not interfere with soldiers performing their duties. It's been a long siege, and no one is in a good mood. However. Any incident of law-breaking by our soldiers, you will report to me. And I will deal with it. I have a wife and children in the colonies; anyone who lays disgraceful hands on a civilian is not worthy of his uniform." Another sweep of gold eyes. "I don't like you. That doesn't mean I hate you. Keeping the peace is a hard and thankless job, and anyone who does it well has earned some respect. Do your jobs, use your heads, and we'll all go home at the end of the day."

He's good, Huojin thought, watching carefully as the master sergeant inclined his head to the captain, and stepped out of the way of the station's business. Just keep doing your jobs, never mind us taking over... Heck, we let the Dai Li run us, what's the difference besides the uniform? That's what a lot of people will think, until it's too late- uh-oh. The captain was beckoning him over to them. And he couldn't pretend he hadn't seen it.

Keep it together. Huojin took a deep breath, and walked over to his captain. "Sir?"

Yakume held up a ribbon-bound bundle of papers. "I believe we need to talk."

Funny, how the interrogation room always looks different from this side of the table, Huojin thought whimsically, as Yakume laid his file bundle down between them. The master sergeant didn't look upset... well, not more than he had already. And Huojin still had his sword. But... This is not good.

"I understand you're acquainted with Healer Amaya," Yakume said plainly.

"So's half the Lower Ring, and a lot of the farms," Huojin answered, just as blunt. "She's been here... almost thirty-one years now, I think. People know her."

"And they'd be willing to protect her." Yakume's gaze was level.

"I haven't seen her since the clinic got closed," Huojin said plainly. "I thought the Dai Li got her. She always worried about them. She knew the war was out there." He shrugged. "If they don't have her, I hope she's okay."

"Hmm." Yakume nodded slightly. "And have you seen these men before?"

The wanted poster was a shock. Huojin didn't try to hide it; just pulled the paper closer to study the portraits. So that's General Iroh, topknot and all. And... "Kid looks a lot more human with hair." He met Yakume's gaze, deliberately. "If you have the Dai Li reports, you know I know them."

"Tell me anyway." From the chill in Yakume's eyes, it wasn't a suggestion.

"Not much to say," Huojin said bluntly. "I rotate onto the docks at least a few days every other week. Captain Lu-shan likes to be sure we're all familiar with different trouble spots. About a month back, I spotted a ruckus over at the incoming desk, with these two in the middle of it. The kid healed a woman on the ferry, and the bureaucrats were frothing at the mouth 'cause he saved a life without a license." Huojin rolled his eyes. "They looked about done in, and to be honest? Kind of scared. So I cut a little red tape and took them straight to Amaya. She decided he was good enough to train, his uncle got a job making tea, and that's pretty much what I know about them."

Was it his imagination, or had gold eyes creased with a little humor when he mentioned Iroh and tea?

If they had, it was gone the next instant. "I'd hardly call Prince Zuko a kid," Yakume said coldly. "And you," he tapped the poster, "are not surprised."

Oops. "No, Master Sergeant," Huojin said, trying to salvage what he could. "The Avatar's little bunch described the prince pretty... vividly."

Gold eyes fixed on him, razor-sharp. "You knew Prince Zuko was in the city before Princess Azula overthrew Long Feng."

So that's the story? Huh. Might even be true. "Yes, I did."

Yakume studied him. "And you didn't have him arrested."

"He didn't break any laws," Huojin shrugged.

Yakume raised a skeptical brow.

"If there were a law against being Fire Nation in Ba Sing Se, your whole army would have warrants out on them," Huojin said wryly. "It'd be stupid, but somebody in the government would be brainless enough to pull that. But there's not. He was a healer's apprentice. He wasn't any trouble. Well... not much," Huojin amended, thinking of Lee's terse account of dumping Jet the fanatic off a bison, hopefully far from Ba Sing Se.

"None of which would have mattered if you'd told the Earth Army he was here," Yakume observed.

Good point. Damn. "Well, I guess the Avatar just caught me on a bad day," Huojin snarled. Jerked a nod toward his file. "You've read that? Then you know Amaya picked me up off the streets. I was six, I was alone, my parents were gone, and I was about one hungry night away from getting mixed up with bad, bad people. She faced down a crowd of those weevil-rats and got me out of there. She helped me grow up, into the Guard. She was at my wedding, and she's Auntie to my daughters. I love that woman. And now she's gone, and the whole Wen family is gone, and my wife and kids just barely got out before the Dai Li crashed down on the Wens. Because the Avatar decided to tear through Ba Sing Se to get his bison back." He waved an angry hand toward the wall, and all the Outer Ring beyond it. "You've been out there. You've seen what it's like. Life is hard down here. We get the refugees, and there aren't enough jobs, and most of the good men go fight on the Wall. Which leaves us between good citizens and the scum. The Avatar's out to save the world? Oma and Shu, we could've used a little saving down here!"

Yakume was carefully silent.

Damn temper. Huojin yanked it back by his fingernails, taking a minute to just breathe. "I didn't know Prince Zuko. But I damn sure knew Lee, Amaya's apprentice. Who saved my neck in a dark alley when a ninety-nine-year spirit tried to eat me. Who stood between rocks and my kids, when a bunch of brainless noble earthbenders started throwing their weight around because they could." He shrugged. "And the Avatar ticked me off."

"Hmm." And that was a smile, faint as dawn's first light. "I see."

"Master Sergeant?" Huojin said warily.

"Try not to have any more bad days," the soldier advised. "That will be all."

I missed something there. I just know it.

Huojin was still puzzling over that as he headed back to his desk, halted only by the captain's somber look. "Well?" Lu-shan asked.

"He wanted to know about Amaya's apprentice," Huojin said frankly.

The captain frowned. "You're still calling him that?"

"It's what the kid I knew was, sir." Huojin shrugged. "If the war hadn't gone this way, he'd still be here. Helping."

For a moment, the captain looked as if he'd swallowed a live catfish-eel. Shook it off, and warily waved him back to work.

Pausing by his desk, Huojin checked that there wasn't any new paperwork that needed seeing to before he met up with the rest of his patrol for the night. And took a moment for one frustrated thought.

Damn it, Lee, where are you?

Out at last, Teruko thought wryly, watching over her younger charge as he burrowed further under his blankets. The heat in their expanded shelter was gentle, nowhere near the stifling heat the prince's illness had required, but he finally looked like he'd shaken off the shock. Though having one lump of huge dark feathers curled up alongside him might have something to do with that.

Better you than me, the marine thought frankly, as Asahi's quiet snores buzzed in the air. Literally; the prince's reflexes apparently categorized the ostrich-horse as safe. Another human being wouldn't be so lucky.

And what that told her about the prince's life so far... she didn't like it. At all.

Satisfied there were enough marines between Zuko at this end and the shelter door at the front to at least have a chance of catching him, Teruko retreated toward the door, stopping at the desk-like nook Toph had shaped. Where her second charge studied maps, tracing possible paths through the water to Ba Sing Se. "General." She kept her voice low; no need to spread this beyond clan. "Why doesn't the prince know what he is?"

Iroh arched a gray brow at her. "What he is, Lieutenant?"

"Byakko, sir. I know the stories." She eyed him. "You and I both know, the Avatar knew the Shidan we know. Just - not on two feet."

"I had thought it was only a legend," Iroh said quietly.

She couldn't help it; she stared at him. "Sir. He stalks. He was a difficult birth. He's got nails steel won't scratch. A temper so bad he loses words. Agni, I'd lay odds he didn't even bend until he was six!"

"Eight," Iroh said frankly.

"Orochi's eight drinks," Teruko swore. Worse than I thought. Way worse.

Iroh was watching her very carefully. "My brother believed this meant Zuko would never be a powerful bender."

I don't believe it. The Fire Lord's an idiot. "Sir... dragons take a long time to grow up." She shook her head, feeling as if someone had yanked a rug out from under her. "Eight. Agni, it's a wonder the kid didn't hatch."

Iroh nodded slightly, as if she'd confirmed something he'd puzzled out. "You have some experience with late benders?"

"Sir. There are no firebenders recorded as having first bent later than five in Byakko," Teruko said steadily.

"I see," Iroh murmured. "Of course, the government ceases to examine children past the age of five. For those few who do bend late are usually brought to official attention by their parents, so they may catch up with their training as soon as possible."

"So I've heard, sir-" Teruko whirled toward the wall, fist up and ready.

"Whoa! Truce," came the tense whisper. Sand parted like falling water, and Toph stepped free. "I was just coming to check up on Sparky."

"In the middle of the night?" Teruko hissed.

"Oh, how awful! I can't see a thing!" Toph smirked.

Teruko smacked herself in the forehead.

"It is all right." Iroh raised his voice, just enough for nervous marines to hear and stand down.

"Toph is free to visit as she wishes." He lowered it again. "Should I ask how much you have heard?"

"Um... well..." The little earthbender leaned to listen the prince's way, and swallowed hard.

"Dragons? You're... dragons?"

Teruko frowned at her. "You sound like you believe it."

Toph tilted her head, then held out a hand. "Wrist. Gimme."

Teruko shrugged, and let Toph wrap fingers above her hand, under her armor. It was always a little weird, touching someone from another nation. They just weren't warm.

"You're hot," Toph said plainly. "Not a lot, but - if I was this hot, Mom would have me in bed with soup. But you're not sick. And... your pulse is slow. It's one of the things that fooled me about Sparky 'til I had a chance to listen to him. When he's scared? He feels like Sokka, when Snoozles is just a little worried. He had to be telling us about Azula or smack in the middle of a dozen Dai Li before I felt it really pick up. Little animals have fast hearts. Big ones are slow. It's like... you're a lot bigger than you really are." She let her hand slip down to grip Teruko's fingers. "And what you said about rocks... whoa."

At the general's intrigued look, Teruko shrugged. "My clan's ancestor is a lot farther back than the prince's, sir. But I come by the temper honestly."

Toph was feeling her nails, pressing her own fingers against trimmed edges until they dented skin.

"So... Zuko doesn't know this is weird, because for you guys, it's not."

"And because, it would seem, no one who knew of his heritage told him," Iroh nodded.

"We better tell him something, sir," Teruko said bluntly. "And make him believe it. He was out there doing fire-rain."

Iroh blinked. "Oh dear."

Toph grinned, eager. "You can make rain burn?"

"Frost, no, I can't," Teruko admitted. "But Byakko knows how to do it."

"As I understand it, the water does not actually burn," Iroh informed the girl. "But lightning and fire are kin, and falling from the sky, all rain carries a whisper of lightning. It is that a bender seizes, to flare into fire."

"So... you can't do it either," Toph said thoughtfully. "Uh-oh. Does Sparky know?" She paused, and shook her head. "Nope, he'd have flattened the whole camp if he did, right?"

"I would like to believe he would show restraint, even in such distress," Iroh said heavily. "But I fear you are right. Did he know, his words to Aang would have been far more painful."

Teruko looked between them, unsettled. "Wait. If you didn't know he was a dragon-child..."

Iroh weighed her in his gaze, and released a quiet breath. "Do you believe in ties that can hold even beyond death, Lieutenant?"

Teruko's eyes widened. "You mean, like when Usagi was trapped by the oni-wife, and Lord Mifune's ghost cut her down to save him?"

"You guys have got to tell me these stories," Toph breathed. "Mom always said ghosts were just cold spots and rattling windows and dreams, and maybe a shadow that kept you from stepping on a snake."

"As are most of ours," Iroh nodded. "It is rare that a ghost has power enough to touch our world. Though I have heard of a few. But other stories claim there is a way to return to those who have desperate need of you. Though it is a grave risk. For one forgets... and who can say if the spirits will pierce the veil, and grant even a hint to tell you why you are caught in a web of fate you do not remember weaving?"

Teruko sighed, feeling a deep sympathy for the prince. Dragon-child or not, anybody would want to beat their head against the wall if their teacher kept springing stuff that indirect on them-

He's the prince's teacher. And he doesn't know Byakko forms... and the prince does...

Teruko sat down on sandstone, not sure her knees would hold her. "He... came back? To this life?"

"My nephew has always been brave," Iroh said quietly. Smiled, bittersweet, at Toph's confusion. "The Fire Sages say that before one chooses to leave their rest in the spirit world, they are warned of where their choice may lead. Not of all, no spirit knows everything... but of likely outcomes. And of pain."

Toph gulped. "So... Kuzon knew?"

"Enough. Yes."

Teruko felt like gulping herself, marine discipline or not. Kuzon died almost eighteen years back... and the prince is... oh, Agni. "Are you sure?"

"Spirits can lie," Iroh said wryly. "But given that in the spirit world Gyatso claimed my nephew promised to find Aang and drag him home, and in the midst of his fever my nephew called for his uncle, Kuroyama of Byakko..."

Who'd been dead near a hundred years now. Teruko swallowed, and tried to still shaking hands.

"Yeah. Fever." Toph scowled at the general. "You going to tell me about that now? Or do dragons and lightning just not mix?"

"It was the dragon, not the lightning," Iroh hesitated. "Toph. I meant what I told you. Those of other nations are often horrified when they learn of this. And, worse than horror, there is... pity."

Toph cocked her head, and moved in for a hug. "You're good people, Uncle. Maybe I can't bang that into people's heads yet, but I'm not ever gonna feel sorry for you."

"I pray you are right." Iroh sighed. "In the desert, I told you my nephew was still loyal to his father. To aid you and rescue Appa, he tread on the very edges of that loyalty; it is a prince's duty to prevent military disasters, if he can, and allowing Long Feng to unleash the Avatar on our siege would have been that." He paused. "To save your lives from Azula, who he knew acted in Fire Lord Ozai's name... he broke it."

Teruko shivered at the very thought. Agni, even if you knew down to your soul what you were doing was right... I'm not sure I'd have the guts.

Toph was silent, toes curling against the floor as she paled. "You mean... it didn't matter if she zapped him. Just helping us, helping Aang... oh, Sparky..."

Iroh held her as she shivered, biting her lip not to cry. "It is over now. You helped us, and he lived."

"And I thought truce was bad," Toph gulped. "When you guys say loyalty..."

"Ah, yes. We mean the bonds of fire and spirit to one's clan, one's lord, and one's followers," Iroh nodded. "For what you mean by loyalty in the Earth Kingdom, we use several words. Coin-hire, for employer and employed; in which category, I am sad to say, some of your army falls. Love of country; that is something we both understand. Discipline, for those in a chain of command. There is friendship, alliance..." He lifted a shoulder, and let it fall. "I could go on for quite some time."

"Please don't, sir," Teruko groaned. Thought, for a lip-nibbling moment. "Toph... loyalty is having somewhere you belong. And people you'd walk through fire for." She grinned. "Though for some of us, that's easier than others."

"Only if we do something awful to someone we care about, it doesn't kill us." Toph shuddered. "You've got to tell Aang."

"And what should we tell him?" Iroh said softly. "That we are, in truth, what Katara names us? Inhuman monsters?"

"...I don't know," Toph admitted. "I have to think about this. But we've got to figure out something. Aang still thinks things are okay." She tapped her toes on stone. "So how do I find Byakko?"

"You wish to visit Lady Kotone's domain?" Iroh asked, outwardly mild. "I was not exaggerating. Zuko is her grandson. She will not be pleased."

"She won't be glad to see Aang," Toph shrugged. "Maybe she won't want to see me, either. But if I tell Shidan Aang's back... It's worth a try." She pointed at Teruko. "And I want to see those rocks of yours."

Smart kid, Teruko thought, approving. And stubborn. "You know, sir, if they want to get there quietly, rocks would be the way to go. If they walk around asking for Byakko, people would wonder. But if they ask what's the best way to go see Mount Shirotoora..."

"It is a wonder in any season," Iroh nodded.

"Fire Nation people go to see a mountain?" Toph said skeptically.

"A mountain tall enough to have ice on top," Teruko stated. "That's something special." She lowered her voice, and leaned close. "And if the mountain really, really likes you... you might see the yamabushi."

"The mountain sages?" Iroh glanced at her, intrigued. "I had thought their order all but extinct."

"They've been up there over a thousand years," Teruko shrugged. "Not a lot of people join them, but they get by. They're weird, but if it weren't for them, we wouldn't still have fire-rain. They saw Kyoshi's storm coming. It wasn't much time... but we got some people to higher ground." She shrugged again, and tried not to hold her breath.

Toph started to say something, then stopped. Thought. Pursed her lips, and let out a slow, amazed, "Huh." Smirked. "So Sparky comes by the sneaky honestly."

"You better believe it," Teruko grinned. "Um. No offense, General. I'm sure you can be stealthy. When you want to be."

"I begin to believe I am in the presence of masters," Iroh mused. "And to speak of masters..." He raised a brow at Teruko.

"Not sure I can give you a good estimate, sir," the marine answered frankly. "I was still a kid when he died. But he trained Lady Kotone, and I know she's good."

"You want to know how good a bender Kuzon was?" Toph frowned. "You're a general. Can't you just look up his record?"

"Even if I had access to more of our records than are kept on Suzuran, Kuzon would not be in them," Iroh said frankly. "As lord of Byakko, with so few living kindred, he managed to avoid going to war. Directly, at least. He was in... intelligence. Kuzon traveled throughout the world, and Byakko has many trade contacts, and the Fire Lord sought information from all of them. And I will not say that information was not harmful as any fire." He smiled ruefully. "Yet given what I know now, I suspect not all the information the Fire Lord sought reached him. And that, likely, is what finally brought Kuzon's death." Iroh stroked his beard. "Still. He was ninety-eight, and as hale as I am. Which is very nearly information enough."

Toph frowned. "Huh?"

Iroh blinked. "Your teacher did not mention how benders age?"

"The guy my parents thought was tutoring me? Thought I could barely move rocks," Toph said, disgusted. "My teachers were badger-moles."

"Ah," Iroh said, very quietly. "Well. Strong benders move their chi, and smooth its flow; I have let my discipline slip these past few years, which I must remedy... If we are diligent, and practice, and if nothing kills us - we can live a very long time. Not so long as legend says of the Avatar, who tales grant half a millennium or more, but long. My grandfather, Fire Lord Sozin, was a hundred and fifty-three when he died; and I think that was of grief and loneliness, more than age. Without our cousins of the waves to learn from, we of the Fire Nation are unbalanced, and few reach so many years. But Kuzon would have been among them."

"So... really good," Toph concluded. "Why's it matter? Zuko doesn't remember any of it."

"Yes he does," Teruko said soberly. "Fire-rain's a Byakko form. The prince didn't know what it was, and he doesn't know how he knows it - but he does."

Toph thought about that. And smirked.

"This is not amusing," Iroh said sternly. "It is not wise for a bender not to know what he is capable of-"

"You're thinking like a firebender, Uncle," Toph said gleefully. "Try some earth and water. Listen. And wait for the punch. Who's Sparky's biggest problem? The one that's not in this camp?"

Iroh paused. And, quietly, began to laugh. "I see."

"Yep. Crazy blue fire thinks she knows everything?" Toph locked her fingers together, and cracked her knuckles. "Let's see her fight this."

Xiu looked at the unholy trap the general's aide had lured her Pai Sho pieces into, and glared.

Across the board, almost backed up to the army tent wall, graying Sergeant Bo grinned cheerfully at her. "Another game?"

"Not until I figure out how you slaughtered me in this one." Xiu studied the field, retracing moves in her mind. The chariots, and then the ship-tiles, and that weird move with the lotus...

"Ah, a break's good anyway," Bo nodded, standing up to stretch with a yawn, before dropping back down to poke through the chest he'd been sitting on. "Have to do something nice for your boyfriend for letting me do him a favor. We don't get many pretty girls to game with around here." He dropped her a deliberate wink.

Xiu tried not to roll her eyes too obviously. The sergeant was harmless; she'd met enough men like him to know. But that didn't mean he wasn't enjoying the view. "So why are you doing him a favor? There's some kind of meeting going on, right?" And Huizhong was in the middle of it; why did she have a bad feeling about that? "Shouldn't you be with General Gang?"

"Well... that's a story," Bo shrugged, sorting through scrolls. "See, it looks like I'm retiring."

Xiu ran that through her mind a few times. Looked up from the Pai Sho board. "You and the general had an argument?" A bad one.

"Something like," Bo nodded. "Now, don't get me wrong, General Gang's a pretty good man. But the war - eh. It's not going so good. I hear you're Tzu's daughter? Good man. So you know, when a soldier thinks his back's to the wall, things get... dicey." He lifted a still-dark brow at her. "Ever hear of General Fong?"

Xiu frowned. "He holds a fort up north, doesn't he?"

"Yep. Welcomed the Avatar back from the North Pole after the Fire Navy went sploosh," Bo told her. "People say the Avatar was training there a while, getting ready to help us invade the Fire Nation. Then? I don't know what happened. Something went wrong, the whole fort got wrecked, and the Avatar's bunch took off for Ba Sing Se." He shook his head. "Now, General Gang, he thinks it was worth it, if the Avatar gets set to do the same thing right on top of the Fire Lord. Me? I kind of wonder." He shrugged. "So, looks like I'm going to get reassigned somewhere quieter. But before I do... here's what you're looking for."

Xiu's eyebrows rose, as she picked up just one of the score of scrolls Bo was placing on the game board. "This... there's all this?"

"Wouldn't see most of it in one place, but as soon as word got out about what happened at the North Pole? The general asked me to find out what else an Avatar can pull off, mass destruction-wise," Bo stated. "So. You wanted to know if Avatar Kyoshi ever hit the Fire Nation so hard, their ancestors felt it? Yeah. Oh, yeah."

Swallowing hard, Xiu started to read.

She had to put her head down after the third scroll, and just breathe. I'm not going to cry. I'm not.

"Bad idea, being home to the pirates that killed one of the Avatar's kids," Bo shrugged. "Bad idea."

Xiu shivered. "Oma and Shu..."

"Funny thing is? I've met a few Fire Nation guys," Bo said thoughtfully. "The good ones? Sweetheart, you wouldn't believe how important family is. Pirate raids are one thing; they think lords should be strong, and anybody who can't protect his people is asking for it. But a mom after the guy who killed her kid? Do not mess with a Fire mother. They kill you. And if they're feeling nice, they do it quick." He looked aside, into the distance. "So I gotta wonder. What would've happened, if Kyoshi hadn't let the Earth King handle yelling at the great names? He hated the Fire Nation, and history says he was a stuck-up royal bastard, and..." He shrugged. "What if she hadn't? What if she'd just gone over there like a mother, and asked?"

Xiu stared at him. "So... you're retiring."

"Getting transferred. Guess it's pretty much the same thing." Shuffling through the pile, Bo came up with a simple letter-scroll. "You know, we've got a lot of these. Don't think the general would mind if you gave this one to Chief Hakoda. I hear his kids know the Avatar. Bet they'd kind of like hearing how another airbender saw stuff."

Almost against her will, Xiu reached out. Closed her hand on old paper, and wet her lips. "Why?"

"Same reason I'm in here looking after you, lady," Bo said bluntly. "By now? Whole camp knows you were friendly with Hakoda. And the Fire Nation kid."

Xiu tried to keep her face calm. "I didn't know who they were."

"You didn't. Too bad for them, that weasel-mink Xiaobo did." Bo laid a tattered poster beside the scrolls.

Xiu looked at inked faces, and felt her heart sink into her sandals. He's... Lee is...

"The Fire Lord's son, and the Dragon of the West," Bo said soberly. "General's hitting them right after dawn."

Chapter End Notes

You may notice that the only Fire Nation person in the audience chamber when Azula pulls this on Min is Ty Lee. There's a reason for that. By Fire Nation standards, she's just threatened him with mind-rape. A literal fate worse than death.

Teruko's mention of Usagi and his lord's ghost - this is from an Usagi Yojimbo comic. (Which is also, definitely, not mine. Darn.)

A bit of clarification for chapter 28... and, all my fault, here's a bit of personal culture clash I hadn't realized I'd written in. Way back when Zuko was talking to Tingzhe, he didn't say that he lost eleven men to the Avatar. He said he had to count them because he didn't know all their names - which he didn't, having been rather estranged from the crew until "The Storm". I'm too familiar with the military history use of the term "casualties" - which means people injured, and possibly taken out of the fight, but does not necessarily mean death. With one historian (Tingzhe) and one military commander (Zuko) talking to each other, they each understood what the other meant.

This fic makes liberal use of Hanlon's Razor. "Never attribute to malice what can equally well be explained by stupidity." One act of violence in 1914 left over 8 million dead. And the results of WWI (I recommend looking into the Treaty of Versailles) eventually triggered WWII. Which has repercussions even today.

There are no excuses. There are reasons, but no excuses.

And because a lot of people have asked... Shirong is based off Michael Archangel. From Airwolf.

Chapter 30

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

"You guys," Sokka couldn't hide a yawn as he eyed fading stars before dawn, "take mornings way too seriously."

An expressionless skull faceplate stared back. The spear-armed marine beside the firebender was just as stoic, gold eyes glittering at him.

Sokka rubbed a few last grains of sleep-sand out of his eyes, considering the edged silence around the shelter. Nobody should be up at this hour... and maybe that was the whole point. Not enough sleep made you cranky and crazy; just look at that whole mess set off between Katara and Toph months back, with even Aang yelling at the earthbending teacher he'd been searching the whole Earth Kingdom for.

For a moment, he played with the idea of telling Katara that maybe the whole Fire Nation just needed a good, long nap.

...Nah.

Shrugging, Sokka eyed the guards. "I'm here to talk to Zuko."

Silence. Utter, angry silence.

I'm getting a bad feeling about this. Put that together with what Dad had woken him up to tell him, making sure Katara didn't hear it... "Guys... and ladies if there are any... I really need to talk to him," Sokka said honestly. "My Dad's got a question, and I've got a feeling Healer Amaya could tell us, but she isn't here and we really need to know." He paused, judging grim gold. "It's important to the truce."

A flick of a cold gaze, and the firebender nodded slightly.

Sokka stepped into warm air, lit and tasting faintly of smoke from a few lanterns. "...And make sure everything's stowed tightly-" Zuko shook his head, and handed off a list to Teruko. "Why am I bothering you, you know your job."

"Always good to check, sir." Teruko smiled a little. "Right, General?"

"It is a fine balance, ensuring all of a command functions properly," Iroh agreed. "Ah. Sokka."

Not, good morning. No offer of tea. And Zuko barely glanced at him. The bad feeling stopped prickling down Sokka's spine, and broke into an all-out sprint. Aw, man. "You studied with Amaya, right?"

Zuko looked at him, cold as winter midnight. "Why? Does Katara want to call her a monster, too?"

Ouch. Somebody'd got up on the wrong side of the bedroll. Either that, or all the armor was contagious. "This isn't about Katara," Sokka started. Reconsidered, waving his hands. "I mean, it's about her, but she doesn't know I'm here, and - it's a waterbending question. And I don't know if you know, but Amaya had to be teaching you something about her bending, and- argh. It sounds crazy." He tried not to grab for his hair. "Can waterbenders mess with your head?"

Frowning, Zuko nodded.

That quick, Sokka felt his heart lodge somewhere near his ankles. "You're serious. Katara could... and we wouldn't even know, and..."

Zuko looked at him, then, and swore under his breath. "Here."

Surprised, Sokka downed half the cup of soup pushed into his hands without thinking. Spicy, but not nearly as hot as fire flakes, lucky for him. More just warm, rich with fish and seaweed and a kind of slippery noodles he'd never tasted before. "You eat fish?"

"Islands, Sokka." But if the tone was sarcastic, pale gold eyes were thoughtful. "You met me on a ship. Yes, we eat fish."

Fish and barbecue. Why are we fighting again? Sokka almost quipped. But finished the cup instead, gathering his thoughts. "You're serious. Katara can... Wait." He held up a hand. "Tell me what Amaya told you."

"She told me a lot," Zuko said frankly. "I'll sum up." He looked into memory, and nodded. "Water is family and community. Waterbenders can pull on that, just like the ocean. Most benders can't do much besides make you like them more. Or work with someone whose emotions are all screwed up, and help them get better. That's what healers are supposed to do. Keep an eye on people, especially in the winter; and if someone's acting off, stuff them full of oily fish and help them cheer up and calm down. Sometimes that's all it takes. Sometimes you have to drug them and let them sleep part of the dark away. And sometimes..." He winced. "That's why you've got ice floes."

"Oh." Suddenly, a lot of Gran-Gran's stories made a lot more sense. "So, if you've got a really strong bender, who didn't study healing...?" At Zuko's incredulous look, Sokka shrugged. "Come on, you know you've been showing her what to do."

"About lightning," Zuko said, still stunned. "I studied that on purpose. That - in the desert..."

"She had a few lessons with Yugoda," Sokka said plainly. All too aware of Iroh's attention focused on him. "Until Azula? It was enough."

...He'd heard Zuko growl like that before, one time before lots of Suki's village went up in flames. "Combat-trained waterbender," the firebender said flatly. "Of. Course. Damn. You spend all your time feuding with each other. You'd need something to keep your spears all pointed the same direction if someone else invades. And why bother training her to rein it in? Anyone who doesn't back the Avatar is the enemy." Fists clenched, flames flashing and vanishing. "Damn it, I should have seen it..."

Sokka ran that through in his head. And what Katara'd done. And what he'd done - and not done - trying to make sure they all came out okay. And kind of wished he could spit sparks. "I'm going to bounce Boomerang off Pakku's head. Damn it! He did that, and he didn't even warn us? We haven't had benders since Gran-Gran was young, nobody knew - what's wrong with you people? Earth, fire, water, air - you do things because you can, and the rest of us just have to live with it, and-"

"Calm. Down."

Zuko. Hand on his shoulder. Looking about as sober and coldly mad as Sokka'd ever seen him. "The whole camp's mad," the firebender said bluntly. "Katara, Aang, us - I don't know. Don't get tangled in it. Think about your father, and breathe."

Dad. Sokka took a breath. Another. "What do you mean, you?"

"Strong firebenders can also affect the heart," Iroh spoke up. "It does not usually reach those outside our own nation. But you are a leader, and a chief's son. There is, perhaps, enough fire in you to be... susceptible."

Sokka swallowed. "I'm Water Tribe."

"Separation is an illusion," Zuko said simply. "Get deep enough, all the elements draw from the same source. All benders, Sokka. And everybody who isn't a bender. We all use chi. I can light air on fire. So? What do you think you're doing when that boomerang hits exactly where you want it? That's not just good aim. Bending is fighting. Any fighting trains your chi. So it's not as easy if you can't bend. Are you going to let that stop you?" He let go. "You want to know why all of us fight? Women included? Because we don't know who's going to grow up to be a firebender."

Sokka took a step back, disbelieving. "You're kidding. Even in her sling, Katara was-" He wagged his hands, remembering melting ice walls, and sharp nos from Mom and Dad.

"Water and earth are like that. Air Nomads - they were all born with it. But Fire Nation-" Zuko shook his head. "If your parents are both firebenders, most of the time you are too. But not all the time. We don't know. Not until someone's four or five. Or older."

They don't know? Sokka shook his head. And why does Zuko sound like he's... "How much older?"

Zuko let out a slow breath. "I was eight."

Sokka stared.

"So don't tell me I don't know what you're up against," Zuko said sharply. "I do. Agni, I do. Don't you know why Azula wants me charred to a crisp? I took what was hers. I'm firstborn, but she bent at four. Two years, Sokka. Two years she'd been training under our father's eye, and everyone knew she was a prodigy. He had what he wanted. The perfect heir to Sozin's legacy, to make up for his disappointment." He took a deep breath, and let it steam out. "You don't like benders twisting your heart? Learn to fight back."

Zuko wasn't always... Katara's been playing with water years longer... Sokka shook his head. "So you learned to fight with swords."

"That was one reason," Zuko said dryly. "You've met another. Pink, bouncy, giggles a lot?" He frowned. "Why didn't you? Dao aren't a Water Tribe style, but the Kyoshi Island waterbenders... what?"

"What Kyoshi Island waterbenders?" Sokka said carefully. If Aang and Katara could have learned there, instead of heading for the North Pole... Yue. "I didn't see any benders there. Just the Kyoshi Warriors and their fans... and they redirect your attacks..."

"Waterbending did inspire them, though they have rarely numbered benders among their company," Iroh agreed. "The eastern waterbenders were far better known in Avatar Kuruk's time, before Kyoshi Island was cut from the continent. They still persist there, but they live very quietly. Avatar Kyoshi had firm opinions on the separation of the four nations. Earth and water intermingling... irked her."

Sokka groaned. "And Aang made this big fuss about how he was Kyoshi..."

"They would not have been swift to draw his attention," Iroh nodded. "I am sorry you did not have the chance to linger. The Kyoshi Island sword-style is very beautiful. And effective."

And why that made Zuko smirk, Sokka wasn't sure he wanted to know. "They didn't use swords when you hit Suki's village." Kyoshi Island... damn it, they were heading for the Fire Nation. The wrong way.

"You forget, they were neutral almost a hundred years," Iroh said mildly. "Fire Nation visitors were not welcome, but so long as they passed as peaceful Earth Kingdom travelers, it was possible to walk unhindered."

Sokka paused. Took another look at Zuko's singed green robes. "You did this before. Not just in Ba Sing Se. Or dressing up to yank Aang out from under Zhao's nose. You... sneak."

"Sometimes," Zuko admitted stiffly.

Sokka raised a curious eyebrow. "Okay, it worked, so I'm missing something?"

"To disguise oneself is an act of Low War, and implies you are not strong enough to face your enemies directly," Iroh stated. "For a great name, that is not exactly proper." He heaved a dramatic sigh. "I am such a trial to my family."

Zuko reddened.

"But as it happens, I did not say I had seen that sword on Kyoshi Island," Iroh said plainly. "Though it was an island. With the most beautiful waterfalls..."

Zuko, Sokka suddenly noticed, was looking any direction but theirs.

Iroh winked at Sokka, hand up to shield a loud whisper. "He didn't always know how to swim."

"Not going to solve his problem." Zuko glared at them both. "I don't know what you and Chief Hakoda want to do about Katara. I know what I'd like to do. But I don't have a good history with sisters."

Sokka remembered lightning, and grimaced. "Sometimes she listens to Aang..."

"Then you're at the wrong end of camp," Zuko said dryly. "Good luck."

Sokka eyed him. "You could talk to Aang."

"I don't think so."

He'd heard anger in Zuko's voice, lots of times. He'd never heard venom. And... nope, not his imagination, it was getting hot in here. "You said attacking our village like that wasn't your brightest day ever," Sokka pointed out. "He's a kid. He thought you were the bad guy. Come on, give him another chance-"

"No."

Fire, blooming from bone-white knuckles. Zuko made himself breathe, loosening fists finger by finger. "I am Zuko. Son of Ursa, and Fire Lord Ozai. My honor reflects on my clan, on every soldier I have ever commanded, on every soldier I will ever command. And Aang..." He snorted. "I don't know why I'm even surprised. Air blows where it wants, when it wants. Words are just your voice on the wind. And they own the wind." A bitter laugh. "Agni, what was Kuzon thinking?"

"Nephew." Iroh rested a hand on Zuko's shoulder. "I am certain things were different then."

"I'm not," Zuko said quietly. "Kuzon was fifteen. The Fire Nation had had half a century of peace and prosperity. Who'd care about a few little lies from a foreign child?" He looked at Sokka, gold eyes grim. "I'm not Kuzon. I'm not a minor clan member who wouldn't have been near becoming the heir if half a dozen other people hadn't ended up dead. Thanks to Sozin, by the way." A determined breath. "He offered parole, Sokka. He set the terms. Not me. And then he broke them." He waved toward his robes, where armor would have sported an ornamented collar. "Gold means a great name or a ranking officer. Someone with power to speak for the Fire Nation. Someone whose honor is our country's. And damn it, Aang knows that!"

About to protest, Sokka paused. Thought that over. "You're saying Aang slapped the whole Fire Nation in the face." Not that he objected to that, really. But man, couldn't Aang have just thought a little bit before waving that grin under Zuko's nose?

"It is a bit more severe than that," Iroh said heavily. "To us, honor is not simple glory earned in battle. It is life. Without honor, there is no trust. No one will help you, or stand by your side. And without that, when knives gleam..." He sighed. "It is as if you returned to your sled from hunting on the tundra, to find every arctic dog slain."

Dead, Sokka realized, all too able to picture it. Maybe you could hold out a few days, maybe you would get lucky and someone would come looking for you, but if no one did...

Sokka gulped, working it through. Iroh didn't just stick with Zuko to be nice. If Zuko lost his honor, then the Fire Nation can treat him the way they treat everybody they don't like, and that means-

Well. Maybe he wasn't sure of all it meant, not to the Fire Nation. But one thing was crystal clear. His honor was the absolute, no-holds-barred, sorest spot Zuko had - and Aang had just stomped it. Hard.

You know, if it was Zhao, this would be a good thing.

Zhao was dead. Zuko wasn't. Given the Ocean Spirit had apparently grabbed for both of them, that kind of clued Sokka in on which firebender was the bigger problem.

"Katara wants us dead, and Aang wants us dishonored," Zuko snarled. "No. I will not give him another chance. My people deserve better." He jerked a nod toward the doorway. "Good luck with Katara. And don't let Aang get Toph killed. I will find you."

That... sounded final. And given the quiet in-and-out of Teruko and her people all the time they'd been talking, with even lanterns now being blown out and stored away... "You're leaving?" Sokka blurted out. You're after Aang. Why would you leave? "You can't leave! You promised Toph."

"To help heal Aang," Zuko said bluntly. "I did. Every minute we're here is another Katara has to set your people off. Have you ever seen a mob? I have. There's too many of you. We won't be able to use nonlethal force. You'll die."

Sokka's eyes narrowed. "Just keep pushing it, Sparky."

A corner of Zuko's lips turned up; a cold, cold smirk. "You seem to be under the impression that the truce is meant to protect us from you."

Oh, no, Sokka thought, lifting an accusing finger. I don't care how lousy you say you are at being diplomatic, you do not get away with that one-

Iroh was smiling at him. In a way that raised all the hairs on Sokka's neck.

Finger still hovering, Sokka mentally counted allies and enemies. On his side, the Water Tribe fleet, the greatest earthbender in the world, Katara, and Aang. On Zuko's-Toph thinks Iroh's good enough to take her. It's daylight, which means Zuko probably can beat Katara. And Aang's hurt.

And four-to-one ship odds didn't mean a handful of snow in a fire when all Suzuran had to do was crank up the trebuchets and drench wooden ships in flames.

We've got Zuko. Oh yeah. Right where he wants us. Oh, man... Sokka swallowed dryly. "You promised Toph."

"And I kept it," Zuko said levelly. "I respect Chief Hakoda. I don't want to kill any more of his people."

Erk. "Toph swears you're one of the good guys," Sokka got out.

"She likes the Avatar, too." Zuko didn't turn a hair. "Toph is a Bei Fong. Daughter of a great merchant clan. They are responsible for their workers and traders. Like a great name is to his people. She won't like it. She won't be surprised."

He must have made some noise of protest; Zuko's eyes narrowed. "Did you listen to what she told you, before all of you ran into Azula?" the firebender said levelly. "Her parents hired bounty hunters to bring her home against her will. And that's one of the gentler things the Bei Fongs have done to defend their name. You think Toph doesn't understand ruthlessness?"

He's bluffing, Sokka thought. He might be that cold. He's Fire Nation. We know them. But Toph's not... well, she just isn't.

He was sure of it. Almost.

Think, Sokka told himself. Aang needs more help. So how can I get Zuko to- "You owe Avatar Yangchen a knot."

"No," Zuko said calmly. "I don't."

Not working. And why was it not working? In the desert Katara had helped Iroh, and he'd said he owed them. That had to still hold, right? Why else would he have jumped at the chance when Toph needed one firebender-sized ally to mow down Dai Li? Not to mention really healing Aang, instead of just making sure he didn't die... Never mind. Think! "You're going to leave Toph. You're going to leave Aang, hurt. And you're going to leave my father, who you say you respect, without even trying?"

Zuko took one deliberate step forward, close enough Sokka could feel the heat shimmering off him. "It's dangerous."

"I noticed," Sokka stated, trying to match that edged calm. "You don't want to kill people? I don't want anybody getting killed. Do this, even Katara won't say you didn't give it a shot. Which makes you guys leaving a lot more likely to stay calm. Right?"

Zuko eyed him, and turned toward Iroh. Who shrugged slightly: it's your choice.

Nodding, Zuko glanced at Teruko. "Finish up here, and get everyone on board. Try not to let Asahi bite you."

"Under control, sir." But she cast him the slightest look askance.

Zuko shrugged. "Uncle and I will take a look."

"Um," Sokka started. Because maybe he wasn't sure what he was planning yet, but with Zuko and Iroh both in the same place? It wouldn't be easy.

"If you think I'm going anywhere near Katara alone, when I'm this mad? You're crazier than the airbender," Zuko said coldly.

Couldn't argue with that. Damn.

This is a bad idea.

Iroh sitting behind him, Zuko waited in Aang's tent for Toph to get there, cursing himself for falling for Sokka's offer. Katara hated them all individually and as a nation; he could see it in her eyes, as she sat on the bed by a wary airbender. Lounging over by a fabric wall, face a little too bland, Sokka could see it too. Why else was he stropping the edge of that boomerang so casually? So how, exactly, was trying again on that damn chakra-knot going to change anything, except to make Katara more convinced they all had to die?

It won't, Zuko told himself. But it still matters. To Sokka. To Chief Hakoda. No matter how hard she pushes, her father is an honorable man. And we don't want a fight.

And why that didn't matter to her, Zuko wished he knew. She'd helped them in the desert. Why act as an honorable opponent then, and an implacable foe now?

She's never seen Uncle armed.

Zuko blinked, caught off-guard by Lee's shy whisper. Dug deep within, wondering why he hadn't noticed an odd silence these past few days. Sure, Katara had only seen Iroh bend at Zhao's soldiers once, before Ba Sing Se. And then only on the Moon's side, which meant her side. And Uncle was good at looking harmless. But he was still a firebender. He wasn't exactly a helpless elder...

Loathing. Disgust. Crawl away and die.

A breath, and he wrapped fire to shield that second self. Uncle. Amaya. Jinhai. Your people.

Hatred loosened its grip. But he could still feel it.

Katara. She hates me. And Lee's Water Tribe, I feel her pulling at me...

No wonder he'd shoved Lee back into hiding. Just a taste of that, when he was lost in fever... it'd be so, so easy to let her kill him. And he wanted to live.

Not that you're doing such a good job of that right now, sparking fire without even a warning-

There was no heat.

Holding his expression steady, Zuko glanced at his hands. He could feel the chi moving. Why couldn't he feel fire?

No flames. Just a shimmer out of the corner of his eye, that vanished if he tried to look at it.

Not fire. No way it's water. But I'm bending something- Oh.

Spirit. Amaya bent spirit, not just water, to hide people from the Dai Li. To shield a mind, no matter what tried to warp it.

"Ah. Like the plague kamuiy," Uncle murmured behind him. "You believe this injury is to the spirit, as well as the body?"

Which did and didn't make sense; getting blasted by Azula might wound anyone's spirit, sure, but...

Uncle can see spirits. Even when the rest of us can't.

A fact Amaya had dropped so casually, a day or so after the haima-jiao, he knew it had to be important. But there hadn't been a chance to ask, before everything with the Avatar blew up in his face.

"Fire fights water," Zuko murmured back; feeling it burn to hold the worst of Katara's hate at bay, and promising himself he and Uncle would have a long talk, later. Right now, he had an angry waterbender just waiting for him to make one wrong move on Aang. He needed to know what Lee knew, and didn't know he knew.

She thought Azula attacked a harmless elder, not a warrior for our tribe. Uncle said the Fire Nation needs the Moon too, but you know how Katara hears what she wants to hear. If he fought for the Moon, he was fighting for the Water Tribes. End of story. And in the desert, when Uncle went down...

He'd screamed. He remembered that. And dove into healing with everything he had - and Katara had never seen him rescue Uncle before, she would have had no idea that clan bound you as tightly as any Water Tribe family...

Youngsters help the elders, so their wisdom helps the tribe survive. I was doing what was right for a Water Tribe child. And Uncle was hurt trying to help Katara... just like an elder helping a girl of the tribe. So she wanted to help us. Then.

But in Ba Sing Se, he helped me drag her off. And then he lashed her up one side and down the other. Zuko hadn't heard the argument, but he didn't have to know the specifics. Uncle was proud of him. He'd never have let Katara's venom stand. That makes him an enemy - and once she saw him bend his way into Azula's mess to get me, he was an enemy warrior. Just like me.

Wonderful. They'd been thinking of Katara as an honorable opponent, because that was what an honorable Fire Nation healer would have done. Iroh had been injured facing a mutual enemy. He deserved an offer of aid.

But she didn't do it for our reasons. She did it for hers.

Maybe Toph could raise a sandstone wall in here, so he could beat his head against it. It'd feel so good when he stopped.

And here she was, black hair a wild nightmare as the earthbender rubbed sleep out of her eyes. "So, this time I get to feel your trick?"

"Just the beginning," Zuko warned. "The last time I touched that mess, you know what happened. I'll show you how it starts. Then you get clear."

Toph grinned, undaunted. "Got it."

"Um... before we do this," Aang spoke up, "I just wanted to say I'm really, really sorry about last night-

"No you're not," Zuko stated, level as drawn steel. Uncle was here, you idiot. Do you think he wouldn't tell me what you said? All of it?

"But I am!" the airbender protested. "I know honor's important to the Fire Nation, I was just trying to-

"Protect the Water Tribe?" Zuko let his brow arch slightly. "You're not sorry you did it. You're sorry it had consequences. Surprise, surprise." He drew a breath, gripping control with both hands. "In case Chief Hakoda doesn't know he has to tell you, let me inform you what some of those consequences would have been. If it'd been anyone but me." Another breath. "You gave your parole. You broke it. Meaning my half of the agreement was null and void. Any other commander - any other Fire Nation officer - would have been forced to do what the honor of their word required." One heartbeat. Two. "Meaning they could have sailed back to the Water Tribe and slaughtered every. Last. One of them."

Horried silence. Sokka was leaning forward a little, eyes no longer sleepy. And Katara had her body between him and the airbender, hand near her waterskin. "You said we'd be safe!" she flung at him.

"No," Zuko said evenly. "He said you wouldn't be hurt." Two breaths, and a smirk. "He never said for how long."

Aang was pale as milk, eyes round.

"Doesn't feel so good from this side, does it?" Zuko said quietly. "I don't care if you're the Avatar. The Southern Air Temple's prodigy. The last of your kind. You're still human, just like the rest of us. Actions have consequences. If Kuzon and Monk Gyatso couldn't teach you that, you'd damn well better learn it now. You lied to me. Why you did it doesn't matter. The first matter of honor between us was a lie. Your lie. I can trust nothing you've said since then." Breathe. Stay calm. "So grow up, show a little dignity, and stop lying to my face."

"Or, as we say in the army," Iroh mused behind him, "if you find yourself in a hole? Stop digging."

"But - Toph could tell you I'm really-

"Twinkletoes." Toph pushed her hair back, mostly confining it under a band. "You're missing the point, big time. You're a contract breaker. You found a loophole and squirmed right through it. If you did that to my parents? You'd be blacklisted forever. Nobody'd trade with you. Nobody'd deal with you. That's a really, really big slice of the Earth Kingdom to have mad at you." She cracked her knuckles. "So are we going to do this?"

"What is wrong with you?" Katara demanded. "He says horrible things about Aang, and you agree with him? And then you think he's going to help?"

Sokka buried his face in his hands.

"Forget it, Toph," Zuko advised. "You're not going to get anywhere. I'm not part of her tribe. I can't be trusted." He looked at Katara, cold and angry. "So lying to outsiders doesn't matter." He eyed Aang. "In case you're wondering why I'm here, it has nothing to do with you. I told Sokka I'd take a look at you. To see if there's anything safe that can be done about that knot in your chakra. I doubt it. Some things just need time. But I said I would look. I keep my word." His voice dropped, and Zuko couldn't keep a trace of venom from leaking into it. "I will always keep my word."

"And here's where we hit what really ticks me off, Katara," Toph said bluntly. "You think Aang was right to lie to a bad guy, and do whatever it took to get away from the Fire Nation? Fine. He was." She pointed at Aang. "But if you thought Zuko was such a bad guy you had to lie to him, what the heck made you think he'd keep his word?"

"Well, he-" Aang swallowed, and shut up.

Sokka winced. "Let me guess. He was wearing gold, so you knew he could make a promise like that. And keep it."

"How'd you - I mean, a lot of things changed in a hundred years-"

"Stop. Just... stop." Sokka sounded tired. "When we get some breathing space, Dad and I are going to tell you what Kyoshi did. And why the Fire Nation's got a right not to trust any Avatar without a good reason." He shook his head. "But this isn't about being the Avatar. This is about you. You knew the rules. You knew Zuko would play fair. And you knew you wouldn't."

"Sokka!" Katara hissed.

"Don't Sokka me, Sis-"

"Stop it!" Aang's hands hovered near his ears, and his eyes were moist. "Why is everybody so angry? I said I was sorry!"

"Sorry won't fix this," Zuko said levelly. Aware, as he locked gazes with Katara, exactly where most of that simmering rage was coming from.

"You're right." Blue eyes were cold as winter. "Some things, no one can ever be sorry enough for."

I didn't kill your mother, damn it! But Zuko couldn't say it. If he said it, he'd scream it. And everything would go down in flames. He could feel it. "Let's get this over with."

Katara grudgingly backed off a few inches. Toph clapped her hands and dashed in, fingers resting on his right arm to feel as Zuko pushed the firepot's flames to golden-green. "Turn," he ordered.

Eyes still wide, Aang froze.

"I am not going to hurt you!" Zuko growled. "Not here. Not now. In this tent, I'm your healer. Idiot. You believed me when you'd known me for all of a few minutes attacking you, and you don't now? Agni. I promised Sokka." He snorted. "And if you don't believe that, look where we are. You think I'm stupid enough to tick off Toph when we're on sand?"

Aang looked dubious. "You went after Katara on an ice plain in a blizzard."

"There's a difference between stupid and desperate," Zuko said grimly. "Learn it. Turn, damn it. I can't hold this forever."

Reluctantly, Aang turned.

Finally. Zuko traced his way through dull gold and glints of brass, careful to stay clear of the lightning-scar. He wasn't sure what Toph thought she'd get out of this, there wasn't a speck of earth in Aang unless you counted bones - but she'd asked.

Don't worry about it. Just heal.

A little time, and Zuko pulled back. "Okay. Time for you to make a strategic withdrawal."

"You said you're just going to look," Toph objected.

"And last time I thought I was just going to heal," Zuko stated. "Go."

Sticking her tongue out at him, Toph moved.

Okay. Edges. Just look at the edges. From a distance.

He hadn't mentioned it to Katara before, because she hadn't mentioned it. And he damn well wasn't going to mention it now, not when he knew how much Katara didn't know about healing. But working near Aang's chakras was terrifying.

So much energy. I'm not trained for this...

Studying that slowly-writhing knot of brassy gray, Zuko felt like a moth-owl trying to sneak around a bonfire. This was power that could tear mountains down. The power that had split Kyoshi Island from the mainland, searing a swath of ocean to lifeless rock; that had drowned half the Fire Nation, and shattered Sozin's first invasion of the Earth Kingdom like an ice cube dropped into boiling water.

This is what I tried to catch. Agni, I'm an idiot.

No wonder Azula had gone straight for the kill. Why not? With the Avatar dead, they could have divided what remained of the fleets and used the comet to obliterate both poles.

Except those aren't the only Water Tribes. I wonder if the Fire Lord knows-

The knot writhed again. He wasn't fast enough.

Lava freezing searing-

Indownupout away from the bystanders!

Lightning crashed, and someone screamed.

Ears ringing, Zuko coughed, and did a headcount. Aang, woozy but sitting upright, blinking like he'd stared into sparklers. Uncle, Toph, Sokka - scattered and dazed, but intact. Katara, bolting out the hole in blue fabric, so probably not her-

"You bastard!"

Oh yes, Zuko thought, red hazing his vision, that's definitely her.

Uncle caught him before he could move. Thank the spirits. "Your parents' honor is unsullied," he said sternly. "She knows nothing. You are wiser than that."

Wordless, Zuko nodded. Thank you, Uncle.

"What the heck?" Sokka sputtered.

"Told you," Zuko managed. "Tangled chi. Bad." And I'm not making sense. Terrific. "Kept it clear of us. Didn't know someone would be outside..." He swallowed, dreading what might be out there.

My responsibility. I have to know.

He wasn't the first out of the tent. But he wasn't last. "You," Katara hissed, hands wrapped in water as she worked over a coughing Bato.

Alive, Zuko realized in a rush of relief, barely registering Hakoda's worried scowl, the gathering crowd of blue and spears. Thank Agni. "I told you it was dangerous."

"It was supposed to be dangerous to you!" she snarled back.

Waterbender. Strangle. Now.

Iroh caught him again. "I believe we are finished here," he said gravely.

"Oh, you're finished, all right!" Hands no longer glowing, Katara rose, water twisting around one arm. "Just like your sister. Throw around lightning, and never mind who it hurts. And why should we expect anything else? You're Fire Lord Ozai's son!"

Like that's my fault? Zuko almost snarled. "It was an accident!"

"You lie about Aang, you lie about the Fire Nation, you lie about the Avatars - everything you do tears us apart!" Blue eyes narrowed. "I bet your father's so proud!"

"Katara," Aang tried.

"No! Don't you see what just happened? What could have happened? I let him touch you! He almost killed Bato! And either he did it on purpose, and he's been lying to us all along - or he lied about healing you! Because he doesn't know what he's doing, and his teacher's a lousy, cowardly excuse for a healer who thought she could teach a firebender!"

Any other day, any other time, the way she'd said firebender would have sent Zuko into a molten rage. But today...

Amaya.

You do not insult my teacher, little girl. Not now. Not ever.

Fire and ice. Not warring inside him, but twisting, fury and hate each warding the other until he felt almost... calm.

Eye of the storm.

Firebending's opening moves were obvious. Waterbending... was simply finding a quiet balance, and waiting. And he could wait, Zuko realized, darkly amused. Because Katara was watching him for an explosion, and not-

"You are a young and ignorant fool," Iroh said grimly, heat rolling off him like a bonfire. "Healer Amaya is a brave and generous lady, who has healed more wounds of the war than you will in a lifetime. She has true kindness, and virtue. Not to do what is easy, and aid those whom all will praise her for, but to do what is hard! To wade into the flood of war, and rescue, knowing she will gain nothing from it! No great victories in the war. No rebellions to chant her name to the skies. Only the knowledge that she has tried... and for that, someone may live!"

"You love her." Katara whispered it, pale as fine maple-pine. Flushed then, dark as iron-cedar.

"You touched her! How could you? How could she? You're a firebender, you're a murderer - and she let you touch her!"

Damning enough; Zuko could hear that in the gasps of disgust, the snarls of rage. The words alone could have sparked a mob, without the lethal tide of hate, hate them, hate them all...

And he knew this hate. Oh Agni, he knew it to his bones.

She's gone. She's gone because of me, it's my fault, Mommy, Mommy-!

"Enough!"

Zuko swirled flame in a ball and threw; and never mind that he'd never used this form in combat before. Not with fire. He knew the differences between the elements, now; knew how to soften moves of fire, or sharpen water, to switch-

Katara yelped as the fire-net pinned her, blazing force binding arms and legs tight. Hate cut off like a knife, leaving the silence bleeding.

You're not bending your way out of this one.

"It's all about you, isn't it?" Zuko hissed. Ignoring reactions of shock and fear and threatened violence; all that mattered was the waterbender, and the flames that were not burning her. Yet. "Forget the Avatar. Forget your tribe. This is all you, and your pain. You lost your mother. And it ripped a hole in you so wide and deep and dark... you're hanging on by your fingernails, and what's down there is so awful, so much hate, that it can't ever be you. So it's somebody else's fault. It's somebody else's monster. And you hate it. It's not fair. It's not you. And you'll make the whole world pay for putting that monster inside you. You'll make it all bleed. Make it all burn."

Katara drew a breath, face full of angry denial. Zuko yanked on flame, crushing air from her in a squeak.

"You burn inside," Zuko went on, still wracked by that same cold fury. "Sometimes you can't eat. Sometimes you can't sleep. Because the nightmares are waiting behind your eyes... and the only way you can get rid of them is to give them to someone else. To make us feel your pain. To get your revenge." He smirked, cold and bitter. "Well, guess what, Katara? You're going to get it."

Blue eyes widened. She gulped in a startled breath.

"See, you did exactly what you said you would," Zuko went on, voice like knives of ice. "You stopped me from catching Aang. From restoring my honor. I've failed. I've run out of time. And now... now Azula will be confirmed as the Fire Lord's heir. Crown princess. All she ever wanted. And when my father dies - oh, and who knows? She might help him - the Fire Sages will crown her as Fire Lord. They won't have a choice." He breathed, holding onto his temper like a kite in a gale. "But the great names... Some of them will see her for what she is. They won't be able to give her their loyalty. They care about their people. And it will destroy them. Azula will have the power in the Fire Nation, if she has to kill half of us to do it. She won't accept anything less." Another breath. Odd; he would have sworn he'd be shaking right now. "My people will die. They'll die by the thousands. Streets will run red with blood. And then, then, you'll come for us. The Water Tribes, and the Earth Kingdom. After all, we deserve it. We killed the Air Nomads. We've savaged the other nations. We murdered your mother."

I will not cry. I will not scream.

"We'll die," Zuko said, soft and bitter as air of a winter dawn. "We'll die hard, but we'll die. And the bodies will rot in the streets, with no one to give them a pyre; and the rivers will rage red, until all you bend is crimson and copper nightmares." He shook his head, slowly. "And you won't even have to lift a finger, Katara. All you have to do... is wait." He let fire flicker away, pinning her in his gaze. "You'll have your revenge. All the revenge in the world. And I hope you choke on it."

The world faded back in. Zuko could see Uncle's wary watchfulness, Aang shaking between Toph and Sokka, Hakoda's look of dawning horror...

Not me. He's not looking at me.

Watching his daughter, Hakoda shook his head in slow denial.

Oh. He didn't know. Zuko smiled bitterly. Welcome to my world.

But he wasn't done here. Not after what Katara had said. Not with his people still on shore; expecting trouble, sure, but not ready for things to go this fast to Koh's lair in a handbasket.

Zuko drew himself up, court manners settling around him like armor. "Chief Hakoda," he said formally. "As your daughter insists I act in my father's name, so I must accept she acts in yours. She declares the truce between us ended. I know what the exigencies of war would demand you do to my people. But we came under truce, and meant no harm. I ask leave for us to depart as we came, in peace."

"And if we don't?" Hakoda said neutrally.

Zuko smirked, feeling fire lick at its human confines, raging to protect... and kill. And the bay was so close, and it pulled... "Then I burn your ships to the waterline, and I don't stop until my men are safe. Or you're all dead." He didn't even glance at Katara. "Your daughter thinks I'm Sozin reborn. I'd hate to disappoint her."

"Don't do this," Aang blurted out. "You're not like this. You rescue people. You can't do this!"

Not. Helping. "You never listen, do you?" Zuko said quietly. Not even glancing that way. "My people are going to die. My people. You have no idea what I. Can't. Do." Gold held wary blue. Waiting.

"Go," Hakoda said at last. "Just get out of here."

Zuko bowed, one great name to another. Turned, and marched, Uncle guarding his left.

Please let this not be stupid, I don't want to kill anyone, please...

But he would. Oh, Agni, he would. His men were in the middle of spear-armed death, and he'd do what he had to, to get them out. Whatever it cost.

"Sir!" Teruko's voice, parade-ground strong. "We have to go. Now!"

Oh Agni, now what-?

Signals from Suzuran told it all. Earthbenders sighted, strength-

"Chikusho!" Iroh swore.

"Right," Zuko sighed. Wanting to scream. But what was the point? What else did he expect, he'd just stripped hide off Katara, and the Avatar adored her like a lion-puppy. And spirits helped the Avatar. Always.

They ran for it.

You wouldn't think a man Iroh's age could move that fast, Hakoda thought wryly, barely glancing at the firebenders as they bolted down the beach. Rationally, the chief knew he should be watching their enemies depart. Should be wondering what had set that unsettling fire-woman Teruko off; not with anger, but a controlled fear for her charges that had the little steamer's engines already up and running, nosing away from shore. Should, at the very least, be eyeing his men to ensure they kept the last remnants of the truce, as their oddly honorable foes bolted.

But he'd been a chief too often these past two years, and a father not nearly enough. And it was a father Katara needed right now, standing in the circle of their warriors with her face pale, blue eyes wide as she shook her head no-

Standing in the midst of warriors who'd felt what he'd felt. An unthinking, utter disgust for the firebenders - then a shock like hot water on snow, as Zuko's flame seized her. Leaving fury floundering in a sea of, what was I doing?

Which had kept his men back almost as much as Iroh's narrowed eyes, and his own hiss about holding steady. They'd fought firebenders; they all knew so long as a firebender was directly connected to their flame, they controlled whether it burned. Or didn't. Distract Zuko, and that fire might slip - and Hakoda could only imagine the agony left behind.

A good reason to hold off, so long as Zuko bit with words and not fire. But not the only one. Because they were under truce, damn it all. And you did not break a truce until an enemy offered one of your tribe harm. Whether or not Iroh's attentions to a waterbender turned their stomachs, Healer Amaya was Northern Water Tribe. Not Southern. His men knew that.

Which meant if he didn't remind his men he was a father right now, he might not have a daughter.

Deliberately, Hakoda put a hand on Katara's shoulder. Felt her trembling, cold. "Is that what you want?" he asked soberly. "For years, you told me you believed in the Avatar. That he would return, and restore balance to the world. Is that the balance you dreamed of? A world without a Fire Nation? No people of the sun. No warmth. No summer." He lifted his hand to touch a tearstained cheek. "You were always our joy. Proof that even the Fire Nation could not conquer our spirits. Even after Kya... I didn't know. I should have stayed. I should have been there for both of you." He gathered Sokka in with his eyes. "You are our tribe's future. No victory against the Fire Nation is worth anything, if it costs us who we are."

Aang blinked, looking straight at him, with an awed amazement that made Hakoda want to arch a wry brow. What, wisdom only comes from temples? You can find it behind a spear-point as well, if you survive. You have a lot to learn.

Toph frowned. Shoved Aang into Sokka's arms, lifted her hands as if pushing an unseen weight-

Shoved down, and up again. The firebenders' shelter dissolved as if it had never been, and sand hardened into a chest-high wall in front of them. "Heads up!"

What? Why? Hakoda wondered. The Fire Nation was retreating, why was Toph-

Sand rumbled open under the fleeing pair, and Hakoda felt his heart drop with it.

A blast of flames, and Iroh was clear, just as the beach slammed shut like icebergs clashing together.

Iroh was clear, Hakoda realized grimly, seeing green uniforms pour through what was left of the camp. Hearing an unearthly howl rise from Teruko's marines, their steamer churning back toward shore even though they knew - they had to know! - a shore under earthbenders' commands was nothing but a deathtrap.

They knew. Hakoda could see it. But they didn't care... and he could see the reason why, in the grief and fury etched on Iroh's face.

"Zuko!"

I failed.

Dark. Crushing him, until all he could hear was his own heartbeat drumming in his ears. Crushing away breath, and without breath there was no fire.

Failed. Couldn't find him in time. Couldn't make him see. Couldn't save my people.

Wonder if dying hurts as much the second time...

No. I promised. You were naïve and selfish and a kid, Aang, but you didn't deserve what the elders saddled you with. The whole world didn't deserve what was going to happen.

I burned my luck and life away, and I promised myself it wouldn't matter. I wouldn't let it. I'd find a way without luck, somehow I'd find a way to fix things...

The darkness was damp.

...I don't need luck.

Breath gone, he crooked his fingers.

Come to me, murderers. Iroh dodged rocks and shifting sands by inches, raising just enough fire to mimic a long-retired veteran. Not toothless... but not nearly dangerous enough for the officer in command to hang warily back. Come to me and die.

Rationally, he knew he should retreat. Sand favored the oncoming army, Teruko's marines were putting themselves at risk to fetch him, and Toph might yet win Zuko free with just a little more time-

If he is still alive.

And that was why he could not withdraw. Lu Ten had died so, crushed and swallowed by the very earth of Ba Sing Se, and he would not be moved from where he had lost a second son-

Sand surged up like a waterspout, steaming from a fiery roar.

Alive.

He seized one clawed, furious hand, yanking up as Zuko shoved smoking sand down and away. His nephew blinked away grit, gold only a thin, bright rim around wells of deep black-

For one heartbeat, Iroh stared into the full fury of the line of Sozin. And smirked.

Wheeled, and fell into the kata he knew Zuko would use. The only one that made sense, with enemies thick before them and allies at risk behind.

A firebender's offense is his defense.

The mass fireball struck ahead of the Earth Kingdom troops, not on them; blasting them back. Not that Iroh imagined their opponents appreciated such restraint... as Zuko's next swirl, hands sweeping up and forward, sent boiling sand flooding over armored troops like a molten tsunami.

Closing his ears to the screams, Iroh seized a green sleeve, and pulled.

Thank Agni, Zuko ran with him.

Sand and surf under his sandals, and armored hands pulled them up over the side, as fireblasts warned off those few earthbenders brave or stupid enough to advance past searing sand. All the while Zuko was growling under his breath; a low, rumbling snarl that put up hairs on Iroh's neck, and left every marine but Teruko drawing back a prudent step.

Faceplate shielding her expression, Iroh could only read the set of Teruko's shoulders. But those were eloquent enough: Ah, damn it. "Get us off this frosted beach!" she yelled.

Engines surged, and water rushed between them and oncoming thrusts of stone. Keeping his balance with a practiced sway, Iroh kept a wary eye on his nephew as everyone's coordinated fire blasted stony missiles from the sky. "Acting without orders, Lieutenant?" he ribbed her gently.

"Sir! Standing orders were to withdraw with minimum casualties on both sides." Two punches of flame, and a sweeping leg, as someone on shore got cute and skipped a stone across the water. "If the prince were able to give orders, I'm sure he wouldn't countermand that."

"Able to?" Iroh said sharply. For Zuko was fighting as well and cleverly as he ever had against the Avatar, reacting fast as a mosquito-hawk.

"Sir! Dragons need to think to talk." Teruko ducked fragments of stone. "Right now, we're just blue-nosed monkey noise!"

Oh. Later, Iroh was sure, he would curse himself for being an old fool, believing in spirits whose balance he could not see, and missing the fiery youngster right under his nose. Later.

For now Suzuran's trebuchets were pounding the beach with fireballs, adding chaos, fire, and destruction to earthbending already hampered by the stretch of water between them. Only a little longer, and they should be away...

Steel screeched on stone, and the world crashed.

In ringing silence of still engines, Iroh swore he could hear a tether snap.

"Better disciplined than I thought," the old general grumbled, regaining his feet in a tangle of marines. The steamer was canted and listing; not sinking, not yet, but he had no illusions about their chances. Beside him he saw Zuko had been able to keep his balance, cat-owl quick, staring at shore with a hungry, furious gaze.

A surly squawk, an inquisitive chirrup, and black feathers ruffled out of the hold. Asahi's talons bore her up steel rungs steadily, if gracelessly as a turtle-duck climbing silk draperies.

Which Iroh had actually seen, more than once. As a child Zuko had been very... enthusiastic about animals. If it could be stalked and pounced on, it ended up in Ursa's forgiving lap.

Well. At least now he knew why Ursa's admonitions had ranged less along the lines of don't do that, and more in favor of never kill it unless you plan to eat it.

Chirping distress, Asahi lowered her head to rub on Zuko's shoulder. The young man blinked, and shook his head, mouth a grim line as he heard the curses and stifled whimpers that spoke of bones badly broken.

Back with us. Good. "Nephew, the crew," Iroh requested. "Lieutenant, a spyglass-"

She slapped it into his hand almost before he had the word out. "Sorry, Sir. I don't know the insignia."

With a touch of the self-condemnation he'd heard in his nephew's voice so often, though no reasonable officer would expect a marine to know all the standards of the Earth Army. "We shall have to expand Suzuran's library," Iroh said firmly, searching through clouds of dust and smoke on shore. Where was it, any commander bold enough to attack firebenders in the early morning would not fail to display it-

Ah. Oh dear. "General Gang," Iroh said levelly. "Get everyone above deck. Now."

"Everyone topside! Prepare to abandon!" Teruko bellowed. "Sir?" she asked, not even close to a whisper.

"I fear my reputation has preceded me," Iroh said dryly. "He will not be taking honorable prisoners." He met the marine's gaze. "I would suggest you not be taken, Lieutenant."

"I will do as honor bids me, sir."

Meaning she meant to stay alive so long as she must, to try and see them safe. No matter the cost. Iroh inclined his head, feeling steel shudder into his bones as the first rocks punched through the hull. "Prince Zuko-"

Crouching beside the hatch as the engineer scrambled out, Zuko lifted gentle hands, then breathed subtle frost.

The crackle of forming ice made every firebender shiver.

"Gave us a double hull," Zuko said grimly. "They're punching rocks just through us, and pulling back. Why waste chi crushing us when they can let the sea do the dirty work?" He looked over the crew. "It buys us some time. But he's going to notice we're not sinking."

"Time's all we need," Teruko said gleefully, as Suzuran's shadow fell over them. "Move it, people!"

I am a bit old for climbing boarding ladders, Iroh thought ruefully, as three sets of chain and metal rungs rang down to them. But grabbed hold regardless, and started climbing, just as Zuko and another marine swarmed up the other two ladders. There was no time to argue precedence with Teruko, and no sense if there had been; firebenders of their strength would be far more effective from Suzuran's deck than trapped on the little steamer.

Reaching the top, Zuko whistled.

"Sqwwrk?!"

Despite the desperate climb, Iroh caught himself chuckling. He didn't have to be an ostrich-horse to understand, "What are you, crazy?!"

"It's this or swim!" Zuko threatened, as the rest of the shore party latched on to the other two ladders. "Captain! Does anybody have a rope?"

A coil flung down, and Zuko whistled again. "Come on, sweetheart. Do this, and we'll find you some more nasty men to chew on, I promise..."

"Wrrgh." Gurgling hennish imprecations under her breath, Asahi snatched the rope, and latched onto steel rungs.

And that is all of us, Iroh thought, accepting a hand up from a seaman as Suzuran's engines revved and they started pulling away. A risky move, with half their number injured and still climbing. But far less perilous than lingering near shore with earthbenders-

The sea trembled, and Jee swore. "Cut engines!"

This crash... was less jarring. But not by much.

Iroh righted himself, and glared over the side at rocks grounding their ship.

"Char and blast that general, since when do they take to the damn water..." Captain Jee was fuming beside him, steam rising from the normally collected firebender's breath. "Suzuran may not look like much, but we've got good hulls. He won't be punching through any time soon."

"But it will not take long for him to start a ramp or tunnel this way," Iroh agreed grimly. "Gang is overconfident, and allows the rougher of his men unseemly license, but he is not a fool. We need to prepare for the boarding..."

A clank of steel and chains, and a half-drenched Asahi sputtered up and over the rail. Clawed the steel deck, and glared at Zuko.

And shook herself, deliberately, over everything in the vicinity.

"Sorry," Zuko sighed, one hand up to shield his eyes as he checked a marine's arm. "Simple break," he told a hovering Teruko. "I can show somebody how to heal it after we get out of this."

"Carry on, Rikiya," Teruko instructed. Dropped her voice as they moved away. "How are we getting out of this, sir?"

I don't know. I don't have a clue. We were so close, it's not fair...

Since when had his life been fair? These people needed him. "I'm working on it."

Taking a breath that tasted of sea and smoke, Zuko walked to the rail, eyeing the ring of stone below water, hemming them in. Solid as the wall of Ba Sing Se, he thought grudgingly, ducking out of habit as a trebuchet flung fire toward the shore. Drilled-in lessons of trajectory and geometry told him it wouldn't come near, but with enough angry firebenders around, you could never be sure. Terrific. So we just need a year and a half to bash it down, or the Mechanist's crazy drill...

Frowning at the water, Zuko swirled two fingers. Watched at tiny patch of wave twist, just that same spiral motion.

A drill spirals to cut a straight line. Like you try to make a missile spiral, make it spin, so it'll cut through the air...

Mouth dry, Zuko swallowed. Looked at Teruko, eyes wide; trying not to think too hard, in case his fragile plan burned to ash in the wind. "Do we have any oil?"

"I could-" Aang started.

"No!" Sokka hissed, holding onto an armful of squirming airbender as they all crouched behind Toph's reinforced wall. "You're hurt, damn it! That's fire out there, and I can't believe nobody on Suzuran's plastered us yet! On top of that - see that fancy uniform? That's got to be the general. We're not having good luck with generals lately."

Toph felt earth grumble out under the water all the way to steel, and bit her lip. She could break Suzuran loose. Here. Now. Even with the whole Earth Army bunch working against her. Probably.

Which might work out for Zuko, but would majorly suck for their little bunch. 'Cause there'd be no way the general and his guys would miss landing on her like a ton of bricks, and if they grabbed her they'd take a good look at Aang, and the Water Tribe parka Sokka had pulled over his head just wouldn't cut it as a disguise.

And she'd told Zuko. When the chips were down, she wanted Aang to win.

And she did not have a lump in her throat from knowing Zuko would understand. That heck, Sparky would probably even agree with her. He'd risked it all to make sure Aang got clear of Azula and Long Feng, no way would he want some truce-breaking scum like this General Gang scooping him up. No lump. At all.

Get out. Get away. You're the Dragon of the West, Uncle. Think of something!

And please, please, please let it be something that didn't leave any more screams behind. The smell of flesh seared right through the skin before sand could be bent away... Toph shivered.

"How could he," Katara whispered with loathing. "All those people..."

Hakoda gripped her shoulder, comforting. "I think it looks worse than it is."

"Says the man who's missed being scorched," Bato said grimly.

"I didn't say it was pleasant," Hakoda said gravely. "But it doesn't look like anyone's dead." His voice went dark. "Considering the situation, that's more than they deserve."

They tried to kill Zuko.

Toph swallowed, feeling again those frantic moments when she'd tried to pull Sparky out. But the rest of the army had been too close, squeezing him down, and it'd been all she could do to keep him from being dragon-paste-

Until he'd fought back where earthbenders couldn't bend, with water and fire. The moment she'd felt his heart race, she'd known the army was in for it. In for what, she hadn't imagined. Spirits.

Uncle warned us. Zuko warned us. He's gotta save his people. He's gotta stay alive.

He's through playing nice.

"I don't get it!" Sokka sputtered. "Why? We had a truce! They were leaving!"

"Because Uncle's the Dragon of the West," Toph said, fighting to keep her voice steady. "We never met him like that. He's retired. But I heard bits of stories, growing up. He scares people, Sokka. He scares generals like the Fire Lord scares you. Only way worse." She shook her head. "Why'd you think Zuko wanted us to think he was still after Aang? So everybody'd go after him. Not Uncle. Uncle's all Zuko's got left. He'd step in front of an avalanche for Uncle. He'd let us all hate him, for Uncle." She swallowed, and pointed at a heart fluttering like a dragon-fly. "He'd let you hate him."

Aang gulped. Looked out across the flame-strewn beach, determined, raising a hand-

Sucked in a hiss of pain, fighting not to cry as Katara held him. "All those people..."

"Asked for it," Hakoda said grimly. "I know this isn't the way of your people, Aang. But we had a truce with the prince, and he honored it. He's still honoring it. We've seen those fireballs hit land before. If that ship wanted to hit us, they would have by now..." The chief's voice died. "That's not good, is it?"

"Ah... no." Sokka gulped. "Definitely not good."

"What?" Toph demanded impatiently. Honestly, sometimes, seeing people-!

"Zuko's... looking this way," Sokka said, still shaky.

"Yeah? So?"

"...He's smirking."

Oh. Oh. Oh boy. Toph grinned like a leopard-shark. "Keep talking, Sokka. I want to hear everything-"

She heard the roar first. Crackling, sizzling; like hot oil someone had thrown water into-

Felt an odd, contrary, pulling breeze on her cheek, and realized exactly what Zuko was up to.

"Oh, man," Sokka whispered.

Burnt oil, boiling salt; the scent smacked Toph's nose with the roaring wind. Not a gale, or one of Aang's blasting winds. Air was only an innocent bystander, sucked down with a scream in twisting water to feed the fire binding it like a ribbon of knives.

Like a drill.

Toph felt it bite into the stone around Suzuran, snarling like a tiger-dillo having a really bad day. Rock didn't break, it pulverized; seared and shattered to silt in the waves, too fast for the stunned army earthbenders to react.

A roar of engines, a shudder, and she felt Suzuran yank free.

Katara was shaking like a leaf. "He... how... that can't be Zuko!"

"Sparky's been practicing," Toph said bluntly, heart still racing. Braced and ready to slam a shield of earth up over them at any twitch of the shore that would signal an oncoming wave.

Don't do it, Sparky. I know you're mad. I know you're hurt. I know Uncle said dragons are predators - and bat-wolves don't let hurt prey go, they just don't.

But you're people too, Sparky. You can do this. I know you can...

Wind gusted, and died.

"He - it fell apart," Sokka said, dazed. "He let it go... wait, what's Iroh - get down!"

Bato and Hakoda flattened them all.

Toph almost didn't hear the crackle. Though she felt hairs prick up on her neck, and tasted ozone-

Lightning crashed like a dying mountain.

Ears ringing, Toph flattened her hands on the sand. Swallowed, feeling glass where the beach under the army's center had been, and in the middle of that...

"General Gang is down!"

Done.

Iroh sighed, lowering his hands. It gave him no joy to see Gang fall. No joy... but yes, a certain grim satisfaction.

Try to kill my nephew, will you? I think not.

Though tactically, there were far better reasons to see the man dead. Zuko's daring and cleverness had won them free once, but General Gang might still have rallied his forces to trap them again. And Gang would have tried, desperately; for Gang was not a fool. He might have loathed the Fire Nation with every fiber in him, but he would have known what he had just seen. And how great a danger it would be to his people.

Earth was stability and tradition. The Earth Kingdom recoiled from adopting change, even for the better. But that did not mean they did not recognize it... and their brighter officers knew it was flexibility and innovation on the battlefield, far more than fire, that made Fire Nation forces so deadly.

Healing. Hot water. Searing sand. And now, fire-wreathed waterspouts that could shatter stone. Zuko had shown, plainly, he could bend unlike any firebender General Gang would have ever seen.

Had Gang taken them, no one of their ship would have been allowed to survive.

But Earth Kingdom armies were heir to all the respect for tradition of their nation. Especially respect for rank and noble birth. Cut off the head, and like the scorpion-viper, the rest of the body would thrash uselessly.

"Uncle..."

"They could not be allowed to pursue us further," Iroh sighed. "And you know they would not have stopped."

"...I know."

And quite miserable Zuko looked to know it, indeed. He has your heart, Ursa. Gentle, for all his rage. Agni, let him keep it. "He knew we were there under truce, and given the speed of his attack, he likely knew who he was attacking," Iroh said, loud enough for the crew to hear. "Meaning he came, deliberately, for two of Sozin's line." He shrugged. "If a fool wishes to commit suicide, sometimes all one can do is oblige him."

That won grins from the crew. But Zuko swallowed, looking aside. "You were retired. You liked being retired."

"No one harms one of my clan without consequences," Iroh said levelly. "I had hope that healing would not rouse their ire... but I failed to take into account Xiu's presence. She must have told them how you disguised it. Bending hot water..." He sighed. "Well. It must have been enough."

Zuko flinched.

None too subtly, Teruko glared.

Iroh blinked, thought over what he'd said, and tried not to sigh. "They would have come for us regardless. Azula spread that accursed poster far too widely-"

"I hated acting like him."

Ah. Now he could see the shudders, hidden behind hands calming damp black feathers. That could not have been pleasant, for one who had tried so hard to end things peacefully. "You did not," Iroh said plainly. "My brother would never have allowed the option of leaving without bloodshed." The more fool he. "Come. Let us see to our wounded."

Zuko shivered again, subtly. Drew a deep breath, and straightened. "Lieutenant. Who's the worst?"

"How could you let them get away-!"

Shaken and numb and angry all at once, Sokka stood a few feet back from where his dad was facing down Colonel Mohe, and tried to make sense of the morning.

Iroh killed the general. Iroh. But he's always been... and what Zuko said to Katara... burn our whole fleet? Zhao would do that, sure, but Zuko's not...

Sokka put his head down, and breathed. And tried not to laugh hysterically, knowing whose advice he was taking.

He told us. He told us we didn't know... that he'd never tried to kill us...

And it looked like Zuko hadn't lied. Again.

And that's just wrong. It just is, how come the guy who - who was trying to catch us never lies, and Aang does...

Mind going in circles, Sokka forced himself to focus on the important things. Katara was with the wounded she could still help, treating sears. Toph had Aang and Momo half-burrowed out of sight in a little sandstone shelter, ready to play helpless little scared blind girl for all she was worth if they were found. And Appa was back behind a few of the dunes the army hadn't tramped over. That should hide him for now, unless things got worse.

Yeah. And why wouldn't they? the sarcastic voice in his head pointed out.

You hush, Sokka told himself. I've got enough problems.

Problems like the angry earthbender officer in front of Hakoda, who stopped just short of poking the Water Tribe chief in the chest.

Unimpressed, Hakoda eyed the colonel. "You were throwing earth, and they were throwing fire, and I had injured children to keep out of the fight. What, exactly, did you expect us to do?"

"Not let murderers sail away-!"

"Colonel Mohe." Hakoda's voice was calm, but there was something in his eyes Sokka had seen before. Just before firebenders had charged their village. Hard and dangerous, like a drawn sword. "Would you like to tell me why your general attacked our camp, when Sergeant Huizhong knew there was a truce holding?"

"A truce?" the colonel sputtered. "You actually meant to hold to that? With the Fire Nation?"

"I think I see where my daughter picked up the attitude," Hakoda said dryly. "Not with the Fire Nation. With this ship. Prince Zuko may be as lethal as any of them, but he's never given me reason to doubt his word."

"Prince Zuko?" The colonel's lip curled. "As if that cast-off brat had any authority to negotiate anything!"

"The captain of the ship seemed to think so," Hakoda said levelly.

"Hah!" Colonel Mohe smirked. "I suppose they'd been on the water just as long as you have! That's rich." A snort. "Good news, then. When they learn the truth, they'll kill him for us."

"Truth?" Hakoda said warily.

"You haven't heard? Everyone's wondered why the brat was banished, for years... The Fire Lord himself burned the boy and cast him out! I suppose rumors of that woman he married were all too true... why else would a Princess vanish, if they weren't shamed she even existed? That bastard has no more right to noble blood than one of their damn komodo-rhinos!"

Sokka swallowed, the world reeling around him. Hearing Xiu, only a day before. "Some firebender put his fist in Lee's face..."

His father. Zuko's dad did that... Sokka clutched his head, feeling like his brain wanted to explode. Dads didn't do something like that!

And sisters don't try to kill you. Oh man...

A hawk cried out overhead, and something small, hard, and thankfully light bounced off his skull.

Circling with empty talons, the messenger hawk headed smugly back out to sea.

Rubbing his head, Sokka eyed the bird for a possible boomerang slice. Decided it was more trouble than it was worth, and picked up the little lacquered red and black cylinder. Had to open somehow... oh. Screwed together. Neat. And inside-

Sokka read the scrap of paper, and gulped. "Dad?"

Frowning, Hakoda took the message. And went very, very still.

Sokka winced, the acerbic text still fresh in his mind.

Chief Hakoda. I grow tired of watching people try to kill my nephew.

-And yes. You may, most certainly, consider this a threat.

"Don't think I'll ever get used to seeing those," Huojin muttered, watching the scarlet speck of a messenger hawk circle above Ba Sing Se.

Sitting beside him near the roof edge, Captain Lu-shan snorted. Usually, Huojin knew, the strengthening sunlight at the end of shift brightened the captain's mood. Today... not so much.

"I keep thinking I'm going to wake up, and find out I had bad pickled beets for dinner," Lu-shan said bleakly. Shook his head. "Oma and Shu. One teenage girl took down Ba Sing Se? I don't care if she is of Sozin's accursed house-

"You should, sir," Huojin interrupted. "That's how she did it. How she's holding the Dai Li. She's... they're not like other firebenders. They burn. And it draws people. Especially people who've got that killer instinct. Like firebenders... and like the Dai Li." He glanced at his suddenly wary captain. "Or so I've heard."

"Right," Lu-shan said at last. "Huojin. Why didn't you turn them in? And don't tell me it was the Avatar," the captain added dryly. "You've worked the streets too long to let one idiot bender kid get to you."

"Maybe not," Huojin admitted. "Captain. We both know the streets. And we know there's scum, and there are honest citizens, and that's usually pretty much that. And from what I've heard about Ozai and Azula... yeah. They're scum." He sighed. "But we both know, even in a family of citizens, sometimes somebody goes crooked. And there's nothing anybody can do about it." He glanced at Lu-shan. "And sometimes, just sometimes... even in a family of crooks, one kid will go straight."

Lu-shan took that in a moment, and shook his head. "The Dragon of the West."

"Is one damn scary guy if his nephew's in trouble," Huojin admitted. "Other than that? He's retired, sir. I've seen people like him off the Wall. You know plenty of them. Soldiers who've just seen enough people die. They'll fight if they have to, but... Spirits, he was happy to see Amaya teaching his nephew. Proud as a father. You can't fake that."

"Hmm." The captain didn't sound convinced. "You risked your career - and the Avatar's displeasure, and the Dai Li - because you think Prince Zuko might be a good kid. The Fire Prince?"

Huojin shrugged. "Can't think of a better reason to risk it, sir."

Captain Lu-shan rubbed at what seemed to be a headache. "I don't know you at all, do I?"

"What? Sir, of course you-"

Scarlet feathers swooped down.

"...Um." Huojin looked at the hawk perched on one unwary wrist, yellow eyes glinting. Looked at the captain. "I've never seen this bird before in my life?"

Lu-shan raised an eyebrow, amused and wary at once. "Probably for someone inside."

"Probably," Huojin said levelly, carefully extracting the thin roll of paper from the cylinder on the hawk's back. Wary of that fierce, hooked beak... though the bird seemed just as amused as the captain.

"Huojin." Lu-shan's voice was quiet, catching him just before he could unroll fine paper. "You've got a whole life here."

I know. Spirits, I know. "Captain." Huojin had to swallow before he could go on. "Luli and I... we've talked about this. A lot. Amaya's in trouble. I don't... I don't think you get how much trouble, sir. Azula's in the palace. She knows about the Earth King, and who treats that crazy bear of his. She knows Amaya trained Lee." He swallowed again, throat dry. "She's going to turn over every Ring, every street, every rock, to find her. Amaya has to get out."

Lu-shan sighed. "It's your neck." He paused. "And your family's."

I know. Taking a deep breath, Huojin unrolled the scrap.

Hey Umbrella. We're coming.

Not signed. Just the fancy flowing symbol Amaya had taught him meant Water, in a brown that didn't match the rest of the ink-

That's not ink.

Nose to the paper, he could still catch a faint wisp of cold smoke.

Leave it to Lee to char a Water symbol, Huojin thought wryly. Oh spirits, they're alive. They're alive, and they're coming back-

Footsteps. Huojin tucked the message up his sleeve with a speed learned from outfoxing young pickpockets, and turned an innocent gaze toward Master Sergeant Yakume.

"We're not expecting a hawk," the Fire Nation soldier said dryly. Held out a wrist for the bird to hop onto, and efficiently checked the cylinder. "No message-? Oh, Agni. Suzuran."

Huh? Blinking, Huojin looked again at the hawk's harness, tracing out what had looked like subtle ornamentation. It'd been decades, but High Court wasn't like regular writing. Just a five-score of symbols, easy enough for even a child to remember.

FNS Suzuran.

"I take it Suzuran's someone you don't like?" Captain Lu-shan said dryly.

"Not a who, Captain. Suzuran is a ship," Yakume said civilly. "A supply ship, to be accurate. Manned with-" He grimaced. "Well. I'm sure they'll be no more problem in port than any other sea-mad crew. They're not criminal, just... boneheaded screw-ups." He nodded toward the hawk. "As you can see."

"The Army knows about supply ships?" Huojin dared to ask.

"We have a vested interest in them," Yakume said dryly. "But as it happens, I know a lot about this one. The captain's had the dubious honor of having pursued the Avatar - and surviving - longer than any other officers besides General Iroh and Prince Zuko himself. Including that sea-spirit mess at the North Pole." He smiled wryly. "A wise man keeps track of people with luck like that."

"Tell me about it," Huojin muttered, rubbing his throat.

"The tsukumogami," Yakume nodded, after a moment's thought. "Exactly how did the prince get it off you without revealing himself?"

"What, you don't think he just yanked it off?" Huojin said warily.

"In point of fact, he could have," Yakume replied, gold eyes level. "I was on campaign with the Dragon of the West, years ago; I have seen certain... internal uses of chi that can allow a firebender to confront a spirit physically. I've never heard of another bending style being able to do so. Even your Dai Li use iron; it can't be bent, which I imagine prevents a spirit turning it on them, but it is of earth, and carries their chi. Chi stops a spirit. Flesh and bone - and even steel, Agni watch over our lost - do not." He looked over them both. "So. How?"

Tell him, don't tell him... oh what the heck, let's blow his mind. "Hot water," Huojin said frankly, feeling Lu-shan's eyes on him.

Yakume stared at him.

"I'm getting the feeling that's just as weird as Mushi - er, sorry, General Iroh - said it was," Huojin said, puzzled. "Hasn't anybody ever tried that before?"

"If they had, they certainly wouldn't try it in sight of most of the Earth Kingdom," Yakume said tartly. "Your armies have a century-old policy of eliminating firebenders who show original techniques. If they have to wipe out a whole household with blasting jelly to do it."

Huojin flinched. But the captain...

Captain Lu-shan didn't look surprised. And that... hurt.

Even so, there was something odd about the way Yakume had said that. Like somebody has tried it before, Huojin thought. But if that were true, why had Iroh been so surprised?

More to the point, why was Yakume even talking to them like this? For a guy who said he didn't like Earth Kingdom people, he wasn't acting like he'd rather be anywhere else-

Gold met water-bent green, and Huojin tried not to sweat. "Um... where are you taking that hawk?"

"I'm going to feed her, Guard Huojin," Yakume said dryly. "And then, Captain Jee is going to get a few words about careless expenditures of military assets."

Head high, he stalked out of sight.

"That was... weird," Captain Lu-shan said quietly.

And way too easy, Huojin knew. Even so, he couldn't help feeling like he wanted to giggle.

Lu-shan did a double-take, and edged back. "No," he protested.

Huojin grinned.

"No," Lu-shan repeated, incredulous. "Not a chance. He's... Oma and Shu, he's a teenager. He couldn't have."

Huojin tried not to snicker. "Captain. Did you ever wonder how the Avatar got his bison back?" Leaning back a little, he smirked. "It was locked up down in Dai Li headquarters."

"In Dai Li..." Lu-shan groaned.

"Until Lee tracked down the Blind Bandit," Huojin said, more soberly. "Still think I should have turned them in?"

Lu-shan buried his head in his hands.

A ship. Huojin took a deep breath, joy a bubble of rainbow inside him. Oh Agni, kid; how'd you pull that off?

One ship against the might of the Fire Nation. Not enough to win back Ba Sing Se, not by a long shot...

But he could taste the sea in the wind. And it breathed of freedom.

Since some people have been asking... this is only a partial bibliography. I have a lot stored in my head from reading... well, most stuff I can get my hands on.

Meditations on Violence, by Rory Miller. If you read just one book on this list, make it this one. It'll tell you why there is a gap - better make that a yawning abyss - between Zuko and Aang's viewpoints on reality. Spirituality and violence are not incompatible. A lot of monks in Japan were retired bushi. The way canon sets up the Air Temples, they lack that... and that makes a big difference.

Deep Survival, by Laurence Gonzales.

Ainu: Spirit of a Northern People by William W. Fitzhugh and Chisato O. Dubreuil.

The Conquest of Ainu Lands: Ecology and Culture in Japanese Expansion, 1590-1800 by Brett L. Walker.

- I highly recommend this one for anyone who wants a look at how Water Tribe/Fire Nation interactions might realistically work, with no waterbenders involved to even out the firepower.

China's golden age: everyday life in the Tang dynasty, by Charles Benn.

Early Modern Japan by Conrad D. Totman.

Green Archipelago: Forestry In Pre-Industrial Japan (Ecology & History) by Conrad Totman and Jr. James L.A. Webb.

Ninja AD 1460-1650 (Warrior) by Stephen Turnbull

The Samurai Invasion of Korea 1592-98 (Campaign) by Stephen Turnbull,

And many others of his books.

What Cops Know and Pure Cop by Connie Fletcher.

The Gift of Fear: Survival Signals That Protect Us from Violence by Gavin de Becker.

On Combat, The Psychology and Physiology of Deadly Conflict in War and in Peace by Dave Grossman.

The Anatomy of Motive by John Douglas and Mark Olshaker.

Wetlands by William J. Mitsch and James G. Gosselink.

www. sciencedaily. com (take out spaces) is always interesting for inspiration.

en. wikipedia wiki/Tupilaq

en. wikipedia wiki/Each_uisge

-For anyone who thinks spirits are friendly. Um, no.

Chapter End Notes

I do feel sorry for Aang. Hear all those pedestals smashing? He's a gentle soul who belongs up in a monastery where everyone's peaceful and kind. But the world just isn't like that.

And when Zuko cools down some, he'll probably feel sorry for Aang too. Which is way, way different than having regrets about what he did...

The Fire Nation felt it had reasons for the war of conquest. That doesn't make it right. It's taken Zuko a while to put that together; he was taught all his life the Fire Nation were, unreservedly, the good guys, and changing ingrained beliefs takes time even with substantial evidence in front of you. He and Iroh just want to make the Gaang realize that there were reasons behind the war; it wasn't just because the Fire Nation as a whole is power-hungry. There are no excuses for what happened to the Air Nomads, and the world. But there are reasons.

A note on the spirit-touched and finding love: given the Fire Nation's ancestry, they're all a little touched. Which is one reason Meixiang fell hard for Tingzhe, though he'd survived the same moonless night Shirong did. So Zuko and Iroh are perfectly acceptable as chick-magnets... to other Fire Nation girls. Of course, this also means other nations tend to find the Fire Nation in general... a little spooky. Which does not help in making peace one bit.

A note on nails: people tend to judge "normal" by themselves. If Zuko's used to climbing rock walls bare-handed (which we see in canon), any less strength than that would be considered "fragile".

Finally, Katara. All cultural issues aside... never, ever underestimate the impact of losing a mother on a child. Zuko actually got luckier than Katara, canon; he was older, and he believes there's a chance his mother is alive. It is strongly implied Katara watched her mother's murder. And after that, according to Sokka, she becomes the mother of the household, looking after everyone, always the optimist. Meaning she buried all that grief and anger to function... and that's very, very bad.

In a way, Zuko's seething temper tantrums through much of the first two seasons are a lot healthier. He's mad at the world. That may not be healthy or sane, but it's honest. And as long as you're honest with yourself, you have a chance to stop and look at your own behavior, and fix it.

Katara is not honest. Katara is sweetness and confidence and "we're going to help Aang save the world!" Until she runs into something she doesn't like, at which point the Sugar Queen cracks, and a lot of nastiness oozes out.

In I Could Do Anything, If I Only Knew What It Was, Barbara Sher describes the rage against the ordinary. Ragers are charismatic, often skilled, often geniuses. They work hard, they may be good at what they do - but they want to be the absolute best.

Without having to start from the bottom. Or put up with the ordinary scutwork the rest of us take for granted. They charm people around them into fixing their problems, over and over again. And they always have problems. Because when they were young, they were horribly betrayed by the world - and they want to be rescued. More than anything in the world. Katara's central motivating idea - the Avatar will return - fits the rager's profile point by point. 1) Her fantasy requires the act of an outsider to come true. 2) The end is a rescue or reward that comes only to special people. 3) She'll be "discovered" as special (the last Southern waterbender). 4) Her life is pointless without this happy ending.

This can be fixed. Ragers can learn to find the root of their problems, and move past it. But it takes hard work, self-examination, and admitting a little brat inside you wants something it can never have. Katara can break out of this - if she listens, really listens to her family and friends, and realizes that she wants, desperately, for someone to make things right. To rescue the little girl who lost her mother, and grew up too soon.

Except in canon the creators hooked her up with Aang, who wants to be mothered and have excuses to be irresponsible.

(Insert writer banging own head against wall.)

...Yeah. That relationship is going to end so well. I think I'll take my chances with Azula...

Chapter 31

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Course set, hulls are sound; thank Agni they didn't have time to hole us, Captain Jee thought, heading down to the main deck. The crew seems to be holding steady, even if they are a bit nervous at having two princes on board.

He couldn't blame them for that. It was one thing to read in the history books of the power of the Fire Lord's line. It was quite another to see it. And beyond mere fire, what Prince Zuko had done...

Though in a way, what he was up to now was even more unnerving.

"It's a push," the prince was saying, for what sounded like at least the third time. Iroh was standing back, for now; watching. "You have to make the fire more than it is. Not more intense. Not hotter. Different. Like ice melting."

From the dubious looks, the rest of the ship's firebenders weren't getting it any better than Jee was. Though the way Lieutenant Teruko was chewing her lip had some promise, and...

Jee halted where he stood, eyeing the startled expression of the last firebender he'd expected to find anywhere near a healing tutorial. "Lieutenant Sadao?"

"It... sounds kind of like glass, sir," Sadao said hesitantly. "When it's cold, if you hit it, it breaks. But when it's hot... it's different. It lets you work with it." He stopped, frustrated. "I'm not saying it right..."

"Get over here," Zuko said abruptly. "Don't try to think. Just follow me. I'll catch you if something goes wrong."

"If something goes wrong?" someone said dubiously.

"A waterbender depends on the rhythm of the tides, and is safe," Iroh declared. "We are depending on the rhythm of our own hearts. And that is... not safe. If one grips too tightly." He shrugged slightly. "We are children of fire. Agni grants us much, but safe is not his gift." He nodded at Sadao. "Indeed, Lieutenant, I would suggest you make the attempt. Healing is an outward fire, not inward. You, more than many of us, may be well suited to this technique."

Sadao swallowed visibly. But joined the prince by the barrel of fire, hands barely shaking.

"Don't worry. You don't have to be calm for this," Zuko said practically. "It might be better if you're not. This is a lot more like a fight than you think."

"A fight?" Sadao perked up. "But it's healing."

"Ever had a healer tie you to a bed, glare you down, and force-feed you painkillers to work on you?" Zuko said dryly. "Healers don't have to be nice. They just have to think." His voice gentled a bit. "But we don't have to think right now. We just need to find the rhythm. Us, and the fire." He lowered his hands, taking a breath. "Follow me."

*Oh, good work, General, Jee thought, glancing Iroh's way as the prince played with fire. Smooth, deliberately slow; breath infusing each motion, as Zuko drew out a ball of flame and changed it. I* don't know what you did, but you finally hammered patience into that young man's head. Agni, we may have a chance after all...

Jee's jaw dropped, as specks of green blazed in Sadao's flame like falling stars.

The lieutenant swallowed, looking at trembling, empty hands. "...I lost it."

"That's okay." There was a smile on Zuko's face; small, but there. "That's fine. I fought with this for weeks before I could get it to settle, even with Uncle helping- that was it, Lieutenant!"

I never doubted you could do it.

Jee could hear it, clear as if the prince had spoken. Could see those silent words impact Sadao, in the sudden, sober determination in the lieutenant's eyes. And spread farther, touching every listening crewman with a sense of honor recognized.

Iroh had drifted back beside him, and Jee shook his head. "How is he doing that, sir?" Jee murmured. "I've been working on Sadao for months..."

"But in the classic style, which we know is of the mountain clans, and focuses on the inner fire," Iroh murmured back. "While my nephew - and, it seems, Sadao as well - is more adept at outer fire." He laughed softly. "I feel quite the stubborn old fool. It was under my nose all along; I cannot count the times he has bent other fires. But that is not the thrust of our style, so I thought nothing of it..." He sighed. "I have been forcing a wave to play a mountain's part. The wonder is not that he failed so often, but that he has done so well."

"It's more than that," Jee admitted. "Sir, Teruko thinks..."

"I well know what she thinks," Iroh said dryly. "Given Avatar Aang recounts knowing Kuzon's dragon companion Shidan, what she thinks may not be impossible." The general looked thoughtful. "But my nephew has something more precious than dragon's blood. He has a task worthy of a prince of our people, and the determination to see it through." Iroh's smile held quiet pride. "He has hope, Captain. He knows the odds we face, he knows our peril - and yet, he has stood his ground against spirits, and Azula, and the Avatar himself. And he is still here."

"Hope," Jee echoed quietly. Thinking of Nara, and disaster, and a beloved touch he would never feel again.

"It hurts, to hope again." Iroh acknowledged. "But I promise you, Captain - we will have more allies than you yet know. In the most unlikely of places."

Jee looked at him askance. "What allies?"

Eyes dancing, Iroh gestured toward the west, where a half-moon hung pale in the morning sky.

Jee swallowed. "But... we're..."

"Children of her brother, and loyal to one who respects and honors her," Iroh said plainly. "He does not venerate her, but he does love, fiercely... The Water Tribes believe waterbenders are blessed, Captain. Let the world's spirits hate the Fire Nation; La has raised her hands to shield us." He nodded once. "We are sailors. Let us see where this tide may take us."

Breathe. Just... breathe. Sadao gripped the observation deck's railing, selfishly grateful the captain had ordered everyone who'd tried fire-healing to take a few hours off. Trying to bend fire the way nobody ought to bend it had left headaches and bad tempers scattered through the crew, and the captain wanted them to get their edge back before anything else could go wrong.

Sadao didn't have a headache. But he didn't want to go back on watch, either. He felt... off. And afraid.

So what else is new?

"Captain Jee said you'd be up here."

Sadao started. He moves like a ghost! "Sir-"

"At ease," Prince Zuko said quietly. "May I join you? It's dusty in the files."

"Of... course." Sadao swallowed, glancing down as the prince gripped the rail. If the whispers were true, all it would take would be the flick of a sharpening stone, and those nails could cut his throat...

Of course, rumors exaggerated. Usually.

"I'm not good at speeches," the prince said abruptly. "But the first time I knew I could do this, I was scared."

Wide-eyed, Sadao listened.

"Hurting people is easy. It's so easy. Fire wants to burn. And you're alive, and he's dead, and - that's it. Helping people..." The prince grimaced. "They're counting on you, and you don't know enough, it never feels like enough. And it's worse because you care. You have to care. Fire is life, it's love, it's I will not let them die. That's what you use. That's how you change the fire. You have to give it part of you." He winced. "And it feels like walking unarmored into the middle of your enemies."

Sadao wet his lips. "You've... done that. Haven't you, sir."

"Doesn't make it easier," Prince Zuko said wryly. "I'm just - damn it, Lieutenant. If you weren't scared trying this, there'd be something wrong with you."

"Thank you, sir," Sadao said uncertainly. I think.

"Don't thank me yet," the prince said dryly. "If they made Jee captain of this ship, I know what kind of people ended up on her."

Sadao bristled. That's why he was in the files! "Sir, with all due respect-!"

"Easy, Lieutenant." The prince was smiling, damn him. "I said I know. And I do. I have confidence in Captain Jee. I know he's built a good crew." Pale gold eyed him. "Problem is, you don't know it."

Which was so much the last thing Sadao expected to hear, he just stood there. Gaping.

"It's easy being a failure," Prince Zuko said bluntly. "It hurts all the time, but... you get numb. No one expects anything." He smirked. "But I've got news for you. You're caught."

"...Erk?" Sadao managed.

"You can't be a failure at this. You just got started." The smirk deepened. "So enjoy your time off. Once General Iroh and I get a schedule set with the captain? We're going to work you into the deck."

...Eeep.

"Suzuran's long gone, our allies are twiddling their thumbs trying to figure out if they're going to send to Ba Sing Se for orders, and my, would you look at that. It's almost noon," Bato said dryly.

"I can see that," Hakoda sighed, gazing toward the hole Toph had opened in the sand for fresh air.

"Hmm." Bato eyed the little group barely in view. "Think you should handle this alone?"

"No," Hakoda said reluctantly, after a moment's internal struggle. "I want to be her father... but I need to be her chief."

Bato nodded, and clapped a hand on his shoulder. "Best to get it over with, then."

Says the man who isn't their father. Which wasn't fair to Bato. But right now, Hakoda didn't feel like being fair.

You're chief. You're stuck with it. Do your duty. Resolute, he approached the children.

Sokka saw him first, comforting grin fading into a sober look. Katara glanced up from comforting Aang, and stiffened. "He was lying."

Not a good start. "Colonel Mohe?" Hakoda said, deliberately misunderstanding. "Yes, I think he was. If there's one thing we've learned facing the Fire Nation, it's that they take personal insults... well, personally. The Fire Lord might attack his wife for betraying him, but Zuko?" He shook his head. "I think the colonel would like to believe his story. The Earth Kingdom respects noble blood and rank. Breaking our truce with Suzuran would be a lot easier to justify to his superiors if Zuko weren't a prince at all."

Beside him, he could almost feel Bato trying not to roll his eyes.

"That's not what she meant," Aang said firmly. "And you know that, sir."

"Yes, I do," Hakoda admitted. "But Zuko will keep. My daughter bending our hearts to the point we almost broke a truce, will not." He frowned. "I'd like to have a long talk with this Master Pakku. There are reasons our ancestors left the North, and he's just reminded us of most of them."

"Katara would never do that!" Aang protested. "I know Zuko said - well, awful things - but he doesn't know her. And Master Pakku's kind of cranky... but he's a great waterbender!"

"He's a Northern waterbender," Hakoda said firmly. "A Southern waterbender would never interfere with a chief's decisions this way." He fixed Aang with a stern look. "As far as not knowing Katara, or any of you... I'm told you're a vegetarian, Aang. You don't hunt, so you have no idea what hunting requires. First and foremost, you must understand your prey." Hakoda drew a deep breath of salt air, and longed for the chill of home. "Zuko hunted you near half a year, across the face of the world. If he doesn't know you by now, no one does." Toph being the possible exception, Hakoda knew, judging the earthbender's deliberate silence. But Toph and Zuko seemed to understand each other quite well. Which might be why she was silent. If she understood a prince's role in the Fire Nation, she might have a far better grasp of the realities of a chief's duty than Aang with all his travels had yet managed.

"You can't believe him," Katara insisted. "I'm not like that! So I'm angry about Mom; why shouldn't I be? So some of the Fire Nation's going to die? Well, what do you know - what have they been doing to the whole world for a hundred years!"

And Hakoda wanted to agree with her, Kya's death was like a hole in his heart-

Deliberately, the chief made himself ignore it. "Stop that. Now."

Hate ebbed like the tide.

"That was you?" Aang said in disbelief. "All this time, everybody getting so mad - that was you?" He gaped, then shook his head. "Katara, why would you do that? Someone could've gotten hurt!"

"Somebody did!" Katara fired back, finger jabbing toward Bato. "Because of Zuko! Because he's nothing but a-"

"Sugar Queen." Toph's tone made the nickname a threat. "Finish that, and somebody is gonna get hurt. And it's not Bato."

"She's right," Bato said grimly. "If the men learn you've been doing this deliberately... there are no other women of the tribe here. But that doesn't mean things can't be... decided."

Sokka swallowed dryly. Toph shivered. Katara stared at her fellow tribesmen as if they'd been some trick of an evil spirit, now revealed in all its cannibal horror.

But it was the Avatar Hakoda watched, as the boy paled and leapt to Katara's defense. "How can you say that? Katara's one of the best people I've ever met! If she... almost hurt somebody... I'm sure it was a mistake." He gave Katara a reassuring smile. "So everything's fine, and we can get back to important stuff. Like ending the war."

Hakoda looked into the full force of that endearing grin, and refused to falter. "Everything is not fine. Katara. What you've been doing is wrong. We had a truce. A warrior's honor demanded that we hold it, and you were pushing us to break it. How could we have called ourselves men, after that? How could we ever have come home?"

As long as he lived, Hakoda knew he'd never forget the look on his daughter's face. Pale. Frightened. Betrayed.

Spirits. If only you were anyone's daughter but mine.

Aang's jaw dropped, and stunned gray eyes blinked at him. "But... you have to! They're waiting for you!"

"They're waiting for honorable warriors, and true men of the tribe," Hakoda said bluntly. "We would be nothing but rogue wolves, driven from the pack."

"So... like being banished?" Aang said hopefully. "Katara was banished, and that worked out okay."

I did not just hear that, Hakoda thought, stunned. "You were what?"

"Sokka threw Aang out of the village," Katara said defiantly. "He was alone. He needed somebody!"

Hakoda raised a brow at his son.

Sokka sighed, resigned. "I threw him out - and Gran-Gran backed me up - because he went to the Fire Navy wreck. And took you with him. The forbidden wreck?"

"A bender has to conquer fear!" Katara shot back.

"You want to conquer fear? How about taking your waterbending up against a polar bear? Or ice-dodging? Or - I don't know, anything besides going someplace built by the enemy, and full of traps! Where you set off a booby-trap that led Zuko right to our village!" He met Hakoda's gaze without excuses. "She wanted a waterbending teacher. Aang said he'd take her to the North Pole. She said she was banished, too. Aang talked her into coming back, and Gran-Gran let it go. I figured that should be the end of it."

Fair enough. And it should have been... if it hadn't left one young Avatar with entirely the wrong idea. "Aang," Hakoda said levelly. "What happened when one of your people did something unforgiveable?"

"Like what?"

Hakoda eyed the airbender, keeping a strong grip on his temper. He is not that naive. No one is.

Aang stared back just as hard, face unexpectedly firm. "Look. I know your tribe's... really different. And you feel like you have to do - awful things, sometimes. But we didn't. The temples were all places of peace and enlightenment. And a lot of fun, too. Ask Sokka. We didn't... nobody from the temples would ever do... what happened here today." He gulped. "I liked Iroh."

"Aang." Sokka's voice was quiet. "There were firebender skeletons all around Gyatso. I kind of don't think they just laid there and died."

"I know." The grief on Aang's face was awful to see. "I know, when you're fighting someone who wants to hurt you... I just can't see it. It'd be - like seeing Kuzon in that awful armor. Kuzon never wanted to hurt anybody. But I guess... I guess he..."

"He didn't." Toph crossed her arms. "I asked Iroh about him." At Aang's startled stumble, she shrugged. "He knew who you were talking about in the desert. I figured he might know more. Your friend Bumi made it through a hundred years; I thought maybe..." She shook her head. "He wasn't in the army, ever. A lot of his clan died 'cause they wouldn't do what Sozin wanted. So Kuzon ended up lord of Byakko. Even the Fire Lord couldn't drag him out of that, not if he didn't want things to be really messy. Kuzon was never in the war." She hesitated, fingers gripping her wristlets a little. "Not in armor, anyway."

"Oh man." Sokka winced. "Let me guess. Zuko's not the first guy in the family to go sneaking in green."

Toph grinned a little. "He promised Monk Gyatso he'd find Aang. He spent the rest of his life trying." She faced the airbender directly. "His whole life. That's what the Fire Nation does to keep their word. And yeah, they're crazy - but promises are important to us, too. Earth Kingdom and Water Tribe."

"I know that," Aang said defensively. "Why wouldn't I know that? I'm the Avatar, of course I know about..." He saw Hakoda's look, and swallowed.

"If you really knew that," Hakoda said quietly, "then you'd understand why what Katara did is so wrong." He looked straight at her. "A warrior's honor is a promise to his people. And to himself. That he will always behave with dignity, and courage. That he will abide by the ways of our people, or willingly take the consequences. To force us to be angrier than we already were, to gouge at us with a hate that was not our own - it was wrong. And things are not fine." He straightened, and eyed the airbender once more. "Avatar Aang. Sokka tells me we have an opportunity to attack the Fire Nation directly. To win, at a time the Fire Lord will be helpless. Given the fall of Ba Sing Se to Azula, the plan to involve the Earth King's forces won't work. But I'm sure between Sokka and the rest of us, we can come up with something." He looked sober. "You're hurt, and it would be better if Katara could focus on healing you rather than fighting. I'm offering you the choice of travelling with the fleet, while you heal and we all work out a plan."

"Sounds great!" Aang perked up. "Thanks-"

"You'll be watched."

Caught mid-thought, Aang gaped at him. "But - Katara said she was sorry-"

"No," Hakoda said bluntly. "She did not." He glanced at his daughter. "Are you?"

"I..." Katara swallowed, and looked defiant. "I was trying to help. To do what was right!"

"You'll be watched," Hakoda repeated, heart heavy. "Katara. You're my daughter. I love you, and I missed you both, every day. But if this happens again, with either of you - yes, you too, Aang, we know you're a waterbender - I am the chief of our tribe. I will be forced to act."

"Against the Avatar?" Katara said in disbelief. "Like the Fire Nation?"

"For our people," Hakoda said bluntly, anger finally boiling over. "I'm not asking for the moon! Just the decency to leave our hearts ours. Let us help to restore the balance because we think it's right. Not because you do!"

Katara finally flinched. "Dad, I-"

"Stop," Hakoda said firmly. "Behave. Show us you are a true woman of the tribe. A Southern waterbender, who can be trusted." He switched his glare to Aang. "Bato tells me you proved yourself ice-dodging as an honorary member of the tribe. That honor carries responsibilities. Show us you can be trusted as well. Or you may have allies to throw back the Fire Nation, but as far as a world in balance, or peace..." Hakoda sighed. "Aang. How can there be peace in the world, if the world can't trust the Avatar?"

"I..." Aang swallowed. "I'm trying."

"I know," Hakoda said levelly. "I wish I could make it easier for you. But for now - you have to keep trying." Or Zuko's nightmare will become the truth. And that will shatter us all.

From the corner of his eye, Hakoda watched Asiavik approach, and wondered how much the graying healer had heard. Quite a bit, if that look of wry satisfaction was any clue.

Katara saw it too. And for a moment, just one, Hakoda saw her fear.

Oh daughter. I'm sorry. But this has to stop. And they have to know it's stopped.

"Hakoda," Asiavik said, face neutral once more. "That young Earth Kingdom lady is back." He glanced at Sokka and Katara. "She says she brought a letter for you."

"From Monk Yuan-ti, in the year of- This is an airbender letter!" Aang beamed, leaning back against a sandstone bench to read as they gathered around. "Three hundred and twenty years ago. Wow. This was old when I was born."

Like overcooked squid, Sokka thought ruefully, watching Xiu watch Aang. You chew and you chew and you chew, and he just bounces back.

At least Katara seemed to get that Dad was really ticked off. And kind of in a bind. He was the chief. And part of being the chief's kid was making sure Dad didn't have to worry about that. That he could treat you just like everybody else.

Most of the time, Katara knew that. Most of the time.

"It's hard to believe you're really over a hundred years old," Xiu said curiously. "I knew Kyoshi was two hundred and thirty when she died, and if what I've heard about Avatar Kuruk is true, he lived even longer, but-"

"Oh, I was frozen in an iceberg," Aang said cheerfully. "Until Katara broke me out with some awesome waterbending."

"It's true," Katara nodded, smiling. It only slipped a little when she glanced toward the rest of camp.

"Iceberg," Xiu muttered. "Remind me to be glad I'm not you."

"Right now, he's not him either, okay?" Sokka said pointedly. "We don't want word getting back to anyone in the Fire Nation that he's still alive. To anyone else in the Fire Nation," Sokka realized belatedly. "Oh, man..."

"Relax," Toph said seriously. "Sparky won't tell."

"We don't know that," Aang said sadly, looking up from the letter.

"No," Xiu allowed, "but there's a pretty good chance she's right. You haven't seen the size of the bounty on Zuko's head." She grimaced. "Trust me. Going anywhere near the Fire Nation, or anybody who deals with them, would be really stupid."

And Zuko's not stupid, Sokka finished to himself. Obsessed, crazy, too stubborn to lie down and die - but he's not stupid.

"So... where's your boyfriend?" Katara asked, obviously hoping to divert the conversation anywhere else.

"We had a fight," Xiu said sadly. Smiled, just a little wry. "He tucked me out of the way to keep me safe from the big, bad Fire Prince." Her voice dropped. "My father would never do that."

"He was just trying to protect you," Katara assured her.

"I didn't ask to be protected," Xiu said firmly. "If he'd told me who they were, if he'd told me the Army always goes after firebenders with something new - well, we still would have had a fight. But I would have agreed with him. Mostly." She shook her head. "But he didn't tell me."

Sokka heard her pain, and winced. "He didn't trust you."

"You use your head." Xiu gave him a bittersweet smile. "Keep that up, and somebody's going to be a very lucky girl someday. So for her and you - always tell her why you're going to do something, Sokka. Give her reasons. And listen if she's got facts that should make you think twice. Nobody agrees on everything. But if you really listen to each other... things should work out."

"Um... thanks?" Of course he listened to Suki. Well, he tried to listen. Even if maybe she had to throw him across the dojo a few times first-

Suki. Azula had Kyoshi Warrior outfits. Oh spirits - did she get Suki?

No way to know from here. If they could get to Full Moon Bay, somebody should know. The problem was going to be getting there-

Wait. She said something important. "What do you mean, always goes after?"

"Firebenders come up with new things," Xiu said simply. "Then they teach everyone else. That's what Sergeant Bo said, anyway. Usually it's something simple. A little different way to throw a fireball, maybe. But bending hot water?" She looked down at her hands. "I feel like this is my fault. At least some of it. Even if they didn't know about the healing... the Fire Nation wants him dead, and now the Earth Kingdom does too. Poor Lee."

"Poor Lee?" Katara said in disbelief. "Did you see what they did?"

"I saw." Xiu looked back at her, serious. "When I was a little girl, my father told me, always fight to stay alive. No matter what you have to do. No matter who says they're right, and you're wrong. Always fight. Because you might end up somewhere like Chin Village, where they still want to kill anyone from Kyoshi Island because of what the Avatar did to their great leader."

"Actually... we did," Sokka admitted uncomfortably. "So it's not just Avatar Day?"

"No." She eyed them all. "No offense, but how did you get out in one piece?"

"Don't ask me," Toph stuck in. "Happened before I got into the group."

Sokka felt the sand shiver a little under him, and read the hint clear as day. Talk to me, guys. Or do I have to ask Zuko again?

Never mind that Zuko was long gone. Toph would find a way. He just knew it.

"Well... some Fire Nation guys showed up, and... I did community service," Aang grinned. Glanced at Xiu dubiously. "They weren't really going to boil me. Right? I'm the Avatar."

Xiu looked at him.

"I mean, nobody would want to live with that Wheel of Justice craziness. Boiled in oil, eaten by sharks... even the Fire Nation doesn't do that to people, right?"

"No," Xiu said bluntly. "They usually don't." She shook her head. "That's why Dad told me, if it came down to Chin Village or Fire Nation troops? Head for the troops."

"You're joking," Katara said flatly.

"They boiled a fisherman who got blown off course last year," Xiu said bluntly. "Dad keeps up on the news that way. Just in case he ever gets a bunch of old buddies together in the right place."

"Violence isn't the answer," Aang said firmly. "Death never solves anything."

"It doesn't, huh?" Xiu gazed steadily back. "Keep reading."

Aang blinked, and went back to the pages. "I don't know what you think is in here, he's just talking about visiting the nuns at the Western Air Temple..." Aang paled.

Sokka held the pages as Aang's hands started shaking, and leaned in to read. "Oh, boy."

"Somebody want to fill me in?" Toph said impatiently.

"Short version? Sadao was telling the truth about Kyoshi slaughtering the Fire Nation," Sokka said soberly. "Yuan-ti's talking about 'smoke from numberless funeral pyres'. 'Islands vanished from the face of the sea'. 'Salt glittering on the flanks of Mount Shirotona, where the renegades tried to hold back the tide'." He eyed Aang. "Renegades?"

Wordless, Aang shook his head. "But... Kyoshi was the Avatar. She couldn't have..."

"She did," Xiu said, not without sympathy. "Fire Nation pirates killed one of her children. Granted, he was a grown man himself - but your kids are always your babies. Some other sources I read say she sent word to the lords first, before she brought the hurricane... but it looks like they went through the Earth King, and he remembered how Kyoshi humiliated his father, when she created the Dai Li."

"So the Earth King screwed with the messages," Sokka concluded.

"I don't know that for sure," Xiu said soberly. "But what Sergeant Bo had, what people wrote back then... I'd bet on it. He hated the Fire Nation, and he hated Kyoshi. Why not?" She eyed Aang. "Chin Village hates the Avatar because of what Kyoshi did to Chin. One man. Who deserved what he got." She pointed at the letter. "Go ahead. Tell me they deserved that."

I can't, Sokka realized. He knew how angry he was over Mom, and Yue. But... it had been firebenders, both times. People you could stop. People you could kill, and tell your dead it was over. Aang, in the Avatar State...

Fong, the sandbenders - we were lucky, Sokka knew. Nobody got killed. If things had been just a little different... you can't fight Aang when he's like that. No one can.

Except Azula. Who'd shot Aang in the back.

How did that even work? When Aang's like that, the spirits are with him; nothing else has ever touched him, even when people are bending all over the place-

Sokka glanced up at the sun, and swallowed hard.

When Aang came up out of the sea at the South Pole, nobody firebent at him. They were too stunned.

If they had... would it have gotten through?

Because Aang had told them Koh the Face-stealer still carried a grudge for something an Avatar had tried nine centuries ago. And if Koh could carry a grudge that long...

Oh man. This war is bigger than we think. A lot bigger.

"Maybe they didn't deserve it then," Katara said grimly. "But now? They have to be stopped."

"I know," Aang said thoughtfully. "But it does make a difference. If part of why things are so messed up is they're hurting... we've got to fix it. Somehow."

"Fix them?" Katara shook herself. "What makes you think they want to be fixed?"

"Katara's got a point," Toph put in. "You better think about this, Aang. Hard."

"Nobody could want to be like that," Aang objected. "Kuzon wasn't like that. And Iroh-" He shook his head, sad. "He was trying."

"Stop big bad guy Fire Lord first, fix less bad guys later," Sokka suggested, before it could deteriorate into an argument. Renegades on Mount Shiroto. Byakko?

Maybe. But that didn't seem quite right. Especially with what was in the rest of the letter. "Aang? What's harmonious accord?"

"Huh? Oh. Grownup stuff," Aang shrugged. Winced a little. "Why?"

"Something Yuan-ti says about the nuns in the temple." Sokka frowned, re-reading it. "A lot of the bearing nuns... they had bears?"

Aang went a little pink. "He means they were pregnant."

"Pregnant nuns?" Toph said, disbelieving. "Is that even legal?"

"Well... where else would we come from?" Aang said, confused.

Xiu blinked. "All the airbenders were nuns?"

"Except for the monks," Aang grinned. "Yeah, he says some of them went down to see, and they were upset. Who wouldn't be?"

"He says more than that," Sokka frowned. "Several of our younger sisters, especially among the bearing, were most distressed to witness the Avatar's will. I counseled the elders to bring all back into harmonious accord, as while mercy and compassion are tender illusions, they yet cause the spirit to remain attached to things of this world, and must all be pruned away. Else as you know yourself, one will desire more of what can only pass away and be forgotten. And how, then, would we know the transcendent joy of teaching our pupils freedom, if those who bear them will not give them up..." Sokka gulped, lowering the letter with shaking hands. "Give them up? Your parents gave you away?"

"That's what they were supposed to do," Aang said, surprised. "We don't have parents, Sokka. Not like you do. Though Hakoda's kind of neat... weird, though. Kuzon was always worried about if his parents would be proud of him. And Uncle Kuroyama; he really cared about him, even when his uncle was yelling like you wouldn't believe... what's wrong?"

"Aang." Katara was wide-eyed. "You had to have a mother and father. Everyone does."

"Well, kind of... the monks went to see the nuns a couple times a year, and they brought back babies who were old enough," Aang shrugged. "Gyatso said boys got split between the North and South temples, and girls went to the temple they weren't born in... why is everybody looking at me like that?"

"Um," Sokka managed. "It's just... kind of surprising." Make that terrifying. With some horrific slathered on top.

"It is?" Aang frowned. "I told you Monk Gyatso looked after me. Zuko knew all about it. First day we met, he said I didn't know anything about fathers. And that's just not true. Gyatso took me to visit people all over the place. I know about fathers!" He shrugged. "Air Nomads just don't have any."

"Zuko studied Air Nomads to try and find you," Toph stated. "I guess most people don't anymore."

"...Oh." Aang looked downcast.

"You know what? We could use a snack," Sokka said firmly. "Injured warriors need to keep their strength up. We'll... go bring something back."

"Good idea," Katara nodded, shooting him a relieved smile that said she knew exactly what he was up to. "Aang? You want to tell me what it was like growing up with Gyatso? He sounds like a really good guy."

"Oh, was he ever..."

He'd been in a lot of close shaves since he met Aang, Sokka thought. But somehow, getting away from that pit of sand felt like the narrowest escape of all. "...Oh, man."

"Keep it together." Even Toph sounded dazed. "So now we know. I dunno what we do next, but we know."

"I was hoping he'd say it was wrong," Xiu said shakily. "I mean, I read it, but... one letter. It could have just been somebody's idea of a sick joke, or a crazy man, or..." She gulped. "But it's not. Is it."

"Twinkletoes didn't even flinch," Toph reported. "He... he thought that was okay."

Why does that scare me almost as much as the Fire Lord? Sokka wondered. And stiffened. "Oh, I am going to shove Boomerang up his- that's why Zuko wanted Dad to look after him!" He flung up his hands. "Oh, good going, jerkbender, dump the problems you can't fix on us-"

"You even listening to yourself?" Toph had a faint smile back, sarcastic confidence returning. "He tried, Sokka. Since he hit you guys at the South Pole, he's always told you why he was after you. His honor. His people. His family." She shrugged. "He can't fix this. He's not Aang's friend. We are. What else was he supposed to do?"

Sokka eyed her. "You know, sometimes I hate it when you make sense."

"You're his friends?" Xiu let out a low whistle. "You're braver than I am."

"Not feeling that brave right now, trust me," Sokka muttered. Sniffed the air, and headed for the nearest stewpot. People, blue tunics, no green, thank the spirits-

Dad.

He grabbed onto that solid strength, and never mind if it was manly or not. Dad was here, and real, and helping.

We're not in this alone.

"Sokka?" Hakoda gave him a concerned look.

"When you get a chance? Katara could really use a hug, too." Sokka swallowed. "Airbenders... aren't exactly what people think."

Hakoda nodded slowly. "Tell me."

He did, words running over each other, Toph and Xiu sticking a few in when he choked up. Trying to get across not just the bare words of the letter, but the casual way Aang had talked about shredding families apart. Like taking babies from their mothers didn't matter. Worse - that the moms were supposed to be happy about it.

He ran out of words. Gulped, and dug for a few more. "Aang... Katara and I kept telling him he was family. But he doesn't even know what that is. And if he doesn't know why we're fighting..." At a loss, Sokka shook his head.

"Maybe Iroh was right after all," Toph said, half to herself. "About how the war got started," she added, as heads turned her way. "He doesn't know for sure, he's guessing - but I think it's a pretty good guess."

"The war started when they wiped out the Air Temples," Bato pointed out.

"Yeah. But before that? The Fire Nation gets hit by hurricanes every year," Toph said soberly. "Not as bad as Kyoshi's, but bad. And the Air Nomads were supposed to warn them if they saw one coming. Only right before the war? They didn't."

Silence.

"Iroh thinks... maybe Fire Lord Sozin made that happen. So he'd have an excuse." Toph winced. "I couldn't believe they'd buy it. I know Aang. But... Aang's just one airbender, a kid, and..." She clenched small fists.

"And maybe the Fire Nation knew the others just enough to believe it," Xiu said, voice leaden. "Oh, Oma and Shu..."

Hakoda fixed his attention on Toph. "You seem to have talked to Iroh a lot."

"Yeah," Toph admitted, bracing herself. "So now I'm gonna take my lumps like a warrior ought to, Chief Hakoda. I didn't lie to you. But I did keep secrets."

A couple of the other men chuckled a little, and looked like they wanted to tell the little girl to scurry off. Sokka glared at them.

Hakoda kept his gaze on Toph. "What secrets?"

"I knew Zuko wasn't after Aang anymore."

Say whaaaat? Sokka almost yelped.

Hakoda considered her carefully. "You're Aang's friend, but that doesn't make you subject to our judgment."

"Yeah," Toph nodded, acknowledging the warning. "But I am Aang's friend, and Sokka and Katara's, too. So you need to know what I did to help them out. I am Toph Bei Fong, of the Bei Fong family, and when we make a deal? It's a deal. And you need to know what that means now, or we're all gonna end up in another mess."

"Well said," Bato approved. Glanced at Hakoda, a speaking brow raised.

"All right," Hakoda allowed. "How long have you known?"

"Since he woke up," Toph said bluntly. "Though, you know, him going after Azula to let us get away was kind of a clue." She shrugged. "We did make a deal. Like I told Sokka. But Zuko asked me to let you guys think he was still after Aang. He knew you were mixed up with the Army. And if they found out the Dragon of the West was here - well, you saw. So Sparky figured the best thing he could do was play target. 'Cause if you were worried about Zuko grabbing the Avatar, you weren't thinking about Iroh."

"He was really helping," Sokka said in disbelief. Sure, he'd figured out Zuko had shreds of a real person in there when it came to Iroh, but - whoa. "No games. No tricks. He was really trying to get Aang better." He flung up his hands, utterly confused. "Just because he promised you?"

"Because I asked," Toph said bluntly. "Like he asked me to help get Appa back. He stuck his neck out and found us, Sokka. When he knew we could bring the Dai Li down on them. 'Cause he knew Long Feng and the generals were setting up for another North Pole mess." She paused, frowning a little. "And... because he's got a plan."

Zuko has a plan? Oh man, that didn't sound good. "A plan for what?" Sokka asked, suspicious. "He can't bring Aang home. Azula's the heir. What else can he do?" And why do I have this awful feeling I'm about to find out?

"I don't know," Toph admitted. "Iroh never got a chance to tell me. He didn't want Katara trying to wreck it. But I think-" She hesitated. "You're not the only guys who ran into spirits."

Sokka felt his jaw drop. "Something tried to eat Amaya..."

"And Zuko helped the Dai Li stop it," Toph nodded soberly. "We talked, going to get Appa. A lot." She tilted her head toward Hakoda. "Zuko knows the world's out of whack. Iroh tried to save the Moon. I don't know what they're gonna do, but... it's not going to hurt us. And it might help."

"So despite everything, you still trust them," Hakoda concluded. "That's very honest."

"Well... not all the way," Toph admitted. "There's something else I know about Zuko." Her face turned fierce. "But that's private. Zuko's business. Nobody else's."

Thoughtfully, Hakoda nodded. "I think we can live with that."

Toph started. "You can?"

"You didn't lie," Hakoda said plainly. "You didn't tell all of the truth, but what you left out - well. I won't say I like it, that you claim Zuko as a friend..."

Toph glared.

"But if he has kept his word to you - I suppose that's all we can ask of the Fire Nation," Hakoda frowned. "Colonel Mohe has decided he'll be sending a messenger after all. If we want to avoid Ba Sing Se's answer, we should be gone not long after he is. Even if that puts us on the water after dark."

"What's wrong with sailing at night?" Sokka asked, confused.

"Nothing these past few days," Bato said practically. "But for weeks now... let's just say, I feel a bit bad about scaring your grandmother."

Toph stiffened almost as much as he did. "You've been seeing spirits?" Sokka demanded.

"We're not sure what we've been seeing," Hakoda admitted. "It started not long after the moon went dark. And it comes with a wind from the north..."

The Unagi is screaming, Lángxuě told himself, running into the teeth of the north wind. You should be running the other way.

Other way, heck; he shouldn't even be out here this close to sunset. That's what Sugi Village's elders had decided. That's what every other adult waterbender had decided, once they'd found the first tattered, noseless, earless corpse washed ashore. Children weren't supposed to go near the water alone. After dark, never.

If I wasn't alone, I wouldn't be going! Damn it, Sāoluàn...

Sometimes, he really hated being bad luck.

Not that anybody said that. Not outside of a few muscle-bound older boys he'd left frozen behind houses. And one or two of the girls who'd thought it was funny that a boy was trying to figure out his mother's katana, instead of the waterbender's longsword - before Sāoluàn had taken him under her... um, arm... and shown him a thing or two.

No. It was all in what the rest of the village didn't say, for years. After old Shanxuě had taken his family out to fish and only one half-grown waterbending grandson had washed up alive...

Waterbenders weren't supposed to be alone. Everyone knew that. So he'd been passed from house to house, every last one expecting him to eventually feel grateful, to feel like family-

But they weren't. They weren't Dad, or Mom, or Grandpa, or Little Sister. They weren't.

And only Sāoluàn never seemed surprised to blink herself awake and find him curled up in a corner, in her little shack in Hard Luck Cove. "Hey, little Captain," she'd stretch and yawn, "think we can find some breakfast before we spar?"

Damn it, when he found Sāoluàn - drunk, of course, she was always drunk after one of those idiotic fishermen's Pai Sho games - he was going to-

Don't say it. Don't even think it. You know what spirits can do with a death wish; you know what's loose out there...

-He was going to yell at her. A lot. And then wait until she woke up. And bang pots together.

Vengeance planned, he kept running.

Still be at the game, please still be at the game, Sāoluàn, be away from the water...

Well. She was. Almost.

He crested the hill to a serpent's scream and a crash of shattering wood, like ship-timbers shivering in a gale. Cove waves slapped pink in the wind, scattering and splintering the little boats of fishermen who lived and worked here, away from the main harbor and the shadow of Kyoshi's memory. Lapped up, sloshing toward the fish-stained shack that served as tavern, game-spot and home of the biggest fish stories on the island-

Red and white and blue-purple crashed down, the incredible length of an Unagi shattering the little shack in a desperate bid to escape. A writhing crimson-blotched mass clung to the great serpent's neck, corpse-white head digging deep, blood trickling away.

Red and white and huge, Lángxuě realized, stunned. Too big to be real. Too greedily sucking blood to be anything else.

Jùréngzhì.

Just a story. Most of the time. Though everyone knew sometimes people died in the water... and didn't drown. And everyone knew the signs.

But it shouldn't be here, no one had offended the Ocean this much. No one could have! Even Suki leading the young Kyoshi Warriors into the war - that should have just upset spirits over there, not here...

Lángxuě stared at the writhing monsters, and wondered when the heavy sword on his back had turned into a laughable toothpick.

Please don't let that blood be hers. La, Tui, please...

Green caught a fading glimmer of sunset off the water, as a uniformed woman dragged a dazed fisherman from the wreckage.

Letting out an explosive breath of relief, Lángxuě bolted that way. He'd know that light-brown hair anywhere. Not the shade, not in this light - but the way its owner tossed it impatiently back, with no headband to hold it-

"Higher ground," he heard Sāoluàn swearing, fisherman draped across her shoulder. "Got to get to - whoa!"

He didn't look. Just turned and yanked, the Unagi's wild streams of water whipping away from his friend to coil in a pillar of ice between her and thrashing flesh.

The leech writhed, and ice splintered.

But he'd reached them now, bracing the fisherman's other side so they could all move faster. Well... trying to.

Damn it, I hate being short!

A problem Sāoluàn kept saying would fix itself - but he was thirteen. Shouldn't he be at least a little taller by now?

"Anyone else with you?" Sāoluàn still smelled of sake, but she didn't sound drunk. At all. Didn't sound like her normal, easygoing self either. This was the Sāoluàn almost no one else recognized; the Kyoshi Warrior, who faced him when they sparred. It made him want to stand straighter just to hear it.

That, or hide. If Sāoluàn was serious - this was bad.

"I don't think so," Lángxuě answered, trying to match her steady tone. Even if he had to take two steps to her one. "They finally stopped arguing, and now all the grownup benders are in a sweat lodge."

"They're what?" Sāoluàn sputtered, still dragging.

"Ritual purification to address the Ocean and divine the source of his wrath," Lángxuě said dryly. "If it goes wrong, they're probably going to blame it on me."

"Ritual purification," Sāoluàn repeated, deliberately ignoring any reference to his luck. "Address the spirits properly." Her voice had an edge. "Great. Great timing, guys..."

"Somebody has to!" Lángxuě protested, as they got above the surge line and sat their groaning burden down. "You know a jùréngzhì means the sea spirits are ticked off!"

"Anybody with eyes within two miles can see that." Sāoluàn stared at the struggling giants, her generous mouth an uncharacteristic hard line. "Why couldn't they just purify half the benders? And get the rest out here to do something?"

"That's not how it works!" Lángxuě argued. "You know the spirit-tales. The whole village has to do it, or it won't work. Even one person sneaking out..." He swallowed dryly.

"So we're screwed anyway, hmm, little Captain?" Sāoluàn smiled wryly. "Just my luck."

No, Lángxuě thought. Not yours. Mine. I'm sorry...

"Have to stop it," the fisherman groaned, reaching for a hook that wasn't there.

"Rhun, you're drunk," Sāoluàn scolded him.

Lángxuě couldn't help snorting.

"Well, I know I'm drunk," she said primly. "And I'm not concussed."

"Have to," Rhun insisted, as some of his braver and more nimble fellows swarmed in to help, pulling them all a bit higher above the surf. "Unagi's ours! Can't let some squishy blob eat it..."

"Damn it, the man's right," one of the graybeards growled. "Who's going to keep the Fire Navy out if that thing eats Unagi? Suki took all the real warriors off to the continent... er."

"Don't hold back, Chow," Sāoluàn chuckled, just a little bitter. "Tell me what you really think." Pale blue eyes narrowed, as the Unagi let out another whistling scream. "Damn, it's just as ugly as the last one. And bigger."

"The last one?" Lángxuě repeated, eyes wide.

"Ooooh, yeah," Sāoluàn gusted. "Oh, my little Captain... nobody ever told you why all the real warriors are Suki's age?" She grinned a little, and ruffled his black hair. "Nah, they wouldn't have. And you were hurting too bad to wonder. Nobody wanted to talk about what happened, six years back. That time, the wind was from the south..."

Wind from the south. The wind out of nowhere, that had shattered his family's ship, and driven the waves to a frothing hunger not all his father's waterbending could calm. Wind and waves he'd somehow ridden to shore, knowing something out there wanted him, he was just too small to see... "What happened?"

"Later," Sāoluàn said firmly. "Chow, we need nets. And harpoons. And fire-"

Leech jaws sank deeper, and the Unagi made a desperate lunge up the shore. But not far enough. The leech's blood-spotted white tail uncoiled, tree-thick, slapping water into a boiling fury-

The cove foamed, and a tsunami crashed down.

Ice. Use ice, float, grab the shore, don't let it suck you out-!

The teenager breached the surface with a gasp, ice a solid boat under him to ride the waves-
Shattered against rocks with a bone-jarring thump.

...Ow.

Waves retreated, dragging the weakening Unagi with them. And-

Lángxuě saw wet green, steel flashing, and felt his heart freeze.

"Come on, you bastard!" Sāoluàn taunted, desperately trying to get back to shore. Aware, by her glances, that half a dozen flailing fishermen had been sucked into the water with her; far easier targets, even if they were lighter without the armor awash in salt water. "Little brother wasn't enough to do the job? Bite me!"

Never touch the sea when the Ocean is angry, elders said. Never.

But he already had. And that was Sāoluàn out there.

If this works, you're only going to get one shot.

He took his stance. Gauged the angles. Fixed in his mind where splotched white was, and where steel flashed. And shoved fear back into a dark corner of his mind, to deal with later.

Fear lets sea-spirits get you. Get angry.

Another heartbeat to judge, and he leapt-

Landed, shoving out and down.

Sāoluàn's yelp had a distinct note of glee, as his wave swept her into shore. Bloodstained jaws tore free with the opposing wave, letting the Unagi squirm free-

Blind, those jaws swung toward him like a lodestone, hissing in fury.

Lángxuě ran for it, praying his wave would carry Sāoluàn in far enough. Praying he could outrun the tide soaking his sandals.

The leech howled like lost souls, and a boiling sea swept over him.

Damn it, if I'd just been faster...

He landed hard. On stone.

What the heck?

"Oh, my." An elderly face swam into view; upside down, but with long white mustaches that couldn't be mistaken for anything else. "So many visitors we are having, these days."

"What - how - where?" Bewildered, Lángxuě got to his knees, feeling the reassuring weight of steel on his back. And then reassuring arms, catching him in a familiar hug.

Mom. Dad.

...I guess I'm dead.

I can't be dead! Sāoluàn needs me, I have to-

"Hey there."

Sāoluàn's training took over; he flipped out of warm arms, landing poised, sword drawn and aimed at that deadly, crackling accent. "Get away from us!"

"Whoa. Whoa!" Empty hands, despite the red and black armor. A dark-haired topknot, caught back with a gold ornament Lángxuě didn't recognize, and a wry, friendly smile that didn't ever belong on a Fire Nation face. "Easy. We're all friends here." He chuckled. "Even if some of us haven't met in... a while."

Silent, Lángxuě turned the blade; the blatant threat Sāoluàn called back off, or be sushi.

"Perhaps this was a mistake," the elderly man in yellow and orange sighed.

"The mistake was made after Yangchen died," the firebender said practically. "Just because you don't like your people's past, Gyatso, doesn't mean you can run away from it." He winced. "I hate to do this to you, kid. But we're out of options... and the spirits have finally figured out we're running out of time." Serious gold met sea-green. "Hyourin - wake up."

The world reeled.

Hyourin. I'm...

I'm Lángxuě. But... I was Hyourin, and... "Kaze," Lángxuě breathed, lowering his blade. He didn't remember, not much - but he could feel. Old friend. It's been so long. "What... why?"

"Long story," the firebender said frankly, letting out a breath of relief. "Short version? We stopped them. Died doing it. But Koh squirmed free like the centipede-leech he is, and... things went wrong." He rolled his eyes. "And when the other spirits tried to fix it? They forgot one tiny detail." Kaze met his gaze soberly. "For over a thousand years, there haven't been any spirit-healers."

Oh. Oh, that... he could think of hundreds of Sāoluàn's curses, and only his parents' ears kept him from using them all. "Damn," Lángxuě breathed. No spirit-healers meant no one to patch the damage done when a spirit gifted a yāorén. Which meant anyone who blundered into the wounds and good heart needed to counterbalance the Avatar would have maybe a season's span before the strain tore them apart. Or less. "I'm screwed."

"Lángxuě," Dad reproved.

Mom thumped him lightly on the back of his head. "Our boy's headed for trouble. If a young man can't swear then, when can he?"

"You can make it. If you're fast," Kaze said honestly. "There are two, now. Maybe three, if Shirong learns fire fast... But you're going to have to find them. And they've got trouble like you wouldn't believe."

"Trouble?" Lángxuě said warily. Just because he couldn't remember what Kaze had dragged him into years past, didn't mean he couldn't figure out that sinking feeling of oh brother.

"Aim for Gaipan, and north," Kaze said, avoiding the question. "Trust me, you'll hear enough on the way to figure it out." He smiled sadly. "I really am sorry. If this works out, you'll help save my family. And..." He shook his head.

Sheathing his sword, Lángxuě hugged his parents tightly, drinking in the feel of them to hold until... oh, spirits, until. Took a deep breath, and looked up. Gyatso's air. Kaze, fire. Mom and Dad, earth and water. Yeah, I see where this is going.

And he didn't like it. Guides of the four nations meant an emergency, meant no other yāorén was there to gentle the first touch of another power on your spirit. Not that it was ever gentle...

A yāorén can fight what a bender can't. Even the Ocean's rage. "Get me back fast enough to fry that bastard before it eats Sāoluàn, and you don't have to be sorry for anything."

"That, would be the other thing I'm sorry about," Kaze winced again.

"Why?" Lángxuě said suspiciously. Kaze had taught a startled young waterbender fire, lives ago; just as Mi Noh had taught Kaze air. He could feel Agni waiting nearby; a glint of sunlight through temple windows, a breath of warmth across his cheek. Just as he could feel La in the fountain splashing rooms away...

And she was there, moonlight and flowing robes and a kind face he'd never seen before. "My brother must yield his claim on you. It is the only way to convince the one who seeks you that we mean what our young yāorén promised Avatar Yangchen. That the balance will be restored, no matter the cost."

Young yāorén? "You stuck some other poor bastard with this job?" Lángxuě blurted out. "What'd he ever do to you?"

La eyed him, face shadowed with gentle reproof.

"Sorry," Lángxuě said guiltily. "But - at least I can feel what it was like to have to hold the world together. If he's just started..."

"My cousin's ready for it. Trust me." Kaze's smile was proud. "It's going to drive him crazy... but he can do it."

"I hope so. For all of us." Lángxuě shook his head. Not Agni. Oma and Shu are a pair, so- oh.

Yeah. He had pleaded to be faster.

"My brother must yield you up," La repeated, determined. "But you are still mine."

The touch of her hand was snow and night and starlight.

When he could breathe again, the light had changed. Clearer, with the slant he knew meant autumn, though the mortal world was still edging into summer. La still glowed before him, but she was looking at the monk, eyes sad... and implacable as winter. "The balance must be restored."

"I raised Aang, and loved him, and did all I could to protect him from elders who saw only the Avatar, and not a boy," Gyatso said sadly. "And you would have me break his heart?"

"The rising tide must also fall. The calm must have the storm."

"I know that look in a man's eyes. Hyourin is a killer!"

"The wind cuts the mountain, and must be cut. How many did Kyoshi slay?"

"You cannot hold Aang responsible for-" Gyatso drew a breath, sidestepping the trap. "What you would do would unleash still more bloodshed. Not here, not now - but sooner or later, there would be murder once more. Death the most honored Yangchen gave her life to stop!"

"If that's what you think we all died to stop," Kaze said levelly, "then you missed the whole point. Air is freedom."

Grim, Gyatso shook his head. "I have devoted my life to peace, and only one brief hour to war. I will not help you."

"Are you nuts?" Kaze sputtered. "This is why the Earth Kingdom let you get creamed, you-"

"If he won't help, he won't," Lángxuě said bluntly. "You're here."

"...Good point."

For the first time, Gyatso looked alarmed. "Your young prince needed four-"

"Kaze is yāorén. Humans may have forgotten what that means. We have not." She turned toward the windows, and the endless blue sky. "Autumn lord. Storm lord. You are welcome here-"

Blue swept him away.

"Breathe, little Captain," Sāoluàn panted, dripping; knees weak, limbs like lead, listening for a heartbeat that just wasn't there. "Damn it, don't you die on me, I've had too damn many people die on me..."

She ignored the hissing behind her, the slosh of waves as a house-sized mass of flesh advanced. She'd barely had the strength to drag them both to the edge of the angry surf. She'd never be able to run now.

Focus. There was his heart, and there was his sternum, and - damn it, the stories said sometimes this worked...

Winding up, she thumped his chest. Hard.

A choking cough, and Lángxuě sucked in breath, sea-green blinking wide. "Sāoluàn... move!"

She smiled, bittersweet. Move, and let it have him instead? Too many of her war-sisters had already died that way. Sorry, Captain. No.

Cursing a blue streak, Lángxuě thrust his hand out-

Water chimed into ice, loud as frost-shattering bells.

Jaw dropped, Sāoluàn looked behind her. Oh, my...

The leech writhed in the midst of an iceberg, twitching ice into water an inch at a time. Caught, for now; but let it squirm even the tip of a tail free to boil the sea once more-

"Help me up," Lángxuě whispered.

Yeah, good idea, we should book it, Sāoluàn thought, pulling him to shaky feet. "Let's go-"

Lángxuě drew his sword.

"We need to go," Sāoluàn protested.

"They've forgotten," her little waterbender said grimly. "Everyone's forgotten. The longsword is water. The saber, earth. Paired swords are fire, steel for the dragons' claws. But the katana..."

He raised his blade, and Sāoluàn stumbled back.

"Hai!"

Winter wind struck like a sword, like a hammer; shattering ice and flesh and spirit-taint in one rush of glacial chill.

Blinking away frost, Sāoluàn caught him as he fell.

"Jaws," Lángxuě managed, weary as if he'd arm-wrestled the monster down. "Tell Chow... get the jaws. Break them. Burn them."

"I'll tell him," she nodded, hand on his as he gripped steel like grim death. "I'll handle it. You rest." Oh spirits, kid. If that was - what I think - oh, Oma and Shu, you are in so much trouble.

Sea-green narrowed at her, and one hand came up to grab her uniform. "Don't you ever give up again. Hear me? Not ever."

"I won't," she promised. Trying not to shiver, as ice spread through soaked armor.

"Good," he muttered, finally relaxing into her hold. "Gotta look after each other. Big sister..."

Out like a light. Breathing deep, Sāoluàn sheathed his icy sword. Scooped up the little waterbender, and headed for Chow.

Fishermen scattered out of her path like sparrow-keets.

Chow was made of sterner stuff. A bit. But then, Chow was one of the few people who realized she was never quite as drunk as she looked. "You heard him," Sāoluàn said bluntly. "Break and burn the jaws. If Ocean's decided we've paid enough, it'll be over. If he doesn't - you should have some breathing space before a new leech can get big enough to start munching again."

"We should?" Chow said warily.

Sāoluàn snorted. "You think the Fire Prince would have ever showed up here if people didn't talk? He can't stay. The island can't risk it." She eyed him. "And I'm not going to stand by and watch while the village blames him for surviving. Again."

Chow at least had the decency to look guilty with his relief. "You can't take him from..."

"From who?" Sāoluàn said angrily. "Damn it, Chow! Everybody sees a waterbender. Nobody sees a kid. He has to haunt a washed-up Warrior's shack just to get someplace to cry!" She shook her head, feeling Lángxuě breathe against her breast. "We're going."

"Where?"

Sāoluàn grinned, thinking of the short list of things she'd have to pack. Including one Pai Sho set... and the rumors of the Grand Lotus that had come with the last game. "Now that's... a secret!"

I hate secrets, Mai thought, almost scowling. Brush-maker Tu might be tall and lean where General Iroh was short and... not. But otherwise? There was something about him all too familiar. "I can't wait that long for delivery."

"Our normal sources of supply have been... upset," Tu said regretfully. "A few more days might clarify many things."

"I don't think anything from outside the city would be of high enough quality to justify the wait," Mai said levelly. I don't care if you are the general's contact. He won't be coming back here. Not when Azula has whole Army divisions to call on for backup. He'll wait until she leaves the city. And Min won't last that long.

She didn't know what Azula had done after she left. But given Min was now in a metal cell, Azula looked smug, and Ty Lee was biting her fingernails - it couldn't be good.

Damn you, Zuko. And damn Iroh for getting to you. Covering the Avatar's escape wasn't worth your life!

"Ah, I see," Tu sighed. "The lady is a connoisseur... hmm. Perhaps something less on the cutting edge of fashion, and more classic? I have some valuable antiques."

Mai tried not to roll her eyes, looking over sets of matched hair ornaments and brushes; all fit for a formal Earth Kingdom poetry competition, in which the presentation of the writer was as important to victory as the poem itself. Ty Lee might have enjoyed dressing up like a Kyoshi Warrior, but she preferred her own hairstyle...

Wait. What did he just say?

Looking over jade-tipped ornaments again, she made her choice. "I'll take this one."

Walking into the city night, Mai almost shuddered at how normal the streets seemed. Odashu didn't give up this easily, she thought, nodding to a soldier on komodo-rhino back as she passed through the palace gates. They fought. And when they couldn't fight anymore, they fell back. Brave. Sane.

These people... Long Feng beat half the life out of them before we ever got here.

The shadow of a wry smile flickered over her lips. She could hate Azula for using her. She definitely hated the princess for arranging Zuko's death.

But damned if the princess wasn't a true heir of Sozin's line.

Destroy your enemies. And from the ashes, build our nation stronger than ever.

After all, wasn't that what she meant to do herself? Azula wasn't the only one who could recognize the Dai Li's deadly skill. Min wanted it to defend his city, his family. A worthy and honorable goal. But if all the hints she'd gathered were accurate, his family meant to leave Ba Sing Se for Jinhai's sake. And if his loyalty to them was stronger than his ties to the city, then maybe...

Azula brought the walls down. You paid for that in blood. Take it, and burn free!

A brave hope. And a foolhardy one. But she clung to it anyway. Anything less would paralyze her with the knowledge she meant to defy Azula...

Better dead than caught. No doubt of it.

Min is already caught. I will not let this stand.

Face coolly disinterested, Mai descended into the dungeons.

The pair of Dai Li blocking the way were no surprise. "Why do you want to visit the prisoner?"

"He helped me avoid disgracing myself when I wasn't feeling well," Mai said levelly. "I thought I'd return the favor." She swept a cold gaze over them. "Unless you want him biting through his own veins before Princess Azula decides she's done with him?"

They were too well trained to flinch. But the one on the left looked... a little less than certain. "Has that happened?"

"Around the princess? Not yet, as far as I know," Mai said candidly. "It used to be a problem for the Fire Lord, before he gave the prison wardens strict orders." She shrugged slightly, letting her surety in her uncle's tales speak for itself. "She's the Fire Lord's heir. I'm sure more people will realize what that means now."

They searched her. She'd expected that, and handed over her obvious knives without more protest than a silent snarl. The less obvious ones she'd left in her quarters, even if it did make her feel half-dressed. No sense provoking a more intimate search.

Still a little pale, they opened the door.

Agni, he looks so small.

Steel clanged shut behind her, and Min finally looked up. Green eyes went wide with shock, followed hard by anger, and fear-

Mai let him cling to her, chains chiming with every shiver. "Breathe," she whispered. "Just breathe."

Shuddering gasps, and Min bent his head against her shoulder, breathing in something other than his own fear. "My family - she said-"

"She doesn't have them," Mai said levelly. "I know her. You'd know by now if she did." Because she couldn't resist showing you to each other. Before she started with the fire.

"She said - they're loyal to General Iroh, she's going to kill them..."

A chill ran down Mai's spine. "Tell me what she said. Exactly."

"She said-" Min shivered, obviously fighting past terror to think. "She said she couldn't take me, because I had someone else's strength. My parents. That they had to be loyal to the general, I don't understand..."

"Fire feeds fire," Mai stated. "Your spirit is tied to your parents. Your clan. We're stronger together than separated. Strongest of all, loyal to a great name." Strength she no longer had to draw on... but it didn't matter. She wouldn't let it.

Zuko lasted through three years of exile. I can do this. I have to.

"If you can face her and not crumble, and you don't even know what you're doing... it'd take a strong firebender to lend you that strength," Mai went on. "The Dragon of the West could do it. Not many others."

"She said I was old enough to head a clan," Min blurted out.

Mai froze. No. She wouldn't.

"How can anyone want that as... they're just kids, they never did anything, and-" Min shuddered. "She said she'd leave me alive. With just her to..." He shook his head, wordless with horror.

"No wonder Ty Lee's upset," Mai murmured, mind racing. Granted, a concussion could make the most iron control slip. But Azula wouldn't indulge in something this vicious without a reason.

A whole host of reasons. Including the Earth King.

Taking the city was good, but nothing matched having the city's ruler in chains for the Fire Lord to grind under his heel. More, the very fact Kuei had escaped meant there was still a viable threat to the Fire Nation lurking in this city. That was Azula's real target. Kuei would just be a bonus.

Destroy an incipient rebellion, capture the Earth King, and crush Shirong, Mai calculated. All she has to do is panic someone enough to try to rescue Min, and she has them all...

Mai swallowed hard, realization seeping into her veins like ice water. And if no one tries... she has us all anyway.

Azula had set the scene. Deliberately used her fire and her cruelty to deliver a threat no clan could ignore. All of Min's spirit must be screaming for help-

Yet only a very, very few people would know why that help must not come.

She knows. Agni, I don't know how she knows - but she knows.

"Mai?" Min touched the side of her face, worry for her beating back even the terror, for a little while. "Are you all right?"

"The Dai Li are good," Mai whispered. "I never saw anyone following me." Agni, by now they have Tu-

No. No, they wouldn't have picked him up yet. Not when he'd as much as said some of his more talented contacts would need a few days to show up. Azula wouldn't be satisfied with just Mai and one subversive shopkeeper. She'd want the whole network. Gift-wrapped, to make the victory she presented to the Fire Lord full and complete. Perfect. As that mess at Omashu... hadn't been.

Naive, maybe. But Min wasn't stupid. He added her words up, and paled.

But then he looked down, and breathed. Not the linking of air and chi and muscle she'd seen in firebenders, a hair's breadth from leaping into battle. This was slower, deliberate; chi rooted through spine and feet to sink into the very earth's heart.

Min raised his head, green frightened, but holding steady. "Never give up without a fight."

"So I hear," Mai said deliberately. Reached into her hair, to pull out the one ornament not pinning any black locks into place. Twisted the lacquered stick to part along an invisible line, and poured a gray coil of diamond-wire into his hands.

Min's jaw dropped. He glanced up at her, a thousand questions springing to his lips... and dying, unspoken.

Mai smiled wryly. Of course the Dai Li had searched her for bits of earth and stone. Of course they'd seen the jade subtly topping her ornaments. And of course they'd search again, on the way out, even if the amount of stone was so small you'd need to be the Avatar's own earthbending teacher to be dangerous with it. But all of it would be there when she left... and they'd only be able to report one more opportunity for treason passed blithely by.

Just subtle bits of jade. Just enough to shimmer in an earthbender's senses as stone... and hide the knife-dust of diamond on wire. Wire that could cut through even the best steel, given time.

"Never give up," Mai agreed. "I'll be back."

I don't know what I'll do, not yet. But I'll be back.

Mind deliberately elsewhere as the Dai Li searched her again, Mai considered her next move. And allowed herself one brief instant of self-pity. If there was ever a time she could have used one retired, tea-drinking, kooky general...

Agni and friendship had let her take back her loyalty and survive. The rest was up to her.

First, find out what Ty Lee knows, Mai decided. She thinks that Water Tribe boy is cute, of all things. I know she can't hate Min enough to let Azula do... that.

Not that Ty Lee would want to go against Azula. But sometimes you could do a lot, by not doing anything.

Ty Lee, then Quan, Mai thought. To see if Azula had broken him... or if he still had the guts to try the impossible.

I am a child of fire. Impossible just means no one's done it yet.

Head high, Mai walked.

"Impossible," Captain Jee muttered under his breath, staring at the map of Ba Sing Se's environs spread across the wardroom table.

Not quiet enough, Teruko winced, seeing the prince's gaze flick past Sadao to her captain. Sometime she'd have to admit to Jee just why a marine like herself slept with a pillow over her head. People were a lot louder than they realized.

Jee caught the glance, and grimaced. "We can't fit three thousand people on this ship. We'd be lucky to pack in a third of them! Add in the supplies we'll need - we won't have a better chance to seize them later, General, I don't care how many contacts you have. I may be just a saltwater idiot who wouldn't know which end of a potato-choke to plant facing up, but I know logistics. My wife-" His voice barely caught. "The Home Guard is involved in establishing new colonies, too. Even if everything goes right, if your report on the area does mean arable land and we can draw enough farmers to feed those of us who aren't - the first crops always take time. And as soon as people realize we're really trying to do what the prince has proposed... well, we could be under siege from all directions. Meaning we need to put in more labor on fortifications, and less on feeding everyone. We need to pack this ship with everything we can get our hands on, or those we do get out won't last the first winter."

"All true," Iroh allowed. "Patience, Captain. When we first made our plans, Suzuran's capabilities were not among them." He eyed his nephew. And waited.

Studying the map, Zuko picked up a scrap of discarded notes. "This would be our plans." He let it quiver in the palm of his hand. "This would be our plans with Azula there."

Even half expecting it, Teruko flinched when it burst into flames.

"I think we can still use some of what we came up with," the prince went on, brushing the ash away. "The problem is that once people start moving, we'd have to get them all out at once. Another commander might let groups slip away without a citywide crackdown, but as long as Azula's there..." He frowned, thinking.

Jee sighed, and looked pointedly at the general.

Who smiled, and shook his head slightly. "You forget, Captain. Azula knows I am alive. And she has studied my tactical manuals most thoroughly. She will expect me to act against her, and she will anticipate plans I may make." Iroh paused. "But she believes my nephew is dead."

Teruko blinked. Good point. Tactical geniuses could do that, she'd heard; read the opposing commander's mind across the battlefield from the smallest of clues. Move and countermove until somebody guessed wrong, and then-

"We need to do something stupid," the prince muttered.

Jee eyed him, gray brows lowered like thunderclouds.

"You don't know my sister," Zuko said honestly. "She has to be perfect. Everything has to be under control, all the time. Her control. She wants the best around her. So if we're going to dock at Ba Sing Se, where people are going to see us, but not have her see us, we need to look..."

"Incompetent?" Jee said dryly.

"Marginal," Zuko said firmly. "Incompetent makes us target practice. We have to look like Suzuran's record. A bunch of rejects, just managing to pull off the mission. And it's going to be worst for you, Captain. We have to assume she knows who was on the Wani."

Teruko shook her head, still trying to catch up. "You want us to go in right in plain sight?"

"Nobody deserts and lives," Zuko said wryly. "Everyone knows that." He swept pale gold across them all. "Why not? Shirong's a rogue Dai Li; what better prisoner to bring back for the Fire Lord? We don't try to take everyone, we take the people who can't make it overland. The ones we're going to need with us. We take the supplies we need; if we're heading west with prisoners, of course we're going to stock up so we can head back to the Fire Lord without stopping. Just another loyal ship in the service. Delivering critical, need-to-know information about the channels we used to get to Ba Sing Se without getting hit by mines... and the last reported location of the Water Tribe fleet."

Somebody's still mad about almost getting squashed, Teruko smirked to herself. Well, good. The rest of the fleet near Chameleon Bay would be reporting where they'd dropped out of communications, and someone would spot Hakoda's fleet eventually. Better to report it first, and look virtuously innocent.

Fingers interlaced with absent nervousness, Sadao looked at their captain. "Sir?"

"It could work," Jee said thoughtfully. "Jeong Jeong, a scant few others... but no Fire Navy ship has ever deserted. Technically we haven't either, not that the princess will care for details..."

"It will work for a time," Iroh corrected. "Azula will soon realize something is not right."

"Maybe we want her to." The prince took a steadying breath. "Don't plan to deceive the enemy based on what you want them to think. Plan on what you want them to do. Right? We've got plans to get people out of Ba Sing Se, but they won't work if Azula's there." He met his uncle's gaze. "So what if she finds out I'm alive?"

"Risky," Iroh murmured. "We must think on this."

"Ah, sirs? There's something else we've got to think about," Sadao offered. "If we set up a domain outside the Fire Lord's loyalty - won't that violate Avatar Kyoshi's decree?"

Teruko blanched. Even Byakko gave the Fire Lord loyalty, much as Lady Kotone had to grit her teeth to do it. The consequences otherwise, in the luck of the world ranked against them...

"In point of fact," Iroh mused, "it will not."

All eyes fixed on him. Teruko felt the room hold its breath.

"By Kyoshi's own words, an exile is beyond the Fire Lord's authority." Iroh's gentle smile reminded Teruko far too much of Shidan's. Just before he cut someone apart. "She never said an exile could not hold a domain."

Yeah. Definitely a lot of dragon on that side of the family, Teruko thought. Damn it all, no wonder the prince was such a mess. Grandma Tatsuki said half of knowing your family tree was making sure you didn't end up with too much dragon in the family. Stories said dragon-children married humans. That they were supposed to. And if Lady Ursa hadn't...

Fix mess later, Teruko told herself. Planning now.

And part of those plans meant unobtrusively following the prince back to the visiting officers' quarters after they hashed out the first attempts at assaulting Ba Sing Se. And waiting for him to admit he noticed her.

It took following him right into his cabin before he cracked. "Lieutenant..."

"Sorry, sir," Teruko said politely. "You're going to be stuck with me."

"You have marines to look after."

"Sergeant Kyo will handle that," Teruko said levelly. "Sir. In case you hadn't noticed, you are not expendable."

"My uncle-"

"May have been listed as a traitor but is not an exile," Teruko said bluntly. "If he rules the domain - a domain that won't answer to the Fire Lord, that can't - we walk right into the teeth of Kyoshi's vengeance. You've been up against an Avatar since winter, sir. You know what that means." She grinned wryly. "You're probably driving Agni to drink just keeping you alive."

The young prince ran that logic through in his mind, and deflated. "Damn it."

"Sorry, sir," Teruko said ruefully. And meant it. Nobody ought to get stuck with a mess like this.

But he's a great name. This is what they're trained for. What they're born for.

"I've lived without luck all my life," Zuko said, half to himself. "I forget sometimes... most people don't."

"Get some sleep, sir," Teruko advised. "Things always look better in the morning."

"Not always," the prince muttered, laying a few folded documents on a writing tray. "Go ahead, Lieutenant. I'll turn in when I'm done."

Oh, sure you will... One of the written phrases caught her eye, and Teruko swallowed hard. So testified to by I who have met the spirit of the dead... "Sir. Is that what I think it is?"

"It's all I can do."

"Sir?" Teruko asked warily. That pain in his voice; anger and grief and an awful understanding...

"Have you ever screwed up?" the prince said, almost soundless. "I mean, really screwed up. So bad that-" He cut himself off.

This is serious. "A couple times," Teruko said honestly. "Remind me to tell you why a dozen taverns won't let me set foot inside."

"I wish I'd just burned the place down."

Teruko's eyes narrowed. Okay, this is very bad. "You weren't gone an hour, and you didn't even kill anyone," the marine protested. "Sir, what could you have possibly done?"

"I told Katara exactly how much she hated us for killing her mother," Zuko said bleakly. "And then... what she'd get to see the rest of the world do to us, once Azula took over." The scarred side of his face bent into a bitter, bitter smirk. "Find your enemy's weak spot, and hit it with everything you've got. She's a waterbender. She needs to believe her tribe loves her. And I just set her pretty little family portrait on fire."

Teenage kid, Teruko told herself. He couldn't possibly have hit anybody that hard, that bad, in just a few minutes-

Teenage dragon-child. Who'd been chasing this particular witch of a waterbender half a year. Who'd been raised by the Dragon of the West, who was legendary for devastating opponents before they even got near a battlefield.

Damn. He could have.

"And I don't know what's worse," the prince went on; still bitter, full of loathing. "If I didn't do it on purpose - Agni, no one should trust me. How can you trust a great name who draws steel without cause? And if I did..." He gripped the bridge of his nose, and let out a shuddering sigh.

"Uncle keeps telling me I'm not like him. But he's my father. I've watched him for years. I've seen how he handles the court. All the subtle words, the glances, the smile that means someone's dead, they just haven't stopped breathing yet..." He let go, turning half away. "Like stabbing one leopard-shark in a school. If they attacked her, they wouldn't be attacking us."

"Oh," Teruko said, very quietly. "Well. I don't think we have to worry about your judgment, sir. If you didn't do it on purpose, you've got damn good instincts."

"But I-"

"Sir," Teruko interrupted. Cut that off right now! "To win without fighting is the highest victory."

You turned the most dangerous opponent still standing into a liability for our enemies. You acted correctly." And if your uncle says otherwise, he and I are going to have a talk.

...Right after I get the idiot to tell you you're a dragon-child. Agni, nobody sane expects diplomacy out of you!

"I attacked the Avatar's waterbending teacher," Zuko shot back. "You think he's going to forget that?"

"Sir..." Teruko sighed. "He's the Avatar. We're Fire Nation. He's not going to treat us honorably. No matter what." She shrugged. "You were the commander on the ground. You made the call. If that's what you thought you had to do to get us out in one piece - I trust you, sir."

Which left him as dried-out speechless as Captain Jee had, giving loyalty. Damn it.

Fire Lord Ozai's an idiot. Argh.

"Though I'm kind of curious how you knew that would work," Teruko admitted. "The Water Tribes are a tight bunch. They should have gone after you, not her."

"That's the worst part," Zuko said bitterly. "That's why I have to, it's not fair... You were there. When her brother spoke against her. To us." Pale gold glittered at her. "Sokka attacked her, Lieutenant. I know what she did - but he's her brother. She's Water Tribe, she's a waterbender, and her family is hurting her for something that... wasn't all her fault. I know she hates us, but - Aang doesn't like people getting hurt, and Katara knows that. If she'd been doing it on purpose, she'd have gotten him out of there before she tried to kill us."

Made sense. Kind of. "Family. For the Water Tribes, that's a lot like clan?" Teruko ventured, digging into what she'd heard about trade with the Foggy Swamp.

"We're loyalty and power. They're family and community. But close," Zuko nodded. "She was the only waterbender in the tribe."

Teruko thought about that, and what it would have been like to be the only firebender in a village of people who didn't bend. Who couldn't feel why you had to be up to greet the dawn, why you hated the ghost hours of the night, why you could stare into flickering flames for hours and never, never get enough...

Zuko saw her shudder, and smiled bitterly. "I'd hate to have her life. My father might think I'm worthless, but at least he saw me. The failure. The hopeless firebender. The child he didn't want as heir to Sozin's legacy... and damn it, he was right."

"Sir," Teruko started to protest, alarmed.

"He was," Zuko said simply. "I don't want to conquer the world. Azula does." He breathed out, lantern flickering behind him. "He hated me, but he saw me. Chief Hakoda... he just saw his perfect little daughter, who couldn't ever hate anyone." Zuko winced. "Spirits. She must feel like she's drowning, every day..."

Teruko looked at him askance. "She did try to kill us, sir."

"I know," the prince said guiltily. "I know this isn't a spirit-tale, Lieutenant. She's not the evil sorcerer's beautiful daughter who wants to get stolen away to another world, far from all the monsters her father creates. She's Katara of the Southern Water Tribe, and if she thought I ever felt sorry for her, she'd try to rip out my heart and make me eat it."

Way, way too much dragon in there, Teruko thought ruefully.

"But she's also the Avatar's ally," Zuko said soberly. "And I just shoved in his face a part of her he never wanted to see. Either he's going to ignore it, like he ignores everything he doesn't want to deal with... or he's going to follow Sokka's lead." His fists clenched. "She's fought the whole world for that idiot! And he'd throw that away because - oh, how horrible - she actually hates her enemies."

Teruko thought that over, and nodded. "So... you think she was trying to be honorable. By Water Tribe standards."

"I'm not saying she's trustworthy," Zuko grumbled. "Just - she deserves better than I think she's going to get." He spread empty hands. "I can't fix that. But I thought, at least..." He trailed off, frustrated.

"You could show her respect," Teruko finished.

"It's not even that." The prince paced the few steps the room allowed. "It's... water and fire are different, but they're not separate. If Katara wants revenge on the whole Fire Nation, that's her problem. But if she wants justice..."

Teruko blinked, a delighted grin slowly spreading over her face. "That's right. General Iroh says the Avatar's supposed to keep a balance between the nations? You're going to rub his nose in it."

"Um..."

Teruko grinned wider. Shidan? Is going to love you. Count on it. "How can we help?"

Quiet, Katara thought, huddled on herself on the other side of the ship from where Aang splashed with Appa in the water, throwing back ripples of the early morning light. She should be keeping an eye on him. He wasn't healed yet. But Sokka was there to watch him. Along with most of her father's crew. Deliberately not watching her.

You could almost think you were alone.

Not that she'd be so lucky. Spirits; lost in an ice-field with Sokka hadn't felt this alone....

Wonder how Xiu's doing.

Xiu wouldn't be alone. The weaver had said something about idiot boyfriends, and sticking with Sergeant Bo for a while until somebody got sense knocked into them. Katara hadn't really been listening. Too busy slurping down stew and avoiding Aang's attempts to tell her how really, really cool it was not to have parents, 'cause all the monks looked after you....

Xiu had brought her the bowl. The weaver had taken Zuko's side, she wasn't a friend....

But Sokka had brought back food for Aang. Not her.

Xiu had brought her stew, and waited until Aang was distracted to lean in close. "Run," she'd whispered.

Mute, Katara had stared.

"I've seen the way he looks at you," Xiu said quietly. "He's twelve, and he's the Avatar, and spirits help us all, we know what an Avatar can do if he wants. And you're Water Tribe. You'd never give your children up." She leaned in close, voice quiet as a heartbeat. "Run."

I can't leave Aang, Katara thought; now, as then. The world needs him. And... he needs me.

But if he needed her, why was she alone?

Hesitant feet slid and stumbled along the deck, and Toph tumbled into her. "I hate wood."

"You'd probably love a Fire Nation ship," Katara muttered under her breath.

"Yeah, I would," Toph admitted, ears sharp as ever. "Metal. I could see. I hate being blind." She shuddered a little, gripping Katara's hand hard before she remembered, winced, and eased up. "Sorry."

Wood in the middle of water. There's nothing here she can bend besides her own bracers. "It's okay," Katara said, trying to drag herself out of that cold pit of alone. "You can hang onto me."

"And who are you gonna hang onto?" Toph grumbled. "Say the word, and we ditch the guys to clean up their own mess."

She couldn't have heard that right. "What?"

"You, me, over the side, ride some ice back to shore, and take off," Toph said bluntly. "You say Aang knows waterbending, and he thinks he knows earthbending - no way do we have to stick around where we're not wanted." Blind green eyes aimed her general direction. "I didn't know. I should have; Zuko said what you guys do with icebergs. I just... I never thought anybody'd want to do it to you. What I felt back there - what they said..." Pale, she clung to Katara's arm.

"Toph, I-" Katara swallowed. "I'm fine, don't worry about it-"

"Don't lie to me."

Sometimes she forgot Toph was only twelve. "I will be fine," Katara said softly. I have to be. Aang needed her father's fleet, and the world needed Aang, and... she'd do what she had to. Always.

"No you won't," Toph gulped, still clinging to her. "They hurt you. And I just let them, 'cause I couldn't fix it. Your dad had already decided. Like my dad did." She shook her head, voice quiet enough no one a foot farther away could have heard her. "All I could do was wait until Sokka hit him with that bit about Aang. Then he'd listen enough to think I was on his side-"

"You lied to my dad?" Katara hissed. And she'd thought things couldn't get any worse.

"No!" Toph looked indignant. "I told him I'd take my lumps for keeping Zuko's secret. If he thinks that means I agree with him, that's his problem."

The world tilted a little. "You... but Aang said..."

"Like I should listen to Aang about being angry?" Toph said impatiently. "After he almost flattened those sandbenders, and us, for losing Appa?" She waved a frustrated hand. "What, he's the only guy in the world who gets to blow things up bending when he gets mad?"

Katara shook her head, heart heavy. "But... this was making people feel..."

"Did you mean to?" Toph said seriously. "Listen, okay? I'm not saying, did you want Zuko dead. I kind of want to hurt a few people right now, too. But did you try to make everybody break the truce?"

Katara's gaze fell on Toph's hands; small, and still a little gritty with sand. And obviously feeling her pulse. "I... don't think so..."

"Then it's not your fault," Toph said seriously. "Your bending blew up on you. Just like that knot blew up on Zuko."

Katara saw red. "What?"

"Listen!" Toph wasn't letting go. "Katara, please!"

Please. From Toph. "If you think I'm going to believe that- he hurt Bato-"

"He was trying not to hit us!"

Alone had been washed away in one sweet rush of fury; Katara held onto the earthbender, feeling waves slap against the hull. "Oh, this had better be good," she ground out. "Why bend lightning if you don't want to kill someone?"

"It wasn't his! It's what's stuck in Aang."

Katara blinked. Replayed Toph's words in her head. Still didn't make sense. "...What?"

"I've felt Azula bend lightning," Toph said bluntly. "And I felt what Zuko did to throw it right back at her in Ba Sing Se. Azula - it's like part of the world splits apart. All the hairs on my toes stand up. Then she brings those fingers together and bam." Toph took a breath. "Zuko didn't do that. It was... it's crazy, but it felt like your water whip. He caught it and held it and his heart was so scared - he tried to put it somewhere else. Only there wasn't anywhere. He tried." She winced. "When he let me feel what he was doing, before everything blew up? I could kind of see what he was bending. That knot in Aang is big, and it's ugly, and Zuko was trying to look at it and not go near it, all at once." She shook her head. "I guess he slipped."

"Slipped?" Katara sputtered.

"It's not your fault Bato got hurt," Toph went on, determined. "You, Zuko - you're both trying to fix what Azula did. Only she's just too scary-good at hurting people." She blew out a breath, wipping away stray black hairs. "And it's not your fault Aang got hit, either."

"How can you say that?" Katara whispered, aching. I wanted to fight her. I wanted to kill her. I wanted to show the whole Fire Nation what a real waterbender could do. "If I hadn't been fighting Azula-"

"She was trying to kill you," Toph said stubbornly. "You think that doesn't happen in some rumbles? Fight managers figure those guys out quick, sure; crowds don't pay to see dead benders. But if you get caught in the ring with them first? You do what you gotta." She snorted. "Aang got zapped because Azula zapped him. End of story. And I'm not going to blame Aang for getting zapped. Much. She's scary-good with that lightning." The earthbender paused. "But running out on you in the middle of the fight? He broke your deal. You don't do that."

"I don't have a - a deal with Aang!" Katara burst out.

"Oh yes you do. We all do. Just because it's not inked down and signed, doesn't mean it's not real." Toph looked serious. "He's the Avatar. The guy the spirits say has to save the world. And we're the ones helping him do it. We're his teachers. How are we supposed to hold up our end of the deal if he won't listen?"

Katara shook away the doubt. "Airbenders don't kill-"

"Firebenders do," Toph said bluntly. "And earthbenders. And waterbenders. Is he a waterbending master or not?"

"We can't ask him to give up what he is!" Katara insisted. "He's the last Air Nomad. It'd be like - like making you spend the rest of your life on this ship!"

"So we should let him shove us all off a cliff?" Toph shot back. "I don't know about you, Katara, but me? I can't fly."

Can I? Katara wondered. I did it once, but... even in the sky, we went to war. When Sokka dropped that engine into the gas... how many people died then?

And it was Sokka who saved us. Aang knocking the tanks down... it bought time, but until a lot of them died...

Toph blew out a sigh. "I'm not saying Aang should be like me. I'm the greatest earthbender in the world. Too much awesome? Could break something."

Caught off guard, Katara giggled.

"I'm saying, you went into that fight thinking Aang was going to back you up no matter what," Toph said bluntly. "'Cause she's Azula, and she's the bad guy, and the Avatar's supposed to stop the bad guys." She paused. "And then he didn't. And that wasn't fair."

Katara looked away. "Some things just aren't fair."

"Friends are supposed to be." Toph leaned a little closer. "I mean it, Katara. You, me, over the side and gone."

Leave her family? Leave Aang? For a friend, Toph had a funny way of showing it-

"Ack!" Sokka almost splashed over the side. "We got company!"

Scarlet feathers knifed through the air.

"A hawk," Katara muttered, getting to her feet as it perched on the side of the ship not far from them. "Now what does he want?"

Sokka beat her to it. "Jerkbenders - did enough already - whoa. Toph? It's for you."

Katara almost slapped herself in the forehead. "That has to be Zuko."

"Looks like it's in parts... why are these bits folded together? And how do they get paper this thin, anyway? It's like onion-leek skin, only it doesn't break... here."

Toph tucked away the folded pieces. "Any day now, Snoozles."

A splash and a swoosh, and an air-dried Aang was almost on top of them. "Why are they sending us a message now?"

"You'll find out when I do, okay?" Toph said impatiently. "Sokka-"

"Right, right." Sokka cleared his throat. "To the honorable Lady Bei Fong, by this my hand, greetings - sheesh, can't this guy just say hi? Oh, this looks better. Whoever's reading this to Toph-" He stopped, eyes narrowing. "No. No way."

"Keep reading, Sokka," Toph said pointedly.

"No." Sokka started folding, glaring at the hawk. "He's just being a jerk again. We don't need to hear this-"

"Give me my letter."

The last time Katara had heard Toph that mad, Aang had just blasted her out of the ring. Which, Katara realized with a shock, really hadn't been fair; Toph had been waiting for earth to bend, and Aang had blasted her with air she couldn't see.

Like she couldn't see now.

Stepping in with one fluid move, Katara snatched the letter before Sokka could hand it off to Aang. Glared at them both, and retreated, pressing thin folded sheets into Toph's hand. "Here."

"Read it."

Katara grimaced. The last thing she wanted to do was deal with Zuko, even just his letter. But for Toph... "Whoever's reading this to Toph-"

-hand it over to Katara. Now.

Toph, sorry for using your letter as a cover. I'm counting on your ears to make sure this gets to your friend without interference.

Katara of the Southern Water Tribe,

I am sorry.

I have been informed that "bastard" is an informal, if still serious, insult in your culture. In the Fire Nation, especially to a great name, it is far more dire. It implies that your mother has been disloyal to her husband. This is a threat to the stability of his clan, hers, and that of the blood father of the child. Such threats lead to war.

You attacked my mother. I attacked yours. Viciously, ruthlessly, and without remorse. A great name does not endure threats. He ends them.

But on further thought, away from your angry mob with spears, I realize I may have misread your intent, your reasons, and your desperation. You defied your father, your chief, to attack me. From what I know of the Water Tribes, that is extremely serious, even if you are a waterbender. And Toph, who has been an honorable opponent and temporary ally, calls you her friend. Which implies that whatever I may think, you are not an idiot, and you acted with full knowledge of the consequences.

I have tried to consider what those reasons may be. I am probably wrong; I was not born in your tribe, and though I have listened to Uncle and learned what I could from Amaya, that can only be glimpses of what it is like to live among your people. But I have tried to think this through, and I will outline my thoughts.

If nothing else, this should at least give you great insult fodder for next time.

First - that you believe I and my people are a threat to your tribe.

Correct. I am - every firebender is - trained to kill. We are lethal; we pride ourselves on it. I may have avoided the war, but as your fleet knows, I have not avoided defending myself with deadly force. You had every right to believe me dangerous. Particularly since I, and Captain Jee, went to some lengths to mislead you as to our lack of loyalty to Fire Lord Ozai. You had only our word that we meant no harm... and I have seen enough of the colonies to know there are those who shame their uniform and our people by believing other nations are less than us, and unworthy of honorable behavior.

If this is a reason, I can only say to you that I intend to rescue some of my people from the war. I have no intent to threaten your tribe to do so. But none of us knows what the spirits will arrange next.

Second - that you believe I am a threat to Aang.

Again, correct. Aang scares me down to my bones. Not because of his power (by now you have had a look at the bending I grew up facing), but because he is an idiot.

One thing I can always count on with Azula is that she is smart. Ruthless, vicious, and generally trying to kill me, but smart. Her actions are weighed, calculated, and targeted for maximum effect on her prey. Azula can kill one flutter-hornet in the midst of a swarm, if it suits her purposes.

Aang would blow the whole swarm away from a picnic through a wall, knocking down everything in the house including the lanterns, and cheerfully fly away while a whole neighborhood burns down behind him.

Amaya tells me Aang was completely unaware of the haima-jiao that ate at least two dozen people before the Dai Li brought it down. The Avatar was oblivious to a malevolent spirit murdering innocent people. Those things are fed by death. Particularly violent, unjust, spiritually-touched death - and guess what's being borne on the currents southward, from thousands of unhallowed bodies with no funeral pyre?

If standing in the way of that is a threat to Aang - yes. I am.

Third - that you want vengeance for your mother, and you believed the truce was preventing you from that.

I would never prevent you from taking proper vengeance for your mother.

Let me specifically define proper vengeance, in the Fire Nation. Bluntly, it does not include me, Uncle Iroh, or anyone else currently on Suzuran. We did not do it.

...Yes, I have checked everyone's service records to be sure. Outside of my original crew, no one here has even been near the South Pole. Or wanted to. It's cold down there.

That stipulated, vendetta is an honored and honorable tradition among my people. Once murder has been testified to and confirmed by a great name, a man does not rest under the same sky as his father's killer, nor a woman as her mother's. You have every right to seek out those who dealt the blow, hunt them down, and end them.

That would be the ideal. The reality will be trickier, given the current status of war between our peoples. I have consulted with Uncle and Captain Jee, who are more familiar with the technicalities. It is tradition that a certain amount of trickery and misdirection is acceptable and allowed in vendetta. Therefore, note the enclosed documents. One has your grievance under your correct name, and ours; keep it safe. The other notes you as Tomoe of the colonies near Gaipan. That you may show openly, anywhere in the Fire Nation or its territories. If pressed, claim it is a sword-name, taken to avoid discord with your clan while you hunt. That should satisfy most authorities. It is no guarantee of safe passage; you'll have to rely on your own wits for that. But it is a legal, binding document, and it makes your vengeance lawful.

This is not a gift. This is not a favor. This is your right and duty as the child of a murdered mother - and my obligation, as a great name who knows of injustice.

And there, of course, is the trap.

...Of course there's a trap. We're enemies. I know that, even if I hope we may be honorable ones.

You want to invade the Fire Nation, so Aang can fight the Fire Lord. These documents won't make even an idiot blockade commander let an army through... but a small strike force could enter, disguised as your retinue. Or a scouting party; given how little information I know you have on the Fire Nation, intelligence on your enemies would be a very good idea. There is no time limit on vendetta. So long as your target still breathes, you can search the whole damn nation looking for him.

Aang is not going to want to do this.

Aang was raised by monks. I have studied the airbenders' teachings. (Don't look so surprised. Know your enemy.) They don't believe in vengeance. They don't believe in killing. This works a lot better when you can fly away from all your problems. When you can't - you've seen the Southern Air Temple. So have I.

Aang will not want to do this. Even though it's the smart thing to do. The honorable and just thing to do.

But then, my people's argument with the Avatar has always been about justice.

So. I have threatened your tribe again, by offering you vendetta in the place of a tribeswoman's vengeance against all the Fire Nation. I have threatened Aang again, defying his ideal of peace to present your cry for justice. I may have even threatened the memory of your mother, for now you know you have a choice in how you avenge her. Or not.

Now you can hate me.

-Zuko, son of Ursa, and Fire Lord Ozai.

Folding the letter with numb hands, Katara looked up to silence.

"How could he?" Gray eyes were wide and horrified. "How could he do that to you? Revenge is a two-headed scorpion-viper; all it does is poison you! You have to forgive, and let it go-"

"Let it go?" Paper crumpled, before she pressed it into Toph's grip. She could feel the sea surging around her. "Let him go?"

"The past is gone. You have to let it flow away," Aang insisted. "Guru Pathik says love is never destroyed. It's always reborn as new love. How can you want to take someone's life, when what you lost will always return to you?"

The world grayed.

My mother. My mother is gone forever.

And Zuko understood that. A firebender, Ozai's own blood, her worst enemy in the world-

Knew there wasn't any forgiveness. Just blood, so the dead and her own pain could finally be at rest.

"I don't know you," Katara whispered. "I don't know you at all."

Water roared with her heartbeat, and she felt Toph's fingers desperately brush hers-

And fell forever.

Chapter End Notes

"It is better to be hated for what you are, than loved for what you are not." - André Gide.

Lángxuě (Snow Wolf); Sāoluàn (bedlam, disorder, havoc, roughhouse, TEMPEST).

...I just know someone has recognized who those two are based on. Heh.

jùréngzhì = giant leech; I gave it a Chinese name, but this is an actual monster out of Cherokee folklore. Though I've fiddled with it a little.

What Sāoluàn uses is called the "precordial thump". Just in case anyone's wondering, do not do this without advanced medical training. (Check Wikipedia for more details.) Sometimes, it works.

General note on pinyin: I use 'em when I can find 'em. Until recently, I didn't have a good source that displayed them accurately. Now I seem to have found one, at www .mandarintools worddict. html

On Katara: someone that badly hurt, that stuck in old childhood patterns, takes time to fix. Time, and a nonjudgmental ear - which Aang, the Water Tribe fleet, and Sokka (much as I love the sarcastic one) are not. They've only been out of Ba Sing Se a few days, and Toph has just been putting together how bad the situation is. Give her a little time to work.

Chapter 32

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

"All right." Teruko waited until Corporal Shoni stepped away from the now-sealed hatch, and turned her attention back to her steadiest squad. "People, we have an... interesting situation."

Steady as a rock, Sergeant Kyo barely raised a gray-touched brow. Private Sukekuni had a mink-deer in torchlight look that probably meant he was thinking through three different scenarios of what she'd say next. Shoni looked bland, but then the lean knife expert always looked bland. Especially when he was about to kill someone. Corporal Moriaki looked perturbed, but intrigued, much as the field-healer had ever since Prince Zuko's first demonstration. Private Fushi looked gleefully manic; not an unusual state for the squad's only other female firebender. And Private Rikiya-

"Ooo, bunking with the prince," her favorite troublemaker grinned. "Good thing we know you're flexible- ow!"

Amazing, how Kyo could do that without even seeming to move. "Bad joke," he said sternly. "Commanding officer, remember?"

"Sorry..."

And he looked it, for once. As well he should, Teruko thought. Hit on part of your own unit? That was horrible for discipline. And morale. Great names and officers knew better. And Prince Zuko was both.

"Juvenile insinuations aside, I believe he may have a bit of a point," Moriaki offered. "I'm certain the general taught him discipline, but he is a young man, and, well..."

"First off, no one is bunking with Prince Zuko," Teruko said bluntly. "It's not safe." Especially not with the temper he's in. Well, probably in. Nobody burns that many rough drafts and walks away happy afterward.

She still didn't know whether to snicker or sigh at that overflowing pile of ashes by the prince's desk. She'd read a few of the letters for him, as had General Iroh, and Captain Jee, and anybody else who couldn't move fast enough. Both the general and the captain had been surprisingly patient, pointing out a choice of word here, advising a switch of paragraphs there. Frankly, Teruko couldn't see much of a difference... but she'd been taught how to write reports, not court documents. She'd read the final letter and felt it hit, and she wasn't even Water Tribe.

From the way General Iroh had smirked, it'd hit the Water Tribe fleet worse.

Serves them right.

Putting that thought aside, Teruko looked straight at Kyo. "I haven't gotten much history out of the general yet." Have to fix that. As soon as we get some breathing room. "But from what I've seen? Someone's tried to kill him in his sleep before."

Kyo nodded slightly. "And General Iroh's not in the same room now. He'll be twitchy." He paused. "Still."

"I need you riding herd on everyone," Teruko said plainly. "Moriaki, you'd keep him up nights with healing questions-"

"Sad, but true," Moriaki said ruefully.

"Shoni, you like snarking with Rikiya a little too much-"

The knife-thrower tried to look innocent.

"Sukekuni... no offense, but he'd run right over you..."

"He would," the younger marine admitted. "Boss, I couldn't catch the prince on my best day," he said at Kyo's doubtful look. "Back on the Wani? I tried. We had people in tears. Captain Jee finally had to sit us all down with... um, something non-regulation... and tell everybody they weren't responsible for where the - er, young man was." Sukekuni shook his head, wide-eyed at the memory. "I swear, he could evaporate through a steel bulkhead."

"And Rikiya..." Teruko groaned. "Ten minutes alone while he's thinking, and you'd haul out a deck of cards."

"Keeps the mind sharp," Rikiya said virtuously. "Keeps the nerves flexible-"

"Depending on how bad a day he was having, it'd take him... oh, maybe five seconds to figure out what's on those cards," Teruko said dryly. "And then he'd fry them. And, probably, you."

"No!" Rikiya looked close to shock. "They're artwork!"

"They really are good," Fushi nodded, gold eyes glinting with laughter. "Real high-quality work."

Capital city girl, Teruko reminded herself, eying the deck of less-than-clothed beauties cradled in Rikiya's protective grip. Byakko was old-fashioned, and everybody knew it.

"I can't believe you'd say he'd fry my... wait a minute," Rikiya said suspiciously. "He's sixteen. Why would he fry my cards?"

"Because he doesn't have a territory yet," Teruko said simply.

"Huh?" Rikiya blinked at her, completely confused.

"He's not sixteen the way you were at sixteen," Teruko stated. And still are, you loose-living menace. "I don't usually do this around people who aren't my clan... anybody here have steel they don't like much?"

"Here," Shoni said levelly, producing a knife from nowhere.

Taking it, Teruko spread one hand on the fold-away table. And stabbed down.

The screech set her teeth on edge.

Handing back the nicked blade, Teruko turned her hand so everyone could see the barely scratched nail. "Grandpa Subotai was a dragon-child," she said levelly. "Trust me. Prince Zuko is at least four years too young for you to corrupt."

For once, Rikiya was speechless.

"Wow," Fushi breathed. "You never said you could... But then, you wouldn't. Because the government says- whoa. If it was your grandfather, then everybody... That must have been hard, growing up."

"Or was it?" Sergeant Kyo murmured.

Teruko eyed him.

He gave her that sardonic look of, someone has to teach you young lieutenants we oldsters know stuff. "Let's just say, I've seen something like that before." He straightened. "So what do we need to know, Lieutenant?"

Oh great. I'm supposed to be an expert? "Mostly, what you saw on the steamer," Teruko said bluntly. "When he's not in combat... dragon-children still have problems, but they can handle it. When he is, and he gets mad or scared enough - don't bother yelling. All he'll hear is noise. He's focused on protecting the clan, and killing the enemy." She frowned, dragging Shidan's old lessons back to mind. "Use hand-signals. Drag him if you have to. Anything that's not words." She swept her gaze over them. "That shouldn't happen often. The general didn't know the prince was word-lost. My guess? He's never been lost long enough for people to think he was more than just a hardheaded teenager who won't listen. He must have a lot of practice dragging himself back after the first flash is over. This time... it just took longer."

"Because being buried alive doesn't upset someone at all," Shoni said dryly.

Teruko tried not to roll her eyes. As she'd said, there was a reason Shoni was not sticking close to the prince. "Other than that? He's a firebender. Don't lie to him. Don't sneak up on him. And don't be afraid of him. Fear means prey. That idiot airbender flinches too much."

All eyes went to Sukekuni.

"Well, he is scary!" Sukekuni said defensively. "He dragged us into a hurricane after the Avatar... Okay, forget the hurricane. The Fire Lords have been looking for the Avatar for a hundred years. And the prince found him. And - a dragon-child, and you saw what he did with the water... We're in the middle of a spirit-tale, Lieutenant. And that's not a good place to be."

Damn. Sukekuni had a point. Think, think...

"It is if you're the good guys," Fushi grinned. "Cheer up! When it comes to scaring off bad spirits? Dragon-children are even better than Fire Sages!"

Hiding a sigh, Teruko looked at Sergeant Kyo. Everybody knew Fushi kept her head buried in the wildest books, but usually somebody reined her in before she got this far...

Kyo looked back. Utterly serious.

Oh, monkey-feathers. "Okay," Teruko sighed. "What don't I know?"

"Sir?" Lieutenant Sadao's voice was almost as quiet as his knock. "We think it's back."

Zuko grimaced, and rolled out of his bunk, missing the feel of warm feathers against his hands. It wasn't safe to stable Asahi in human-sized quarters, and it wasn't proper for him to be down in the beast-lodgings with her. Damn propriety.

Already dressed, he slipped out through the hatch-

Stopped, almost nose-to-throat-guard with a certain annoyed marine.

Backing up a step, Zuko sighed. "Lieutenant Teruko. If we're after what I think we are, an amphibious invasion is not going to help."

"Not. Expendable." Gold eyes glittered behind her faceplate. "Sir."

He felt a headache coming on, and the Agni-it's-dark hour had nothing to do with it. "Stay behind me."

"Sir-"

"How many kamuiy have you gone after?" Zuko asked levelly.

"...One less than I will have after tonight, sir." But she inclined her head, and got out of his way.

Best I can hope for right now. He eyed Sadao. "Where?"

"That's the tricky part, sir..."

I don't like it down here, Zuko thought darkly, stepping soundlessly off metal rungs onto the steel of the lower deck.

Which only made sense. A brig wasn't supposed to be pleasant.

A few steps behind, Teruko was almost as quiet. Armor did make stealth a little harder; one reason he was in just robes and trousers-

"At least the traitor's not in uniform," a voice snarled above the general rumble of discontent.

...And that would be the other.

"Shut it, Koki." Sergeant Aoi approached the bars of his cell, all solid muscles and a scowl dug deep as the Great Divide. "Well? Anything to say for yourself, betraying your commanding officer? Your own honored father?"

"Be quiet and let me listen," Zuko said evenly. "Unless you like sharing your quarters with something you can't see."

"Ha!" Koki crowed. "You expect us to believe that, you-"

Footsteps, thumping on the deck down the far end of the hallway. When the prisoners knew as well as Zuko did that no one could have gone that way without being seen.

At least, no one human.

Breathing deep, Zuko ghosted past suddenly silent cells. Paused. Listened, and felt, for that odd prickling unease of something not bound to mortal flesh and bone.

There. I think.

"If you hear something come past me, burn it," Zuko said quietly. Squared his shoulders, and took a few more steps forward. "What are you, and what do you want?"

Footsteps paused, taken aback. Stomped, like a big man thrusting out his chest before a brawl.

Zuko snorted. "Does the name haima-jiao mean anything to you?"

Stomping crashed to a halt. The deck made the slightest of noises, like an amateur cat burglar trying to sneak clear.

It works with fire. Let's see how it does with water. Flowing liquid from his waterskin over a handful of dried leaf bits, Zuko snapped a water whip down the hall-

There!

Wet leaves pressed for a moment against something that wasn't water. Zuko eased his grip on the water still in his hand, shifted his weight in one half-step as he turned palms up and pushed and pulled at once-

Steal Polar Bear's Fur.

...If a waterbender really had used this move to snatch fur from a bear's breast to cure her husband, he had no idea how the North had ever made their women stop fighting.

Leaf-speckled water wrapped air like a winding sheet, and froze.

Teruko whistled. "Is that a pair of boots?"

Zuko tilted his head, trying to catch the angles of light and water around empty air in ice. It did look a little like boots. But if there weren't any real boots there, what the heck was it? "Betobeto?" he sputtered.

How did I even know-?

Worry about that later. Spirit to deal with now.

"The whole ship's been spooked by something harmless?" Teruko snarled.

"They're not all harmless," Zuko corrected grimly. Maybe it's just Lee. Though I kind of wish Amaya had warned me there'd be stuff on kamuiy in my head... "Some of them like to panic people off cliffs at night. Or spook people in with the blasting jelly." He glared at the shape caught in ice. "You wouldn't be one of those. Would you?"

Under leaf-bits, something seemed to shrink.

"You, are getting off my ship."

Listening, Zuko heard the tiniest tiptoe-shuffles on ice, like an abashed child.

Great. Now I feel like a bully... A thought hit, and Zuko smirked. "You know, if you really are harmless, I know somebody who'd love to play with you."

A pitter-patter perked up.

"Oh, you wouldn't," Teruko choked out.

"Why not?" Zuko asked innocently. "He's the bridge between our world and the spirits. Let him see what that really means. Without a spirit that can tear whole fleets to shreds." He turned back to the trapped kamuiy. "If I write a note of introduction you can take to Aang, will you leave us and Suzuran alone after I give it to you?"

Excited tapping, and a stomp, like a soldier coming to parade rest.

"Agreed, then," Zuko nodded, melting ice with a downward push, calling water back, and catching leaf-bits as they filtered through his fingers.

Invisible once more, the betobeto tap-danced across the deck, and faded out of hearing.

"You? Are evil," Teruko snickered.

"Thanks. I think," Zuko muttered. Walked back past the occupied cells, and stopped in front of Aoi's. "Sergeant. Captain Jee tells me you are a good and honorable man, truly loyal to Fire Lord Ozai."

The muscular sergeant had drawn back from the bars, eyes wide in dread. "What are you?"

Like I'd tell you. "It's not a good idea to make the Moon mad," Zuko said levelly. "Admiral Zhao tried to kill the Moon Spirit, and almost succeeded. He tried to kill La, Sergeant. Agni's sister." Zuko let out a slow breath. "General Iroh tried to stop him. But all we could do was try to set things right. And that wasn't fast enough for the fleet. When you report to my father, warn him the spirits are taking a direct interest in this war. I don't know if the Avatar will be able to do something like that again, but someone had better talk to the Fire Sages and find out."

Aoi's eyes narrowed. "You betrayed the Fire Lord for the Avatar."

Keep calm. Remember the plan. "I'm sure they'd both like to think that," Zuko said dryly. "No. I broke my loyalty to my father to serve our people." He drew a breath. "And to protect my sister. She is the heir, now. If she... doesn't have to hate me, doesn't have to prove anymore that she's of Sozin's true line, no matter how young she is... maybe she can become a good leader for our people." He let his voice drop. "Agni, I hope so."

"She tried to kill you, sir," Teruko said bluntly.

Zuko snorted. "She's always had our father's permission for that." He eyed Aoi, watching that swiftly concealed shock. "I want you to report to the Fire Lord, Sergeant. I want you to tell him everything. Our people are in grave danger. I can't save them, not on a battlefield. But there's something I can do. And I will." He let himself smirk. "There are more ways to destroy a man than fighting."

"You healed the Avatar!" Aoi flung the accusation at him.

"The alternatives were worse," Zuko snarled back. "Kill him? The Water Tribe and the Avatar's little gang would have slaughtered us all - and where would the next Avatar be born, Sergeant? Do you want to try to attack the North Pole? Again? I have information from reliable sources that if they train an Avatar, they won't stop until we're all dead." Breathe. Hold your temper. Keep talking. "Not heal him? If Azula had just burned him, that might have been an option. But she hit him with lightning, and the Southern waterbender made sure he survived. Ask the Fire Sages what happens to people after that. The only thing worse than a live Avatar is an insane one."

About to protest, Aoi stopped. Scowled, looking him over once again.

"The Avatar is deadly, but he hates fighting," Zuko said levelly. "If the Fire Nation withdrew to our original borders, he might be persuaded to prevent further reprisals. Might be," Zuko emphasized, before the sergeant could do more than roll his eyes. "That's a matter for the war council to take up. I'm only asking you to report it as a potential option." He paused, and sighed. "And in your report, emphasize that I am an exile and a traitor. By Avatar Kyoshi's own decree, any action I take can be disavowed by the Fire Nation. And I will act."

Aoi was eyeing him, ignoring whispers from the other cells. "How?"

Zuko grinned wryly, heart racing. Pull it off. Pull it off, you're not lying... "Sergeant. So far I've dragged him out of the North Pole, damaged his alliance with his bending masters, and left the Water Tribe fleet with an extremely awkward situation to explain to their Earth Kingdom allies. That thunder you heard the other day? General Gang is now off the roster. Permanently." Deliberately, he shrugged. "And now I'm going to drop a betobeto on his head. Do you really want to know what I'm going to do to him next?"

Agni, let me out of here!

Leaving the brig behind, Zuko climbed out into free air, drinking in the brackish scent of waters well inland from Chameleon Bay. Should be some good fishing up here, even if it was too early in the year for a salmon-bass run...

I don't want to do that again. Ever.

"Lying hurts," Teruko said sympathetically, joining him near Suzuran's prow. "Even when you're not really lying."

"I never knew how she did it," Zuko said, half to himself. "Azula lies all the time, like it's easy, like..." He listened to familiar footsteps approaching, and scowled. "Spirits, why doesn't she just marry him? They've got so much in common. It'd solve all our problems."

Iroh sighed, lantern lighting his serious expression even as it cast shadows into red on Lieutenant Sadao's armor. "Nephew. You know that is not fair to Aang."

Zuko tried not to let his fingers curl, recognizing his own simmering temper, the desperate need to tear something apart. "Isn't it? He lies whenever he feels like it, he never has to work for what he gets--"

"Perhaps I should say, it is not fair to Azula," Iroh said dryly, ignoring the way Sadao choked behind him. "Yes, she has been given much. But she also puts in ferocious effort, and demands everything of herself. Much as you do," he inclined his head. "And yes, Aang is too swift to bend the truth when it suits him. Still, I think he does not do so out of malice--"

"A lie is a lie!" Zuko burst out. And I hate them! I hate them all.

Teruko cleared her throat. "You're not going to budge him on this one, General."

"No?" Iroh arched a brow, curious.

"No," Teruko said firmly, eyeing both Iroh and Sadao sternly. "There's a reason Lady Kotone handles diplomacy for Byakko. Shidan hurts liars." She gave Zuko a look of wry approval. "Even bluffing like that must have been nasty."

Zuko blinked, anger fading in the face of that honesty. She gets it. She's... not like Mom. But she gets it. "It had to be done."

"It did," Iroh acknowledged. "But I will consider that for future plans. One does not go against one's nature lightly."

And that meant something, Zuko could see it in the way the three of them glanced at each other.

Later, he told himself, squashing any further impulse to whine about Aang, Azula, and the world just not being fair. Life wasn't fair, definitely not for him, and it wasn't going to get any more fair just by snarling about it. Better to just... do something. "You think this will help? It's not like he cares what happens to me."

...Okay, maybe a little whine. Damn it, that hurt.

You've known it for years. Just... let it go.

"He will care that Azula failed to kill you," Iroh said grimly. "And whatever else my brother will think, he knows you do not lie well. He must at least consider our message." He nodded to himself. "Hesitation. Confusion. Those, we may gain by this night's work. Above all else, we need time."

"What we need is a miracle," Zuko grumbled. "If Aang would just sit down and think..."

"Nephew?" Iroh arched a brow.

So simple. I'm an idiot. "What does Aang want?" Zuko blurted out.

The lieutenants looked at him like he was a few flames shy of a furnace. "He's the Avatar, sir," Sadao pointed out. "I kind of think he wants to kick our ass."

"That's what the Avatar wants," Zuko said bluntly. "I've fought the Avatar, Lieutenant. And I've fought Aang. They're not the same."

Armored feet shifted. "Sir," Teruko said plainly, "I know he looks like a cute kid..."

Iroh held up a hand. "Appearances deceive, yes. But it may not be as simple as it seems." He frowned, thoughtful. "I have sources on Avatars past, that refer to the awesome power of the Avatar State. Yet those sources claim it takes time, and discipline, and mastery of all four elements before an Avatar can control such power. I had thought the texts were wrong. We have seen Aang unleash that power. Yet if it is akin to bending... perhaps he has not mastered it. Perhaps it masters him."

"Toph said he hates what happened at the North Pole," Zuko said quietly. "That he... didn't know that would happen." He raked them with a look. "So. He's the Avatar. He's also a twelve-year-old Air Nomad idiot. How do we get that to listen?"

"You might begin by admitting he is not entirely a fool," Iroh said mildly. "He has eluded the Fire Nation, which is not easy; he remained out of your grasp, which was harder still. He has chosen wisely in his friends. Toph is a treasure, Sokka simply needs more experience and training, and Katara... well. We are all wounded, in our way. It does not make her less dangerous." He eyed his nephew. "You were raised from birth to know your duties as a great name, and trained to meet them. He was a child of air, born to freedom. Being the Avatar, chained to the very fate of the world, must be a terrible burden."

Zuko flushed, and briefly considered banging his head against the steel deck. It'd be less frustrating. "Can't you tell me these things before I ruin everything?"

"Prince Zuko." His uncle's gaze held mild reproof. "He is twelve. He was not ready to listen, not then. I do not know if he is ready now, or if he will ever be ready. Leaving was wise. Telling him the truth, was wise. You have not ruined everything." He paused, and chuckled. "You may have done better than any of us could have imagined. What better gift to a heartsick child, than a new friend?"

"More snow," Asiavik directed. Aang gulped, and froze more seawater into white slush. Lifted it with a shove of hands and will, helping Momo and the healer pack it into the canoe resting in the bottom of the ship, fresh white darkening around Katara's feverish body.

Sokka watched, one hand gripping Toph's, and felt utterly, totally helpless.

Beside Asiavik, Hakoda looked like grim death. "They swore it wasn't contagious."

"The firebender was freezing," Asiavik said dryly. "She's burning up. Even if they were contagious, this is a different sickness."

"Maybe not," Toph said quietly.

Sokka tensed. "Hold on, they lied to us? Why those-"

"They didn't lie!" Toph burst out. "Stop saying they lied when they said something nobody wanted to hear, they didn't-!"

"Toph." Rising from Katara's side, Hakoda rested a hand on the earthbender's shoulder. "I know you're frightened. But if you know anything that might help Katara... we're listening."

Toph bit her lip, obviously listening Aang's way.

Aang looked at her, and Katara, and swallowed hard. "I'll go," he said quietly. "I'll just... go over to one of the other ships with Appa. If you don't want me to hear."

"No!" Toph said quickly. "It's just... this is hard, Aang. You think you know what Kyoshi did, and you don't. And it's - it's awful."

Aang winced. "She killed a lot of the Fire Nation. I get it. I don't want to think an Avatar could do that, it must have been a mistake, but-"

"That's not the worst part."

"What's worse than death?" Asiavik snorted.

Sokka shivered, remembering a deserted town, and angry daggers of flame. "When someone finds what you love, and takes it away," he said numbly. "What'd Kyoshi take from them?"

Toph let out a slow breath. "Water's family, right? Family, and the tribe."

"So the elders say," Hakoda nodded.

"And you're her family, and Aang's her family," Toph said, feeling her way as obviously as if her toes were scraping wood. "And Katara had to choose. And she couldn't. She's burning up. Like... like her water's dying."

Aang recoiled. "You mean this is my fault?"

"No, it's not," Sokka started.

"Yeah, it kind of is," Toph said levelly. "You heard the letter. The Water Tribes need revenge. Zuko was trying to make things right so she could have it."

"But revenge is wrong!" Aang protested. "How could he do something so awful?"

Awful. Revenge. Sokka tried to connect the two words in his head. It didn't work. Sure, Aang didn't want to hurt people... but what did want have to do with it? Some things just had to be done.

"Awful?" Asiavik said in disbelief. "You won't shed blood to quiet your own dead, and you think we're awful? Listen, young brat-"

"Asiavik," Hakoda said firmly. "Let the boy be. He is an Air Nomad. If he says his people will rest without bloodshed, I believe him."

"Strange people," the healer muttered, feeling Katara's forehead again.

"Aang," Hakoda went on. "Our elders' stories say your people were very different from ours. You say the ways of the Air Nomads were never to kill, and I understand. I don't agree - be patient, wait," he added, as Aang's mouth turned stubborn. "Those are not the ways of my people. But I understand they are yours. Please, try to understand what is ours."

"But Katara's a great person," Aang said, almost pleading. "She'd never want to do that!"

"I have shed enough Fire Nation blood for Kya to rest peacefully," Hakoda said levelly. "If Katara chooses not to shed more, we will all understand." He fixed a stern gaze on Aang. "But after all I've told you of not tampering with others' hearts, how can you say what she should not feel?"

Aang looked away.

He's not getting it. Not really, Sokka thought. "Haven't you ever wanted to do something you knew you never would?" he said impulsively. "You gave us that map, Aang. Even when you wanted us to stay. Can't you trust Katara that much?"

"She said she didn't know me, Sokka." Aang flinched at the thought. "I've been with you guys since the South Pole. How can she not know me? And Zuko-" He gulped. "He was helping us before. And now he says, okay, go murder this guy none of us even knows? Even if - even if you say that's what the Water Tribes do, how can Zuko be okay with this? He wants Katara to kill one of his own people!"

"Twinkletoes," Toph said levelly, "that's not what the letter said." She scowled. "If you don't stop jumping around like a rabbiroo and listen, you're never gonna get earth."

Sokka blinked, trying to remember the wall of words that had crushed Katara. "So... what'd it say to you?"

"Zuko never said he wanted anyone to die."

"Is something wrong with your ears?" Aang jabbed a finger toward her robes, where Toph still had Zuko's hateful documents tucked away. "He said he had to let Katara kill him!"

"Uh-uh," Toph shook her head. "He said he had an obligation. 'Cause Katara's mother was murdered, and that was unjust, and he's a great name. He has to do something. Or everything just - falls apart."

"Not making sense here," Sokka said thoughtfully.

"I know, this is hard... Ugh." Toph rubbed her forehead. "Okay, listen. My Dad's a Bei Fong. Everybody knows us. They know our word is good. So sometimes, when two merchants are fighting? They come to us, and bring their contracts, so my parents can read them and say who's right."

Hakoda's brows rose. "So in your own way, your father is a chieftain."

"Kind of," Toph shrugged. "He doesn't fight. That's what guards are for. But he does... solve things, I guess." She frowned. "So this is the sticky part. If my parents find out somebody broke their contract - my dad's got to do something. Even if the contract wasn't with him. He's got to, because the Bei Fongs are honorable merchants, and everybody knows it. We can't just be as good as everybody else. We've got to be better. 'Cause every merchant looks at how we act, and that's what makes trade work." She grumbled something under her breath. "I don't know how to say it..."

"Hang on," Sokka said, mind racing. He had the pieces, he could feel it. "It wasn't honorable for Zuko to grab Gran-Gran, because she wasn't armed..." He stopped. "You're saying, even in the Fire Nation, killing Mom was wrong."

"Way wrong," Toph nodded. "And Zuko's a noble. He's got to do something about it." She waved a hand Aang's general direction. "It's like my parents. Katara says the Fire Nation's evil, that they're all monsters? One of them was. And he's gotta pay for it. Or everything everyone expects, all the rules you lean on to trust people when you don't know them - it all falls apart."

"But it's awful," Aang whispered.

Toph's shoulders fell. "Asiavik? When Zuko was sick, he was cold. Iroh tried to keep his inner fire going. Kept him hot. If Katara's burning up..."

"Dunk her in water?" The healer nodded. "At this point, it can't hurt-"

A wave of Aang's arms, and water crested the side of the ship to crash over into the canoe.

Dripping, Sokka sighed.

Scolding, Momo landed on Hakoda and shook himself, wide green eyes miffed. A rumble, and Appa swam closer, lifting his head to look at them.

Asiavik ignored it all, feeling Katara's pulse, then the vessels along her throat, as he held her head above ice-chilled water. Waited. And, finally, smiled. "Better."

Aang grinned. "See? She's going to be-"

Asiavik's look cut him off. "I don't know," the healer said bluntly. "If her fever spikes again, we may lose her. But this is better." He snapped a glance at Toph. "Do you know anything else?"

"Moonrise could help," Toph said plainly. "Sunrise did, for Zuko. Her spirit's kind of... fighting itself. We gotta keep her going with her element until it's settled."

One way or another, Sokka finished silently. No. Don't think like that. Katara's strong. If Zuko did this, she can do it.

"So why was Zuko fighting himself?" Hakoda said levelly.

Toph swallowed hard.

Hakoda nodded. "A secret, then?"

"No," the earthbender admitted. "Just something Iroh should be saying, instead of me. Only he's not here." She let out a breath. "Fire's not tied up with family. Fire is loyalty."

Sokka groaned. "Yeah, we know, everyone in the Fire Nation is loyal to the-"

Oh. No.

Aang was almost ice-pale. "You mean... Zuko, he..."

"Thought he was going to die saving us." Toph's words hit like blocks of stone. "Die. Not 'cause Azula would kill him. 'Cause even if maybe he lucked out and got her first - his own fire would kill him." She swallowed, eyes moist. "He disobeyed the Fire Lord to save you."

"He knew." Sokka felt faint. "He knew?"

"He's a great name," Toph bit out. "Yeah. He knew." Small fists clenched. "Kyoshi made the great names be loyal to the Fire Lord. If he says fight, they have to fight. If he says peace, they make peace. If he says kill the Air Nomads..."

Aang sat down, hard.

Kind of wish I could pass out, Sokka shivered. "You mean, in the tent, when Zuko..."

"He told you," Toph said bluntly. "He knows what Kyoshi did to his people. He doesn't want it to happen to anyone else."

And he already missed dying once, the sarcastic part of Sokka's brain quipped. What else could Aang do to him?

Right. Zuko had thought he was going to die, but he hadn't, because Iroh-

Oh, spirits. No.

"Mountains fight," Sokka got out, horrified. "The wave clans... they must have been the healers. Kyoshi-" He couldn't say it.

"And with no healers, people in the tribe-" Asiavik shuddered. "Tui and La. The boy wasn't kidding. They went insane."

Sokka lunged before Aang could grab his glider, fighting rising winds. "It's not your fault!"

"It is, you hear what they're saying - let me go!"

"No! It's not your fault!" Sokka said fiercely. "You're not Kyoshi. You're not Roku! You're Aang. This war is Sozin's fault. Not yours."

"But I'm the Avatar-"

"That's not your fault either!"

Winds died.

"You said you never wanted to be the Avatar," Sokka said into the ringing silence. "Man, I wouldn't want to be, either. Kyoshi screwed up - stop squirming, hear me out - we're friends, okay?" He met that angry, scared gray gaze. "She screwed up, and Roku didn't fix it, and Sozin took bad stuff and made it a nightmare for the whole world. And none of them were you." He took a breath. "There's a war. And Sozin's Comet is coming. And we've got to stop the Fire Lord. That's not our fault. Not ours. Not yours. Not even Zuko's. It just is." Sokka let go a little, ready to grab on again if Aang bolted. "If your canoe gets smashed up in the ice field, and you've got to walk back or freeze, do you think it's your fault the ice was there? No! You say some bad words, and you kick a lump, and you just start walking."

Aang sagged, and gulped for air. "It's just... Sokka, it's so big."

"One step at a time," Sokka said firmly. "We'll change the plan. We'll work it out, I promise." Wait. Wait a minute...

"Sokka?" Hakoda asked.

"This could make things simpler," Sokka said, half to himself.

"Oh no." Asiavik gave Hakoda a sharp glance. "I know what that look means."

"No, think about it!" Sokka let go of Aang, a grin slowly creeping onto his face. "The war just looks big. We're up against the Fire Nation, and they're everywhere. But if all of them are loyal to the Fire Lord..."

"Then Roku's right!" Aang straightened, color coming back into his face. "If I stop the Fire Lord, it's over!"

"And I think stop him is what we want," Sokka admitted, aware of a dozen other listening ears beyond their group. "If we kill Ozai, Azula ends up in charge. And she's nuts."

"I don't have to kill him," Aang whispered. Shuddered, and looked around at watching blue eyes. "I thought... if the Water Tribes want revenge..."

"There are more ways to take revenge than just killing a man," Hakoda said plainly. "The war needs to stop. That comes before any vengeance."

Aang brightened, obviously following that thought to its logical conclusion. Sokka almost said something-

Water Tribe vengeance, sure. Zuko just handed Katara Fire Nation vengeance, or did you not notice? And Katara doesn't always listen to Dad-

No, he decided. Leave it. Get Katara better first. Then we can fight.

And sometime soon, he had to do something really nice for Toph. Who was keeping her head, even without a scrap of earth around, and making sure Asiavik had extra hands to hold Katara steady when he had to warm up and shake away bits of slush. And who'd just gotten out of the way, without a fuss, as Aang charged in and started talking to Katara; that it was okay, he was sorry he hadn't gotten it before, she could wake up any time now...

Hakoda's hand on his shoulder drew Sokka away from them. "There's one problem with Aang's plan," Hakoda murmured.

Problem? Sokka thought. What problem? We stop the Fire Lord, and everybody's-

Uh-oh. "Zuko," Sokka muttered. "But he helped us."

"He helped Toph," Hakoda corrected. "And he prevented Aang from affecting us the way Kyoshi did his people. I know. I also know he did that because he considered us honorable opponents." The chief looked weary, and sad. "But you heard what he said. Before, we know his actions were driven by the Fire Lord's will. Now? He claims a freedom Toph says no firebender has had in centuries. He has broken tradition. He may do anything now. Honorable or not."

Zuko? Sokka thought in disbelief. But... he didn't know. Fire Nation honor wasn't the same as the Water Tribes, and trying to figure out the differences made his head hurt. "Toph trusts him."

"He hurt one of my children," Hakoda said levelly. "I will never forgive him for that."

"But Katara was-"

"He's not Water Tribe," Hakoda cut him off. "He had no right."

Sokka tried to keep his jaw from dropping. "But, Dad-"

"Let's not worry your young friends," Hakoda said firmly. "If Air Nomads don't kill... well. We'll hunt that seal when the time comes."

"But... Zuko?" Sokka got out, disbelieving.

"He thinks we mean to kill his people. And General Iroh now fights beside him," Hakoda said soberly. "We need to deal with the Fire Lord first. After that..." The chief sighed, and gave him a weary smile. "One enemy at a time." Straightening his shoulders, he turned to eye the sail, gauging the wind.

Stunned, Sokka drifted back toward Toph, flopping down beside her as his feet informed him they'd kind of had enough, thanks. "Are you okay?" he blurted out.

"Katara's sick, Aang's only half listening, and your dad thinks Zuko's as nuts as we know Azula is," Toph snorted, keeping her voice low. "Oh. And I can't see anything. Besides that? I'm great."

Damn. He'd remembered Toph's eyes. It was so easy to forget her ears. "Don't-"

"Don't ask me not to warn Sparky, Sokka. Just - don't." She looked lost and small. "Amaya's been telling him about the Water Tribes. I kind of think he won't be surprised."

Sokka winced. "Why would she even do that?" he said impulsively. "Apprentice, sure, why not? But she called him part of her tribe. To us. That's... he doesn't even look Water Tribe!"

"That's not what Ba Sing Se thinks." Toph grinned like a leopard-shark. "They think he's from the Foggy Swamp."

Sokka blinked, struck by the awful image of Zuko in leaves and a loincloth. And wished he were blind. "Toph? I will hate you for that forever."

"You mean he really does?" Toph cocked her head, intrigued.

"Well, kind of... they're weird too, but I don't think the Fire Nation eats bugs-"

"Oh yeah," Toph grinned. "They make silk, like a lot of places in the Earth Kingdom. Our silk-makers usually feed the leftovers to the fishponds after we get the silk off. They fry 'em, with some sizzling spices. Mom had the cook make some for guests," she added at his gurgle of surprise. "I snuck off with a few. Whoo, hot."

"...Please tell me fire flakes aren't bugs," Sokka said faintly.

Toph let him sweat, then smirked. "Nope. I think they do something with potato-chokes."

Oh. Well, good.

Only, not good. "Why does my dad think Zuko would come after us?" Sokka tried to keep his voice just above a whisper. "If Aang stops Ozai, Azula doesn't take over. The war's done. Everybody lives."

Toph looked somber. "When your dad's guys went after the Wani, didn't Zuko tell them they weren't part of the war?"

"Well, yeah, but they're..." Sokka swallowed, realizing what he'd almost said.

"They're Fire Nation," Toph said grimly. "Think about that. The Avatar's supposed to give the world justice, right? Only Kyoshi kicked 'em while they were down, and chained them there. Your dad said it: if you can't trust the Avatar, what are you gonna do?" She shook her head. "He's your dad. I'm just guessing. But I'm thinking he's thinking what a Water Tribe chief might do, if Aang said, hey world, these are the bad guys, and look, I just made them stop fighting." She poked him in the arm; not hard, more like making sure he was still there. "What would you do?"

"I'd hide us," Sokka said, not even stopping to think. "The world is huge. If all of it's mad at you... maybe the Foggy Swamp is crazy, but they're alive."

"That's not what your dad did."

"Yeah, well, Dad's never seen Aang cut loose all glowy-" Sokka cut himself off.

"No," Toph said quietly. "I guess he hasn't."

Sokka rubbed his head, putting it together. "Dad thinks Zuko's like a chief's son. Which is kind of right, but... for us, the honorable thing to do is take the fight right to the bad guys. Out in the open, where everyone can see. Only... I think that's like what the Fire Nation calls High War. The Dragon of the West with Ba Sing Se. Zhao, up at the North Pole. If that's High War - that's what you do when you're strong enough to face your enemy."

"Sounds like it," Toph nodded.

"But Zuko quit doing that months ago." Sokka frowned. "He snuck into the North Pole. Somehow. I don't know how-"

"Took a kayak, figured out where the sentries weren't watching, and followed turtle-seals under the ice," Toph reported. "Uncle taught him something special with firebending. So if he's careful, he doesn't freeze. Even if he is stuck in ice."

Sokka felt chill. "You mean, when Pakku called that ice-wave a finishing move..."

"Not joking," Toph finished for him. "It ought to kill firebenders. Zuko just knows how not to die."

Sokka winced. "We'd better tell Aang. Before he does that to somebody who doesn't." And he'd thought things couldn't get any messier. "Turtle-seals. Okay, somebody needs to know the difference between stupid and desperate, and it's not me."

"Huh?" Toph frowned.

"You know how long turtle-seals can hold their breath?" Sokka said practically. "Follow one down, you might not come up again. That was stupid."

"...I'm going to kick his butt," Toph declared.

"Think you still can?" Sokka said soberly. "What we saw, with the ship..."

"Yeah, I felt it. He's been practicing." She cracked her knuckles. "Get some rocks on this boat, and so will I."

"Do my best," Sokka sighed. "Man, Azula was scary. Zuko and Iroh are pushing it up a notch-

That's it.

"They're some of the scariest benders I've ever seen, but they're still not as scary as Aang," Sokka said plainly. "And they know it, don't they? They're going to stick to Low War. Fooling people. Sneaking. You say Zuko's not loyal to the Fire Lord anymore, and that's what's important. But Dad thinks Zuko could come after us after we get Ozai, because that's what a chief's son would do. The chief is family. You don't leave him captured. You rescue him. And you make it bloody. But Zuko..." Tui and La, this was hard. "Zuko's not thinking my chief, or my dad. He's thinking, my men. My people. My uncle." Sokka groaned, frustrated. "But that doesn't fit, I thought I had it, but he acts like Iroh is family and Ozai and Azula aren't, I don't get it-"

"Easy, Snoozles. You're close." Toph patted his shoulder, only missing a little. "It's words that don't all mean the same thing again. Yeah, Uncle's family. But that's not all he is. Dragon of the West, remember? General Iroh. And Prince Zuko." She smirked. "Prince ranks general. Guess that does make it kind of confusing."

Sokka blinked, putting that together with what he'd heard and seen of the Earth Army. Generals were in charge, and everybody else with the weird titles did what the generals said. Even if it wasn't the brightest plan out there. Only the generals in Ba Sing Se were willing to take orders from the Earth King... "You mean, Zuko was in charge of that ship the whole time?"

"The Wani? Yep," Toph said gleefully. "Suzuran? Captain Jee must have wiggled around his orders so Zuko's still his commanding officer. So yeah. Zuko's in charge. Uncle's helping, sure. But Zuko's the one who's responsible. For all of them. Like he feels responsible for the Fire Nation, even if Ozai is the Fire Lord. That's what prince means." She nodded. "I think you got it. He's not going to fight. He's going to run. And hide."

Because risking his own neck was one thing, Sokka realized. But when everyone was going to die - his ship, his uncle... "Iroh. The Moon." He took a deep breath. "Iroh was okay with being a traitor, even when he knew it could kill him. Because the Fire Nation needs the moon too."

"Not sure I could do that," Toph admitted. "For you guys, yeah. You're family. We don't owe each other. But Uncle and Zuko? They're soldiers. They can die for people they don't even know."

The world tilted. Sokka put his head down, and breathed.

"You okay?" Toph gripped his arm, worried.

"No," Sokka admitted. "That's just... I mean, Katara cares about everybody... No." He shook his head. "She cares about everybody we meet. Mostly. Which is kind of nice, and kind of messy - well, you've seen it. If Aang's supposed to save the world, we need to focus on helping him-" Sokka had to stop again. "Save the world. That's just - Toph, I don't even know if I can think like that. I want to save us. The Water Tribes. People we've met. People we care about. Save the world..."

"Like you said." Toph gave him a wry grin. "One step at a time."

"Yeah, but-" He waved a frustrated hand. "Iroh. And Zuko. They really are trying to save the world. The Fire Nation part of it." Sokka swallowed dryly. "Man. When you said Zuko was scared all the time? This is why. Isn't it. Spirits, it's so big..."

Toph punched him in the arm.

"Ow!" Sokka scowled. "Toph! I'm serious."

"Me, too," Toph said soberly. "Sokka, we can't save the world if we're worrying about it all the time. It's like a rumble. Yeah, once in a while you gotta step back and feel out the whole thing. Who's fresh, who's barely hanging in there, who you need to just laze around and let him wear himself out, so you can save the heavy moves for a nasty guy later. But when you're in a fight? You have to be there. Now. Or while you're worrying about the next guy, this guy is going to smear you all over the ring."

"I guess you're right," Sokka said reluctantly. "I just- how does he do it?"

"Kicks the ice, says a lot of bad words, and starts walking."

Sokka stared at her. And had to slap himself in the forehead at the sheer idiocy of doing it; not only could she not see it, they were on a ship. She couldn't feel it either.

"Seriously," Toph said to his silence. "Sparky should have been an earthbender. He lives his whole life like that, Sokka. The world's bigger and badder and meaner than he is, and it wants him dead. He just won't quit." She nodded, proud. "So he fights what he can. When he can't - he figures something else out. Run. Hide. Sneak. He knows he can't take the Avatar one on one. So he won't."

"So what is he going to do?" Sokka pounced.

Deliberately, Toph closed her mouth.

"Okay, I guess I asked for that," Sokka said glumly. "All right. Can we - can we deal?" He hoped that was the right word. Spirits, who knew the Earth Kingdom was so different?

Feeling along his arm, Toph gripped his wrist. "Okay. Talk to me."

"You said that Lee wanted the war to stop," Sokka said bluntly. "So do I. And I'm going to help Aang stop it. I don't want to kill the Fire Nation." He hesitated, feeling that old wound. Mom...

But damn it, he didn't. The guy who'd done it - yeah. In a heartbeat. And he'd met plenty of other Fire Nation rats. But some people... some people were just people.

"That'd just make the mess worse, right?" Sokka said at last. "Aang's the last airbender, and the world's already out of whack. If there weren't any firebenders left - that'd be bad, too."

"Yeah," Toph nodded.

"Iroh tried to save the Moon, because he doesn't want the world hurt more either," Sokka went on. "And if he's the guy Zuko cares about like family... This is hard, Toph. I believe you, but-" He took a breath. "I'm going to believe what you said. I'm going to try. Zuko wants the war to stop? Okay. But he wants to save his people. How can he do that without stopping Aang?"

"Zuko wants a lot of things he knows he's not gonna get, Sokka," Toph said bluntly. "He knows he can't save all of them."

That's not an answer-

Sokka stopped himself from snarling that. Barely. Because - it was. Just not how he'd thought. "He can save Iroh," Sokka said slowly, thinking it through. "He can save Suzuran - if they're taking orders from him, not the Fire Lord, they're out of the war..." One step at a time. How would I save the Fire Nation, if I can't save all of it? Maybe there's other girls behind those skull masks, but there can't be a lot... He needs more people.

More people who weren't loyal to the Fire Lord. Where could he find those?

Paper rattled.

"Seriously, what is with you people?" Toph said impatiently. "I'm blind!"

Sokka glanced that way. "Toph? There's nothing there-"

Stomp, stomp, kick!

And empty air had just kicked him in the shins. Yelping, Sokka bit back bad words, hopped up, and snatched fluttering paper from in front of Toph's face. Started to read, and stiffened. Oh man, now what? "Um, Aang? It's for you."

Reluctantly, Aang dragged himself away from Katara and took the tattered scrap of paper. Scratched the side of his head, where days unconscious had left a dusting of black hair. "What's a betobeto?"

Tippety-tappety-tippety-tappety-tip...

It sounded like dancing footsteps, Sokka realized. So why did he feel like something was giggling at them?

Spirits. Never mess with spirits...

Hands against hands, the back of her hand yielding and deflecting the push of a palm.

"Relax. Breathe. Feel the water. Do nothing unneeded."

Step and step. Now she pushed, and the other deflected, gentle as snow falling. Advance and retreat. Balance.

"Relax. Breathe..."

Katara opened her eyes.

Yue smiled at her. "There you are."

Step. And circle. "What are we doing?" Katara said warily. Dark; dark everywhere, like a night before blizzard winds.

"What Yugoda did not know she had to teach you." A slow spiral, as they moved forward and back, waves on a shore. "In a way, Aang's friend was lucky. His teacher assumed nothing."

"Aang's friend?" Katara asked, curious.

"Follow me."

Advance and retreat. Hands softly against glowing hands, until she could feel the rhythm like her own heartbeat.

They parted, hands lowering, and Yue smiled again. "Come here, little sister."

...No one had hugged her like this since Mom died. "Why?" Katara choked out. "Why, why, why?"

"Very wise."

Katara blinked, and looked up into brilliant blue. "You mean... nobody's asked you?"

"Why ask what you believe you know?" Yue tugged them both down, until they knelt on darkness that rippled like a quiet pool. "Look. And feel." She reached down, silvery glow dipping into black-

Something writhed in the dark.

"Show no fear. My brother distracts our foe. Look..."

-And she breathed in roses and hot spices, scents whispering through air with a push of her hands to ease her patient's breathing. Steel was a familiar weight on her back as she ran her fingers over the little girl's chest, coaxing breaths deeper and longer. To touch air was to touch chi, and to touch chi was to heal...

Hands shaking her, flee, fly, Xiangchen's followers are coming-!

-Clay slick and warm against her skin as she moved over the infection, drawing out the putrid matter to leave healthy flesh behind. She nurtured crackles of energy in the clay, sparked by chi and lodestone grains, stubbornly matching the body of the young soldier until it agreed to mend...

Chin, burrow away, Chin is firing the town-!

-Fire slid between her hands, fierce as the sun's heat beating down on the sea. She drew its strength into the old fisherman's broken arm, commanding flesh and bone to mend and grow...

Shadow looming before the sun; she didn't need the screams to know Sozin's slayers had found her-

And she was Katara again, and Water Tribe, and weeping.

"I am here," Yue murmured. "I will always be here."

"Why?" Katara managed. "Why did they kill us?"

"All medicines are poisons."

Katara blinked, and drew back a little. That wasn't clear at all. Why couldn't Yue just say-

She's a spirit now. Aang's the bridge to the spirit world. Maybe... she's trying as hard as she can?

"You mean healers... hurt the spirits?"

"Healers are human. Humans change what-will-be. There is imbalance."

Katara stared into shimmering blue, and shivered. "Spirits want us to suffer? To die?"

"Imbalance must be corrected." Yue's fingers interlaced with hers. "There is... disagreement."

Katara swallowed, feeling her world tremble. "But... there's a spirit who wants healers to die."

"Yes."

"Then stop it!"

"The imbalance is." Yue looked down. "If humans were no more, it might not be." Unearthly blue met human. "Some believe humans are part of the balance. My brother. Myself. Some others."

Katara started to speak... and stopped, and took in the black stillness around them. "You're not supposed to be doing this?"

"Destruction is easy. Creation is not. Much has been destroyed. It is... not fair."

Katara looked away, trying to put the fragments together. I wish Sokka was here. He's better at puzzles, he always knows how to get around something people think can't be done- oh. "Humans did it. Maybe a spirit wanted it, but humans did it. Like Zhao killed you."

"Yes." Warmth, wrapping her like summer water.

"If we broke it, we have to fix it." Katara glanced up. "But if we don't even know something needs to be fixed..."

Yue winked at her.

Bring healing back. Bring balance back- Katara sucked in a breath, shocked. "You helped Zuko!"

"It cost him dearly."

"Cost him?" Katara snarled. "I lost my mother! What did he lose, a stupid throne? I hate him. I hate him! I hate him!"

"The tide rises, and falls. The sea nurtures, and kills." Yue's eyes were no longer gentle, but fierce as a storm. "You are one of mine. Love. Hate. Heal. Kill. Live."

Katara gulped, trying not to sob. "You... don't think I'm awful...?"

"You are my little sister. I love you. Always."

Sobbing, Katara leaned into comforting arms.

An endless time later, Yue pointed to rippling black below. "There is something else you might see."

Katara wiped her eyes, and looked down. That looks like Kuei's throne room...

"I'm going to die," Captain Lu-shan muttered under his breath. "I'm going to be a greasy spot on the audience room floor, and no one's even going to send a note of condolence to my wife."

Waiting with the captain, far back in the throng of senior officers eager to report to the princess, Master Sergeant Yakume did his best to give the Guard a reassuring smile. If it was a little wry... well, given the circumstances, he didn't think Lu-shan would fail to appreciate the irony. "I don't think anyone can hold you accountable, Captain."

"I hold myself accountable, Master Sergeant," Lu-shan said stiffly. "I never thought... I never saw... Oma and Shu, how could Amaya do that to us?"

"The Water Tribes aren't civilized people," Yakume said dryly. "I'm sure she had her reasons."

"Reasons for hiding the Fire Prince in Ba Sing Se?" Lu-shan snarled under his breath.

Gently. Gently. The man is torn, Yakume thought. He'd caught the Guard captain out fair and square, laying out facts and reports that proved just how deeply the man's station was entwined in unwitting treachery to Ba Sing Se. Enough damning information to allow even the most lenient Earth Kingdom administrator to condemn them all...

But the Fire Nation was not the Earth Kingdom. And Yakume had given his word: so long as Lu-shan cooperated, he would do his best to see no innocent soul suffered. "She may not have known who he was," the master sergeant pointed out, voice just as low. "Huojin said he didn't know until the Avatar identified him, correct? I believe him."

Lu-shan shot him an incredulous glance. "He's gone. His whole family is gone, and our station's left to take the blame, and he's been lying to us his whole life. And you think I should believe anything he's said?"

Reciprocity, Yakume nodded to himself. This could get ugly, very quickly. Which would not be helpful to eventually integrating Ba Sing Se into the empire. "It may look bad on the surface, Captain, but I believe he was trying to protect you."

"By lying and running away?" Lu-shan bit out.

"Yes," Yakume agreed levelly. "And it will work."

Lu-shan fixed a startled gaze on him.

"He must have realized he'd given himself away," Yakume went on, watching tension ease from the captain's shoulders. From the reports, Huojin had been a good and loyal Guard; it had to hurt his captain to think ill of him. "By taking himself and his clan out of your station's protection, he removes any need for retribution against you. We don't hold one man guilty of another's crimes. You knew at the same time I did, that was obvious. Actually, you knew a bit after," Yakume mused. "So you had no time to consider attempting treachery by concealing him. Which means you and the station are safe. Very honorable."

Lu-shan reddened, looming... then frowned, and thought. "When did you know?"

"The minute I saw him," Yakume admitted. "You're very sheltered, here inside the Walls, for all that you have refugees here from across the Earth Kingdom. You're used to people who look a bit different simply being from another distant village. I've seen people from across the continent. Dress, speech, a queue of hair - he blended in well, I'll give him that. Like a chameleon-skink on fresh-burned pine sandhills. But that temper..." Yakume chuckled.

"Plenty of people have tempers," Lu-shan growled.

"Of course," Yakume nodded. "It's what set it off that's the key, Captain. He is loyal to Amaya. Water Tribe or not. She sheltered him. That's not something a child of Fire treats lightly."

"Loyal to her, not us," Lu-shan said flatly. "The damn prince-"

"Amaya's apprentice," Yakume stated, letting the insult slide. For now. Captain Lu-shan was the key to his Guard station, and the Lower Ring was the key to holding the city. Handle this well, handle it justly, and the occupation would be that much safer for everyone. "A firebender of the royal line, old enough to be seeking retainers. Don't blame Huojin. He never stood a chance."

"I don't," Lu-shan said sourly. "I blame her."

Of course you do, Yakume thought, somewhat sad. She brought trouble to your village - the Guard is a village, of sorts - and that is just not to be tolerated, is it?

Earth was predictable. Those of the Earth Kingdom lived on deals and bargains, written and unwritten. Marriage contracts. Unbetrothed women never traveling without an older chaperone, to ensure those contracts would be honored. The unspoken agreement within every village that one of yours was always right, and supported against any trouble - and in return, no villager would ever act to put all his neighbors at risk.

Which Healer Amaya had. Spirits, he felt sorry for her. She was Water Tribe, she likely considered many of the Guards her family. She'd never expect betrayal.

And Huojin, and all those like him, would never consider betraying her, Yakume knew. She was their shelter from the storm of war. They'd die first.

Which was likely one reason why that small army of refugees had vanished. Any child of Fire who'd gotten all the way to Ba Sing Se really didn't want to die.

As General Iroh didn't.

"Never thought any of you had green eyes," Lu-shan grumbled. "How's a man supposed to know?"

Yakume shrugged, as if it were nothing. Which it most certainly was not.

It was impossible. It had to be impossible. Yet all the reports on "Lee" agreed.

Uncanny green eyes, witness after witness attested. Like the palace fires.

Prince Zuko had Sozin's eyes. Pale gold, burning like the sun.

Pale gold mentioned, quite clearly, on his wanted poster. Which Huojin had read. Yakume had watched him. And yet the Guard had never once stated the obvious: that gold could not become green, no more than a rabbiroo could change into a cat-owl.

Huojin. Lee. Mushi. Every one of Healer Amaya's refugee patients who'd vanished, every one who couldn't be traced back to family in Ba Sing Se...

Green eyes. How did she do it?

Waterbending was bizarre. Everyone knew that. Every tactical manual hinted it might have... unsettling applications not yet seen and reported by survivors. But this was surreal. To put together facts on the missing princes, and the tiny army of vanished refugees, and realize what Amaya must have been up to for thirty years...

Yakume shook his head, still half convinced he was crazy. If it hadn't been for that hawk from Suzuran... well, a bird from Captain Jee's ship, supposedly with no message, when the Avatar's bison had last been reported fleeing toward Chameleon Bay? Screw-ups or not, that was stretching the bounds of coincidence too far.

General Iroh is headed this way. And he is not happy.

What do I do?

Some would say there was no question to be considered. General and crown prince Iroh might have been in the past, but he was a traitor now. No one could owe him loyalty. And yet...

We lost Prince Lu Ten, and the general did not falter. He grieved - but he looked at what was possible. He gave up his own vengeance, to break the siege for us.

Men were alive today who never would have survived, had General Iroh pressed the attack. Including one Master Sergeant Yakume.

My lord. How could you have become a traitor to us? Why?

He had to know. He had to.

So. He would report what he knew: that there were Fire Nation refugees in the city, who had apparently disappeared. Given they had not come to show their loyalty to the princess, anyone could draw the obvious conclusion that they never would. Which made them traitors as well, and a potential source of rebellion far more vicious and ruthless than any Earth Kingdom city could spawn.

If the rumors are true, Princess Azula killed their lord. They'll want her dead.

And they'd be very, very hard to stop. Loyalty gave even the frailest child strength... and Prince Zuko's death would not prevent that. He had been a firebender of Sozin's line, blood and bone of Fire Sages for countless generations, and there would be no ceremony to lay his angry spirit to rest. Not for an exile.

I don't think an exile's ever been a lord before. Agni, what a mess.

Well. The line was moving up. Yakume shifted his written report from hand to hand, far less confident in the outcome of this interview than he ever intended to let on to Lu-shan. General Iroh might have been more calm and level-headed than most, but the line of Sozin was well-known for their tempers...

"Captain Taka," the princess said levelly to an officer in front of them. "Your segment of the Middle Ring is under control?"

"Yes, Princess," the captain bowed. "Our soldiers have served valiantly against the cowardly-"

"Facts first. Bravery later." Dark gold eyes narrowed slightly. Bouncing in the background just behind the throne, the little braided chi-blocker fixed her own worried gaze on the captain.

"The most cowardly hand can be the most dangerous, if it stabs you in the back," Princess Azula went on. "Those worthy of mention are in your report?"

"Of course, your highness." Captain Taka bowed again. "But it would mean a great deal if you yourself-"

" Kararin. Kororin. Kankororin! "

About to step forward under the brooding gaze of Lady Mai, Yakume froze. That... couldn't be what it sounded like.

"Yah-ha-hah-ha!"

Little feet drumming like quenching rain. Little clawed hands grasping. Wide, staring single eyes set in flesh of flexing straw, and slobbering tongues lolling from fanged mouths.

Bakezori!

Cackling, the wave of little monsters swarmed over the throne.

Fire, chains, and arrow-like kunai flew.

When it was over, and the stench of burned straw tainted the air, Yakume rose with Lu-shan from their hastily-sought cover behind a giant ornamental vase. "Agni," he breathed, glancing over twitching monsters impaled through the eyes. "I have to ask if she's still single."

"She's armed!" Lu-shan sputtered, eyeing the dour-faced noblewoman as if she'd sprouted fangs and horns. "And you're married."

"Of course I'm married," Yakume said, surprised. "I have sons." Not that Governor Tsumami would be likely to entertain the thought of such an arrangement. But a man could dream.

And... why, exactly, was Lady Mai watching the Dai Li haul off the bakezori with such a carefully neutral face?

"Sandal-monsters," Lu-shan shuddered. "Damn it, the Dai Li are falling down on the job. Decent people aren't supposed to have to deal with kamuui!"

Yakume's brows went up. "Fire Sages are usually very decent people," he said sternly. "Quite honored, and honorable. Don't your priests of Guanyin hold consolation ceremonies?"

"Ceremonies, sure," Lu-shan snorted. "Hunt evil spirits? Do that even once, the taint never goes away-" He paled.

No fool, Yakume had already started to drop into full prostration the moment he'd sensed people clearing the way before her. "Your highness."

"Master sergeant." Princess Azula's voice was precise, keen as a masterwork blade. Green silk shushed like leaves in the wind, and the scent of fire wafted over him. "Why are you here?" The shift of her feet hinted at a glance toward Lu-shan. "With a rather... unusual companion."

"We have uncovered information that may be vital, your highness." Head still bowed, Yakume offered his report on flattened palms.

The weight of the scroll lifted from his hands. Paper rustled.

Silence.

"I see."

A hiss, not a voice. Hair rose on the back of Yakume's neck as he remembered the old tales, the forbidden tales; the rumors of Sozin's long-vanished mother and the odd, cruel, gold-eyed wife who'd disappeared at his very pyre...

"Leave us."

Evacuating with the rest, Yakume caught a glimpse of the chi-blocker standing out of harm's way, staring fixedly at empty air.

Or - given the bakezori - was it empty?

The throne room doors slammed, and he heard the roar of flames.

"How dare they!"

Perched up among the pillars with a few terrified Dai Li, Ty Lee breathed a silent prayer of thanks to Tengri that Katara's aura was gone. Azula was going to be upset enough after she'd calmed down. She'd hate it if the Water Tribe girl had seen this.

"I am Father's heir. I am the line of Sozin! He's a weakling, a traitor, dead! How can they betray our people for him? Betray our war!"

Blue flames blasted, shattering rock and stone.

"It's okay," Ty Lee smiled at the wide-eyed earthbenders clinging near her. "Just stay up here until she calls for us. You'll be fine."

They'd be fine. But what about Azula? Her aura looked awful. All clashing colors, and dark veins, and a kind of spin that made her dizzy.

She hit her head. Hard. She even admitted she was seeing two of me. Ty Lee hid her sudden spike of fear. The Academy's training had been very thorough. Including the symptoms of concussions... and what might happen to those left untreated.

Granted, all she'd seen with her outer eyes was Azula losing her temper. But this was Azula. Dizziness, faltering gait, lack of judgment? She'd hide it all.

I have to help her.

It was what Zuko would do, if he were here. It was just sad Azula had never seen that.

Then again, if Azula had been able to see that, what else might she have seen?

You are so, so silly, Aang.

Fire couldn't kill the wind. Burn out pockets of air, yes. Burn so fiercely the wind had to run with it, hidden in the flames. But kill it?

Heat, fuel, air. Agni's sacred triangle.

No. Fire could never kill the wind. Not without killing itself. The wind had blown through the mountains before the temples ever rose; it blew through them now, never ceasing. So what if there were just scattered breezes left? Tengri was patient. There would be time.

Only, maybe not. Because there was an air monk left, and he was the Avatar, and if he won Xiangchen's mess would start all over again.

Her family, all the families, were counting on her to make sure that didn't happen.

...Well, not counting counting on her. Because they weren't here, and they didn't know. Except for a few bubbly messages Azula had let her send by hawks. But if they knew, they'd be counting on her, and that was good enough.

Sometimes she wished she could just bounce around Aang and talk to him. He didn't want people to die, right? That's what her family taught. What the temples were supposed to teach. So why didn't he join Fire Lord Ozai, instead of racing around the world telling people to fight? People died when they fought the Fire Nation.

...Well, except when they fought people like her. Why couldn't Aang see that was the right thing to do? She fought people for Azula, Azula got what she wanted, and nobody died. Just look at what had happened in Ba Sing Se. Long Feng had died, and Zuko, and nobody else.

Poor Zuko.

If Aang showed up again - and Ty Lee just knew he would, waterbenders were tricky that way - she was going to poke him one. Where he'd feel it. Zuko was nice. Zuko was kind. Zuko had been General Iroh's son, really, even if the Fire Lord was his father. General Iroh was his teacher! Didn't the temples say that was the most important thing of all?

If Aang couldn't see that turning himself in so Zuko could be the heir would have been the right thing to do...

Well. She was really going to poke him one.

Flames died.

Tumbling down, Ty Lee landed lightly, folding gently into submission. "Maybe they should have run away and joined the circus, too."

Azula's eyes narrowed. Then, wryly, one corner of her lips turned up. "And who says this isn't one? It even has three rings."

Grinning, Ty Lee looked up. "You can make this work for you. You always do."

About to speak, Azula hesitated. "Uncovering potential traitors all our intelligence networks couldn't find. Yes. There should be a way..."

Ty Lee felt chill. She had to think about that.

Some time later, the acrobat cartwheeled down the halls, satchel over her shoulder, seeking the conspiracy she knew was afoot. Mai was good at hiding. But she'd known the sober girl for years. And really, in a place this big, there were only so many places to hide and not look like you were hiding.

A handspring in over raised stone, and Ty Lee grinned at Quan and Mai. "So when are you breaking Min out?"

Quan's jaw dropped.

"Azula shouldn't do that to Min's clan," Ty Lee explained patiently. "It's not good for her. And it'll make the other clans upset. She has the rest of the Dai Li; she'll find the traitors sooner or later. A little later won't hurt."

Quan glared at her. "Don't think you can-"

Mai held up a hand. "What do you want?"

"Azula's hurt," Ty Lee said seriously. "She needs a healer."

"She killed the last one she dealt with," Quan said darkly.

Ty Lee glanced down, sad. "Zuko would help her if he were here." She looked pleadingly at Mai. "You know he would."

"She killed him," Mai said flatly.

"The earthbender killed him," Ty Lee insisted. "You didn't see him when he came to save Toph. His aura was all... solid." Certain, and brightly glowing, the way it never was around Azula. Zuko had always been afraid of Azula.

And... well, he should have been. He was a firebender, and firebenders were like dragons. Not that she'd ever seen a dragon, no one ever would again, but they were predators who flew, and Ty Lee guessed they'd probably been like messenger hawks. And when hawks raised chicks, and there just wasn't enough for everyone... feeding the strongest made sure one chick survived.

Azula was strong. Zuko - hadn't been. It was sad. But it was the way things had to be.

Why didn't you just run away, Zuko? Run away from the Avatar, and never come back.

But firebenders didn't run.

"I know you're good at plans, but Azula's better," Ty Lee said softly. "Mai. Let me help."

The two conspirators traded glances, and this time Quan waved Mai down. "The rest of the Dai Li?"

"Well, you can't stay," Ty Lee said honestly. "Azula can't trust you. But if you go with Min, no one gets hurt."

Mai met her gaze, gold eyes hot with the chained red rage around her. "I'll be up against other agents, Ty Lee. Someone is going to get hurt."

"Oh, you silly!" Impulsively, Ty Lee hugged her. "You need to have fun sometimes, Mai. The markets down in the Lower Ring? They have some of the neatest stuff!" A dip and a twirl, and she presented a small wooden box, still smelling ever so faintly of beetles and sand.

Wide-eyed, Mai unlatched the lid. "Shirshu darts?"

Bouncing on her tiptoes, Ty Lee beamed.

Wind and arrows and mocking laughter-

Langxue rolled out of the bottom bunk, and slammed into familiar arms, minus the gloves a Kyoshi Warrior would wear in battle. "Easy, little Captain. I've got you-"

"Saoluan?"

Still kneeling, her grip eased. "You're awake?" Fingers felt his forehead in the dark. "And your fever's down. Oh, Guanyin be thanked... cover your eyes, I'll give us some light."

Wobbly, Langxue sat on the edge of the bunk, eyes slits as Saoluan used spark rocks to set a ship's lantern aglow. We're on a ship, he realized, adding up scents and movement and the tight, slightly fish-scented confines of a passenger's tiny cabin. Pretty far out to sea. "We left the island."

"Had to," Saoluan admitted. "Someone would have started asking questions, and I'm not that good a liar. Not with that many witnesses... You were starting to worry me. You've been pretty much out of it for two days-" She faced him, and almost dropped the lantern.

Hand shaky, Langxue reached up and pulled stray strands in front of his eyes. Most of it was still dark brown, typical of the island. But where La had touched him...

"Damn," Saoluan breathed. "I didn't think we'd need hair dye. I'll have to ask the crew-"

"Don't waste your time," Langxue growled, brushing white-rooted hairs back from his face. "La is ticked. And she wants everybody to know it."

"Going to make it a little tricky to stay out of sight." Saoluan smiled wryly. "Can I know why, or is this a bender thing?"

"It's... kind of complicated," Langxue admitted, feeling his face heat up. "I just- where are we going?"

"Omashu," Saoluan shrugged.

"What? But the Fire Nation-"

"Took it over, call it New Ozai - who gossips with the fishermen, you or me?" Saoluan grinned. "There are still Earth Kingdom troops in the area. And people I know. We can get help there."

"Unless the White Lotus is hiding a spirit-healer La doesn't know about, I doubt it," Langxue growled. "It's north, though. Place to start... what?"

"Um." Saoluan blinked innocently at him. "Who?"

"I can probably give you the signs and countersigns," Langxue said wryly. "Unless they've changed in a thousand years. I kind of doubt it."

Saoluan leaned back against the cabin wall, blue-gray eyes wide. "...Little Captain?"

Langxue swallowed hard, hurt. "It's me," he said guiltily. "And - I don't want to scare you, I don't, but I'm going to... the spirits get what they need, and those of us they tag just have to live with it..."

"Shh." She squeezed into the bed by him, ducking her head under the top bunk. "Take it from the top, okay? The leech. I saw-"

"You saw me airbend," Langxue said quietly. "That's why I was... out of it. Used too much chi, too fast, and I haven't been healed yet." He took a breath. "I know this is going to sound crazy, but a long time ago, some benders could-"

"You're a yāorén."

Langxue shut his mouth before he caught a gnat. "You know?"

"The Grand Lotus seems to have found one," Saoluan said plainly. "Two-element benders. I don't know how that can work-"

"It doesn't. Not without help," Langxue said dryly. "Don't think of it like the Avatar. It's not. The Avatar spirit changes the next incarnation before it's born. He starts with all four, and more power than... well, you can imagine. We start with one. Like any other bender." He paused. "Except we tend to have hard lives. And a lot of bad luck."

"Uh-oh," Saoluan muttered.

"I don't know if kamuiy go after us because we're strong enough to take them, or if we just end up living because we're strong enough," Langxue said honestly. "Will, not bending. Some of us start out pretty lousy benders... If you're in the right place at the wrong time, and the Great Spirits notice you, and you're praying with everything you've got that you were just more, that you just had one last shot at what's killing you..."

"Be careful what you wish for," Saoluan said ruefully. "Ouch. So you got - noticed."

"Noticed, heck," Langxue grumbled. "I think they were waiting for me." At her wary glance, he sighed. "Remember how the priests say if you live a virtuous life, you might get a chance to reincarnate as a human being?"

Saoluan smirked. "They keep telling me I'm going to be a sea slug."

"Don't bet on it." He grinned wryly. "Yāorén do come back. A lot. And we're not that holy. A little too busy getting our hands dirty in other people's messes... anyway. About a thousand years ago, I was one of Avatar Yangchen's yāorén."

Silence.

Langxue swallowed. "I know it sounds crazy-"

"Yes," Saoluan said, oddly thoughtful. "Yes, it does. Except." She looked straight at him. "I know benders, and I know what I saw. Avatar Aang doesn't use a sword. You used a move no one's seen in at least a hundred years." She shrugged, smile wry. "So why not a thousand?"

Langxue tried to swallow the sudden lump in his throat. Sniffled, tried to hide it-

"It's okay," Saoluan murmured, gathering him against her shoulder. "It's okay..."

Tears soaked her shoulder. She didn't say a word. Just stroked his hair, like it was any other day that losing everyone had been too much.

Which was exactly what it was, Langxue realized. He didn't remember everything, but he could feel it. And knowing they'd all lost hurt all over again...

"Though I kind of cheated," Saoluan mused, voice deliberately light. "I've been listening to you mumble in your nightmares. You really freaked me out. There's no way you could have learned High Court. Not in this life."

Langxue let a last sob shudder out, and raised his head. "You speak High Court?"

"Little," Saoluan confessed, thumb and finger a fraction apart. "Only little." She shrugged. "I read it a lot better. Helped, when Kyoshi Island was staying neutral. Nothing like knowing what the Fire Nation's really up to, so the elders could do things that kept us out of their way."

"I'll have to teach you," Langxue nodded. "We need to find someone."

"In the Fire Nation." Saoluan eyed him, uneasy.

Oh. And the reality of the war crashed back in, and oh Agni, this was such a mess...

Deep breath. You're a yāorén. Impossible is what you do. "I don't remember everything," Langxue said bluntly. "I'm not dead. When you're dead, and in the Spirit World - you remember everything you've ever done. Everyone you've ever been. But I'm not. I just have bits of what Hyourin remembered. Because La and an old friend messed with me to make sure I would. And I think - I think Kaze gave me a little more, he knew air, not me. Sure, I watched him bend, but..." Deep breath. Take it slow. "It's like trying to grab pieces of a dream." Or a nightmare. "When I woke up - I was fighting Koh. And the people helping him." He met her gaze. "I was fighting to protect the Northern Water Tribe. And I wasn't alone. The Yu Yan were there. On our side."

Saoluan stared. "But, the Yu Yan are-"

"The Fire Nation wasn't the enemy!" Langxue cut her off. "Not then. La is Agni's sister. Sure, they fight. Family does. But he loves her." He swiped at his eyes, angry and hurt and scared. "They're family, and - the world's all wrong..."

"Okay," Saoluan said softly. "Damn lucky I am what you think I am, or I would think you're crazy." She whistled. "Koh. That Koh? You don't make easy enemies."

"Yāorén are supposed to keep people alive until the Avatar can get across the world to handle it," Langxue said dryly. "If it was easy, regular benders could handle it. The Great Spirits wouldn't have to-" He winced.

"You've still got a fever." Saoluan's fingers moved across his forehead. "You should rest."

"That won't fix it," Langxue muttered. "I need to find a spirit-healer. Gaipan. That's where Kaze said they'd be."

"A spirit-healer?" Saoluan raised a brow.

Langxue looked away.

"Hey." Saoluan touched the side of his face, turning him back toward her. "It cost you to save me, huh?"

I'd pay it again. And again, and again... sister... "Never touch the sea when Ocean's angry," he said reluctantly. "Spirits can tear up your chi, if you don't know what you're doing. And - I didn't. Sometimes you get better. But if the scar gets... forced wider..."

"Because you got noticed," Saoluan said quietly.

"Yeah." He shrugged it off. "If there'd been another yāorén to pull me through - I'd just be sick for a while. But there wasn't. So I have to find one."

"Oh." Saoluan looked away. "That could be tricky."

"Tricky?" Langxue repeated warily. I knew it. I knew it. Kaze always finds trouble.

"Well... rumor says he was in Ba Sing Se," Saoluan said honestly.

Currently under siege by the Fire Nation. Terrific. "He's not there," Langxue said bluntly. "Or, he won't be."

"Okay..." Saoluan eyed him. "The Avatar is there."

Oh, wonderful. "Gaipan," Langxue said firmly.

"But you said the yāorén-"

"Ocean's mad. The Avatar should have done something about it by now," Langxue said flatly. "Trust me. A yāorén's the last person he wants to see." Because I'd start by ripping off his toenails... deep breath. Calm.

Geh. Working into a new element was always unsettling. And this promised to be worse than most.

I'm used to fire. And fire pushes back. Air just... scatters.

Meaning water was going to be shoving him harder than usual, until he got his balance again. Wonderful. "We're family, aren't we?" he blurted out.

Saoluan cocked her head at him, and smiled wryly. "Sure you can't do better?"

"Nobody's better," Langxue said plainly. "You were there."

Her smile softened, losing the wry edge. "Guess I was." She held out an open arm.

Family. Snuggling in, he took a deep breath, and sighed. Safe.

They were on a ship headed away from everything he'd ever known, in the middle of a war that shouldn't be happening. No one was safe.

But he felt safe. For the first time in years.

Take it while you can. The world will crash in soon enough.

"So spirits are part of the Avatar's job." Saoluan leaned her head against his. "Never really thought about that. Everyone knows the Avatar's got to learn the elements. Who teaches him about the spirits?"

"Um." Langxue glanced away, fighting the impulse to whistle innocently.

"...Oh, great," Saoluan said faintly.

"We died!" Langxue said defensively. "There was a siege and an invasion and Koh got past us to wake up a volcano, and we had to stop it or the North Pole and half the Earth Kingdom..." He winced, even from the shadows of memory. "We died, and there'd been yāorén so long... I guess the spirits forgot. You need a spirit-healer, or the tear kills you."

Saoluan frowned. "You said you'd be fine if another yāorén had been there..."

"Most of us were spirit-healers, too. It made things simpler. I'm - not. Not yet. But spirit-healers don't have to be yāorén. A few of them weren't even benders." Langxue shook his head. "Spirits, what could have killed them all... oh."

"If Koh took you out, why stop there?" Saoluan said wryly. And shuddered. "Oma and Shu. Spirits. Give me something I can kill, any day."

"You're strong enough," Langxue told her. "A lot stronger than you think." And I thought all I had was bad luck. Heh. I should have looked closer.

"Gaipan, then," Saoluan nodded. "We'll get you fixed up, first." She nudged his shoulder. "So what after that, little Captain?"

"Find out why Ocean's mad, and fix it," Langxue said firmly. "It wasn't anything on the island, or Kaze would have dropped a hint. Must have happened north of us." He winced. "If it's this bad, this far away - did any of your gossip fiends say anything about an earthquake, or flood, or anything? Or is the world really screwed, and the Fire Nation's not even giving their enemies proper burial... what?"

Pale, Saoluan swallowed dryly. Started to speak, shook her head-

And drove a punch into the wall.

"Saoluan!" A wave of his hand snatched water from the jug near the hatch, and he grabbed her wrist to clean out any splinters. Saoluan was a swordswoman. She knew better than to mistreat her hands. "Why'd you do that?"

"They didn't tell the kids," Saoluan said, half to herself. "Of course they didn't tell the kids. Avatar Aang's the hope of the world, everyone loves him, he's so nice... the Fire Navy got their asses kicked, it doesn't matter how..."

Cleaning the last scrapes out, Langxue let them bleed for now. Sometimes you needed pain. "Saoluan. What are you talking about?"

Eyes shadowed, she explained.

"The Avatar did what?"

Soundless giggles woke Toph, rippling through the scatter of rocks she'd shoved up against Katara's waterbed of a canoe. Thank goodness for Sokka. She'd still rather be off this boat onto honest land, but at least he'd gotten her enough earth to glimmer around the deck like beacons.

Reaching into dark and chill and wet, Toph felt for Katara's shoulder. "Hey. You back with us?"

"Shoes." A whispered giggle. "Azula... buried in shoes..."

Okay, maybe not quite back yet. "Asiavik! She woke up. Kinda."

"I'm awake, I'm... brrr, freezing..."

Scattered rocks told Toph just enough to dodge out of the way, as running feet and yammering questions swept the boat.

"I'm okay," Katara said, over and over. "I think I'm okay... I'm just tired..."

Uh-huh. That didn't sound like okay. Maybe not sick anymore, but not okay.

"Your dad told me you don't need revenge anymore," Aang said, somewhere in that babble of getting Katara dried off and wrapped in fur to warm up. "That's great!"

"...He told you that." Katara's voice was ice.

"That's not what he said," Toph stuck in, before Aang could dig himself any deeper. "He said the Fire Lord had to come first."

"Toph!" Aang protested. "I know you like Zuko - I don't know why - but that footsteppy thing he sent is driving everyone crazy-"

"Not me," Toph smirked, hearing the patter of intangible boots on wood. "Heads up, Twinkletoes."

"What are you- augh!"

Thwack. Thump. Crash!

"...Did I just see air trip Aang?" Katara muttered, dazed.

"Zuko's note said it was a betobeto, whatever that is." Sokka's hand latched onto Toph's, pulling the three of them into a furry knot of warmth near Toph's rocks. "Some kind of follow-behind spirit. Mostly harmless." His tone dripped sarcasm.

"It wanted someone to play with, so Sparky told it to go find Aang," Toph grinned, listening to Momo's angry chittering as he dived at the deck near the airbender. And screeching, as the lemur found that, once again, claws didn't seem to touch tip-tapping spirits.

"And it's driving everybody nuts," Sokka groaned.

"So why doesn't Aang find out what it wants, so it can leave us alone?" Katara asked, confused.

"It has what it wants," Toph said bluntly. "It wants to play." She crossed her arms, smirking. "I keep telling him. He wants to be an earthbender? He's got to figure out where his line in the sand is. And what he's gonna do if someone keeps crossing it."

"Toph." Sokka's voice held more than a hint of exasperation. "Zuko did not drop this on us to help."

"Nope," Toph admitted cheerfully.

"You... you... I don't get you!" Sokka sputtered. "This thing! And that letter! He's trying to split us apart!"

"He finally gets it," Toph mock-whispered to Katara. "Think we ought to help him throw Aang overboard now?"

"What?" Sokka yelped.

But Toph was listening for a giggle. And got it, as Katara reached out to clasp her hand. "Okay, tell us," the waterbender said firmly.

"Tell us about tossing Aang off the ship?" Sokka muttered. "Toph, I know you think Zuko's got a real person in there somewhere-"

"She said she wants Aang to win," Katara said firmly. "That's the deal, right? Help Aang defeat the Fire Lord."

"Right," Toph nodded. And pointed Sokka's general direction. "You think the Fire Lord's not gonna try to mess with our heads?"

Sokka was silent almost a minute. "Run that by me again," he said soberly. "And leave in more pieces."

"Uncle's the Dragon of the West," Toph said practically. "Way I heard it? Him, Azulon, Sozin - They didn't just beat people with tanks and drills and stuff. They beat generals because they could think around them."

Sokka let out a slow breath. "Okay, let me see if we're thinking the same thing-"

"Wha- oof!" Aang hit the deck near them, rocks trembling as he pushed up with impatient hands. "I think it's playing with Appa for a while... what about the Fire Lord?"

"Something you wouldn't get," Sokka said darkly. "It has to do with families."

"Hey, I know about families-"

"No. You don't," Katara said firmly. "So we're going to have to tell you. You were raised by Gyatso, and I know he was wonderful. But he adopted you. You weren't born to his family. There are things you don't know." She stopped. "Spirits. I don't even know where to start..."

"I think what Toph's trying to say is, we don't know much about Ozai," Sokka stated. "But we know Iroh. And Zuko, and Azula. And that tells us a lot."

Aang sat down half-lotus by them, Momo curling on his shoulder with a rough purr. "Because they had the same teachers?"

"Good one," Toph muttered, impressed in spite of herself. "I didn't think of that... yeah. People who train the same way, bend the same way." Like the whole Terra Team, taken down by Mai and Ty Lee in minutes. Whoof. "Only Zuko's been trying to mix up his bending with a few other tricks. Because Azula's better than he is." Was better. Before. And he still got her a good one. With Kuzon? I'm betting on Sparky. "But we're talking about the kind of stuff that's not bending. You're like your parents, Twinkletoes. Whether you knew them or not."

"But how can that be if they never taught me?" The frown rang through Aang's voice. "I know Zuko's not like Iroh, but if Azula's better than he is, he's just not a good student... now what?"

Winding up, Toph tried to punch him one.

Wind whistled around her fist. Darn.

"What was that for?" Aang demanded.

"Do I look like a badger-mole?" Toph demanded. "They taught me. Twinkletoes, I'm blind. And I still know I look like my mom." Mostly because people told her that. But there were things she could feel in the earth when her parents walked. Not the same as her own stride, but - they were hers.

"People in a family are different, but everyone in one family has a lot in common," Katara said plainly. "That's why we're chiefs. Granddad was a good leader. So is Dad. Sokka will be, too. Someday."

"You want a favor, don't you?" Sokka said suspiciously.

"Not this time."

"What we're trying to get at is, Uncle's kind of famous for messing with people's heads," Toph said practically. "And Azula does it. And now Zuko just drop-kicked a spirit over here to mess with all our heads. Mostly yours," she added. "You gotta realize the Fire Lord might try the same thing. Only a lot meaner."

"I thought Zuko said he was trying to help!" Aang objected.

"Yeah?" Toph shrugged. "He's mad at you, Aang. He doesn't want to kill you," well, maybe just a little, "but you hurt him. You can't just let something like that go."

"Yes, you can!" Aang insisted. "The monks always taught us to forgive. Hate just makes you hurt yourself."

Toph jabbed at him again, feeling another puff of air. Must have gotten close. "Who's the idiot who told you Zuko hated you?"

"Hello?" Aang said impatiently. "He chased us all over the world!"

"Yeah. He did. Because the Fire Lord ordered him to," Sokka said grimly. "Though honestly? I think he would have come after you anyway. We know how much he cares about Iroh. And Iroh's just his uncle. You're the Avatar. You're going to stop the Fire Lord. Only Ozai's not just the Fire Lord. He's Zuko's dad."

Toph almost snarled in frustration. "Damn it, Snoozles, don't you listen? The Fire Nation's got a bounty on Zuko's head-"

"Yeah, sure. Now. Jee didn't even know about attacking the Moon; who knows what the Fire Nation thought happened up north? But back when Zuko started chasing us?" Sokka huffed, and shuddered. "Xiu, Mohe - they've got to be wrong. Parents just... there's no way Zuko would have been after us if Ozai did that to him."

"My dad sent bounty hunters after me," Toph started.

And all but heard Aang's jaw hit the deck. "You mean... Zuko would have threatened your village, and chased us, and burned down Suki's village, and - all that, everything - because of family?" Even through wood, she could feel his shudder. "And Kyoshi killed all those people... no wonder the monks didn't want it!"

Still holding onto Katara, Toph felt her cringe. All right, the earthbender decided, I've had enough of this mess-

Sokka beat her to it. "Are you out of your mind?" he exploded. "Why do you think we're still here, Aang? We've been up against the whole Fire Nation for you! Do you think we're doing that just because we're friends? Because it's the right thing to do? Let me clue you in, oh mighty Avatar. We're not that good. We're just - not." He dragged in a breath, lowering his voice again. "We're family, Aang. That's why we're here. That's why we'll always be here."

Toph tried not to wince. My family wasn't.

But they'd tried. They would have been a good family. For a daughter who could see, and who smiled in the right places, and who wasn't an earthbender.

You get me, don't you, Sparky. You didn't fit where the spirits dumped you, either. You are so lucky you have Uncle. She swallowed the lump in her throat. I miss you guys already.

"I don't understand," Aang protested. "How can you be good people if you don't care about everybody?"

"How can good people care about everybody?" Katara shot back. "Some people are evil, Aang! If good people don't stop them, they do - well, you've seen Azula."

"But killing them? There has to be another way!" Aang's voice got a little louder, aimed Toph's way. "Toph. You ran away from your family-"

Don't go there, Twinkletoes. "Family's like bending," Toph said bluntly. "You can help people, or you can really mess them up. Like fire and water. Katara and Zuko? They can fix people. Or they can shred them. Family didn't kill half the Fire Nation. Kyoshi did."

"She couldn't have meant to," Aang whispered. "She was the Avatar. Even if she was born an earthbender - she was an airbender too. She couldn't have. Air's not like that."

Katara twitched.

"Katara?" Sokka asked.

"You don't know everything air is like, Aang. Yue... showed me things. While I was...away." Katara sucked in a breath. "She showed me there's a spirit trying to get rid of the bending healers. All of them."

Toph shivered. "Why?" she blurted out. "Why would the spirits do that?"

"Why would Wan Shi Tong try to sink us when we're trying to stop the war?" Sokka said grimly. "Not all the spirits like us."

"How'd you know?" Katara sounded startled.

Water splashed as Appa groaned, and Sokka snorted. "Exhibit A's over there with our big furry buddy. Amaya told us about that haima-jiao in Ba Sing Se. Hei Bai almost shredded Senlin Village, and they didn't have anything to do with the forest burning down! Yue? The Ocean? Sure, they're on our side. But if every spirit liked us, this war wouldn't be such a mess." He blew out a breath. "So somebody's out to kill off the Water Tribes and the Fire Nation. Man, that makes too much sense-

"Not the tribes. The healing benders." Katara swallowed. "Toph. Can you make some clay?"

Toph frowned. That was a little trickier than just making sand. You had to bend the rocks into really tiny pieces. "Sure." Picking up a pebble, she crunched it in her hand a few times, tiny particles slipping over her fingers like silk. She breathed in the dust of it, moistened with salt spray, remembering days in the tunnels, a badger-mole suckling kits with a low, almost inaudible purr...

"Do you remember what Zuko's healing felt like?"

Like she could forget. Warm and cozy, like everything was going to be right with the world. Like one day the kits' roughhousing had been a little too rough, and she'd thought she'd smelled blood-

No. No way. "Katara. Everybody knows earth doesn't-"

"Everybody knew fire didn't," Katara said bluntly. "You're the strongest earthbender I know." She dragged Aang into reach. "Try."

Aang's bruised hand in hers, Toph froze. "I don't know what to do. I don't know where to start."

"Yue showed me. I was an earth-healer, in the vision," Katara said softly. "Before Chin came to kill us... You have to tune yourself. To the earth, and the body."

"Right." Sokka had that figuring-it-out tone in his voice. "They love music!"

Music. Purring's music. Kinda. Clay wrapped around her fingers, Toph tried for that felt-and-heard rumble, so like the shift in her head she used to handle jumping unhurt among crashing rocks. She could feel the earth in metal, maybe she could feel it in people too-

Oh.

It was tiny. Tiny tiny; no wonder Katara had been half-convinced it wasn't there when Zuko had showed her stuff. Aang was a tangle of vibrations against her hands. Most of them felt okay, but the ones right under her fingers...

Off. Just a little.

Reaching through the shimmer of clay, she tugged them back into rhythm.

"...Ack," Sokka managed.

Toph dropped shaking hands, feeling like she'd just chucked half a mountain at somebody. "Did - did I get it?"

"Yeah." Aang sounded amazed and happy and like the world had gotten kicked out from under him, all at once. "You got it."

Mad, Toph realized, listening to what lay under the wow in his voice. He's mad at me. Why?

"We all used to heal," Katara said, stunned herself. "Sozin hunted down fire-healers. Chin got the earth-healers. And... someone called Xiangchen was after the air-healers." She gulped. "If the Avatar has to master every element, but part of our bending is gone..."

"Xiangchen?" Aang said in a very small voice.

"You know about the guy?" Sokka pounced.

"No!" Aang said, too quickly. "I mean, Gyatso told me about our Xiangchen. But he isn't the same guy. He was a hero!"

The Fire Nation calls Sozin a hero, Toph almost said. But kept her mouth shut, thinking. Aang just didn't get mad, most of the time. Unless it was Appa. Or Katara.

Only this is quieter. Like when Chief Hakoda told him to stop waterbending people when he didn't know what he was doing-

Oh. Oh. That was it. Aang was a master airbender. Said so himself. And he picked up other bending moves like breathing.

Only if Katara was right, there was a part of airbending he didn't know.

Like Azula didn't know you could toss back lightning.

And if Sparky was right - and it was a little scary, sometimes, how right Zuko was about Aang - the Avatar was a lot like Azula. An expert. A prodigy. Everything was easy for him.

So what's Azula do, when something's not easy?

They hadn't stuck around to hear the aftermath of Zuko's lightning-toss. But Toph would bet it wasn't pretty.

"A hero?" Katara's voice smiled, but there was something uncertain in it. "What did he do?"

"He made sure no one's hands got pierced, ever again," Aang said firmly.

"Hands pierced?" Sokka gulped.

"I saw it on a scroll," Aang said seriously. "I don't know the tribe's name. I don't think they're around anymore. But I saw pictures. They hauled people off with ropes through their hands. They had bows, and awful arrows, and even used some kind of burning oil... maybe they were related to the Yu Yan. Only I don't think they could be, Gyatso said that tribe was so ashamed by Xiangchen's peacefulness that they gave up their bows forever." A wistful smile crept into his voice. "Wouldn't it be great if the Fire Nation did that?"

"No!"

Toph blinked, surprised Sokka and Katara had joined in. This should be good.

"Don't you dare," Sokka said firmly. "Kyoshi already messed with them. That's the problem." He snorted. "Besides. You've seen Zhao. And Zuko. If they couldn't fight somebody, they'd probably spontaneously combust."

"And you're not making me hunt down someone who can't fight back," Katara said grimly.

"I'm not making you go after him at all!" Aang protested. "You don't have to. Your dad says the Fire Lord comes first."

"We have to get to the Fire Lord, first." Katara shifted, uncertain. "Aang. Don't you want to know about your own healers?"

Wind brushed Toph's face as Aang flung up his hands. "What do healers have to do with revenge?"

"...Nothing, I guess."

Not nothing, Toph realized. The elements balance. Mend, and break. Sokka says Southern waterbenders fought and healed; up North, they split 'em. And Asiavik and everybody think the Fire Nation went crazy 'cause they lost their healers, and just had warriors left. And all the Earth Kingdom's got is warriors, and people who bend to do other stuff. So we're off balance too. And the Air Nomads lost their healers, and we know they don't fight-

No. No, they didn't know that at all. Everybody in the Fire Nation fought. Everybody. And the yamabushi weren't up just any mountain. They were in Byakko.

Mend and break. There were airbenders who healed. There had to be ones who fight.

Zuko did both. Katara did both. And if Katara wanted to tell Aang about air-healers, but didn't want to tell him everything... Oh, not good.

Well. Time to put Aang's rabbiroo mind to good use. "So you saw Yue?" Toph asked.

"Was she okay?" Sokka jumped in. "And don't say she was the Moon."

"Well, she was," Katara said ruefully. "She showed me something Yugoda didn't teach us. I think... it helps keep us from bending other people's feelings." Fur wrapped around her, she stood. "It works like this..."

Chapter End Notes

"Steal Polar Bear's Fur", is actually "High Pat On Horse". I once ran across a tale of a woman stealing white hairs from the moon-bear's chest to cure her husband from war-sickness, and the move looked right for that.

Betobeto - in Japanese folklore, the betobeto-san is a spirit that makes the sound of footsteps following you.

Bakezōri - a straw zōri sandal which has been transformed into a tsukumogami, a yōkai (spirit creature) which was once an ordinary household item. It runs through the house and chants "kararin, kororin, kankororin!" Translations on this vary. I've found a few sources that say kororin refers to the sound of something tumbling. Others say it means "Eyes three, Eyes three and teeth two!"

In case anyone's wondering... in this AU, Zuko, the Gaang, and the entire Avatar world are smack in the middle of a Thirty Xanatos Pileup. And historically, every nation has been caught in its gears. Twice.

Chapter 33

Chapter Notes

Warning, Azula in this chapter.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Strop. Strop. Hisssss...

Tingzhe looked up from the latest cache scroll he'd been examining, still a bit dazed by just how much the Dai Li had been sitting on for centuries. He couldn't speak for the other elements, but there were earthbending forms here he'd never seen in all his decades as a teacher, and if some of these were what they hinted to be-

Focus, he told himself. Something's not right.

The shelter was still intact around them; not an inconsequential thing, given Meixiang was right to tease him about ignoring little things like walls crumbling in the midst of his studies. He'd once had an entire half-demolished building come down on top of him while he was excavating, and only noticed that he'd shunted everything casually away when it was suddenly too dark to read.

Of course, given Meixiang had been in the excavation with him, he'd shortly become very distracted indeed.

"Tingzhe." A breath against him as she shivered in the darkness, shut away from sunlight. "There's something I have to tell you..."

He shook away the memory of shock. He knew, now. And so did their children. No more hiding.

Hmm. No problem with Shirong and Jinhai, still meditating with their single candles off to one side, hidden from casual passersby behind rock screens. His youngest had been a bit giggly about showing a Dai Li what to do, but the boy seemed to have settled down now. For a firebender, meditation was evidently serious business.

Near, but out of range of the occasional flare, Jia and Suyin were wrestling with some of his historical accounts of earthbender strike teams, comparing rescues in the text to the rough sketch in their sand-tray of the smuggled map of where Min was. Huojin was sitting with them, bemused, adding his own observations of Guard operations in a low tone. Sitting by the stone screening the entryway, Luli was reading stories to Lim and Daiyu before bed, another layer of warning in case someone barged in who didn't know about the firebenders inside...

Ah. There. Jia, glancing at her mother out of the corner of her eye as Meixiang put the finishing touches on another knife to slip up her sleeve.

Not something we're used to. Any of us. "How sharp do you need to make those?" Tingzhe asked, curious.

"Not as sharp as a fine chef's blade," Meixiang said plainly. "It's a balance. You want them to go through flesh, but given their size, it's just as well if they slide across bone instead of cutting it."

"Um," Jia said faintly. "Is it okay if I say, ewww?"

"Of course it is." Meixiang smiled sadly. "We don't want to hurt people. We just want to be safe." She eyed the newly-edged blade. "And I want my son back. Whole."

And I rather don't care how many pieces I leave someone else in to do it, Tingzhe agreed silently. And had to put the scroll down, staring at nothing at all.

"Tingzhe?" Meixiang crossed the room to sit by him, rubbing her knuckles along the ridge of his cheekbone to ease some of the building headache. "What's wrong?"

I'm not sure what our family is anymore. What I am. And what I may be becoming. "Perhaps I should spend some time meditating myself," he admitted, trying to keep his tone light. "I'm a bit... upset."

"An enemy has our Min," Meixiang said simply. "Do you think Earth doesn't get angry?"

"I lost Yijiao on the Wall years ago," Tingzhe objected. "This... it's different."

"Yijiao was your brother, and a soldier. Min is our son," Meixiang said plainly. "He was supposed to be training. He was supposed to be safe. We all were." She rubbed his back, leaning her shoulder against his. "Of course you're angry. Use it. Don't let it use you."

"I've..." Tingzhe shook his head, pride aching. "I've no idea how." Oma and Shu, that was hard to admit. He was a civilized, educated man. He knew history and all its ancient battles, how to deduce a smithy or a flower-shop from shards centuries old. But this? To know all the paper battles he'd refought in his own mind were about to become a small, bloody reality...

"Start by leaning on the experts, Professor." Huojin gave him a wry smile, still haunted by the Guards he'd had to leave behind. "Shirong's good at this, or he wouldn't be alive. And from what he says, Mai is scary enough to almost do this herself. Listen to them, and listen to us. And ask. What do you always tell your students, there are no stupid questions?" The Guard nodded. "We'll get him back."

"We will," Meixiang agreed. "He's Gyokuro's great-grandson. Even at this remove, Agni will watch over him."

"Gyokuro?" Suyin looked interested. As well she might be. Meixiang almost never spoke of her family tree, or mentioned names. Fire Nation names, no less.

"He was a Fire Sage," Meixiang nodded. "When my family was listed... he's the one who smuggled me out. And sent me here." She smiled sadly. "He didn't want me to cry. He said it was his destiny, to serve the Avatar."

"Because the Fire Sages are so in touch with the spirits," Shirong grumbled, candle flickering.

Tingzhe gave him a look askance. "You're supposed to be--"

"I know, I know. But when you start mentioning Avatars, I can't avoid listening. Self-preservation." The Dai Li cast a glance at Meixiang. "Seriously, honored elder sister. I know the Fire Nation holds a grudge against the Avatar, Kyoshi in specific. I don't know why, but you'd think someone really in touch with the spirits would know there's no way this war could ever be justified--"

Tingzhe winced.

"...You know something."

"I know there are gaps in our history," Tingzhe said honestly. "There are reports of the waegu and Water Tribe piracy before and after Chin's time. Then, about three hundred and twenty years ago, the attacks all but cease. Suddenly. At the same time, there's a suspicious scarcity of court records. Those that remain, in relation to Avatar Kyoshi, have a tone I might best describe as shocked. In the more moral of the counselors. Those that my research indicates were not... seem rather smug." He paused. "I also know that prying too deeply into whatever happened earned a stark warning to leave the past buried. Those who ignored that warning - well." He gave the agent a pointed look.

"You don't know," Meixiang said quietly. "I'd heard all the Earth Kingdom knew."

"They might," Luli stated. "We don't."

Tingzhe felt the weight of eyes on him, and bent his head in acknowledgement. "I was younger, and far more reckless, when I first knew there were facts missing from our history. Then... we had children, and I didn't want to pry into what might be best left resting in peace."

"Then you need to know. Suyin?" Meixiang nodded toward Amaya's side of the shelter. "Would you go see if Amaya's done for the night?"

"You only want to tell it once?" Huojin raised a brow as Suyin headed that way.

"I'll tell it as many times as I need to," Meixiang said steadily, stirring Jinhai from his meditation with a few whispers. "But if she truly is serious about Mushi... she should know the weight his family bears. For all of us."

A curious Water Tribe healer followed Suyin back, and Tingzhe sealed the doorway against casual listeners.

Meixiang let everyone get settled, and drew a breath. "This is the story as it was told to me..."

Some time later, Tingzhe held his children in numb shock. That was... spirits...

"You're saying, for over two hundred years..." Huojin was glassy-eyed, as Luli cuddled their girls.

"The Fire Nation begged to have the ruling rescinded," Meixiang said quietly. "It's said that as prince, Fire Lord Zouge, Sozin's father, went to plead before Kyoshi herself in her fading years." She shook her head. "A great name, forced to beg. The indignity must have whipped Sozin's soul like chains of ice."

"No way to take revenge for your people," Amaya said, voice bleak. "Tui and La."

"But why didn't he just ask Roku?" Luli spoke up. "You said they were friends."

"Avatar Roku would not return from his training for Fire Lord Zouge's funeral," Meixiang said bluntly.

Shirong made a sudden, strangled noise of comprehension. And buried his face in his hands.

Tingzhe traded looks of confusion with the other adults. "I suppose that could be considered an insult, but..."

"Oh, the insult is the least of it." Shirong looked up, eyes glittering with anger. "Spirits. And loyalty. You don't understand what Kyoshi did."

"She made them swear loyalty to the Fire Lord." Huojin was pale. "And... breaking loyalty can kill you."

"And usually does, without a fire-healer," Meixiang stated. "Mai is lucky, and strong. And not a firebender." She shook her head. "You have no idea how many died defying Sozin. I wouldn't know, if Gyokuro hadn't kept the tale for our family. It is not in our history books."

There were firebenders who didn't want the war. Tingzhe held his children close. "Why didn't they simply leave?" he asked, voice tight. "Not disobey. Just... avoid the command. Lee did-"

"No. He didn't," Shirong said harshly. "He was exiled, with orders to find and capture the Avatar. Hiding in Ba Sing Se so his own army wouldn't kill him while he tried to do that - that was not disloyal. Not quite."

"...I don't understand," Tingzhe admitted.

"The Avatar is the bridge between our world and the spirits," Shirong stated. "I didn't really understand what that meant until Kuei... well, you saw. If the Earth King can enforce a judgment on Wan Shi Tong himself, what do you think the Avatar can do?"

Tingzhe felt a bit faint. "So Avatar Kyoshi's decree..."

"Any Fire Nation citizen who goes against the Fire Lord's authority is defying the will of the spirits," Shirong said bluntly. "They'd have as much of a target on their backs as any scarred Dai Li. Oma and Shu, it's no wonder you're all here. Without constant protection from malice, you'd never survive." He chuckled, without humor. "No wonder the war doesn't hit them with ill luck for what they've done to our kingdom. They're following the Avatar's orders."

Tingzhe drew breath to protest; the war had started after Roku's death, and there was no way Avatar Kyoshi would have ordered the Fire Nation to attack her own people-

Let it go, a lifetime of examining history forcing him to scrutinize his own logic. Even if he hated it.

They must follow the Fire Lord. He orders the war to continue. They have no choice.

Besides choose to run. And risk everything.

"You see, the funeral was the key," Shirong remarked into the aching silence. "It's customary for the great names to attend, or at least send proxies, to affirm that they've set aside loyalty to the dead Fire Lord to attend to the living one. If Roku was a friend - I doubt Sozin would have been allowed to associate with many youngsters who weren't great names. If Roku thought his training as the Avatar was more important than showing loyalty to Sozin..." He sighed. "So much of the Fire Nation is wrapped up in what they don't say. If Roku would not show loyalty to Sozin, then by default, he was claiming his loyalty to Fire Lord Zouge was more important. And Zouge's request had already been refused by Kyoshi." He smiled ruefully. "Sozin was a murderer and a monster and a plague on our kingdom. But I think... I would have given up then, too."

"Oh," Huojin managed. "Oh, that's what he meant, that slippery catfish-eel... Mushi got out of swearing to Ozai," he explained at Luli's raised brow. "He broke his loyalty to Azulon and lived, Agni only knows how - and he got out of giving it again!" He flung up frustrated hands. "He's been loose for six years!"

"From the Fire Lord," Amaya said somberly. "Not the Fire Nation. And he had Lee to look after. Who is loyal, though since his exile Mushi has been moving with care to strengthen Lee's loyalty to his people, so he could survive..." Blue eyes widened.

"So he has," Shirong breathed. "Oh, that genius son of a-" He laughed, full of startled joy. "No wonder we haven't been caught!"

"Dad?" Jia muttered under her breath. "Is it just me, or has he completely lost it?"

"Jia," Meixiang groaned.

"No, no. She's right. It is crazy." Still laughing, Shirong wiped away tears. "A wonderful crazy, upside-down and backwards and breaking everything into pieces... And I don't know if it's Agni or just Lee, any kid who's chased the Avatar across the world is more than any spirit should count on..." He looked up, eyes bright. "Lee's an exile. Sozin's blood, yes; and that will bring malicious spirits down on his head whether he's chasing the Avatar or not. But Kyoshi's decree can't touch him."

Tingzhe frowned. "I imagine that would be useful for him..."

Meixiang was smiling at him. "We're home."

I'm definitely missing something. "We haven't left Ba Sing Se," Tingzhe pointed out.

"He has a point," Shirong said dryly. "Great name or not, Lee can't set up a domain inside the city."

"He already has," Meixiang said ruefully. "Great names hold territory, yes... but the domain is the people."

Shirong clapped a hand to his face. "I am so doomed."

Luli gave them an urchin's look of innocence. "Why? Just because you tried to recruit a firebender, helped kidnap the Earth King, and now you're helping us plan to skate Fire Nation refugees who happen to be our families right out from under the Avatar's power?"

"...So doomed..."

"Will that work?" Huojin asked, skeptical. "Some of you - us - were ordered to go. Doesn't that still mean you're loyal to the old lords?"

"And bound in spirit," Amaya nodded, sober.

"Lee is of Byakko. There aren't many older lords," Meixiang said levelly. "And he has enough dragon blood to fall prey to the rage. He can shield us. And with fire-healers... any who suffer will at least have a chance."

"Only fire?" Tingzhe mused.

"Water can't help," Amaya said sadly. "It's the fire in your spirits that bleeds. Water only worsens it."

Tingzhe nodded thoughtfully. "What about earth?"

All eyes fixed on him.

All but Jia's, who had picked up his discarded scroll and was now tracing characters with a look of stunned awe. "Is this what I think it is?"

"What?" Shirong frowned.

"One of the scrolls from your cache," Tingzhe informed him. "A rather neglected one, from the looks of it. Given the content, I can't imagine why, unless it doesn't work..." He trailed off at Shirong's bewildered look. "The scroll Jia's holding?"

"...She has a scroll?"

Tingzhe blinked.

Amaya didn't, moving in with a water-wrapped hand swift as a striking scorpion-viper. "Stay still."

Showing more iron will than Tingzhe would have believed possible, Shirong did.

Amaya concentrated; eyes closed, lips writhing into a snarl. "There you are." Drawing away water tinged with an oily shimmer, she held it as a globe in one cupped hand. "Jinhai. Burn this."

"But - your hand," the little boy protested.

"I'll heal. Burn it!"

"She wouldn't ask if it weren't crucial." Hand on his son's shoulder, Tingzhe nodded.

Wide-eyed and shaking, Jinhai cast a flow of flame.

Amaya set her jaw and held sizzling water, even as her skin reddened and blistered. Held, muttering quiet, angry prayers to the Moon and Ocean, until every last drop burned away.

Only then did she let her hand fall, tears seeping as Suyin scrambled to help her with her waterskin.

"I'm sorry," Jinhai whispered, clinging to Tingzhe as water glowed and the stench of burnt skin faded.

"Fire purifies," Amaya said somberly. "I don't think I would have been able to cleanse that alone."

"What was that?" Shirong was standing his ground, barely; eyes wide as saucers.

"A spirit's influence," the healer said grimly. "Like that fox's touch on Tingzhe, but more hidden. And darker... catch him!"

Tingzhe found himself the center of the mob supporting Shirong as the agent shivered. "What is it?"

"I remember..." Shirong blinked, dazed. "I have seen that scroll before. I must have tried to read it a dozen times. I just... kept forgetting." He rubbed his head. "How much is in that cache?"

"We'll have to inventory it all," Tingzhe agreed. "But for now - Amaya? Is it a healing scroll?"

"It certainly appears to be," she breathed, as Jia spread it open for her. "We'll have to test it."

"How could we lose something that important?" Shirong burst out. "The lives that could have been saved, the misery...."

"Bending is easy," Luli mused. "Healing - that's hard."

"That doesn't even make any sense!"

"More sense than you think," Huojin said practically. "Healing... it's sort of at right angles to bending, right?"

"A counterintuitive use of chi," Amaya nodded. "Instinctive bending is meant to protect yourself, like slapping away a violent hand. Healing is giving some of your own energy away. Like Lee teaching the children to relax to fall. The only instinctive healers I've heard of were tide-touched, and who learns earthbending from the badger-moles anymore? The rest of us have to be taught."

"Can you teach me?" Jia burst out. Saw their looks of surprise, and blushed. "Well, manners aren't going to get Min back! And even thinking about fighting makes me all queasy." She gulped. "But I want to help."

"That's my girl," Tingzhe said softly, as Suyin grinned and hugged her sister. Jia rolled her eyes, but didn't push away.

I should stop worrying, Tingzhe told himself, Jinhai warmly nestled in his arms as Meixiang drew them all back together. Even Shirong, awkward as the man still was with his new clan. We may not be what we were. But I believe we're going to be fine.

Shirong drew back, a hint of a smirk on his face. "Don't be so quick to assume manners won't make a difference. Guards, walls, Dai Li; everything we have to get past is tied to one enemy."

Tingzhe nodded, eyes narrowed. "Princess Azula."

Threaten my boy, will you? He glanced up towards the cavern ceiling, and the sleeping city above. We'll see about that.

Dawn, and a bowl of hot water glared obstinately at her, steaming. Azula glared back, coils of steam rising from her breath as she dressed for the day. "Move, curse you!"

Rising from water, a bubble popped.

How did Zuko do this?

And what had the Dragon of the West kept hidden, that had let Zuko learn?

"His tea-bending kookiness," Azula muttered to herself, fixing her hair into strict, utilitarian perfection. "The man studied waterbenders. Agni only knows why."

After all, what was the point of studying a way of life destined to become extinct? Fire was superior. The world knew it.

And those who didn't know, would be ground under armored treads.

Still. If the man had learned something useful, he should have said something. To a loyal, strong firebender. Not her weak idiot of a brother.

"Unless he's been planning treachery since he first left Ba Sing Se," Azula mused to the mirror. Now, that would make sense. Vanishing for months, with some stupid story that he'd been on a spiritual quest when he did pop back up? And only a few firebenders could master lightning in the first place. Why hide that he knew a counter, unless he had plans against her father?

Never. You'll never touch him, Uncle. He is the Fire Lord, and I am his heir. And I am loyal.

Not like Zuko. Never like Zuko.

Claiming he'd turned traitor to protect her. How stupid did he think she was?

Mom asked him to protect you.

Right. As if she needed protecting.

As if Ursa would have even asked him. Her mother thought she was a monster. Who'd protect a monster?

...Besides a certain dead idiot.

I served the Fire Lord, loyally. I am the heir now. Everything I've worked for, for ten years, is finally in my grasp.

Excelling at her studies as her dread father wished. Befriending Mai, whose family were not benders but still held power in the court; partly by guile and true skill at governing, partly by the whispered prestige of Roku's heritage. Befriending Ty Lee, daughter of a chi-blocking family crucial to destroying assassins and maintaining order in the prisons. Subtly twisting the girl to her will over the years, shaping the most useful of tools to ensure her blockhead of a brother could never, ever be a threat to her position as favored child. As her father had always, silently, made clear that he was - if only because to be lacking an enemy might lure her to be less than the best, and Prince and then Fire Lord Ozai would never accept less than perfection.

Poor Zuko. He'd only survived that Agni Kai because Ozai wanted him to. Exiled, barely existing, banished to do the impossible... and always a reminder of the fate she must be clever enough, quick enough, ruthless enough to avoid.

Really, Father. As if I would ever disgrace Sozin's line with less than my best performance.

...Can't you trust me?

Silly thought. A Fire Lord trusted no one. Avatar Kyoshi had handed them the power to remake the world... yet even now, centuries later, there were great names who would gladly see all that power go down in ashes and ruin. Who would forgo revenge, and yes, even the self-defense necessary to be certain the world would never, ever ravage the Fire Nation again. If they dared.

Traitors, all of them.

Traitors who to this day sent men and materials to the war effort, praying to be allowed in turn to protect their domains. So her father left them in place. For now.

She'd taken Ba Sing Se without a single soldier. What great name would defy her now?

Use my victory, Father. To your glory - and crush them all!

She'd have to maintain the Dai Li recruitment program. Fire was superior, but loyal servants to bury your enemies alive were too good a tool to let rust out of existence. Especially considering what else she might need to use them against.

Spirits. In broad daylight. Attacking me.

What an uncivilized place!

That debacle in the audience chamber would never have happened in the Fire Nation. Fire Sages handled these matters.

...Then again, Ba Sing Se was unimaginably larger than the capital, and the Dai Li had been a bit distracted.

I'll have to order some Sages assigned here. That should prevent any other fiascos... and demonstrate the benefits of accepting our rule. She smiled slightly. Tend a komodo-rhino, and it will draw any load. Even sausages.

A truth learned at her father's knee. Which made its failure with Mai all the more frustrating. What had she not done, to make the girl risk her life breaking loyalty? She'd nurtured Mai with smiles and discipline. Made it subtly clear to the court that Mai's family was in her favor. Encouraged the girl's interest in Zuko with subtle hints and a bit of fire-play for her brother to "rescue" Mai from. And terrified exactly the right people to cover up that Momiji and Ilah had been sisters.

Fraternal descent, her people wouldn't have balked at. Or if they'd been brother and sister; with at least three generations between them, that was perfectly safe. Sororal descent... Azula clicked her tongue in disappointment. She'd seen the Fire Sages' records of the monstrosities possible when that happened.

Oh, not physical monsters. Beautiful children. The strongest of firebenders, yet all too often... missing something. According to the Fire Sages. Dried-up old coots. What in the world was wrong with having firebenders who didn't weep over stupid animals? Weakness should be crushed, not coddled.

She'd so looked forward to Zuzu's face when she finally told him. Right before she took his children.

Ah well. One half of that equation was dead, but Mai did have a little brother. Perhaps she could just borrow him, once she'd produced a legitimate heir.

And here was the would-be traitor herself, bearing message scrolls. Just as if it were any other morning. "Which of these should I see before breakfast?" Azula asked, arching one elegant brow. Pretend, pretend; they were all pretending, and wasn't it fun?

If it weren't, she'd burn Mai down on the spot. No one betrayed her.

"The top one might be funny," Mai deadpanned. "I think Earth Kingdom messengers have more brains than their generals."

Intrigued despite herself, Azula unrolled an account of a courier, identified as one of General Gang's, who had headed for Ba Sing Se so fast he'd almost run right into the middle of a Fire Army encampment. Before he'd noticed the Wall was down.

In between the lines of the formal report, you could all but hear the girly shriek.

Pursuit initiated, first hidden remount station located and marked, currently leaving in place while we fix and prepare to destroy next stations on the route, Azula skimmed out of the rest of the report. Good. An intelligent officer. The chase could be left in his hands, for now.

Though she did wonder what Gang had wanted out of Ba Sing Se. More supplies? Or something more critical?

We have the city. Whatever they wanted, it's out of their reach.

Out of habit, she rifled through Mai's pile, looking for whatever had been buried as unimportant. Mai couldn't really lie to her, but it was always good to keep in practice...

Well. Well, well, well. Perhaps she should reevaluate Mai's skill at lying. " Suzuran anticipates making port here tomorrow?"

"So?" Mai shrugged. "It's a supply ship. I thought you had plenty of supplies."

"It's a dumping ground for malcontents and incompetents," Azula stated, watching her closely. "Assigned to minesweeping duty."

"They must be pretty good at finding them, to get here," Mai said dryly. "Or pretty bad."

Not a flinch from the knife-thrower. Could she really not know? "You might know their captain, Jee."

Mai frowned. "From where?"

Interesting. So. Tell her, and lay an obvious snare? Or let it go, and make the girl work for her treachery?

I'll have her one way or another. Let's make it amusing. "Oh, just one of those discipline problems the Fire Lord means to make an example of. Whenever certain laggards in our government get restless." She snorted. "A pity I can't make an example out of that Guard station. Damn that sergeant."

"For reporting a potential insurgency?" Mai's eyes didn't even crinkle in a hint of smile.

"For the way he did it," Azula said in disgust. "I don't have to check the records; that man must have served with my idiot uncle. If I burn that weevil-rat hole down the way it deserves, he'd be standing right in the way of the flames. Fool." Her eyes narrowed. "What was Father thinking, leaving Zuko in his hands?"

"That he liked you best," Mai said levelly. "And that the only way the court would accept him training you to rule was if somebody at least looked like they were training Zuko. One crown prince to teach the next." She shrugged, gold eyes glinting hard before fading back into the mask of apathy. "The crown prince who didn't fight Ozai for the throne, because he knew he'd lose. That's what the rumors said. No one would have been surprised if Zuko went the same way."

Azula smiled, remembering how many of those rumors she'd spread herself. "It's always good to have a backup plan." Lazily, she glanced at Mai. "So how would you lure these traitors out?"

"I wouldn't," Mai said flatly. "This isn't like New Ozai. They're not an Earth resistance, who love hiding out underground. They're Fire Nation. And they're mad. They won't wait forever. Have the Dai Li watch, and wait for the fireworks."

Reasonable. Plausible.

...Oh, it was going to be so much fun crushing them all.

Though she'd have to wait on crushing Tu and his little network until after Mai made her move. Wouldn't want to miss any of those. Tu was a citizen of the Earth Kingdom, if his records were accurate. And they were - or he had some of the best fakes she'd ever seen. How on earth had Mai known to contact him?

Asking that will be very, very amusing.

The only way this could get more entertaining was if Mai thought she was clever enough to get Suzuran's help. Jee was a cowed, beaten man; no one else would take orders from her brother without a fight.

A pity Zuko was already in the Earth Kingdom before the anniversary, this year.

After all, what kind of sister would she be to let such an important event pass without commemoration? Nothing said you are not forgotten like attempted mutiny.

Though pulling her present off this time around might have been a bit trickier. She doubted Uncle had caught on that these were officially ordered mutinies, but he had managed to call in a few favors from the Navy for their latest crew. It'd taken her weeks to even get her hands on the crew records, much less set up the necessary leverage.

And then Zhao had smashed her careful plans to bits with one vainglorious invasion. Honestly. How was she supposed to be properly efficient with so many idiots in the way?

At least the man had had the bare decency to lose himself in that fiasco. Good riddance. One less idiot to derail the march of their empire.

Two less, now, she smirked. And soon to be more.

So. Breakfast, occupation duties, and plotting. And then, water would bend to her will. One way, or another.

Land. It was all Toph could do not to kiss it at odd moments. No rocking. No rolling. No meal-stealing nausea from water that just wouldn't stay still. No blindness.

"Augh!"

And on top of that, she got to kick Aang's butt. Didn't get much better.

Toph cracked her knuckles, then cracked the ground that had trapped Aang up to his nose when he'd stepped wrong. "Watching my hands again, huh?"

Aang scrambled out, then leapt skyward with a yelp as more seemingly solid layers crumbled into badger-mole tunnels. "You did all that with your feet?"

"Toes," the earthbender said simply, using them to smooth the rest of the ground solid as Katara and Sokka walked closer to the danger zone. Felt an interested little jig a few feet behind them, and barely kept the grin off her face. The betobeto might drive people up a wall most of the time, but it seemed to have enough good sense to back off when the bending started. Which meant Aang wasn't just practicing 'til he got bored anymore. He'd practice 'til he thought he was bored. Then he'd take a break, chase a flutter-hornet or Momo or who knew what, flop down, hear footsteps - and all of a sudden get interested in lessons all over again.

Next time she caught Sparky, she had to hug him.

Not that Toph was going to let on about that. Why spoil a good thing?

Think I'm gonna call it Boots, Toph decided. "Don't watch me, Twinkletoes," she said firmly. "Watch the ground. Feel it. You feel the air, right?"

"How can anybody not feel air?" Aang touched down, feather-light. "Everybody has to breathe."

"Except when they're diving after turtle-seals," Sokka muttered, too low for anyone else to hear.

Toph frowned, wishing she'd been a little less sick and a little more listening when Chief Hakoda had asked them to take Appa and head inland for a while. But about all she'd been up to at the time was adding her nauseated vote to Hakoda's and Sokka's about staying away from people.

Aang was having a hard time with the idea of "the world thinks you're dead". Wanted to head back, try to bust up Ba Sing Se, and get himself zapped by Azula again. Well, tough. As Sokka had pointed out, a bunch of times, they didn't know exactly how long an eclipse lasted. They needed every edge they could get. Including letting the Fire Nation think they could breathe easy.

How long that would last, Toph had no idea.

Sparky doesn't want us dead. But he's got a volcano of a temper, and he knows Aang's teamed up with the Water Tribes. And he thinks they're gonna kill his people.

On top of that, Zuko was living proof he was willing to risk it all to make things right. And what Zuko thought was right... well, it sure didn't match up with Aang's idea of right.

So what's he gonna do?

She didn't know. And that made Toph worried. Zuko didn't just face the impossible. He stood his ground when it barreled down on him, threw it into a bamboo-thorn thicket, and bashed it over the head. With a rock, if that was all he had. He'd chased the Avatar for half a year. The Avatar. When he didn't even think he was a firebending master.

Sure, Aang was a kid. Sure, Aang never tried to kill him. But Aang was an airbending master. Anybody sane would have gone down and stayed down.

Zuko wasn't sane. He wasn't seeing-things crazy, and he sure wasn't evil-crazy like Azula, but he was not walking on the same ground as everybody else. He was a friend, no doubt about it. And she was gonna kick his butt in the nicest way to get him to think. But Toph was never going to make the mistake of thinking Zuko was sane, reasonable, or even human.

Not twice, anyway.

Funny thing was, it didn't bother her. The badger-moles had been better family than her own, sometimes. And Zuko tried really, really hard to figure out where her lines in the sand were, and how not to cross them. Crazy, yeah. But he was decent. One of the best.

But he had lines, too. Deep ones. And Aang had just blown through them like they didn't matter.

Do that with a badger-mole, it'd bury you in the mountain or rip you to shreds. Zuko hadn't done either.

Fire needs revenge. So... whatever he's up to, it's gonna hurt Aang worse.

Darn it. If only they'd had a few more days to talk. She could have gotten that plan out of Uncle eventually, she just knew it. At least she could have maybe gotten Zuko to talk more about the Dai Li, those earth shoes just might be a good idea in some places-

"But I don't want to fight you!" Aang protested.

Sokka was hefting his boomerang, stance set and determined. "I'm not saying we have to fight. I just want you to practice making sure Boomerang doesn't hit you."

"It's not like the Fire Nation uses boomerangs."

"Yeah, well, I haven't got arrows to shoot at you," Sokka said, sounding even less happy about it than Aang. "You said those Yu Yan caught you, right?"

"Oh, yeah." Aang shook his head, amazement shivering from his toes. "I knew some people in the Fire Nation were archers; Kuzon snuck away with me to see some, once. Whoa, did he ever get in trouble for that! But I never saw anybody shoot like that, ever."

"So why haven't we ever seen them chasing us again?" Sokka asked, pointedly.

Silence.

Aang gulped. "Come on, Sokka, they know that didn't work-"

"They know somebody in a mask broke you out after you were captured," Sokka said bluntly.

"That's not exactly a didn't work."

"We're using the eclipse so they won't firebend!" Aang protested.

"And Zuko broke you out without firebending," Sokka shot back. "They fight, Aang. They teach everybody to fight. Yeah, we're hitting them during the eclipse. Yeah, they won't have fire. Mai and Ty Lee ring a bell? No fire? Doesn't exactly stop them."

"It's just in case," Katara jumped in. "Just practice making Boomerang go somewhere Sokka didn't aim it." A shift of her weight, looking toward Toph. "You've been working so hard on earthbending..."

Not as hard as Toph would like, but - yeah. This would work. "Good idea," Toph agreed. "Work with air some. Get all loosened up." She slapped a fist into her palm. "So I can grind you into the boulders, later."

"Sometimes, Toph? You scare me," Sokka muttered. Slung an arm over Aang's shoulders, heading back to where Appa and Momo were doing their best to strip a thorny bush of fruit. "Now, the thing to remember is, Boomerang always comes back..."

Katara shifted her weight to watch them go, and sighed. "We need to talk."

"This have anything to do with why you're not pushing Aang to figure out air-healing?" Toph said wryly. Tapped her toes on the ground, inviting Boots to hang around them, instead of pestering Aang while sharp things were flying at his head. Save that for later.

"I don't see you trying to get him to work on that with earth," Katara said pointedly.

"Don't think so," Toph shrugged, feeling silent tippy-taps sneaking up behind Katara. Not that she thought the spirit was out to trip Katara; not this time. Long as it was daylight, it seemed to stick to just sneaking. Unless Aang acted like he was forgetting about it, at which point Boots got pushy as an overfed cat-owl.

"I'm a rumble fighter," Toph went on. "I hit things, they stay down. Healing? I don't have a clue. If somebody's so hurt it's me or nothing, I'll try it. Anything else, I'm calling you. Or Asiavik." Or better yet, Sparky. If I can get him. "Know what I think we should do? Find some nice guy earthbender who wants to help people. I can get him started, and he can figure it out. Not sure I ever will. I like messing people up too much."

"Haru," Katara blurted out.

Toph rocked back a little, surprised. "You know somebody?"

"The earthbenders in his village were all taken away to a Fire Nation prison barge. I... kind of got him captured," Katara admitted. "We set it up so Aang could make me look like an earthbender, and when the Fire Nation took me, Sokka and Aang followed us. We got coal to the prisoners, and they threw all the soldiers overboard." She nodded. "Haru's kind. He got caught because I asked him to help someone. If you showed him, I know he could do it."

"Sounds like a plan," Toph said, relieved. Flicked a finger, sending a stone skating across the ground for Boots to pounce on. "A barge? Is that where you lost your necklace?"

"I think so- That weevil-rat! Did he tell you what he did with it? First he tried to get me to give up Aang for it, then he used it so this big... nose-seeing thing with a bounty hunter could smash up a whole abbey..."

"Whoa, easy. Just checking," Toph said plainly. Zuko's version of events had been a little less villainous, but not by much. The firebender had admitted he was tracking down an enemy of the whole Fire Nation. Bribes, bounty hunters, eel-hounding somebody to the ends of the earth? Zuko wasn't exactly proud of any of it, but he'd do it all over again. In a heartbeat.

And... somehow, that poked at her ideas of just what Zuko might do next. If she could only figure out how.

"Anyway." Katara let out an angry huff, calming herself down. "I just... Air Nomads are peaceful. We know that."

"I know what Aang's like," Toph shrugged. "And a few things Iroh and Zuko said. That's about it."

"They were! Gran-Gran told us about them."

"Okay," Toph agreed. "So what's the problem?"

Katara sucked in a breath, probably biting her lip. "Why would a healer carry a sword?"

Oh. Wow.

"Never mind," Katara said impatiently. "It doesn't matter, it must have been a long time ago-"

"Maybe somebody didn't want her getting to the good guys," Toph broke in.

"But she was a bender!"

"Not everybody's got as much chi to throw around as Twinkletoes," Toph said seriously. "Healing takes it out of you. Just fixing up Aang a little - I've come out of rumbles feeling better."

"I know, but..."

Toph waited, letting silence do the work for her.

"Bending is a gift from the spirits," Katara said at last. "If we don't trust the spirits, who are we? Just look at the Fire Nation! All coal and steel and burning down forests and hurting people - ugh!"

Toph frowned.

"Well, they're wrong!"

"Give me a minute," Toph said impatiently. "I'm thinking about it." And not liking everything she was thinking. I guess I owe Sokka an apology. Maybe a couple. "Your tribe uses swords. They're made out of whale teeth, but they're still sharp pointy things."

"They have to," Katara said practically. "They're not benders."

Definitely owe Snoozles an apology, Toph decided. "So if Ty Lee got your bending again, you wouldn't use a sword?"

"I wouldn't even be able to move!"

But Zuko could. "Coal burns," Toph said seriously.

"That doesn't have anything to do with the spirits."

"Maybe not water spirits," Toph said impatiently. "You guys use ice for everything. You even make houses out of it. Why can't the Fire Nation use fire?"

"They don't firebend to keep their ships and tanks and drills running," Katara brushed it off.

"And your dad doesn't waterbend to keep his ships sailing, either," Toph pointed out.

"You sound like you think what they're doing is right!" Water sloshed in Katara's waterskin. "Well, it's not! It's not fair. It's not what the spirits want. Forget Zuko; none of them have any honor!"

Maybe I should try healing after all, Toph thought sourly, feeling stone skitter back across the ground her way. And stop, as Boots felt the chill in the air. Even if I just end up sneezing dust, it might help the headache.

Though she couldn't blame Katara for still being mad at Zuko. That letter had been kind of like getting flattened by house-sized hailstones. No way to see it coming, and nothing you could do afterward but pick up the pieces.

...Damn, Sparky was good.

Wish I'd been on Kyoshi Island last winter. Could've snagged them all and helped Uncle talk him around.

Well, maybe. Zuko was as stubborn as an earthbender. And he'd probably been a lot crankier.

"We're on dry land. If you're so mad you want to run off and leave Aang twisting in the wind with Sokka, I'm right behind you."

"I am not angry at Aang!"

She says, freezing every drop of water in twenty feet, Toph thought wryly.

"...He doesn't care about Mom," Katara whispered at last. "How can he not care? When we found Gyatso's skeleton - he almost blew everything off the mountain. Why..." She hugged herself, chilled. "Why can't he see I feel like that?"

"He didn't have a mom," Toph reminded her. "He had a teacher. He probably thinks you ought to get broken up like that over Pakku. Only Pakku's still alive."

"Pakku?" Katara sputtered.

"He taught you, right? Like you're teaching Aang." And didn't that make her stomach move a bit queasy, dry land or not. Katara as the teacher Aang had a crush on... she'd overheard stuff like that at the arena, and it never seemed to be good.

"Pakku?" Katara repeated, shocked.

"Air." Toph jabbed a finger toward where Boomerang was whirring through the wind, then pointed at Katara. "Water." Jabbed a thumb at herself. "Earth. We're in this together, but we started from different places. That's not wrong. Just the way it is. So we have to work harder to work together? We can do that." She crossed her arms. "First, we win. Then we fix things."

"You sound like Sokka," Katara sighed.

"He's a pretty cool guy, sometimes," Toph admitted. Too bad he'd met Suki first. "So, you need another person for this calm-you-down meditation stuff?"

"I was going to do it with Aang..."

"Do it more with Aang later, when you're already cooled down, so you can show him better," Toph suggested. When Aang would need it, given she could feel the whisper-steps of Boots sneaking that way. "Please? I want to feel it. Maybe it'll help me figure out seawater."

"What are you doing with seawater?" Katara asked warily.

Toph grinned.

"And again," Iroh said patiently, hand against hand as he felt his nephew's inner fire wax and wane. He heard a ruffled chirp, but trusted the rest of the crew and Asahi's own good sense to keep the ostrich-horse clear while they practiced. It seemed his intuition had been correct; modifying Amaya's tide-push meditation did give Zuko a better grasp on his fire.

Unfortunately, that still wasn't saying much.

If we had another week, even, to bring it under better control...

But they did not. Iroh drew a breath, and nodded. "Enough."

Zuko stepped back, sweating in the sunlight dappling the rear decks. Though perhaps more in the heat of attentive eyes, Iroh mused, noting with some humor how Zuko tried to avoid the gazes on him. It seemed his nephew had grown used to being overlooked.

"It's still not good enough, is it." Zuko's voice was quiet; not so much resigned, as simply accepting unpleasant fact.

"To pass unnoticed anywhere near Azula? No, it will not be," Iroh said frankly. "But you have passed as a common firebender before. We will simply need to be careful."

Zuko frowned. "She missed me in the palace."

"Oh?" Iroh raised a brow, curious. Either Azula had been unusually distracted, or... "At what distance?"

"Maybe fifteen feet."

Iroh blinked.

"Straight up," Zuko added, reddening a little.

Iroh made himself breathe. And reminded himself that now was not the time to chew his entirely too brave nephew out for taking what must have been the best of very bad options. "I would say that was... a bit risky."

"Only if she looked up," Zuko said sheepishly. Shrugged a bit. "I used to do it back- in the capital. It didn't always work at first."

Those marines practicing in earshot weren't even pretending not to listen now, Iroh realized ruefully. He couldn't blame them. To hide from someone with Azula's mastery of inner fire... "How?"

"He didn't want to be found," Sergeant Kyo said dryly. "Right, sir?"

"No one wants to be found by my sister, Sergeant," Zuko said wryly.

"Not what I'm talking about," the graying sergeant said plainly. "Do it now."

Zuko frowned. But seemed to settle himself, and breathed out-

Gone.

Brows arched, Iroh searched for the sense of his nephew's fire. The young man was standing right before him. Yet all he could feel was his own fire, the other benders, the sunlight warming the deck-

Sunlight on the deck.

"You have hidden your fire against the warmth around you," Iroh breathed. "How?"

"I... don't know," Zuko admitted, as Asahi stalked over for a scratch, judging practice over. "It's like sticking to shadows. You're the one who gave me the book!"

"Which book?" Iroh inquired. If anyone had said he was a bit wary of the answer, he would have denied it.

"To not be seen, is to be invisible," Zuko quoted.

Waves in Moon-shadow. Iroh didn't - quite - bury his head in his hands. Yes, a fine read for a young child. Full of waegu and epic sea battles and young warriors who dared to sneak even into dragon caves...

And Azula had frightened his nephew more than any dragon.

Sergeant Kyo cleared his throat. "Not a bad book to start an akuma komainu-ko off on, in my experience." He smiled slightly. "Anyone who can sneak past Private Sukekuni and Lieutenant Teruko, while they're looking for him, is doing something right."

Devil lion-puppy. Iroh inclined his head to the marine, amused and grateful. His nephew's startled look at being called a baby marine was priceless. "I have always suspected the marines kept a few tactics in reserve," he said mildly.

"Like we say, General, if you can choose what to bring to a fight? Bring a firebender, and a swordsman, and all their friends," the sergeant said wryly. "It's a state of mind. You have to make yourself part of the landscape. Not everybody can pull it off." He shrugged, deliberately casual.

"Besides, that's our job. Sneak in and scare the demons out of the enemy so you ground-pounders can burn them down like a dry field." He looked over them both as Lieutenant Teruko came back down to the deck from consulting with Captain Jee. "Now that the sneaking part's a little more likely..."

"There's not much that can scare Azula," Zuko said honestly, scratching along an interested neck. "She has the Dai Li following her, and they hunt man-eating kamuiy. We can surprise them. We might even shock them. We're not going to scare them." He frowned over the lake waters. "Even if we could get in and out without a trace - and Sergeant, I am never that lucky - she's going to have a fast ship to chase after us, or she'll hunt down the ground evacuation..."

Lieutenant Teruko almost said something. Iroh held up a hand for silence.

Fingers buried in black feathers, Zuko scowled. "Where are the ferries?"

"I doubt any more refugees will be making use of Full Moon Bay," Iroh observed. "Not with our army within Ba Sing Se's very walls."

"Yes, but where are the ferries?" his nephew said impatiently. "The merchant ships, the fishing fleets - some of them ought to be out this far..." Gold eyes narrowed, and Asahi followed his gaze with her own lazy blink. "Lieutenant. You'd make a good pirate."

"Sir?" Teruko said through clenched teeth.

"That sounded a lot better in my head," Zuko said faintly. "I meant-"

"Won't work," Kyo said bluntly. "Not unless you can give us an idea who and what are where in the harbor."

What will not work? Iroh almost asked. But held his tongue. If Zuko had found an answer...

"Yes, I can," Zuko said, half amazed. "You wouldn't believe how I know, Sergeant, but... I know Ba Sing Se's docks. As well as Amaya does." He looked straight at Teruko. "And if we can get under the city, I think I can get willing crews."

She winced, obviously trying not to rub at a headache. "Sir. You're not-"

"No one else can do this, Lieutenant."

"Unfortunately, he is correct," Iroh sighed. "The Earth King would be insulted by one of lesser rank."

"The Earth King, sir?" Kyo raised a brow. "Won't the princess have him by now?"

"She'd keep it quiet if she did. If it were up to her," Zuko stated. "Azula's always twenty moves ahead. She knows it'd be better to keep people guessing. If it were up to her, Kuei would be a figurehead right now, the Walls would still be up, and she'd have every Earth Army ordered into range to be obliterated. But it's not."

"My brother favors an open display of victory, especially when it will be most crushing to his enemies' spirits," Iroh agreed, thinking on that short, tetchy, and surprisingly informative message Suzuran had received from Master Sergeant Yakume. Information carried almost as much in how it had been written as the text itself; the tone might be barely civil, but the words were as formal as any experienced officer reporting to... well, to a general.

Yakume knows I am on this ship. But I do not think he has told Azula.

At least, he had not at the time of the message. Yakume was an honorable man, but Zuko's sister could be entirely too persuasive.

For his sake and ours, I hope not.

Iroh disliked building plans on hope. Still, whatever Yakume might have let slip, there was no way Azula would believe her brother had survived.

"If Azula doesn't have the Earth King, he's hiding," Zuko went on, letting Asahi press against him. "If he's hiding, there aren't that many people who can hide him. Either he's with our people or they'll know how to find him."

"And if the Earth King's not inclined to be persuaded, sir?" Teruko said bluntly.

Zuko smirked. "Then we ask the captains who they want to take their chances with. After we get far enough from the city, we'll let them go."

Azula won't, hung in the air like smoke.

Teruko glanced subtly at her sergeant. Who nodded, ever so slightly.

"All right, let's take this up to the captain," Teruko decided. "It might work, sir. But we're going to need all the details on this harbor we can drag out of your head. Both of you, sir," she added, glancing at Iroh. "I know you must have taken the harbor into account in your siege plans."

Indeed he had. Though he had never seen it until that day on the ferry. "We are at your disposal, Lieutenant." He couldn't help but smile.

"Uncle?" Zuko said warily, an equally suspicious beak suddenly swiveling to glare Iroh's way.

Iroh chuckled. "If we are to defy Avatar Kyoshi's decree, we may as well be thorough." He smirked. "Waegu, indeed."

"They look too good to be pirates," Saoluan said thoughtfully, perched at the Wave Runner's rail to peer across brackish water at the sleek, red-and-dark trim of the fast little ship docked among the oak-mangroves. Steel, Fire Nation to the bone if that smokestack was anything to go by... yet anchored among the odd little wood and skin boats plying this estuary like an Unagi curled up and smirking as the fishing fleet sailed by.

That elbow-jab, she felt even through armor. "Like people who want to cut your throat can't be neat?" Langxue hissed.

"Well, sometimes," she admitted, switching her gaze to the swamp flatboat racing toward them with the weirdest waterbending she'd ever seen, spray rising behind it like rapids. Shaking her head, she eyed the stout, smirking man supervising the lowering of a rope ladder; Mi, their dear captain. She didn't have a real high opinion of Mi at the moment.

"We're sailing straight to Omashu," he said. Unagi's toothpicks, we are.

But Saoluan smiled, and breathed deeply, just as one of the more friendly sailors passed by. Instigating a dropped jaw, a stammer, and a threatening slosh of hot tar out of a bucket before Langxue gave him enough of a shove to counterbalance. "Hey, Shu," Saoluan purred. "Who are all these guys?"

"Um..."

Langxue glared at the man, a palm-full of water clinking into spiked ice.

Saoluan stifled a giggle as Shu sobered, fast. Sailors were the same everywhere. Some of them had hearing problems. The word "no", for instance. Even if no came with the visual illustration of sprained wrists. Not broken wrists, unfortunately; she might have paid their passage, but a captain flexible enough with law and custom to help her sneak out an orphan waterbender wasn't exactly going to cry a river if his disgruntled crew decided to dump them over the side. Sleazeball.

Pincushion sailors with ice, though, and their ears suddenly started working. Jarred, maybe, by the reminder that Langxue was a waterbender, and dumping them over the side might be the last thing anyone wanted to do.

"Well," Shu started, "this is the edge of the Foggy Swamp - I know it's kind of surprising, there are waterbenders here-"

"The Fire Nation guys," Langxue said bluntly.

"Oh! Right. Um." Shu sweated a little. Maybe it was the heat. "Don't worry about 'em."

"About Fire Nation?" Saoluan said pointedly.

"Yeah, well... see the flag?"

She saw two; the black flame of the Fire Nation, clear and pristine - and flying precisely below that, a three-quarter-sized flag of a blue mountain on a sunset-shaded field. "Why does a Fire Navy ship have two flags?" Saoluan said bluntly.

"It's not navy," Shu said uncomfortably. "That's a domain flag. Look, that's Byakko. Don't spread it around, but... they're not too bad. Even if they are kind of... off." His voice dropped to a confiding whisper. "They eat bugs!"

Saoluan's jaw dropped. Though probably not for the reasons Shu was thinking of. Kyoshi Island had picked up some odd habits from their waterbending kin, compounded by living on an island. If you wanted meaty, fatty, mouth-watering goodness that wasn't fish or chicken-pig? There were options. The elders probably would have told the Avatar they were river shrimp. If they'd served any of such options at all; apparently Air Nomads were vegetarians.

Food. Real food, that wasn't dried mutton-beef or salted fish. From that sudden glint in Langxue's eyes, he was just as tempted as she was to jump overboard and go raid a Fire Nation galley.

Not that she was going to admit it. Mainlanders had some pretty harsh things to say about people eating anything that squirmed.

Wimps.

"Your shaman wants what?" Mi blustered.

The stocky Swamper in leaves, leather, and bamboo heaved a put-upon sigh. "How many times have we gotta tell you? Hue's no shaman. He just sees what is... Whoa., spooky. There they are." Stomping over the deck, he ducked and touched his leaf hat. "Ma'am. Young'un. The Moon, bless her heart, dropped in on Hue. Said you might be headed this way, and could use a hand. If the tides came out right."

"Dropped in?" Saoluan echoed faintly.

"She shone on the Tree, ma'am." He gave her a wry smile. "Hue's kinda funny that way."

He was wearing about as much clothes as she'd go to a summer beach in. In public. And he thought someone else was weird?

"Well, now... I'd be Tho," he said gravely. "That's Due down there in the boat waitin' for us. And you might be?"

"She's Kyoshi Warrior Saoluan," Langxue said firmly. "I'm Langxue. Why does the Moon want you to do anything? We're on a ship already. We need to get north. Soon."

"Do, huh?" Tho cast a speculative glance at Captain Mi. Who was giving them a smile oily enough that Saoluan wanted soap. Or maybe a torch. "Well. Might could be y'all did not impress upon the captain the seriousness of y'all's situation."

"My men need a break," Mi said bluntly. "We need to pitch seams. Resupply with fresh water. Rest a little." He smirked at her. "Of course, if we had some incentive to get underway a bit faster..."

I hate him a lot, Saoluan decided, subtly gripping Langxue's shoulder before the little yāorén could go for his sword. "Well, if you're all going to be so busy," she chirped, "we should just get out of your way for the day! Don't you think so?"

Guanyin be thanked, he didn't try to push it. Yet.

Saoluan boarded the little boat behind Langxue, taking a deep breath to steady herself. And managed not to scream it all out again, as Due wind-milled his arms and their craft took off like a bolt of lightning.

"Awesome!"

Saoluan watched Langxue lean into the breeze, grinning like a maniac, and slapped down her own impulse to panic. This wasn't the yāorén, or even the little warrior who took every lesson she taught to heart. This was the kid who should have grown up on his family's boat, happy in the wind and water and salt.

Let him have his fun, Saoluan told herself as Due added his own giggling laugh, showing off with a slalom through the water for a fellow bender. Spirits know, we could all use some.

They zipped through the small maze of floating docks and salt-stippled trees, slipping out of sight of the Wave Runner in minutes. Vrooming around to raise quite a bit more rainbow-glittering spray, until Tho and Due exchanged nods, and Due shifted to an almost sedate glide through the water.

A glide that brought them to the dock just by the Byakko ship, still out of the Wave Runner's view. Why was she not surprised?

But they didn't head on board. Which did surprise her. Instead, Tho helped them up onto the dock, argued with his maybe-cousin as the two Swampers tied up, and sat back down in the boat with Due to wait. Politely. At a distance. With a lot of splashing involved, as the pair of them got out a net to go after little fish swarming under the dock.

If she hadn't been watching toward the Fire Nation ship, she'd never have seen the noble coming.

Old, given that full head of snowy hair, pulled up and back in an antique phoenix-tail. Not tall, even for Fire Nation; she'd put him at least two inches shy of her own height. But an easy stride, katana and wakazashi thrust through his belt with quiet confidence...

I do not want to start a fight with this man.

Oddly, she didn't think she'd have to. Those long white whiskers of a mustache twitched with what seemed like relief, and his eyes-

I've never seen eyes like that. Ever.

Pale gold, that seemed to peer through her to her bones. But glinting with humor as well as fire, warm and deep as summer waters.

Saoluan let out her own breath of relief. Whoever he was, he was better than she was, and they both knew it. And he had no intention of fighting.

Spirits. She almost felt like crying. We're safe. We're finally- What am I thinking, he's Fire Nation...

With the oddest outfit she'd ever seen. Oh, the robe wasn't too outlandish. Wrapped in a belt to carry those swords, but the clasps at the right shoulder and the slit sides for free movement reminded her of stuff she'd seen on merchants from the edges of the Earth Kingdom. But on top of that he was wearing an odd, long-sleeved outer... not exactly a robe, it seemed to be only secured by one tie in front. A flow of deep red silk, with black triangles hemming the sleeves like mountains, or flames-

Not black, Saoluan realized, as sunlight shimmered with indigo glints. Very, very dark blue.

Why is a Fire noble wearing Water colors?

And why was Langxue eyeing him like he couldn't decide whether to hug the man or cut him down on the spot? "Could you make it any more obvious?" Langxue challenged.

A white brow went up. "Obvious, am I?" A baritone chuckle, without even a hint of the cracks of age.

"You're not even sweating!"

Saoluan blinked, breathing in the muggy air off the swamp. How could she have missed that? She was sweating, Langxue's hair was so damp it was spiky... and the noble looked like it was just a nice, spring-gentle day.

"I am old enough to do as I wish, young man," the elder said dryly. "And those of Byakko are known for being old-fashioned. Who am I to deny custom?"

Which was a twisty enough statement to make Saoluan narrow her eyes at him. There'd been an odd pause in his voice before custom. Like he was leaving something important out.

"Human custom," Langxue said flatly.

Saoluan's eyes widened. Oh no. Oh, hell. Oh, Oma and Shu, how do I get us out of here-

"It's okay!" Langxue grabbed her left hand before she could move, still gazing at the noble. "He's help." He hesitated. "I think."

"Are you certain?" the elder said levelly.

"If you were a dark dragon, La wouldn't have asked Hue to help us meet," Langxue said firmly.

A dark dragon? Saoluan wondered. The dragons are dead.

"Don't be too certain," came the growl of a reply. "Your lady can be cruel, if it serves her purposes." He gripped the bridge of his nose, and let out a gusting sigh, with only a hint of steam curling from his lips. "But done is done, and my grandson will need your help. As I know you need his." He bowed, hands in the Flame. "I am Shidan of Byakko. And yes, Warrior, I am help. Much as it may gall me. I have nurtured plans to protect those of my domain longer than you can imagine, and to have them overthrown in one throw of the spirits' dice..." Another sigh, but humor glinted in pale gold again. "We of the flesh plan, and those of the spirit act, and all of us must ride the storm. And pray."

"Would someone like to talk so I can get what's going on?" Saoluan scowled, looking between them both with malice aforethought.

"You'd better sit down," Langxue advised.

"I am not sitting down!" Saoluan fumed. "If this is about not scaring me, forget it! You're too late. This is a Fire noble who says the Moon sent him. Doesn't that seem just a little wrong?"

"He's a dragon, Saoluan."

Gaping, Saoluan sat on rocking wood.

Shidan folded himself gracefully down to match, sheathed swords pulled free to rest against his shoulder. "No screams, Warrior? Either you don't believe, or you're blessed with a braver heart than I would have hoped."

"I don't... not believe," Saoluan managed, still staring. "But... Fire Lord Sozin hunted the dragons. They're dead."

"Indeed he did, and so it has been thought," Shidan said gravely. "Those of us who did survive have gone to great lengths to be sure rumor is considered truth." He eyed Langxue again. "Yet another reason I am not amused at your Lady." A slow breath, and he shook his head. "But we have common foes, and none of us has time for wounded pride."

"What foes?" Saoluan pounced, glad to be back on firmer ground. So to speak. Enemies were killable.

...Well, most of them were. Koh might be another matter.

Focus. "The only enemies we've got are the Fire Nation," Saoluan drove on, not bothering to hide her narrowed eyes. "So unless you're planning to help us take them on-"

"I hope I will not be driven to such lengths," Shidan said soberly. "True, it may come to that. But I fear Makoto will find us first."

Langxue stiffened.

Saoluan tried not to shiver. "Someone you... remember?" No. No way. That was a thousand years ago, no one could-

"Dragons live a long, long time," Langxue whispered. Turned a look on Shidan of mingled anger and despair. "Spirits, why hasn't somebody killed her?"

"Many have died trying," Shidan said dryly. "Those of my clan said she was cornered once, before Kyoshi came..." He sighed. "And a century ago, she found yet another way to elude challenges. You knew her as Makoto, long ago. But in the Fire Nation, she was Fire Lady Tejina. Wife of Sozin, and mother of Azulon."

Father of Fire Lord Ozai. Saoluan swallowed dryly. The Fire Lord isn't human. "Azulon's dead."

"Yes; assassinated within the walls of his very palace," Shidan said, with a grim satisfaction.

"Makoto has never forgiven my kin for that. Nor will she. Ever. Yet even if she cared nothing for us - and she has very good reasons to hone her thoughts on us, young warriors - she, too, remembers the yāorén. Better than you can, young one, no matter how La has meddled. Far better than I, who was not even hatched when the last yāorén walked this earth. She knows you are her enemy. She knows you will move against her." He frowned. "I have clouded my grandson's trail. Our blood is wave as well as mountain; it can hide even the Moon's pull, if she is not close. But you, young one..." Gold eyes were level. "By now, Koh knows of you. And he will find a way to act. Makoto has been his ally before. I do not doubt she will be so again."

"And you're not strong enough to stop her," Langxue said quietly.

Saoluan winced. Oh, that's torn it. We're going to have blood and limbs and all kinds of nasty-

"True," Shidan acknowledged, obviously less than pleased to admit it. "My lady and I have kept Makoto's accursed nose out of our territory. As my parents did before me, and theirs before them. Byakko is safe. But that is wit, and cunning. If the battle should come to pure strength and fire... She is old, little yāorén. Old, and hateful, and evil. And her beloved is dead these many decades. She is wings and claws and flame. And I..." He inclined his head slightly, a rueful smile. "I am what you see."

"But - you're a dragon," Saoluan blurted out. Because it was impossible, it had to be - but Langxue believed it.

"A night, or a lifetime," Langxue murmured. "I don't... I should know, I just..."

"Agni's gifts always have their cost," Shidan nodded. "As I said. For so long as my lady lives... I am what you see." Teeth glinted in his smile. "Though that is no small thing. And I will aid you. My lady would prefer I do so and come back in one piece - but for our grandson, she will understand if I must take risks." A quiet laugh. "She'll likely thank you for the need, later. Chosen fate or not, I grow restless if I stay too long chained in customs and civility. And you offer me the chance to threaten a few mortals and help my true lord's sister?" A curled lip flashed fang. "How can I refuse?"

"We didn't offer you anything," Saoluan said pointedly.

"No," Shidan allowed. "Not yet." He regarded them both. "Warrior. I offer aid. I offer help - I cannot heal your wound, young yāorén. But I can buy you time. And in regard to time..." He gestured at his ship. "Nami no Kizu is faster than any craft you can hire. And a great name's husband can pass through many barriers. Even those of steel and fire."

"He can get us past Fire Navy blockades," Langxue said in an undertone.

"If he wants to," Saoluan shot back, not bothering to lower her voice. "If this isn't some kind of crazy Fire Nation trap - how are you even here, if we need you so much? And don't tell me about spirits, or luck. I don't have luck anymore." Except bad.

"You'll have much in common with my grandson, then," Shidan said dryly. "And you may only partly blame the spirits for this. I may be what you see, but I am still spirit enough to sense the fires of my kin, and of my children. And only a bit more than a month ago... I felt La drown my grandson."

Langxue winced. "She did it the hard way."

"Indeed," Shidan nodded. "I knew he was not dead, but..." He sighed. "This is not the first time I have felt Agni consider sharing one of his children. Decades ago I combed the world for spirit-healers, and found... well. For good or ill, that firebender was never chosen. But I feared greatly for my grandson. It took time to arrange my absence from Byakko, and when my lady and I had nearly managed it - I felt him healed." He shrugged ruefully. "Given the chance of Makoto's peril, Kotone and I decided I would go anyway. But a bit more quietly, and slowly. Those who know Byakko, know we trade with the Foggy Swamp. And those who think they know us, know we seek information on the war, and will be on the hunt for it in the wake of what happened at the North Pole." He inclined his head. "So I am here."

Normally, Saoluan was good at reading people. But Shidan had admitted he wasn't exactly a person, and even if he sounded sincere... "I don't trust you."

"Saoluan!" Langxue hissed.

"Let her speak," Shidan said sternly. "My kind prefer the most ruthless truth to lies." He inclined his head. "And how should I be offended? I have given you no reason you can touch. Only my words. That I will not lie to you - you do not know our kind. You do not know it is truth."

Saoluan's jaw dropped, before she caught it again. Fire attacked. Always. And he'd just let her assault slide away... "You don't lie? Then why are you wearing blue?"

"A custom of Byakko." Fingernails prying a splinter loose from the dock, he breathed it into flame. And beckoned.

Flame rippled out in a crackling stream, flowing about his hands as he rose and moved. Liquid amber, it spiraled and lashed, deceptively slow. Never still, ever shifting...

"Wave clan," Langxue blurted out. "Your flag is a mountain - but you're a wave clan."

"We are both," Shidan acknowledged, letting flame flow back to the splinter before he blew it out. "Though the heart of the wave, we must keep hidden from all but a few. For the power to heal is the power to let those of true loyalty defy the Fire Lord. And Sozin would let none who defied him survive."

"Fire that heals?" Saoluan said in disbelief. "Fire can't heal!"

"Yes," Langxue said soberly. "Yes, it can. All the wave clans are healers." Sea-green narrowed. "So come up with a better story, because there's no way Sozin could wipe out half his own people..." He trailed off, suddenly pale. Clapped a hand over his mouth, and breathed hard.

Saoluan kind of felt like tossing their poor excuse for a breakfast herself. All the old stories. The old jokes, about Kyoshi and the waegu...

"You do not trust me, Warrior of Kyoshi?" Shidan's tones were velvet over steel. "I've no reason to trust you. Save that we may have common allies... and we most certainly have a common enemy." He nodded, once. "I offer a temporary alliance. Should we choose to travel together, I will defend you, and I will expect the same. Within limits," he scowled at Langxue. "I know the wound you carry, and I will not have you worsen it. The world needs you alive." He glanced down. "And that shames me. It shames us all. You are young. Barely fledged. I should stuff you back into the nest and fight..." He sighed. "But the world is not so kind."

Silence fell. Saoluan swallowed, and eyed Langxue. "Temporary alliance?"

"I hate your guts, but we both hate the other guy's guts more," Langxue filled in. "So we bury the hatchet and both kick his butt, first."

Saoluan raised an eyebrow, and looked over them both. "So... you've got a good reason to go north?"

"Indeed." Shidan smirked. "I bring my clan the fortuitous news of a granddaughter. Those in Pohuai Stronghold are not as close kin as some of those here... but they will be relieved to know the domain's line is secure."

Kin. "There are dragons in the swamp?" Saoluan blurted out.

Shidan chuckled. "Not quite."

And if that wasn't an I've got a secret smirk, she'd eat her lotus tile. "Pohuai Stronghold, huh?" Saoluan mused. "Wow. That just happens to be on the way to Gaipan."

"By some quirk of fate, yes, it is," Shidan smiled wryly.

Steeling herself, she gripped his arm in a warrior's clasp. "So what are we waiting for?"

Chapter End Notes

If you're wondering what's up with firebenders and genealogies, besides just trying not to have too much dragon blood, the interested reader might check out human mitochondrial genetics on Wikipedia. Especially the facts that the mtDNA passed to kids from the same mother can vary remarkably, and have differing effects depending on the nuclear DNA involved. Mixing two species (and their mitochondria), even with the spirits taking a hand, isn't exactly something that's always going to have good results. Given the Fire Nation doesn't have genetic testing to figure out what the problem is, they go by a rough rule of thumb: do not marry descendants of sisters. Even so, this doesn't catch everything.

And yes, theoretically speaking, Mai and Zuko would be fine. They don't know that. Plus, they know Azula's involved. Assuming whatever Azula's involved in will screw you up royally (pun intended) is a survival trait.

"Dragon-child" doesn't have to refer to a direct dragon descendant; it can also refer to anyone who exhibits enough of the traits to show there's a lot of dragon in their background. And it can skip generations. (However, Teruko does come from a long, long line of tavern-burners...)

Akuma komainu-ko - roughly, "devil stone lion (or lion-dog) cub". The stone lions are protective guardians outside temples.

Shidan's outfit - think Piandao's robe, with a belt and a haori on top. Yes, the "mountain stripes" were inspired by the Shinsengumi.

For those who are wondering - don't worry about Sokka and Suki. Those two, in canon, understand each other enough to know they've got cultural differences to work out. I think that's the most grounded, plausible, working relationship in the whole show. (And one of the cutest. Sokka's Look of Awe when Suki goes after the Warden in Boiling Rock... there's a guy secure enough in being a warrior to appreciate her!)

And a reviewer pointed me to the TVTropes page on Embers.

...You guys are awesome. (Yes, even those of you who think I like Zuko too much. And that I did everything wrong. That page is cool!)

Chapter 34

Chapter Notes

And another Azula warning. Plus, many notes at the end.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

In the middle of the night, curled up next to Appa was the best place to be. For sleeping... or if you had to think.

Aang didn't really want to think, but, well - want to seemed to get lost a lot, ever since the monks had told him he was the Avatar. Which just wasn't fair.

...And nobody else seemed to think that it wasn't fair that it wasn't fair. Which didn't make any sense.

And he couldn't ask Toph, because she'd make it another lesson. And he couldn't ask Katara, because she'd try to make it all better. And he didn't want her to make it better.

...Well, no. He kind of did. But he had this itchy feeling that making it better wasn't making it fixed. And he just didn't know what to do-

Frustrated beyond measure, Aang thumped a fist on the ground.

"Gah!"

Aang grinned sheepishly as Sokka pinned a sleepy glare on him, sleeping bag half-raised by bent earth. "Um, Sokka? Can I talk to you a minute?"

Blue eyes blinked at him. Eyed Katara, blissfully dead to the world in her own bag. Turned to eye Toph, who seemed to smirk even in her sleep. If she was sleeping. Aang wasn't quite sure. Narrowed his gaze, and slowly scanned the starlit forest around them, as Sokka tilted an ear to listen for any trace of things moving that shouldn't be.

Why'd she have to call it Boots? Aang wondered, a little cross. I could have come up with a better name.

Why'd Toph have to call it anything at all, was what he really wondered. Gyatso had talked about spirits, a couple times. And one of the things Aang remembered from that was that names were important. The Moon and Ocean had names. Koh had a name. Now this thing had a name. That just couldn't be good.

But name or not, everything was quiet. For now.

Rolling his eyes toward the stars, Sokka gently scooped Momo up and off to the side against Katara. Gathered up his sleeping bag, and moved around to the other side of Appa, giving the drowsing bison an absent pat. "So what's up?"

A thousand things tumbled through Aang's head; he let the first one fall out of his mouth. "Why are you sure the Fire Lord's going to have the Yu Yan at the invasion?"

"I'm not. I kind of hope he doesn't," Sokka said, blinking himself more awake. "But it'd be dumb if we didn't plan for it. They caught you once."

"So what?" Aang said crossly. "So did those pirates."

"When they had Katara to lure us in. Not the same."

"Zhao almost got us a couple times."

"Not sure you noticed, but Zhao got munched by an angry fish spirit-monster," Sokka pointed out wryly. "He's kind of not available."

"Bumi did it-"

"By slipping funky rock rings on us when you couldn't earthbend. That's not going to work now." Sokka frowned. "Arrows still will."

"Oh, come on!" Aang burst out. "Even Zuko caught me! And the Fire Lord's not going to have him there."

All the way awake now, Sokka gave him a long look. "Even Zuko, huh?"

"Well..." Aang shrugged, feeling oddly itchy again under that stare. "It's not like he's that hard to beat."

Sokka didn't say anything.

"I did it with a mattress once!"

"A mattress?" Sokka said warily.

"On the ship. The first day he showed up," Aang grinned. "Boy, did he ever look mad."

"I didn't see a mattress when you washed those soldiers off the deck," Sokka pointed out.

"Well, no," Aang admitted, confused. "He was down, though, and I was gliding away to catch up with you guys, and then he jumped after me... What?"

Sokka sighed, and dropped down to thump the mossy ground by Appa's side. "Come on, buddy. We need to talk."

"Well... that's what I said, but..." Aang folded himself down by Sokka, worried. "What's wrong?"

Sokka wrapped blankets around himself, getting comfortable next to Appa's warm fur. Eyed Aang again, with a look of sympathy. "You never really got into a fight with other guys when you were growing up, did you?"

"A fight?" Aang echoed, not sure where this was headed. "We had practice. And sparring. The older students could get a little rough sometimes... well, that's what Gyatso said, anyway. We didn't see them much." He grinned. "Air Nomads. Gyatso always said teenagers needed to roam around and get it out of their system, and the younger grown-up monks could use up their energy to keep them out of trouble. Elders stayed at the temples. And kids."

"So you never really saw a fight, like us against Zuko," Sokka concluded.

"No!" Aang exclaimed, surprised Sokka could even think that. "Who'd want to do that?"

"Guys fight, sometimes," Sokka said plainly. "Girls too, when they get really mad. Though Gran-Gran usually got that stopped quick... Aang. When you're in a fight? You're not beaten until you go down and stay down."

"But... Zuko doesn't..."

"Unless we fly off, or he gets hit by a paralyzing tongue, or Katara buries him under ice after he's already walked through a blizzard - no. He doesn't," Sokka agreed. "Speaking of ice. You know what that finishing move of Pakku's really does, don't you?"

"I know what a finishing move is!" Aang shook in place a little; suddenly, deeply angry. He wasn't an idiot. He didn't care what Zuko thought. Zuko had hurt the best, most wonderful person he'd ever met. What did it matter what Zuko thought? "Why do you think I never froze anybody like that? That's a horrible thing to teach somebody! Even if you're just using it on a waterbender, and they can melt it back if they think about it. What if they get too scared to think? I do!"

Silence. Sokka was looking at him, eyes wide and surprised.

"Sometimes, I do," Aang admitted. "I'm learning it from Katara because I have to. I'm the Avatar. I have to master waterbending. Even when I never ever want to do that to anybody." He shivered. "Airbending doesn't have a finishing move. We're not like that. We respect life. We don't eat meat, we don't kill people - we don't have evil people!" And - that was the wrong thing to say, he just knew it...

"Must be pretty lonely, sometimes," Sokka said quietly.

"Lonely?" Aang said quickly, feeling his heart do a kind of funny stab, like it was trying to get somewhere else. "Why would I be lonely? I've got Appa, and Momo, and you guys..."

Sokka leaned forward, away from warm fur. "Yeah. But it's not the same. When we were at the North Pole..." He looked toward the sky, where moonlight filtered softly down through new leaves. "They were Water Tribe, but they weren't our tribe. They were... different." He let out a resigned breath. "Aang, this kinda doesn't make me sound like the best guy, but I think you ought to know. What really ticked me off about Hahn? Besides him thinking Yue was just a perk." Sokka almost growled at the thought; shook his head, and sighed again. "He said I was just a back-ice rube, who didn't know anything about the political complexities of their kind of life. And you know what? He was right."

"That's not right!" Aang protested, hands flying as if he could push away the ache in Sokka's eyes. "You're a great guy!"

"But I'm not that kind of guy," Sokka said bluntly. "I'm not like Chief Arnook. Fancy words, and moving like all those fancy furs are made out of iron, and just looking all sober and sad over Yue. She was his daughter and he just sits there. My dad would cry. Maybe later. After he knew the rest of us were safe. But I know he'd cry."

Aang bit his lip. "Maybe he did, and we just didn't see it," he suggested. "Kuzon was like that a lot. He was really... private. Gyatso told me some people are just like that." He hunted in memory. "Because Kuzon was from the old clans, and they don't talk much." And Gyatso had given him a look when he'd said it. The kind he sometimes used playing Pai Sho; pay attention, there's a move coming you won't see until it's over.

Only right about then Kuzon had shown up with Shidan, clear gold eyes obviously putting aside whatever it was he'd gone off upset about. Which was weird, he couldn't have had a chance to talk to anybody... but the sky was great, and they were going flying, so what was the problem?

"Maybe," Sokka admitted. "I'm still not that kind of guy. And I'm not the kind of guy you think I am, either. None of us are." Rummaging in his bag, he pulled out Boomerang. "I'm going to take a wild guess here, and I need you to tell me if I'm right. You think hunting is wrong. The same way you think killing people is wrong."

"Killing people is wrong," Aang objected. "But you're not - you don't-" How could he say this and make it come out right? "I know the Water Tribes hunt. You're not monks. You live on the ice, and, well, sea-prunes... though seaweed-bread's pretty good, I don't know why you don't eat more of that-"

"There's never a lot of it," Sokka shrugged. "You could gather all spring and summer, and you still couldn't feed the village. Gran-Gran says you'd get sick if you tried. Winter melts the fat right off you. People who don't hunt can't live at the poles." He fingered Boomerang's edge, just before the knife-sharp blade. "But it's kind of all tangled up together, right? You respect life. So you don't want to kill anything. Or anybody."

"Right!" Aang blew out a breath of relief, ruffling the bushes on the other side of the clearing. Sokka got it. And he wasn't mad. Whew. "If you don't respect life - well, you'd never be like Azula. But just look at the Fire Nation! How can they live like that?"

"Azula's a lousy hunter."

Aang couldn't help it. He blinked at Sokka, not sure he'd heard right. "But... she was in Omashu. And then the ghost town, and Ba Sing Se..."

"Sure, she showed up in Omashu," Sokka agreed. "I don't think she expected to see us. Then she tracked Appa's fur. And then she was in the drill, and she knew where we'd be as long as the Fire Army was camped outside the walls." He shook his head. "That's not hunting, Aang. More like... hanging around the storage pits to kill weevil-rats."

"Are we even speaking the same language?" Aang implored the sky. "Hunting, killing - what's the difference?"

"Respect."

Aang glared at him. "How can you respect life if you're gonna kill it?"

"If you don't, you're a lousy hunter." Sokka put Boomerang away. "Maybe I don't always act respectful hunting around here, but I don't know what animals off the ice want for their spirits. So I just hunt, and figure I'll say thanks later. If they let me kill them."

"If they let you?" Aang shook his head, hoping some sense would rattle loose. "You're human, Sokka. You're bigger than they are, smarter than they are-"

"You ever see an arctic hippo?" Sokka put in. "The spirits gave us brains, Aang. Like they gave animals better eyes, better ears, teeth, claws... arctic hippos can kill you. Easy. If you're not smart. Zebra-seals have fangs that can shred you. A hunter has to have respect. He's got to know what he's hunting. Study it. Be careful. And be lucky. And if you do all that, you get a chance to bring meat home. So the village lives." He spread empty hands. "I'm not asking you to go hunting, Aang. If the way Air Nomads respect the spirits is to not eat them - okay. But if you keep thinking people don't respect life when they do - you're not going to get why people are doing what they're doing. And that's like playing with blasting jelly. Sooner or later, it's going to blow up in our faces."

"He's right, Aang," Katara said flatly. "Though I think we all get Azula just fine. She doesn't just not respect life. She's... evil."

Aang jumped. Smiled weakly at the girls who'd just rounded Appa. "Um... hi?" I was kind of hoping you'd stay asleep? Uh-uh, that won't work-

"Start shoving earth around, I feel it," Toph said bluntly. "I don't know about hunting, but I gotta agree with Katara. Azula doesn't respect anybody."

"She'd risk killing a baby just to get her own way," Katara said darkly. "A Fire Nation baby. And Mai just let her."

"I'm not sure Mai had a choice," Sokka said thoughtfully. "If you're right, Toph, and they have to do what the Fire Lord wants - Azula's his daughter."

"So?" Aang said crossly. Not that he wanted to believe anyone could have wanted to risk a little kid's life. Even Mai, who looked like somebody had carved her face out of sour ice. But there was one big hole in Sokka's idea. "Zuko's his son."

"Zuko's banished," Sokka said bluntly. "That's not usually as nice as what happened to Katara." He crossed his arms, and gave his sister a sober look. "In the Water Tribes? Banished means you can't come back. No one can help you. No one will even talk to you, if they can get out of it." He glanced back at Aang. "I don't know how it works in the Fire Nation. All I know is what we saw. Azula got tanks, and drills, and all the help she had to have to take down Kyoshi Warriors. Zuko had a ship, and Iroh, and that weird bounty hunter. That's it. Zhao had more to go after us with than Zuko did."

Aang froze in place, staring at Katara. You couldn't come back? That wasn't a big deal. Before the war, people from other nations had told him that a lot; go away, and stay away. And maybe it wasn't nice, but there were always more places to go. More people to see. More creatures to ride, whether they liked it or not.

But... nobody would talk to you? That was horrible. That was... that was like being dead. "You did that?" he whispered. "For me?"

Katara swallowed dryly. "Aang-"

Sokka cut her off. "Don't answer that."

"Sokka!"

"This was a private, manly conversation, and I'd kind of appreciate it if you two would head back that way and let the rest of it be private. And manly." Sokka waved toward Appa's other side, blue eyes serious.

"Oh, sure. One day dodging rocks instead of ice, and you're incredibly manly." But Katara's gaze slid away from his, and she touched Toph's shoulder. "Come on. They probably just want to be gross at each other."

"Try closing your eyes," Toph advised as they moved off. "It's a lot harder to be gross if you can't see it." She jabbed a finger Sokka's way. "But if earthworms end up in my noodles? I know just who I'm coming for."

Aang grinned.

"Quit that!" Sokka hissed, as the girls went out of sight. "You know I wouldn't do that to Toph."

"Sure I do," Aang agreed, still grinning. "But does Toph know that?"

"She'll know when I tell her I didn't do it."

Yeah. She probably would. Darn.

"Aang." Sokka looked suddenly serious. "Don't ask Katara why she did that. Not unless you're sure you want to know."

"But she left because of me," Aang said, puzzled.

"Maybe."

"Maybe?" Aang echoed, incredulous. "She didn't want me to be alone, Sokka. She went penguin-sledding with me, she wanted to help-"

"She wanted to get to the North Pole and learn waterbending."

Aang stared at him. That... hurt. And it wasn't true. It couldn't be.

"I'm not saying that's why she went with you," Sokka said soberly. "We're your friends. And your family. But she's always wanted to be a waterbender. Even before Mom-" He had to stop, and shake his head. "Look. People can have a lot of reasons for doing something. And the one you see isn't always the one they're thinking of. Okay?"

Aang gulped. "You mean, like we think the Fire Nation is just out to take over the world. But they think," he had to pause, lump in his throat. "They think they're trying to protect themselves. From the Avatar." And that just wasn't right. The Avatar was supposed to be the hope for the world. That's what everybody said.

...Well, almost everybody.

"I think maybe some of them started out that way," Sokka said thoughtfully. "I'm pretty sure Iroh knows that's not what they're doing now." He glanced at Aang, fingers worrying the edge of his sleeping bag. "And I think... if Zuko really thought you were the bad guy, none of us would be here."

Aang was already sitting down. Now he kind of wished he could fall down. But Appa was behind him, which made that kind of not an option. "But... Zuko wouldn't... I mean, even at your village, with all that fire, he didn't want to hurt anybody! Not really." Aang rolled his eyes. "So I don't get why he's all upset about one lie. He got tricky first."

Sokka was silent.

Curious, Aang eyed him. "What's wrong now?"

Sokka dragged out Boomerang again. And this time, banged his head against it. "Aang... how did you know that?"

"Master airbender, remember?" Aang reminded him. "We just know." He frowned. "Only Jet... I guess he really believed he was doing the right thing, taking out the dam. Or he did while he was talking to us. Gyatso said that could happen. That some people could just tell part of the truth, and make themselves believe that was all of it while they talked to you. I mean, I knew Gyatso was telling the truth about it, but it sounded so weird..."

"You knew Zuko wasn't going to kill us," Sokka said flatly.

"Like Bumi," Aang shrugged. "He wanted you scared, but he wasn't really going to let you get crushed." He frowned. "Chin Village - that was weird. The guys in prison told the truth, but that mayor... he just said whatever he wanted. Shouldn't it kind of be the other way around?"

Sokka was gripping Boomerang like the last branch before a cliff. "You knew all the time Zuko wasn't trying to kill us?" His jaw worked, as he tried not to sputter. "You- you- do you have any idea how hard that must have been?"

"Um..." Aang looked at him dubiously. "Killing people is supposed to be hard. It's wrong."

"That's not what I- Argh!" Sokka banged his head against his weapon again. Made himself breathe, grumbling something under his breath that sounded like the crackles of burning blubber jerky.

"Of course you don't," Sokka sighed at last. "You don't hunt. You've never had to worry about, if you miss, you don't eat, your family doesn't eat..." He counted silently under his breath. "Aang. Zuko was hunting us."

Aang gulped, flashing back to a tent, and Iroh's solemn advice about dragons. "He was going to eat us?"

Sokka blinked at him.

"He said great names were like dragons!"

Sokka smacked himself in the forehead.

"Well, he did," Aang protested.

"Yeah. Iroh also said they just chew on people. Kill, not eat," Sokka said practically. "If the Fire Nation actually ate people, I think we'd have heard about it."

Oh. Yeah. People said all the other evil stuff the Fire Nation did; killing, burning, stealing, everything. If that had happened - well. Somebody would've told them. "But you said Zuko was hunting us," Aang pointed out.

"To catch us alive," Sokka said bluntly. "Gran-Gran said sometimes waterbenders would send people on quests like that. Hunt, don't kill; bring it back for the Moon and Ocean to bless. It's hard." He looked straight at Aang. "It proves you respect the spirits, and your prey. That you know them."

"So?" Aang said, uneasy. He didn't like where this seemed to be going.

"So, that's why I think the Yu Yan might be in the Fire Nation when we invade," Sokka stated. "If Avatar Kyoshi can make a Fire Lord, you can stop one. And Ozai's not going to just let that happen." Blue met gray, sober. "Zuko learned about airbenders to hunt you. And he stayed on our trail across the world. He had to learn that from somebody."

Aang started to protest - he wasn't sure what, maybe that Zuko couldn't have learned that much if he'd never caught them so they stayed caught-

Stopped. Glanced away from Sokka, and tried to think about what his friend had just said.

Somebody taught Zuko to - to hunt me.

Somebody taught Zuko about airbenders.

And Sokka said hunting was about respect. Respect, and... trying to keep people you cared about alive...

"Aang?" Sokka frowned at him, worried.

"The world's really broken, isn't it?" Aang said, a little shaky. If what he thought was right...

"Yeah. It is." Sokka raised curious brows. "You thinking about something specific?"

"When Zuko broke me out of Zhao's fort, the Yu Yan knocked him out," Aang answered; thinking of a fierce blue mask, the shock of a familiar scar. "I hid him in the forest. And waited 'til he woke up; I wasn't sure he would... And I asked him. If we'd met back then, before everything, could we have been friends?"

"I'm gonna guess he said no," Sokka said wryly.

"He threw fire at me."

"Close enough," Sokka shrugged.

"But he didn't try to chase me," Aang went on. "I don't know why, if he could get up at all, but..." He swallowed. "Or maybe I do. Before I knew who he was, I told him you guys were sick, that you needed those frogs, and you say he's just after me..."

"Oh, man," Sokka said softly.

"But it kind of doesn't matter why he did it," Aang gulped. "I asked the wrong question."

"You did?"

"I was thinking about Zuko back then," Aang nodded. "I should have thought about Kuzon, now." It was hard to think about people from the past. Only a few months ago, for him, they'd all been alive and happy and real...

Now they were gone. Just... ghosts.

"He'd be one of the good guys," Sokka said firmly. "Like Jeong Jeong."

"Boy, I hope not," Aang said sadly. "I mean - I wouldn't want him to be a bad guy! But Jeong Jeong hates fire. All he sees is how it hurts people. And Kuzon... he wanted fire to make things better." Aang swallowed. "And maybe he could. I saw him with green fire, Sokka." He turned a pleading gaze on his friend. "Why didn't he trust me?"

"I don't know," Sokka said thoughtfully. "But I'm going to find out."

"You- huh?" Aang exclaimed.

"It's important," Sokka insisted. "Iroh knew about Kuzon. Iroh knew he was looking for you. And if Kuzon knew about healing fire, when the rest of the Fire Nation thinks it got wiped out by Kyoshi-" He cut himself off, mouth an unhappy line.

"Sokka?" Aang frowned.

"I don't want to get your hopes up."

"Hopes?" Aang echoed, almost a whisper. Because there was something odd in Sokka's face, like just before he came up with a risky, incredible plan-

"Kuzon was your friend," Sokka said honestly. "I didn't really think about that. The Fire Nation's been the enemy so long. And even if he was your friend, how could one kid get from the Fire Nation to anywhere?" His smile went wry. "But he had a dragon."

"Well, yeah," Aang nodded. "He'd come and visit me at the temple all the time..." Words died in his throat, and he stared at Sokka with a weird, wild flutter in his heart.

"He was your friend, and he never stopped looking for you," Sokka said plainly. "And I don't think it was for the Fire Lord." He stared into the night, nodding as he fit bits of fact together like a spider-fly spinning web out of thin air. "He had to know it was dangerous. That the Fire Lord might catch him. But if he knew about healing fire, he was already hiding stuff from the Fire Lord."

Aang swallowed. "You mean - Kuzon had a plan?"

Sokka shot a startled look at him, as if he'd just put it together himself. "How fast was Shidan?"

"Um... kind of depended on the weather," Aang answered, surprised. Sokka worried about the weirdest things. "And how far we were going. Appa's faster if it's a calm day, but if Shidan caught a warm wind, or if it got stormy... why?"

"If you're fast enough to be where nobody thinks you can be, you can pull off a plan everybody else thinks is impossible," Sokka stated. "Aang. This is something else you need to know about families. Kuzon wasn't just your friend. He would've felt - man, how do I say it? Responsible. Gyatso was the closest thing you had to a father. Those kids you grew up with? Like your brothers. If Kuzon couldn't help you, he would have helped them."

Aang winced, fighting the urge to cry. "But... you saw Gyatso..."

"Yeah," Sokka said softly. "And a heck of a lot of firebenders. Grownups, Aang. I didn't see any kids' skulls. Not one."

Aang held still. For a moment, he couldn't even breathe.

"I don't know what he tried to do," Sokka admitted. "I don't know if it worked. A hundred years. Anything could have gone wrong. But I talked to the Mechanist. I had to talk to somebody about what we saw at your temple, and I figured he must have been in on - on seeing your people got burials..." Sokka swallowed. "He found firebenders. And kids' bones. A lot of them."

Air, Aang told himself, as if from far away. You've got to breathe.

"Aang." Sokka gave him a sober look. "I knew Gyatso knew they were coming."

"He couldn't have," Aang whispered. "He would have gone if he knew, he'd be alive!"

"Not if there was something more important than just living," Sokka said quietly. "It's what my dad would do, if people were trying to kill us. He'd stay behind. And fight."

He didn't want to hope. Not after what he'd seen in the temple. What he'd had to accept. It hurt. "But... if someone else got away, where...?"

"Anybody who made it must have found a hole and pulled it in after them," Sokka said bluntly. "Teo, his dad - they wouldn't have lived making those gliders if the Fire Nation hadn't wanted them protected." He shook his head. "I don't know, Aang. I don't have any evidence. All I've got is what we didn't see." He paused. "There's just one thing we know for sure. Kuzon was Zuko's great-grandfather. And Zuko doesn't give up."

And if Sokka and Katara were right, and people in a family were like each other... "You think - Kuzon didn't give up." Aang gulped. "I don't know what to do. I almost wish you hadn't said anything..."

"I know. Hope is hard," Sokka said seriously. "Just ask Katara." He eyed Aang. "Maybe there's somebody left. Maybe there isn't. The point is, people tried. Regular people. Like me, and Katara, and Toph, and Suki. Like Dad, and the whole tribe. And we're still trying." He waved at the night. "Yeah, the world's broken. We'll fix it. Not today. Maybe not in a hundred more years. But we're not beaten until we quit trying. So we lost Ba Sing Se. For now. But we've got us, and my dad, and the fleet, and all the friends we've made on the way. We can still do this."

"So... you believe in the Avatar after all," Aang said, half to himself.

"No way," Sokka snorted.

Aang's jaw dropped.

"I believe in you."

"...Huh?" Aang managed.

"I believe in the kid who was smart enough to trick Katara into penguin-sledding," Sokka said seriously. "Who was crazy enough to ride the Unagi. Who had the guts to save Zuko - man, I can't believe you saved Zuko! - instead of letting Zhao grab him." He smiled wryly. "That's what's really going to save the world. Sure, we need plans and weapons and benders strong enough to stop the Fire Lord. We need to fight. And it's not going to be pretty. But after that? We need you."

Aang swallowed, trying to follow where Sokka was going. "The Fire Nation - some of them are just fighting for their families..."

"If we can get them to stop, everything else get simpler," Sokka nodded. "You got the Mechanist to change his mind about the war. We got Haru's people to change theirs. Maybe, just maybe, we can change a few more."

Aang shook his head. "Toph says going against the Fire Lord can kill them-"

"Yeah. So I kind of doubt they'll fight with us," Sokka agreed. "But Captain Jee just bent the rules to not take Dad's fleet on. Maybe we can't get them on our side. But if we can get some of them to not fight..." He spread empty hands.

Yeah, Aang thought, turning that over in his mind. Yeah, just maybe... "You think I can do that?"

"I think you're the only guy who can," Sokka said soberly. "We lost Ba Sing Se. I know you hate that. We all do. But for now, we have to live with it. After we beat Ozai, then we can come back and kick Azula's..." He trailed off, eyes widening in horrified amazement. "Oh, no way."

"What?" Aang pounced, worried.

"...Um." Sokka blinked, shaking his head as if to rattle something loose. "Just - something I've got to think about." He shook his head again. "No way. That'd be just... crazy..."

"What would?" Aang insisted.

"...I've got to think about it." Standing, he scooped up his bedroll. "Maybe sleep on it. Crazy, it's gotta be..."

"Could you check if Toph's still up?" Aang said impulsively. "I want to ask her something."

"Yeah, sure," Sokka said absently, almost tripping over one of Appa's paws. "Sorry, buddy. Oh, boy..."

Oh boy, what? Aang wanted to demand. But Sokka said he wanted to think about it, and that it was crazy. And maybe when Bumi had talked about thinking like a mad genius, he hadn't just been talking about the Avatar.

Or maybe he wasn't talking about the Avatar at all. Maybe he was talking about me. Aang.

Which was kind of confusing. Guru Pathik had said he had to accept he was the Avatar. People looked up to him because he was the Avatar. The Fire Nation was afraid of him because he was the Avatar.

But Sokka said he was Aang. That he shouldn't feel guilty for what Roku and Kyoshi did, or hadn't done. Just what he did. And Katara said that maybe he hadn't been there when the temples were attacked, but he was here now, and doing his best. And Toph-

Make a plan, then move, Twinkletoes, she'd say. Earth listens and waits, sure. But when we hit that right moment, we move.

All of that had something in common. He just had to figure out what.

Toes drumming night-cool ground, Toph felt Aang shift, as if he'd decided. Nodded herself, and walked around where she guessed Aang could see her. "So what'd you figure out?"

"Now," Aang stated. "You, and Sokka and Katara - you all want me to think about now. Not the past. Not the future."

He didn't sound too happy about it, either. "Not what Gyatso taught you?"

"No!" He hesitated. "Not exactly. Before the elders told me... you have to have freedom to fly. You have to be in the future, where the wind's going to take you. Now - now's not supposed to matter."

Toph wiggled a finger in her ear. "I kind of hear a but."

"After they told me I was the Avatar... Gyatso said we couldn't worry about what was. We had to deal with what is."

"He sounds like a good guy," Toph nodded.

"But that's not the way airbenders are supposed to be!"

Ouch. That sounded like just a whine. But the way she could feel Aang curling in on himself, and trying to hide it... He's really hurting.

And she could tell him he wasn't the only one. That he wasn't alone.

But I promised.

And would it really help to tell him Zuko was hurting the same way? That a firebender was trying to wrap his mind around water... and that Zuko hadn't run out of time because of Katara at all?

I don't know.

So start from what she did know. "It's like a rumble-

"Everything's like a rumble to you!" The earth shivered. "This is real, Toph! Not some fancy earthbending contest."

"Just figured that out, huh?" Toph said tartly. "Okay, let me clue you in on part of my life that's not a rumble. You know, the part where my parents have all kinds of guards so nothing could get in to hurt me, but they don't even tell our neighbors I exist? Nobody treated me as someone real, Aang! I wasn't in anybody's debt books. Nobody made deals with me. Everybody made deals around me. A rumble was the only place I could be me. You think earthbenders are supposed to be like that?"

"Toph-

"The world isn't like your temple, Aang! Okay? I'm sorry, but it's not!" Toph gulped a breath, and tried to let her temper sink back down through her feet. Too much time with Sparky.

"I'm really sorry," she said, more quietly. "I just-" A thought hit her, out of the blue as one of Katara's snowballs, and Toph groaned. "Oh man. I am sorry. Aang, think about something. Gyatso started telling you different stuff after the elders told you you're the Avatar, right?"

"Um, yeah..."

Toph blew away some stray bangs, and nodded. "So - what if he didn't know 'til then, either?"

Silence. Disbelieving at first. Then, slowly, she felt tension drain out of him. "But... I was still me," Aang stated. "I didn't change."

"Yeah, but you're not just an airbender," Toph said practically. "After Gyatso knew you were the Avatar, he knew you'd have to learn the other elements. And we're a lot more grounded. More now."

"He promised it didn't make a difference!"

Fed up, Toph kicked a rock at his head.

Stone crumbled against a defensive fist. "What was that for?"

Crossing her arms, Toph cocked her head. "You're not the guy who's supposed to have a head like a rock. Come on, Aang! What if I wasn't born blind? What if one day I just woke up and couldn't see? Would you hand me posters to put up? You didn't change. What Gyatso knew you could do changed."

Quiet. Almost scary quiet, if she hadn't been able to feel his breathing. A little fast, a little bit of an upset hitch in it - but he was still there.

"So." Toph let out a breath. "You're Aang. And you're the Avatar. I wish somebody could help. That there was somebody who could tell you what you're supposed to do. But we can't. You've gotta figure out who you're gonna be." She paused. "Though I kind of think you should look at what Kyoshi did, and try something else."

More breathing. Slower now. Good, he was thinking...

Something rattle-stomped yards away, and Toph grinned. "Hey-"

"Don't give it a name!"

Toph closed her lips on Boots, and cocked an ear Aang's way. "Why not?"

"...I don't know."

Toes drumming the ground out of rhythm with the frustrated little spirit, Toph waited.

"You said I should look at what Gyatso taught me after." Aang rocked a little in place. "He started reading some new scrolls. Spirit-tales. With benders in them. That's kind of what I was trying with Hei Bai, only in the stories spirits listened to benders right from the start... The villagers already called it the Hei Bai spirit, or I wouldn't have called it anything. Maybe Elder Uncle," Aang allowed thoughtfully. "They like that sometimes. But you don't give spirits names. Things can happen."

"What kind of things?" Toph said warily.

"The stories were all different."

That was not the sound of a happy airbender. "So sometimes it's bad?" Toph asked.

"Yeah," Aang said quietly. "I know they're just stories, but-"

"Okay," Toph nodded.

"...Okay?"

Boots rattled the ground, indignant.

"So they're just stories. The Avatar's stories too," Toph pointed out. "Gyatso was your teacher, and he sounds like a really good guy. If you think he was warning you about spirits, I'm listening."

"But I don't know!" Aang protested.

"Sokka didn't know how to take down that drill when we first ran into it, either," Toph shrugged. "Sometimes, you gotta make it up as you go along." She turned toward the thumping and scuffling of an indignant spirit. "Sorry. But 'til we can find somebody who can tell us - well, you want to be friends, right?"

A put-upon scrape of earth.

"We don't know who to ask," Toph pointed out. "Unless you know where to find a shaman or somebody?"

A thoughtful patter, that slowly faded away into the night.

"You think I'm right?" Aang sounded hopeful.

Argh. "All I know is, I don't know," Toph said bluntly. "So I'm going to act like it might be trouble."

Which it could be. She'd been worrying about Zuko dropping a boulder or two on Aang. This could be it.

Might not even matter if it went after all of us. Sparky wants Aang pounded, he knows Katara hates him, and he knows Sokka's gonna be right behind her. And he knows I can take care of myself.

She didn't think Zuko would be that sloppy. Zuko hated hitting things he didn't aim at. But he was really mad at Aang.

And he might not know much more about spirits than we do. Even if a couple tried to eat him.

Any way you bent it, couldn't hurt to not call it Boots. She hoped. "Get some sleep," Toph advised, heading back around Appa. "We've got rocks to break in the morning."

"Okay..."

Mmm. Blankets, with just a little dust scattered on top so she was sure what to grab and pull back-

"Toph?" Sokka whispered.

Growling under her breath, Toph crawled under the covers. "Going. To. Bed."

"Right, keep it quick, I know this is going to sound crazy but I was thinking of some of Gran-Gran's stories. The old ones, where the chief had more than one son, and the kind of messes that could happen-" Sokka cut himself off, and took a deep breath. "Is Zuko crazy enough to break back in to Ba Sing Se?"

Toph blinked. Waggled a finger in each ear, checking her memory against Sokka's voice. Nope, she'd heard right. "Whoa."

"He would." Sokka sounded dazed. "Why?"

Can't tell you, Toph almost said. Except she could. Some of it. "Duh. He's Lee. Amaya's his tribe. And Uncle loves her to pieces." And maybe just a little more... "There's people there he cares about. You think he's just going to leave them for Crazy Blue Fire to grab?"

"And if he does mess with her plans, maybe she doesn't look so good as the heir after all," Sokka said thoughtfully. "Almost wish we could help."

"You do?" Toph blurted out.

"I don't like Zuko. I don't trust him," Sokka said grimly. "But Azula's worse." He sighed, setting it aside. "If Aang went back there, he'd want to free the whole city. And I don't think we can. So we're just going to have to live with whatever the jerkbender pulls off." His tone softened a little, reluctantly. "Or doesn't pull off."

"He'll make it," Toph said firmly.

"Turtle-seals," Sokka shot back.

"And he made it then, too," Toph pointed out. "I'm okay, Sokka. I know what we've gotta do. Teach Aang, and beat the Fire Lord. I made a deal with you guys, and I'm gonna stick to it."

"It's just... I know he's your friend," Sokka admitted.

"And I trust him," Toph nodded. "He's going to stay alive, or I'm going to kick his butt." You hear that, Sparky? Stay alive.

Man, I wish I knew what was going on in Ba Sing Se...

Green flickers playing across her hair from the fireplace of what had been Long Feng's elegant meeting room, Azula regarded her assembled Dai Li. Off to one side, Ty Lee tried to hide that she was biting her lip.

Don't think I'm up to this, do you? Azula mused, trying not to smirk. I know you're looking for a healer. But I'm not that weak. I can handle treachery like this in my sleep.

Father would expect no less.

"Our target is about to move," Azula announced. Saw Ty Lee flinch at naming Mai a target, and almost chuckled.

"Suzuran will be here tomorrow morning," Azula went on. "Our target knows there is a possibility of recruiting aid from that ship. But that would take time. And the more time I have, the more likely it is Mai will not succeed in her ultimate goal. She cares about Min Wen; she will take any risk to see him out of my hands."

"She barely knows the boy, Princess," one of the agents protested. "She's visited him, yes, but..."

"Agent Chan." Azula eyed the Dai Li, almost mildly. "Min, unfortunately for him, was in a position to save her life when she chose to defy me. Mai is Fire Nation. She is strongly bound to him." But not to me. Damn him. She'd make him die for that, slowly. Later. "Even if she weren't, by now she realizes I know she's a traitor. If she has any concern for that boy at all... when I break him, she knows who will be her executioner."

...Oh, what a sweet thrill of fear from their spirits. Good. Good. Long Feng, and now Quan; too many of the Dai Li underestimated her, and what she would do for her people.

Never again.

"Mai won't wait for Suzuran," Azula continued. "She'll strike tonight."

"We can increase the guards-" Chan began.

"That won't be enough," Azula cut him off. "At this moment, with the smallest diversion, Min could stroll right out of his cell and disappear."

"Impossible!" another agent sputtered. "Those cells are inescapable. We searched her thoroughly. There's no way she could have passed him so much as a nail file."

"You searched her and found nothing, so you assumed there was nothing to find," Azula said sharply. "I never choose my servants lightly. Mai is as trained, deadly, and clever as anyone in this room. Except me."

"Princess." Chan bowed. "If you know her, what could she have gotten past our guard?"

"I can only imagine," Azula said dryly. "What it is doesn't matter. Mai would never leave an escape to chance. She would never count on being able to fight her way in. Which means she has discovered some way for Min to free himself." She nodded. "Later this evening - past sunset, she may wait until the ghost watch - Min will be ready to escape."

One sleeve padding the loop of diamond-wire so it wouldn't cut into his fingers as he sawed, Min drew one more subtle stroke across the inside of the bolt holding his cell door shut. Think that should do it.

Tucking the wire back into his sleeve, Min touched the door, reaching out with his chi. You couldn't bend metal, everyone knew that... but Tingzhe had shown him something interesting, years ago. Back when he'd still been a child excited by anything his father did, whether it won the war or not.

"Just a piece of rust, hmm?" Tingzhe had smiled at his disappointed look, then laid the old dagger back into its hole in the excavation. "Feel that. Don't bend the earth. Just feel."

And he had. Mouth dropping open as he finally realized what his father was trying to show him; that there was a rainbow-shading of difference between earth and the heart of steel, with rust like that odd green flash between sunset and dark...

Nobody could bend metal. But if you listened, if you worked at it, you could bend rust. And all metal rusted. Even the polished steel of his cell. It wasn't much, not even as much as the diamonds on his wire. Not nearly enough to use. But he could feel it.

And feeling rust, he could judge how thick metal was inside it. And listen to it, so he knew exactly when he'd cut enough metal that the door-bolt held on the outside... and no more.

The hinges had been trickier. They were on the outside of the door, of course; meaning he not only had to steal time when no guards were looking at his cell, but he had to bend the diamond on the wire itself, forcing it to saw as firm as steel when by rights it should have flopped like a limp noodle.

He had to wryly thank the spirits that they'd left him locked in here; food in, chamber-pots out through the hatch in the door. If anyone had actually opened the door... well, he wasn't sure the hinges would hold.

Blowing away metal dust, Min snuck back to his cot, wrapping chains around himself to hide their cut ends. And shivered. For the past few days, he'd been focused. Busy. Now... now, all there was left to was wait.

And hope Mai got there first.

"Of course, he'll need a distraction." Azula surveyed her Dai Li again. "And that's where your confined spirits come in."

"Our what?" someone in the crowd sputtered.

Agent Chan raised his hand slightly, and the sputtering subsided. "Princess. I know we somehow missed the sandal-spirits-"

"That was no accident, Agent Chan. That was a trial run." Azula narrowed her eyes, weighing the man. He might do. Perhaps. "Agent Quan arranged that to test our defenses. And see how much it would take to overwhelm them."

Horried silence. But Chan lifted his head to meet her gaze, hazel eyes serious. "Princess. You suggest that Agent Quan would use spirits against the ruler of the city." He shook his head slowly. "That is... difficult to believe."

"He will," Azula stated, confidence ringing in her voice. "I know the eyes of a man with nothing left to lose." Of course, she'd taken it all from Quan herself. Details, details...

"If so, we should arrest him now, your Highness," Chan replied, outwardly calm. "Before any harm is done."

And leave any of you with doubts of following me? I don't think so. "Agent. I would hardly condemn a man simply for the look in his eyes."

Which was a blatant and unrelenting lie. But it was exactly what they wanted to hear, so they would believe.

So much fun!

"He is your current commander, and you need proof," Azula said, with utmost sincerity. "I have full confidence in your ability to contain the situation so we can get it." She inclined her head. "We'll start by reducing the outer guards of your spirit-maze."

Dai Li protect the city.

It'd started as a whisper in Quan's brain, the moment he'd first made plans with Mai. In these dark corridors below the palace it'd grown to a howl, all but deafening him to outside threats. He pushed it aside then, and he pushed it aside now. There were advantages to knowing how mind-bending worked. Especially your own.

Dai Li protect Ba Sing Se.

Snarling, Quan slashed an earth-gloved hand down, slicing a spirit-ward with the stone that had formed it. Shuddering, half through, his own arm rebelling at the thought of sabotage, of treason-

Dai Li protect the city!

Mind deliberately blank, he finished the cut. Felt the pulse of malevolence, as kamuiy sealed into chambers further inside the maze tested their limits.

Dai Li protect Ba Sing Se-!

"Not this night," Quan gritted out. And kept moving.

There were guards. Rather, there had been guards, before the gold-eyed shadow drifting behind him had lashed out with a hiss of steel and venom. They'd never seen it coming.

He stepped past limp bodies, avoiding accusing eyes. Had to smile wryly, despite himself. Guards and lock and wards, yes; the maze of tunnels here had them all. So captured kamuiy would be held, and purified, and consoled, until finally restless spirits were satisfied and drifted back into the other world where they belonged. Save that dark night of the last Earth King's murder, nothing had ever broken out from here.

A pity the Dai Li had never considered someone breaking in.

Breaking your contract with the city-! part of his soul shrieked.

"Yes," Quan whispered, trying to catch his breath just before another barred gateway. "I am."

I know what this will cost me. I just don't care anymore.

Not if he could shatter the Fire Princess' plans. If he could hurt her, the way she'd cut his heart out, murdering Long Feng. Hurt her the only way that mattered to that monster, smearing her perfect victory...

A shadow flickered, and he didn't move fast enough. Stone ground up, trapping his feet, climbing-

Darts whistled past his head, and an agent dropped. Mai leapt past in the next eye-blink, knives pinning the Dai Li's partner to the wall in a scream of steel on stone before she drove a dart into his shoulder.

Breaking himself free, Quan winced.

Reclaiming her knives, Mai cast a dark look his way. "Focus."

"I'm trying..." Quan shook away the weakness, mind still screaming. "I'll last long enough." I must.

Mai eyed him narrowly. Almost spoke-

Shook her head, deliberately leaving his word unchallenged. "You said there would be more guards."

"There should be."

Gold met dark, and he sensed more than saw her nod. Wherever the other Dai Li were, they'd find out soon enough.

It was odd, Quan mused as they slid yet another pierced-steel gate aside. Most people would assume a Dai Li prison would be all sculpted rock, impenetrable without earthbending.

Most people have never dealt with kamuiy.

Dai Li were expected to sacrifice themselves for the city, certainly. But not without reason. To perish at spirits' hands simply because they'd drained you of chi so you could not bend - that was a stupid, stupid reason to die.

So. Dai Li prisons for people might need earthbending to escape. Their prison for kamuiy needed none at all. Carved from stone, yes, it was - but pierced with tunnels and gates in a way that made it a spirit-maze all by itself.

A maze he was deliberately weakening with every gateway crumbled, every ward slashed, every strategic hole punched in a wall.

Not too weak, please, Guanyin...

But he needed revenge. Spirits, he needed it. The whole Earth Kingdom needed vengeance for Azula's violation. Capturing the heart of who they were, meaning to twist it from Earth to Fire-

He'd never hated anyone the way he hated now. It boiled in him; seethed, like the acid mud-springs legend placed in the Si Wong desert. Seared even the circling light of mind-bending, giving him just enough room to keep his promise to Mai, and to the hapless young earthbender who'd trusted him to protect his family. Even if cost him every other promise broken.

...And perhaps that was Guanyin's will, hearing his plea for mercy. How could it be anything but a blessing to perish? Far, far better than surviving, with hate eating away morals and conscience and compassion until he was willing to do this.

A merciful death. But not yet. He counted corridors as they sped silently through the maze: second left, third right - there!

Not the heart of the maze, no. Not that still-guarded corridor where he could feel stone shivering, ready to answer to Dai Li wills. But not moving. Not yet.

You trained them well, Long Feng.

More than enough Dai Li guarding the heart of the maze to take him and Mai both. More than enough - but they would not come. They'd hold their posts until ghost-fire itself consumed them. Dai Li here guarded no mere spirits of malice. What lurked behind those walls was nothing less than pure evil. Headless hounds, murderous ghost lion-dillos, razor-fingered specters with smiles of black-thorn fangs. And more, countless more. Even some of those dark spirits that had been loosed decades past, when all the royal family but Kuei perished...

Hold your ground, men. I'm not mad enough to loose those on our people.

...Not quite.

Cup hands, and slam-

Stone tore loose, carrying warding steel with it. Door after door in his chosen corridor wrenched free, screaming malice to the night.

For a moment Quan could only breathe, hearing the faint whisper of cloth as Mai followed their plan, turned, and fled. Could only feel, like slime and frost on his soul, as kamuiy after kamuiy slithered, stomped, and rattled free.

I've broken my contract. Breath sighed out of Quan, as a grinning gǔgé nǚ turned her eyeless skull his way, fleshless hands already reaching out. Here's as good a place as any-

Warm hands seized his shoulder, and pulled. "Come on!"

He broke into a stumbling run, carried by steel and fire.

Stupid. Can't die yet. Still have to open a tunnel - there-

Stone crumbled, collapsing into darkness.

Shock and horror, on a host of faces. Move quickly, Azula told herself, flaring her inner fire to swamp that sudden blaze of defiance. "They'll have been working with saboteurs, so they'll already have a way to lead the spirits to the prison cells. And to other places as well; saboteurs won't help them simply because it's the right thing to do." Her voice dripped irony.

A heartbeat for that to sink in, and she nodded at Ty Lee, who spread a map of the city for all to see, marked with various potential trouble spots.

Azula gestured over several in the Middle Ring. "The Army barracks." Where loyal Earth kingdom soldiers were now confined, until such time as orders arrived to deal with them properly. "The saboteurs will want payment in their freedom. Or an attempt at it." She touched other spots in the Upper and Lower Ring. "You'll need to coordinate with the local Guards and Fire Nation forces here as well. They'll use spirits, and their focus will be the barracks, but they'd be fools not to use purely human sabotage and destruction as well. In as many places as they can wreak it, trying to spread us thin. I imagine there will be several small, localized earthquakes, that just happen to hit innocent civilians. So they can claim we have no intention of rescuing them."

The Outer Ring is on fire!

A heartbeat of pure panic. That was all Master Sergeant Yakume allowed himself; the flames weren't right on top of their Guard station, so he could afford an instant of terror. One moment to allow his soul to breathe; to simply be a man, angry and afraid-

The next, he chained emotion with decades of discipline, barking orders that sent runners to city firemen and the nearest contingent of occupying troops. Captain Lu-shan was already snarling at his Guards, leading them out to push onlookers back and knock on doors of tenements in the path of the flames.

Once, only once as they fought the fires all that heartbreaking night, would An Lu-shan give him a look, blunt and uncompromising as granite. Did your people do this?

But by then they'd found buildings collapsed from more than fire, and Yakume stared boldly back as they battled smoke and flames and time to drag civilians from the rubble. Did yours?

"How much damage, will tell us a great deal about who was in charge of the sabotage," Azula mused. "I rely on you to make concise and accurate reports, so we can find all of those responsible and restore peace to Ba Sing Se." Half-truths; the best lies of all. She never relied on anyone, but she did want peace in the city. How could it be a productive part of the empire if it wasn't peaceful? Loot was well and good in its place, but it didn't last. Inhabitants would learn to hide what they could, and defiant fools would even deny themselves wealth, rather than let any of it profit their enemies.

Fools. Sell luxuries and buy training. And fight!

So few would. Better, far better, to have them pull in peaceful harness, tithing to the empire. Not as satisfying as looting and death, no. But in the long run, it was far more productive.

And there was always someone stupid enough to burn alive.

And once we track down this little plot, Ba Sing Se will be even more firmly in our grasp, Azula thought. Not only because she would have wiped out the troublemakers themselves. Because the citizens would see that their so-called leaders had done them harm, and turn against them.

Earth Kingdom fools. The Fire Nation would understand Low War. And hate us even more fiercely. Azula smiled to herself. I wonder which idiot of a general I didn't catch, who came up with this plan?

"People are going to be hurt, aren't they?" Seeking refuge away from the rest of the refugees in these small rooms some noble had sculpted in the cavern's heart ages ago, Earth King Kuei scratched behind a sleepy Bosco's ears. The eyes behind polished glass were still young, but determined. And sad. "Even if this plan Agent Shirong has helped us shape works... people are going to die."

"They are, your majesty," Agent Bon said plainly. "I'm sorry."

"I should have made a better plan," Kuei said, almost soundlessly. "I should have let one of the lesser generals make this plan-"

Bon cleared his throat. "With all due respect, your majesty - no. You shouldn't have."

Kuei shot him a narrow glance. "I'm not a soldier, Agent Bon. I'm certainly no Dai Li!"

"No, your majesty," Bon inclined his head. "That's why your plan has the best chance of working."

Kuei scowled, raising a hand to object-

Stopped. And thought, slowly pacing across the carpet one of his grateful fellow refugees had donated to give bent stone chambers a sense of warmth and welcome. As almost everything within these walls had been given; rugs, furniture, even an odd little water-heating contraption tucked away in the next room, to allow a sort of standing scrub-shower. All gifts of Earth Kingdom refugees - and of the Fire Nation.

"A lord must have his dignity," Pei-born-Maeda had said when Bon asked. Surprised, plainly, that the agent would even have to ask. "His majesty's not ours. But we're under his shelter. How can we not look after him?"

Here and now, Bon had to shake his head at the smith's honesty. All his years of service, he'd been taught that the Earth King needed walls, and guards, and Dai Li to preserve his life. Yet here, among people whose families were at least half the blood of the enemy...

Here, my king is safe.

Part of that feeling was based on rational facts. They were hidden, they had supplies, and they had enough earthbenders escaped from normal life or the Army roundup to warn them if others were about to break in. But another part, one Bon winced to admit, was that he felt safe.

These people are spirit-touched. All of them.

Not as much as a Dai Li; well, not most of them. But there was that faint sense of other about Amaya's people. And all the little things they did, salt-tossing and sake offerings and subtle patterns worked into clothes and wood and stone...

My king is safe. As safe as they can make him.

None of those small protections would stop a truly determined spirit. But little creatures, and the more general fog of malice that usually breathed in the air when humans intrigued for power - those would not touch Kuei. Not here.

I don't know why I'm so surprised, Bon thought ruefully. Amaya chose to help these people. And she'd never had anything but goodwill toward our city.

More pragmatically, Amaya might not be a perfect judge of character, but these folk were almost all from the Lower Ring. If they'd wanted to be trouble, they'd had plenty of chances. Those here now wanted to live quiet, peaceful lives in Ba Sing Se.

And if they were wary of men like him - well, who wouldn't be, given what Dai Li did? But they were only wary. Not afraid. The Dai Li families he and Shirong and a few other survivors had smuggled down here on Quan's orders, fully expecting to have to guard them near as fiercely as the king-

Those families were safe. Welcomed. In a way people as blunt as Maeda could no more feign than they could fly.

Bon rubbed his aching head. Fire Nation refugees who wanted to help. Scrolls of healing - earth healing! - discovered in their very own cache. And evidence that some unknown spirit had tampered with the Dai Li's own memories so they'd missed that most precious treasure for Guanyin only knew how many centuries. Though given they'd found that tampering after Kuei had made his judgment... well, Bon had his own suspicions which spirit was responsible.

The world isn't anything like I thought it was. Like Long Feng told us it was, Bon thought, still a bit stunned. And if it isn't-

He'd been in the ranks long enough to have heard the rumors; that some were Dai Li because there was Fire Nation blood somewhere in their veins, and mind-bending would never take. He hadn't wanted to believe it, of course not...

But he couldn't deny that feeling of safety here. Of being... spirits, how odd... normal.

It wasn't that fierce blaze, that pull, he'd sensed near the Fire Princess. Azula - spirits, Azula was like a landslide he'd just barely struggled free of, to watch helpless as she carried most of the Dai Li away. Here among the refugees... it was like walking on one of the fields outside the Outer Ring, burned after harvest. Ash on your feet, smoke lingering on your tongue, yet you could feel the strength returning to the soil.

We have some of those farmers here. Bon shook his head. How much have they changed us? We thought we held all the traditions of the Earth Kingdom, and yet... Water Tribe. Fire Nation. Only threads, woven into the vast loom of our city. But everything looks different now.

Bon didn't know what it meant that Shirong had been adopted by the Wen... clan, he'd definitely heard that word, and tried not to think about it too hard. He wasn't sure he wanted to know. But you couldn't miss the change in the man. He seemed - more solid. Stable. Spirits, sometimes the man even smiled.

And Shirong was out there now, risking that newfound sense of home and safety to rescue one boy. And carry out the Earth King's plan.

Kuei had finally stopped pacing, eyeing Bon speculatively, as Bosco whuffed and rubbed against a handy chair to scratch his back. "They say the greatest swordsman fears not the second greatest, but the worst."

"Exactly, your majesty," Bon said steadily.

"We have an occupying force within our own walls," Kuei stated, working it out. "Our officers have never trained for that. We call ourselves the Impenetrable City, and they think that way even when it's obvious we're not. The Dragon of the West broke the Wall. And now his niece has brought it down."

Bon nodded.

"But the Fire Nation, like Lady Mai, is used to fighting inside their own palaces," Kuei went on. "So any plan we've made, you and I and Agent Shirong and Professor Wen, and everyone else who's helped... any plan like that, that she's willing to risk her life in..."

"Stands a better chance than a plan made by those who depend on walls and armies and standing your ground at all costs," Bon nodded. "I believe so, your majesty." He gave his king a sober look. Is he ready for this? Oma and Shu, please let him be. "Sir, we are occupied by the enemy. The Fire Nation can now add our resources to their own, reaching out to conquer those who still resist. That resistance can either see Ba Sing Se try to act, no matter how rashly - or roll over and submit, helpless as a broken-legged rabbiroo."

Kuei swallowed, briefly closing his eyes. "And I am the Earth King. I am responsible for more than just our city."

"I'm not a general, sir," Bon said steadily. "I never will be. But I know spirits. And spiritually, you are the heart of the kingdom. If you move against our enemies, the earth itself will feel it. And it will act." He bent his head, aching for the young man in a king's robes. "Sir, if I may be blunt? Even doing the wrong thing, may be the right decision. So long as your people know you will not give up... they will have hope."

"But people are going to die." Kuei winced. "My people."

"We're at war, your majesty. Some of us are going to die, no matter what happens." Bon sighed. "A commander cares about his people. Long Feng cared about us, sir. And he never threw our lives away. But he knew he might have to ask us to die. It's our job."

"Those people up there aren't Dai Li," Kuei said quietly. "They never wanted to fight."

"But they are Earth Kingdom, your majesty," Bon said steadily. "We believe in the Earth Kingdom. In our ways. Our traditions. Our king. Even - spirits, I never thought I'd say this - even Amaya's hidden Fire Nation folk believe in you. They have to, or they wouldn't be here." He met those terrified, brave eyes. "They're not warriors. They don't want to die. But you are our king. You have to decide. Do we give up who we are... or do we fight?"

"I think I could get to hate being king," Kuei said, half to himself. Breathed out, and nodded. "We'll keep going. Guanyin have mercy on us all."

Bon nodded, trying not to let a rueful smile cross his face. They'd all thought of Kuei as a helpless, naive bookworm, who had to be protected for his own good.

Just as Long Feng intended.

But the Earth King had spent his life growing up with books. And the palace library was stuffed with the oddest texts, from growing silkworms to glass-blowing to tomes on extinct creatures of the poles that had once lunged onto northern Earth Kingdom shores like furry cat-gators. Every book printed in the kingdom since at least the tenth Earth King had a better than even chance of being tucked somewhere in that rambling pile of knowledge.

Meaning there were plenty of books on Chin the Conqueror. And hordes of other military men, friends and foes alike. Including, spirits only knew where they'd come from, texts on the Dragon of the West himself.

"They didn't have a date," Kuei had said when Bon started sputtering about that piece of information. "I thought he was just another warlord in Chin's time. That's where they were shelved."

Shelved by who, Bon dearly wanted to know. Certainly Long Feng wouldn't have put them there!

Then again, given the odd contacts Amaya still had in the city above, contacts vital to the most fragile part of Lady Mai's plan... well, it seemed there might be more conspiracies in the city than just the Dai Li.

At least this one's on our side. For now. "You should get some rest, your majesty," Bon said gently. "Worrying yourself sick won't help them."

"I didn't worry about anything except tradition and the next ceremony for years," Kuei muttered. "Look where that got us all."

Bon almost objected. Frowned, thinking better of it.

"That's an interesting silence." Tired, Kuei pushed up his glasses. "If I'm wrong, I wish someone would tell me."

"You're not wrong," Bon admitted. "But you're not entirely right either, your majesty. You are the Earth King. The traditions and ceremonies are important. Spirits need respect and veneration... and once in a while, a stern rebuke if they go too far. Ba Sing Se needs a ruler to handle the matters of this world, that's true. But without one of royal blood to perform the rituals for our city, we will die as surely as by the Fire Nation's flames." He winced. "If you want honesty, your majesty - I've seen spirit-dealt deaths. I'll take the flames."

Kuei gave him the oddest look. Took off his glasses, polished them on his sleeve, and propped them back in place. "Agent Bon. Are you telling me I need to get married?"

Bon froze. He hasn't said anything of the sort, but...

That's the pity of being an earthbender. If the ground opens up and swallows you, nobody thinks it was an accident.

Gathering his courage, Bon cleared his throat. "It would be wise, sir." More; it could be vital. While Kuei had been safe in the palace, while the city had been safe, they could wait. Now...

If Kuei dies, there's no one left of the Earth King's blood to hold the barriers. A chill shivered down Bon's spine. He'd been far too young on that moon-dark night to remember anything but screaming, but he'd heard the stories. And Shirong's infamous aura of doom was all the proof anyone needed.

"I suppose that's why the noble ladies keep bringing their daughters to those parties," Kuei mused. "I never knew if I should feel sorry for them or run screaming. Not that they were ever allowed to be close enough to run from, but... they never seemed as if they really wanted to be there. That's not how it should be. At least," Kuei looked a bit shy, "I don't think it is. It didn't seem like men and women were that way in Princesses of the Golden Cage. Or Blind as a Badger-Mole. Or Love Amongst the-" Kuei cut himself off, reddening at Bon's look.

"Your majesty," Bon said, with what he hoped sounded like curious calm. "Have you been studying marriage... from romance novels?"

"Well, I didn't... I never... how does anyone ask about that?" Kuei's flush deepened.

"There are some married Dai Li, sir," Bon said seriously. Trying not to laugh, or cry. "I'll... find one of them." Even if he had to drag them off of watch and take theirs over himself. So much for sleep tonight.

Sleep could wait. His king, and his city, needed this. Romance, marriage, an heir - none of these were trivial. Not for the Earth King.

And not for Kuei, Bon reflected, smiling a little to himself. With a little reality abrading all the layers of books and ceremony, there seemed to be an honest-to-spirits young man shining through.

Oma and Shu, what a way to find him.

He only hoped that young man could survive the consequences of this night.

"But it doesn't matter who planned this little farce of a rescue, because it will be nothing but a miserable failure," Azula said coldly. One gesture with a sharp-edged nail, and Ty Lee unrolled another map; a floor-plan of the palace, the grounds, and the underground prisons. "The most efficient and least detectable tunnel from the spirit-maze will exit here. One floor above the prison cells." Azula smirked. "And that, is where we'll stop them."

It wasn't even a fight.

Waiting for them in his own section of tunnel, Shirong opened stone into the palace and latched onto Quan, freeing Mai to dive and throw and scatter paralyzed and knife-pinned Dai Li before her.

Then the spirits poured free.

Bones sank claw-like into cloth and skin. Hundred-eyed bǎiyǎnlián cast glares of madness, chittering like evil children. Wispy as winding sheets, miáncháng rustled through the air, striking at necks to strangle.

We're winning, Mai thought dizzily, as more agents fell. We're going to make it-

Blue fire blazed, searing away spirit-cloth.

"I don't even have to hunt you down." Azula stepped out of the shadows. "How thoughtful."

No...

Steel and chains and shivering. Not from cold. He wasn't cold.

I want to see the sun.

Huddled on his cot in the corner, chains draped around him in case of visitors, Min pressed his forehead against the back of his wrists. And wished he could deny he'd ever thought it.

He was an earthbender. Born and bred in Ba Sing Se. So long as the air was fresh and the water clear, he shouldn't care if it was night or day, winter or summer. So long as there was earth-

But there wasn't. Just a ghost of rust on steel and stray bits of other metal, wrapped around his chi as far as he could reach. Just an awful, aching grief, flooding him like ice water; cold and ancient and somehow not his-

I want to see the sun.

What did you do, when your own blood was the enemy?

No! Don't think that way. She wants you to think that way. If you hate Mom, you hate your clan, and then-

Min shuddered, thinking of Azula's smile.

She hadn't touched him. Hadn't even come in the cell with him. But every day, at least once a day, she'd come to look at him. Watching through the barred window with that subtle, knowing smirk.

And every second she stood there, he could feel her prying at his soul.

Come. Come to me. I am strong; I will lead you, even through rage and fire. Come...

No, and no, and no. He'd chanted it under his breath like a meditative mantra, trying to will away that awful feel of her. Leaning on that strength from elsewhere; it might be enemy blood, it might be Fire Nation, but spirits, anything was better than letting her take him...

Oma and Shu, forgive me.

Oh, Guanyin have mercy. He could all but taste what sunlight would feel like. Honey-gold, and warm, so warm, sinking into chilled bones, filling all the aching emptiness...

She's killing me.

Min blinked, and breathed, trying to think past fear's chill to his father's old lessons. Benders... benders needed their element to fuel their chi. An earthbender on a lake was as weak and vulnerable as a waterbender in the desert, or a firebender buried underground-

I'm not a firebender!

But Jinhai was. And if what Suyin had said about her lessons was right, and everyone used chi, and he was leaning on something of Fire to keep that monster out of his head...

No earth. No sun. She's killing me.

And she knows it.

Min closed his eyes, tears leaking. Stupid. He felt so stupid, he didn't want to be afraid...

Courage is not the absence of fear, Min, Tingzhe's voice murmured in memory. True courage is to be afraid, and accept it, and do what must be done.

...Maybe his father had known what he was talking about after all.

Just like a university exam, where you can't recall the answers, hmm? You've had your moment to panic. There's nothing wrong with panic. All beings do. What makes us human is thinking past it.

Breathe, son. Slow and deep. Be the mountain rising up. Breathe. And think.

In, and out. Clutch the diamond-dusted wire hidden in his hand, and let himself feel that scattering of earth-

"It won't work."

Min stiffened, chains on his arms rustling. Eyed the barred window, where one of the Dai Li guards was calmly peering through. Ling, he thought this one was called; and what it said of a man that he let people call him Specter...

He couldn't have seen the wire. Or the filings; he'd been very, very careful to blow them discreetly out of sight in the shadows. And they'd all behaved. Almost like crumbs of soil... but that was silly, everyone knew metal didn't bend. "What won't work?"

"Your plan."

"I'm chained in here, while the Fire Princess takes over our city and tries to find my family. So she can murder them," Min snarled. "Do you have a plan? Because I'd love to hear one!"

"Nice try." The guard looked darkly amused. "Pity about that family, boy. Things would be so much easier for you if we could just make you forget."

Min shivered.

"But if you are a loyal citizen of Ba Sing Se," Ling's voice dripped sarcasm, "then you'll just have to suffer. Because if you're true, Earth Kingdom born - you know there are things the Fire Nation should never learn of." He paused, deliberately. "So cheer up. You won't live to serve the Fire Princess."

She doesn't know what you can do with mind-bending, Min realized. And you plan to keep it that way.

Part of him found that oddly comforting.

No. No, I am not going to die here. I am not going to give up.

Never give up without a fight.

"Oma and Shu, it must be true," Ling murmured, watching him narrowly. "You shouldn't have this much fight left."

And that stung, even through the fear. Deeper than Min had thought possible. "My father never stopped fighting you!"

"An archaeologist?" Ling said contemptuously. "And a professor's wife. You think your parents are going to chase the nightmares away and save you?" His lip curled. "Child. This is the real world. There are no miracles."

Wind moaned down the corridor, and every glowing crystal blew out.

One, two, three little traitors, Azula mused, stalking in front of the bruised and bloodied failures chained before her. At least one of them had tested the chains, she'd heard the clink - but her Dai Li had sunk them into the audience room floor, and it'd take a more skilled bender than these rejects to free himself with no slack to move his arms. Even if one tried, Ty Lee was barely a breath away, poised to strike them down.

Fitting, to bring them up here. The Earth King's very throne room, where justice would be done. Her justice.

The Fire Nation's justice.

Same thing, really. She served the Fire Lord, and they all served Fire Lord Sozin's great vision. A Fire Nation as powerful as any Avatar; so powerful, it would never bend to the so-called will of the world again.

And we are making that real. Here. Now.

Gracefully seating herself on the throne, Azula smirked at the three on their knees. One ex-servant, who'd survived treachery. One soon to be former Dai Li second in command, who didn't look at all well; she'd have to do something about that, he couldn't be allowed to die until she said so. And another Dai Li, last seen fleeing with her now-deceased brother...

Azula's eyes narrowed, and she shot out of the throne to stalk up to Shirong. Stared at him. Felt at him.

He feels like fire.

Impossible. He was Dai Li. An earthbender; everyone attested to it. True, some of the agents might have Fire Nation ancestry, but-

He doesn't feel like that little fool downstairs. He feels like fire. "What are you?" Azula snarled.

Lip torn, one eye already bruised and blackening, Shirong didn't even try to distract her. "You wouldn't believe me if I told you."

Truth. She could see it, in that fey, steady gaze. A look that reminded her of-

The crack of her slap shattered the silence. She stalked away, hands shaking with rage. How dare he look like Zuko; about to die, and knowing it, and beyond any mortal doubt that he was doing the right thing. How dare he?

"Where's Min?" Anger glittered in eyes that should be cold, flat gold.

Azula's fingers curled at the sight, eager to flay that still face open to the bone. That Mai would allow herself to be anything but the useful, courtly mask... "You let him ruin you!"

Mai's head snapped up. "I have done nothing that would shame my clan."

"You really think so?" Azula said silkily. "After you've defied your princess?"

"I sent a letter to my parents to announce loyalty reclaimed."

Truth; Azula could hear it. Impossible as it should have been for any letter to have left Ba Sing Se. So you've saved them, and damned yourself. How very noble. Azula's lip curled. How very stupid. I let you be with Zuko too long...

"You have what you want." Mai's voice was level again. "Let Min go."

The princess smirked. "You know me better than that, Mai. Once I have an enemy in my grasp, I never, ever let them go."

Mai's face didn't change.

"You do know me better than that," Azula mused, suddenly thoughtful. Why doesn't she flinch? She's lost. Everything. I've predicted her every scheme, countered every move...

One of the servants' doors swung open.

"Leave us!" Her firebolt seared the end off of the noble girl's ornate tortoiseshell comb, tainting the air with smoke. "I am not to be disturbed!"

The girl was made of stern stuff, for a useless Earth Kingdom trinket. She dropped to her knees, pale but still conscious, holding out a folded fan with trembling hands.

"Ooo!" Ty Lee bounced out of the shadows, face split ear to ear with an eager grin. "It's for you!"

"What?" Azula said blankly.

"I heard about this in the circus," Ty Lee smiled. "You must have really impressed some cute guy."

Azula shot the acrobat an incredulous sideways glance, unwilling to take her gaze off a potential threat. "At this hour?"

"Oh, of course," Ty Lee nodded, perfectly sincere. "You don't send pillow-poems in daylight. That'd be rude. Especially if you already had a boyfriend. Or ten."

"A boy-" Fire blazed in Azula's hands, and she turned a furious gaze on the quaking girl.

"It's not her fault!" Ty Lee was right beside her, worried and upset. "She's just a messenger."

...Right. And the first rule of messengers was, don't incinerate them. Good messengers were hard to come by. "Who sent this?" Azula hissed.

"He- he-" Shaking on her knees, the girl swallowed. "He wore a mask..."

"He probably signed the poem," Ty Lee put in. "That's what some of the girls in the circus showed me."

Good. Then his own arrogance would be his downfall. Throttling back her rage, Azula held out her hand. "You'd better be ready to find another master, girl."

Trying not to whimper, the girl presented the fan in both hands, laying it in her grasp as gentle as dandelion fluff.

For a second, Azula considered stepping back. Even a terrified girl might be a threat.

I will show no fear. The Dai Li, the Earth Army - they have no women among them.

A useless waste of resources. Granted, the tactics Earth Kingdom generals used meant it wouldn't be wise to place most women in front-line battles. But you didn't need to be a man to drop rocks off a wall!

Lip curled in a sneer, Azula opened the saffron-edged, mint-patterned fan.

Overlapping robes

Should bring warm new beginnings.

But you are still cold.

No signature. Azula frowned at the fan, puzzling at the meaning, the foreign but acid insult she could all but taste-

Demure hands slashed up, and stone moved.

And her fiery shriek caught nothing, nothing in its blast, for Ty Lee had pulled the girl away...

Trapped in bent stone, Azula glared at the chi-blocker. "Traitor!"

"No!" Ty Lee actually sounded hurt. She dropped to her knees - prudently out of fire-breath range. "You're my friend. I'd never betray you, ever!" She raised her head, tears in gray eyes. "But you're hurt, you don't know how hurt, and you need a healer. More than anybody can do with herbs. I had to find you one!"

"Idiot!" Azula hissed. "You think a healer in this city is going to do anything but kill me?"

"I certainly want to." Stepping through the door in green upper-class robes that matched the messenger's, the matronly woman's blue eyes were still unmistakable.

Healer Amaya, Azula realized. So the weevil-rat's finally crawled from her den.

"I know some of what you've done." Amaya stopped by Ty Lee, weighing Azula in her gaze. "And I can only imagine what you will do."

The Dai Li aren't stopping her. Azula twisted, skin rasping against stone, more furious than she'd ever been. They're loyal to me! Why aren't they stopping her?

"But if you die here, Fire Lord Ozai will make this city a pyre in your memory," Amaya said softly, circling out of Azula's view as she stalked nearer. "And if I can stop that, I will." Her voice dropped. "And when it comes to your life... my student, your brother, would move mountains to see you healed."

No! You can't do that to me. You can't throw me on Zuko's mercy-

Cool water touched her head, and the world went out.

Like walking barefoot over knives.

Reaching carefully through water and blood, Amaya coaxed fluids from swelling tissues, gently mending delicate capillaries. Spirits, it was amazing the girl was even standing, much less outwitting them as easily as Mai had predicted.

You're Zuko's sister after all. Too stubborn to lie down and die.

Brain injuries were oddly easy and hard at once. There was nothing large to coax back into wellness; not like a broken bone, or torn muscle. Everything that needed mending was small. Delicate. Intricately intertwined with everything else in the brain, so a slight imbalance here would cascade there, and roar on to potentially ravage mind and spirit...

But you are fire, and the will to live. You will survive this.

Shift fluid. Heal. Wait, reading how the storm of the mind flexed. Heal again...

There.

The physical damage was mended. Now for the tricky part.

Eyes closed, Amaya reached beyond body and mind, toward a keening flame of spirit. Zuko loves you.

Flames spat and crackled; negation, denial. Hands pressing a pillow home to smother. An evil smirk, shared with her father, whenever she crushed her brother. A sad mother's face, whispering monster...

It scourged Amaya like acid. But she'd touched evil before. She would not let it win. He knows, she murmured to that dark spirit. He knows all of this. But he knows something more. You are his sister... and you are all the hope your father has left.

LIAR!

Girded with water and spirit, Amaya forged into the inferno.

"She won't hurt a patient," Shirong said swiftly, as Azula gasped and Chan tensed. "You know Amaya. You know she won't." He nodded toward Ty Lee; about as much as he could move, in such tight chains. "A life for a life. Min's freedom, for the princess' healing. That was the bargain."

Agent Chan relaxed slightly. Though he gave the still-shivering Jia a dark look. "Does your father know you behave in such... such..."

"I not only know," Tingzhe said gravely, stepping through the door with Meixiang close behind, "I thoroughly approve." He bent to offer his daughter a hand, drawing her up to unsteady feet. "Well done."

"I was so scared." Jia clung to him, tears trickling through perfect makeup. "Daddy..."

"Shh. It's over now." Tingzhe stroked her hair, rocking her gently. "It's over."

Agent Chan raised an eyebrow.

Shirong chuckled wryly, taking in Meixiang's casual stance... that would have a blade through the first of the Dai Li to move. "I know. A bargain to save Min's life doesn't save ours. But I think you'll want to hear us out."

Letting go of Jia, Tingzhe reached into his sleeve, and produced a ribbon-bound scroll. Presented it to Chan, with a professor's rough grace.

Unrolling the scroll, the agent read carefully. Eyes slowly widening, face blanching as he glanced at the scroll's lower left corner.

A thumbprint in blood, Shirong knew. The Earth King's own mark.

Anyone in the Earth Kingdom might sign with a thumbprint. The marks Guanyin left on a person's fingers were unique, a reflection of the spirit in mortal flesh. But all agents knew their king's sign.

Chan lowered the scroll, still pale. "He... orders us to remain with the Fire Princess."

"Those who feel they must," Shirong nodded. "Ba Sing Se must be protected from malice. We can't do it if all of us are hiding. You will serve our city with honor." He swept his gaze over the agents in view. "But if any of you have doubts, if you would fight for our kingdom, even at the risk of being hated and hunted - the Earth King needs you. Desperately." He met Chan's gaze again, all too aware of Quan's uneasy silence. "You'd be surprised how much he's learned, just in a few days. Bon seems to have given him some rough lessons in what it's like to be Dai Li. He was startled to hear how the spirits' touch separates us from the rest of the world." Quiet murmurs of disbelief followed that; Shirong shrugged. "Think about it. How would he know? He's been kept away from ordinary people his whole life. Whenever they do show up, they're always in awe because he is the king. Of course they're afraid of him!"

Silence. A thoughtful silence. Please, let this work.

Chan cleared his throat. "There's also an odd order in here about the library."

"Apparently, the Avatar managed to offend He Who Knows Ten Thousand Things," Tingzhe stated. "He did so to strike against the Fire Nation, and restore balance to the world, but Wan Shi Tong does not seem to care. He's been stealing texts and documents that would help the Avatar ever since. One of his foxes took my form to steal a letter that would give the Avatar insight into who's tried to stop the war in the past, and how he might stop it in the future." He spread empty hands. "If Wan Shi Tong wishes to harm the Avatar, the king wishes to stop him. We will spread knowledge to the four corners of the earth, and hope we succeed." He cleared his throat. "Personally, I think he'd also just like his books. He's holding up well, but he's as adrift outside the Palace as any of you would be outside the Wall. It'd be a kindness to follow that order."

Another long silence, as Chan looked troubled. Shirong shifted as much as he could, knees aching. Soaking in chi from stone helped, but his fellow agents knew too well how to bind someone in a painfully awkward fashion-

The hairs on his neck went straight up, as something glowed through the audience room floor.

Chains clashed and rattled, passing through ephemeral robes like so much jade mist. Passing over the dazed boy sprawled on the floor, gasping for breath stone and spirit had denied him-

Min!

Shirong didn't dare look closer, not now. Not with jade-mist robes whispering through air, drifting about a female figure whose unbound hair was peppered with ashes, and whose blind white eyes leaked tears...

Falling to her knees before the empty throne, the spirit keened.

Grief struck Shirong like a thunderbolt. No hope, no warmth, no life. Nothing but gray chains of despair; all was set awry, time itself was out of joint. They were grieving, had been grieving, would be grieving forever...

The Palace is empty.

No king dwells within these walls.

The Palace is lost, lost; a haunt for cat-owls and creeping things, to finally wear away as dust in the wind...

The wail vanished. She vanished. Leaving only poor, shattered mortals, trying to breathe life back into their battered souls.

"Qiè gù gōng yōulíng," Shirong whispered.

A spirit no Dai Li had ever trained to defeat. That no Dai Li had ever wished to see, she had not been seen in thousands of years...

She who only appears if the Imperial Palace is abandoned. If no king rules here, Shirong recalled. The spirits will not recognize Azula as our ruler. No matter what the cost.

Chains fell away from them, and Chan himself lifted Shirong to his feet. "Take them and go," Chan said brusquely. "Go!"

Nodding, Shirong helped Quan upright. Winced inside, at the way Quan swayed on his feet. He's hurt. Badly. Not bleeding, but... empty.

Amaya took a deep breath, and straightened. "She'll live." The healer eyed Ty Lee, and Chan. "Let her sleep. Try to give her a restful day so everything can settle. I've healed what I can. Her mind is whole... at least, as whole as it ever was." She shuddered.

"Don't say things like that!" Ty Lee flipped to plant herself between Amaya and the unconscious firebender. "Azula's an amazing person!"

"Amazing, indeed." Amaya stepped back, still eyeing the princess as if she were the deadliest white scorpion-viper. "Tui and La. I would have drowned her in her very cradle."

Rubbing iron-chafed wrists, Mai's head jerked up at that. "She's... not that bad..."

"No. She's worse." Amaya rubbed her hands over each other, face set and determined. Glanced at Ty Lee, and shook her head. "I only hope that one day you see the truth."

And let's hope we're far, far away when that happens, Shirong thought grimly. Yet bleak as that thought was, bleak as their situation might still be-

We're not safe, not yet, we need to get moving-!

-He still had to smile a little as a dazed Min pushed himself off the floor, and looked at his parents, and Mai, and all of them, with awed, amazed hope.

Tingzhe nodded once, a proud smile on his own face. "Let's go home, son."

"-Losing him-"

"-Heal-?"

"-Trying, he needs earth, they've all just started..."

Go away, Quan thought wearily. Dimly aware of a hard stone table under him, voices pleading, hands plucking at his robes... and an oddly soothing grit of sand, humming to itself as it pressed over his heart. Just let me go.

He was a traitor. A contract-breaker. All he'd done, all he'd hoped to be, was dust on the wind. And he wanted to blow away with it.

I've had enough. Failed enough. Suffered enough...

"No." A young, familiar voice. Though stronger and firmer than he'd ever heard it before. "No, Agent Quan, you haven't. Not yet."

Aching, Quan opened his eyes. The hands on him resolved into the most unlikely faces; Amaya, Shirong, Min, Professor Wen... and spirits, was that Jia?

At the head of Amaya's stone table, Earth King Kuei looked down at him with stern eyes. "You followed Long Feng, and betrayed me."

"Yes," Quan whispered. Why deny it? At least he could be true in death, if not in life.

"You helped Princess Azula occupy our city."

"Yes."

"You threatened Ba Sing Se itself, by weakening the spirit-prisons."

"Yes," Quan admitted quietly.

"And you think dying could possibly make up for that?"

Quan had to look away. "My death is all I have left to offer."

"Oh, monkey-feathers!"

Quan blinked.

"I need every trained earthbender we can save," Kuei said plainly. "Even you. Especially you. Who can better advise me how to fight these people, than one who's faced the Fire Princess herself?"

Quan shook his head minutely. "I betrayed you..."

Kuei winced. "You betrayed a king who was in the middle of making a terrible mistake," he admitted, voice pained. "Someone who'd always taken loyal service for granted. Who'd read about what you are, what you do, yet never truly realized what it costs." Kuei swallowed dryly. "I'm trying not to be that king anymore." He narrowed his eyes, trying to look stern. "Am I your king, Agent Quan?"

"Yes, sir," Quan whispered.

"Then accept my judgment." Kuei's face softened, as he touched Quan's brow. "I sentence you to live."

Quan's heart seemed to skip a beat. Almost, he could imagine a shimmer around the king, like air wavering over summer-roasted rocks. Like the ancient tales, of the kings who'd caught and married the wild enchantresses of the sands, bringing the strength of the desert into the very heart of Ba Sing Se. But that was ages ago. Impossible. "It's... not that easy..."

"On the contrary, young man." Professor Wen's voice was worn, but he looked wearily triumphant as he lifted a sand-dusted hand away. "I think you may find it is exactly that easy."

The earthbenders stepped back, leaving Amaya clear to touch Quan's heart and head.

Quan shivered. Amaya's touch didn't feel like water, or sand, or any element he could name. More like someone reaching inside his skin. Sharing it, just for a heartbeat.

She lifted her hands away, relieved. "Rest," Amaya directed. "Don't bend more than you must for at least a week. Your spirit is whole, but your chi is worn thin. Don't try to fight a spirit. Let other Dai Li handle it." She paused. "And don't pray to any great spirits that aren't of earth. There could be... consequences."

Shirong winced. Quan raised an eyebrow, absently wondering if he could muster the energy to sit up.

"Consequences?" Kuei asked, worried.

"It's difficult to explain." Amaya glanced at Min. "The same goes for you, young man. That metal starved you, and I know you could have been reaching for... more."

Quan levered himself up, ignoring the dizziness. Shirong knew something. As did Professor Wen, and even Min himself looked as though he'd put a few facts together. "We've imprisoned earthbenders in steel before," Quan pointed out. "There have never been consequences. Besides the usual." Despair, madness, death. A predictable progression. Nothing that would cause any other healer he knew to advise not bending, if you escaped that fate.

Professor Wen made a startled noise of comprehension. "Of course. Ritual starvation, for a spirit-quest; the texts say the shamans of old would do that to - gain more power..."

"Power over the spirits?" Quan ventured. Amaya said he'd live, and he believed her. But the headache had him almost wishing he wouldn't. They're hiding something. From my king. I can't let this go.

"Sometimes," Kuei spoke up, startling him. "Shamans are meant to deal with spirits. But sometimes, if their people needed it, they'd seek other powers. To call down storms, or quell floods, or walk unharmed through raging fires..." Behind glass, his eyes widened. "Yāorén! Of course. They were yāorén!"

You could have heard a pebble drop.

They know, Quan realized, looking over the motley band of rescuers. They know what he's talking about.

"I'm sorry, of course you wouldn't know," Kuei waved it off. "It's in the ancient books. They're the most accurate, at least; any stories written after Avatar Yangchen... well, they tend to confuse the Avatar's advisers with spirits in human form. Or just imply the Avatar did it all. Which is ridiculous. Even on a flying bison, how could the Avatar be in two places at once? And-" He shook his head, smiling ruefully. "Never mind. Agent Quan, please follow Healer Amaya's advice. If the spirits decided to bring back a legend, I have no idea where to look for the spirit-healer you'd need-"

"You could be one."

Kuei stared at Amaya. "I'm not even a bender!"

"Not of the four elements," the waterbender acknowledged. "But you are a spirit-bender, your majesty. I felt you reach for Quan's, when you helped us hold him to life." She nodded. "I don't know how much time I'll have to teach you. But the basics of spirit-healing, I can show you. And I will."

"Oh," Kuei said, in a very quiet voice. "That is... that would be... thank you."

Smiling, Amaya inclined her head.

"But even if she can teach me," Kuei turned to Quan, "you'd need another teacher. And we have one waterbender, and no firebenders we can trust, and there's only one airbender anywhere. It wouldn't be wise."

"A teacher?" Quan said warily. The Earth King couldn't mean what he seemed to be implying. Impossible.

Kuei looked abashed. "I know it sounds like something out of a spirit-tale, but... well, yāorén are out of spirit-tales. The Avatar's helpers. Benders who can mediate with some spirits themselves. Or fight them, like the Dai Li. Though they have an advantage, if they're trained, because they can strike with two..." Words died in Kuei's throat, as he turned a disbelieving gaze on Amaya. "Lee is Fire Nation. And a waterbender. Is he... he couldn't be..."

A silence of exchanged glances, and Quan knew. Every child of the house of Sozin was a firebender. Every. Last. One. Yet if the reports of what had happened at the Wen house were true - hot water, possibly. But what firebender could bend ice?

"Lee is a yāorén, your majesty," Shirong said quietly. "And... so am I." A deep breath-

And his hand cradled fire.

Quan blanched, feeling the room sway around him. This can't be happening. It can't.

Flames flickered out with Shirong's sigh. "As you said, we have no firebending master here. Lee was teaching me, but - I only knew what I'd become a day before everything fell apart. And Lee..."

"My apprentice drowned under my hands a little more than a month ago," Amaya said simply.

"He's worked hard to learn, even when he was terrified of what happened to him. But we haven't had enough time."

"Terrified?" Kuei objected. "This is a gift from the spirits!"

"None of us knew that," Amaya said sharply. "He was born a firebender. In a land whose idiot of a Fire Lord teaches every other form of bending is inferior. He was scared half to death! Mushi barely found scraps of a tale that gave us a name for... for what had happened." She shook her head. "But we'd thought the spirits could only take a hand if someone were gravely wounded."

"Well - those are the strongest yāorén, in the tales," Kuei managed, eyes still wide. "The warriors. The ones the spirits set between us and harm. But the stories say some benders went on spirit-quests to become yāorén. Though it was risky. You could die. Even if you didn't, it didn't always work. And the ones who lived... well, they weren't who you might expect." He gave Shirong a shaky smile. "If spirit-torn yāorén are lion-dogs, questing yāorén were cricket-mice. They were healers." He rubbed his head. "Lee is a yāorén? He seems so young..."

"Was," Quan said soberly, heart aching for Kuei. He didn't know what the spirits had been thinking to give that kind of power to an heir of Sozin. But the Earth King had known only a young healer, who'd tried to help.

"Is," Shirong said simply.

No. Not possible, Quan thought. He broke his loyalty - he had to, to act against the Fire Lord, and attack his own sister!

Min swallowed audibly, eyeing the adults as if he couldn't believe Shirong was serious. "Azula said he was dead."

"Azula," his father said gravely, "makes a mistake all too common among the most gifted. She believes that if she could not see a solution, no one could."

"Don't underestimate her." Amaya shivered. "I touched her spirit, not her mind, but... she's a knife of glacier ice. Hard. Sharp. Focused. We dealt with her when she'd been blunted by injury; a blow that would have killed most of us, and left the rest of us delirious and raving. And she still nearly had us all." The healer drew a breath, mastering her fear. "But your father is right. She may be a genius, but she still makes mistakes. Lee is alive."

"And bringing us a ship," Shirong smirked.

"A ship?" Quan echoed, aghast. "How? He's-"

Shirong winked at him.

Exiled, Quan bit back, seeing pure mischief in Shirong's gaze. What in the world are you up to?

"A ship?" Kuei looked dismayed. "There's nothing in the plans about a ship!"

"Not yet," Shirong smirked. "That's why we should sleep on it, your majesty. Tomorrow is going to be interesting."

Chapter End Notes

gǔ gé nǚ = "skeleton female"; from the Japanese hone-onna (skeleton woman) bǎi yǎn lián = "hundred eyes"; from the Japanese hyakume - creature with 100 eyes.
mián cháng = "cotton formerly"; from the Japanese ittan-momen - cloth, smothers by wrapping around people's faces.

qiè gù gōng yōu líng = "abandoned Imperial Palace specter"; from the Japanese aonyoubou - female ghost who lurks in an abandoned imperial palace.

For all you out there poking at it, I am grinning like a maniac every time I check the Tropes page. :)

Plothole mentioned about Teruko... it was Jee's POV, and she was speaking to her superior officer on a subject that was very shaky ground. Whatever Sozin might have done to the dragons, he was publicly considered a hero for removing the "airbender threat". And while Teruko may have a serious allergy to lies, she can shade the truth.

Letter length to Iroh versus Katara: to someone who really cares about you, all you need to say is, "I'm sorry". Possibly augmented with, "I was an idiot and I won't do that again". It's your enemies you need to handle with long, careful speeches. Zuko focuses on Katara because she's the linchpin of the Gaang. Get her pointed one direction, the rest tend to follow.

And here, with your kind forbearance, I'll tread onto a bit shakier ground. Tolkien spent years telling people the War of the Ring had nothing to do with the atomic bomb, or WWII in general. Let me make a simple statement likewise in regard to nuclear weapons, WWII, or the War on Terror, so far as Embers is concerned. I'm reaching a bit farther back in history, to - among other things - the Roman Empire, the Mongols, the Japanese invasion of Korea, and many, many other historical messes.

(If I were referencing the War on Terror at all, I'd be listing books by Robert Spencer, Bat Ye'or, Mark Steyn, Nonie Darwish, Bruce Bawer, and Melanie Phillips. Among others. Many others. Go ahead. Check them out.)

In myth and folklore, spiritual pollution, hauntings, and monsters are common effects from scenes of violent battle, violent death, and unhallowed burial. Given we are explicitly shown in canon that proper burial for the Fire Nation involves cremation, then as far as evil effects on the spirits go, Koizilla pulled off a hat trick. (Yes, there were also firebender skeletons at the Southern Air Temple. I'd imagine Sozin wanted that place to stay cursed.) Look up Shinto. Heck, look up Irish and Scottish legends of battlefields.

There's also a common theme in folklore and fantasy that while the ghost of someone who died in a "fair fight" can be cranky, the ghost of someone who died from something they had absolutely no chance against - be that magic, poison, or ambush - is downright murderous. Robert E. Howard has some great short stories on that. I recommend Shadow Kingdoms, which has among other stories "Skulls in the Stars", "Rattle of Bones", and "Dead Man's Hate".

In short, for someone canon sets up as Super-Shaman, Koizilla was an extremely dumb thing to do.

And Koh deliberately ran out the clock so Aang would do it.

The hallmark of a Xanatos Gambit is that all outcomes produce a win. Aang loses his cool and loses his face? Win. Aang gets delayed long enough that the Fire Nation wipes out the Northern Water Tribe? Win. Aang and the Ocean Spirit shred the Fire Navy, giving the whole Fire Nation reason to personally hate his guts (as opposed to just "because he's the Avatar") and smearing spiritual pollution all the way from the "most spiritual place in the entire North Pole" through the Ocean itself? Win.

And if I were going to reference Hiroshima and Nagasaki - first, I suggest you look up General Tojo Hideki's February 1944 "emergency declaration", which effectively called for the mass suicide of the entire Japanese population (plus Koreans and Taiwanese) in the event of defeat. Think about the options the Allies would have had to consider, to prevent that from happening.

Second, I direct you to this information, available at this site, among others. (Take out the spaces.)

ww2db image. php?image_id=7350

"On August 1, 1945, five days before the bombing of Hiroshima, the U.S. Army Air Force dropped over one million leaflets over Hiroshima, Nagasaki, and 33 other Japanese cities warning that those cities were going to be destroyed within a few days and advising the residents to leave to save their lives...."

...So. Make up your own minds where Aang falls on the scale of idealism vs. cynicism. The fact remains that whatever Zhao did, the rest of his fleet thought this was an ordinary invasion they were going to win by force of arms, not by going after the Moon Spirit. They had no warning, before Koizilla smashed them into bits.

You decide whether they deserved one.

Chapter 35

"Oh, that doesn't look ominous," Jee said dryly, staring at the trails of smoke rising from the distant city.

From his perch on the observation deck, the harbor itself looked mostly calm. Mostly being a flexible term; Jee had sailed into enough recently pacified ports to know one when he saw it. The furtive looks, the heads kept down; the way sailors casually lingered near tie-downs, where a sharp blade might turn a peaceably secured ship into one that could cast off in moments. The Fire Nation's grip here was firm, but not secure. Not yet.

This is more than just the tension of a conquest. Something's happened. Something bad.

Well. It was good to know Donghai's information was solid. So far, at least.

They'd met the smirking Earth Kingdom smuggler in the dark of the ghost watch; a lean whip of a man with a ship that looked like a floating disaster and moved like an eel through the lake. Just what a man would want for moving cargoes that couldn't risk coming near official channels.

As his latest had been. Though it was a very small cargo. A bundle of letters and maps, weighted only with treason.

Or loyal resistance. Depending on whose side you were on.

"I'm on mine, what do you think?" Donghai had snorted when Jee gave him a pointed look. "War, no war - shale and shards, business is going to be even better with the skull-faces locking the port down. But Shirong's okay. For a Dai Li. Got my first mate out of a mess with a... um. Trust me. You don't want to know. I don't want to know." He shivered, and tried to cover it with a cynical look. "So like I said, he's not bad. Understands about... trade. And that sometimes a man has to make compromises to get something useful out of the enemy." He gave Jee just as sharp a look back.

Jee had found himself hiding a smile, then. He might not have seen it when he was a younger man. Might not have recognized it even today, if he hadn't dealt with a certain angry prince. But under all the sarcasm and attitude of a man out to make a profit from both sides, was someone Agent Shirong had trusted to put the Earth Kingdom first. Even if it meant consorting with their mortal enemies.

I hope he's as good at sneaking back into port as he was sneaking out, Jee thought now. Sergeant Kyo's good, but even he says inside help is what we need. There aren't enough of us to crew enough ships. Even if we all knew how to sail.

A fair number of his crew did. Saburo, Teruko; he could lay his hands on half a hundred files of the most unlikely sailors. Mixing firebenders and wooden ships was enough to turn a sane man's hair white - but the older domains gritted their teeth and did it anyway. Steel ships and coal went to the war first, and fish didn't catch themselves.

Ba Sing Se fished as well, but they didn't rely on it. Or General Iroh's siege would have had a far different outcome.

Jee lifted his gaze from the harbor's fishing fleet to the unimaginable breadth of green fields between here and the city itself. Farms and crops to support not only the uncounted millions inside the Inner Wall of Ba Sing Se, but the bulk of the Earth Army as well. The sheer wealth of what Princess Azula had captured made his mind reel. With those supplies diverted to Fire Nation use instead...

Well. He felt considerably less conflicted about the resupply part of the prince's plan. Even if it had been lifted straight out of waegu raids.

Staring over ordered, endless squares of green, Jee had to shake his head. "You could lose small armies out there." Recalled who was standing next to him, wrapped in a concealing red cloak. "Sorry, sir."

"Not just small ones," General Iroh said mildly, lowering his spyglass. "No need for apologies. The Fire Nation lost much here, least of all my pride. I believed this city could be taken by rightful force of arms. I was mistaken, and we all paid a heavy price. If only I had come to wisdom sooner." He sighed. "Let that be a lesson, Captain. If the spirits grant us a vision, they do so for their goals, not ours."

"And the prince's vision?" Jee said carefully.

"Ah. That, I have far more faith in. For it is not a vision." The general smiled wryly. "It is a plan. His plan. And while many of my nephew's plans have not reached their intended goal, they have kept him and those he cares for alive. And this one, he has had time to create."

Which should have helped cut down on what Lieutenant Teruko had sheepishly admitted was one of the worst flaws of dragon-children: find, fix, kill. It didn't sound like a flaw, not in a marine...

Or at least, it hadn't. Until Teruko had told him the other, major problem dragon-children had hanging onto sanity.

"We can't fly, sir."

A statement that had seemed utterly obvious. Outside of a few legendary master benders like Jeong Jeong, back when that general had been inclined to show off crushing the Fire Nation's foes, no human could fly.

"Sir, a grounded dragon is in trouble. Sick. Hurt. Protecting eggs. Which means you find the most obvious threat and you kill it dead. Because you can't get away."

Which explained an uncomfortable amount of the prince's - and his lieutenant's - behavior. If not the tavern torchings.

"...Um, no. That's just guys getting to me. Sir."

Well. Knowing why Prince Zuko tended to focus on one target would be useful. If only to soothe nerves jangled by the fact that he had on board a bender who could move an entire supply ship.

One of these days, he might even be able to think about that. Without desperately wanting a drink.

Focus on now. "You'd better head below, General."

"Yes, that would be wise," the general nodded. "Good luck, Captain."

"Thank you, sir." We're all going to need it.

Not least here and now, as helm and lookouts guided the Suzuran to the best berthing they could find. The lakes were more than deep enough to allow free sailing, but Ba Sing Se's harbor had been built with ferries and junks in mind; shallower vessels, moving mostly under the power of wind. And what a few rebellious earthbenders might be able to do to channels marked as clear... Brr.

Though before General Gang's attack on Suzuran, earthbenders Jee had run into had lacked the reach - or possibly, the imagination - to raise a lakebed while they were standing on its shore. And none of Gang's men should have made it here. Still, he couldn't help but wonder if somewhere, sometime, someone had found the guts to just hold their breath and dive.

Then again, given Earth Kingdom policy on destroying innovative firebenders... if he were an earthbender who'd come up with a new tactic, he'd keep it quiet. Just in case.

Which is a damn shame, Jee mused. There's no honor in fighting an enemy who's crippled himself.

Not that war was ever about honor, but... There. Jee let out a quiet, relieved breath, as Suzuran's engines wound down and the ship ghosted neatly into place alongside a floating pier. New; an Army construction, and not nearly the solid structure he would have liked to load from. But it would do.

It has to.

And there was the welcoming committee, just as expected. Mostly in red armor... yet there were a few in the city's green and dun as well. Interesting.

How strong is Azula's grip on command and communication? What gaps can we find - or create?

Time to encourage a few, here and now.

He didn't wait for any official summons; simply gripped one of the outer ladders and slid down to the main deck, timing it to march up and nod to the harbormaster just as the younger officer was about to open his mouth. "Welcome aboard, Lieutenant. I'm glad to see your commanders are following up on our report on the Avatar's bison so quickly."

"Captain Jee, you had no orders to bring Suzuran into Ba Sing- what did you say?"

"We sighted the Avatar's bison," Jee stated matter-of-factly, letting a slight hint of surprise cross his face. "Rendezvousing with the Water Tribe fleet, apparently. We thought we'd caught up to them but - well, let's just say General Gang's army regretted catching us. Unfortunately, as you know, the tribesmen were able to escape in the confusion..." Jee let his words trail off, as the harbormaster's jaw dropped. "Oh, damn. Don't tell me... Agni, we never got any message to compartmentalize that! Standing orders are that possible sightings of the Avatar are to be broadcast to all forces!"

Which set off a flurry of quoted regulations, demands for ship's logs, communications sent up to the Palace, shore patrol ordered on board to inspect the ship, and Agni alone knew what else.

In all the confusion of uniforms coming and going, no one noticed a few sailors and marines quietly slipping off to scout the harbor. Even Jee didn't quite know when one particular pair of armored firebenders ghosted away. One moment they were on deck being dressed down by patrollers; the next - gone.

Keep him safe, Teruko. If anyone can.

We're all gonna die.

"Relax, Lieutenant," Sergeant Kyo murmured. "We're just sightseeing."

Right, Sadao thought morbidly, keeping pace with the sergeant as the rest of the knot of mayhem-bent marines peeled off to saunter through the docks. Just seeing the sights of the ships we're going to steal right out from under the Army's nose.

At least nothing had caught fire around him. Yet.

Actually, nothing had accidentally caught fire around him for days. It was weird. Almost as weird as healing.

...Not that there was anything wrong with healing. Once he'd finally gotten his head around that odd push-pull pattern of the prince's, fire had been eager to do what he wanted. Sure, it took the kind of patience you needed to read wind and waves when you weren't sure of your charts. The ruthless determination you needed to kill flames in the first place. And the same balance of caring and calculation you used to lead men where any sane civilian would fear to tread. But once you had all that down, it was scarily easy.

For once, he was good at something. And nobody had even hinted at throwing him off the ship.

In his darker moments, that scared him stiff.

Though at least he wasn't really here to lead Sergeant Kyo, and they both knew it. Just... advising. Because given marines tended to be more in the business of sinking ships than sailing them, Captain Jee wanted a few second opinions on the vessels they were about to steal.

...Er, commandeer. Sort of. In a way. Oh, Agni...

"Well?" The sergeant raised an eyebrow as they made their way past old sailors mending nets, a stray woman of ill repute hurrying away, two passable fishing boats that were beginning to stink of their early-morning catch, and one dry-rotted wreck that should have been burned to put it out of an honest sea's misery.

"I think it's a good thing the Western Lake ships haven't been committed over here yet," Sadao said in an undertone. "We're going to have to get past them. If we get out of here in the first place. And there's nothing here with that kind of speed."

"Nothing, huh kid?" An amused voice spoke out of a net-cast shadow.

Gaah! No fire no fire-

"Breathe, Lieutenant," Sergeant Kyo advised, planting himself between Sadao and the weather-beaten whip of a man smirking at them. "Captain Donghai. You're early."

"You're earlier," Donghai said dryly. "A guy might think you didn't trust your own plan."

"Plans always go wrong," Kyo said, just as dry. "Are you in or out?"

"To the point. I like that." Donghai shrugged. "I'm thinking about it. First, I need to know what you've got." He eyed Sadao. "Nothing?"

"Maybe a few of those nobles' junks down near the city-side," Sadao shrugged, uneasy. "But if they lose the wind, they're dead in the water." Emphasis on dead. "And we don't have anyone who can sail them."

"Not in our crew," the sergeant nodded. "Have to admit, those ferries are a bit more our speed."

"Except speed is exactly what they don't have," Sadao said unhappily. "And if we do get through the Western Lake? Rivers, Sergeant. Suzuran can take it; we've got a strong hull, and charts with the current deep channels. Those ferries?" He winced just thinking about it.

"One step at a time," the sergeant advised. "First, we need to get people out."

Donghai looked between them both, dark brows climbing toward his hair. "You really mean it." His voice was troubled, thoughtful. "You're really planning to get people out of here."

Sadao nodded; sure in himself of this, at least. "If we can."

Donghai looked at them, then inland, where eyes dazzled by sun off the harbor could just make out a few occupation komodo-rhinos. "You're dead men walking."

"No," Sadao said, surprising himself. "No, we're not. We've got a chance. It's not a good chance. But we have surprise, and we'll have speed. And... other resources, the rest of the Army doesn't. We can do this. We can save these people." He met Donghai's brown gaze, trying to be open and honest as sunlight. "We could use your help."

"And if you're as slippery as I think you are," Sergeant Kyo stuck in, voice wry, "no one's ever going to know you had anything to do with it."

Donghai took a step back. Chewed on his lip. Frowned, eyes down and thinking. Looked back at them, calculation lighting his eyes. "Hate to say it, but those junks aren't mine."

"Ferries," Sadao sighed.

"Didn't think they were, Captain," Sergeant Kyo agreed. "Though given both of your opinions, I have to say I'm a bit more interested in those junks now than I was when our Lee first brought them up." His smile had a predatory edge. "After all, if Lee can make contact with... our soon to be associate, we could have papers to sort out that inconvenient detail of who owns what. Or who gets to borrow what." He smirked. "I know you people like your paperwork."

"Borrow?" Donghai pounced on that like a cat on a scorpion-viper.

Kyo shrugged slightly. "You think this is going to work if there's a ship left in port to catch us?"

Donghai looked at them. And their armor. And the wooden, flammable ships currently at dock. "...Borrow. Right." He chuckled, shaking his head at them both. "And people call me a crook."

"It's all a matter of scale, Captain," Kyo stated. "So what can we do for each other?"

"Give me an hour to find some people." Still smirking, Donghai sauntered off.

"Think we can trust him?" Sadao whispered once the man was out of sight.

"Lee's friend thought we could," Kyo observed. "Let's hope he was as right about that as he was about Lee."

Sadao swallowed dryly, thinking of the prince. "Can he do it, Sergeant? I know he can meet - our contact." Even if their prince had to sneak through a whole city occupied by enemies. Who just happened to be their people. "But convince him? When we're - who we are?"

"Don't forget who he is, Lieutenant," Sergeant Kyo said wryly. "He's young. He'll never be charming. But he's got his uncle's training... and never forget what that family is trained to do." He chuckled quietly. "Our earthy friend will never know what hit him."

"I never would have dreamed it was this big." Teruko shook her head as they strode through the Lower Ring. "And this... quiet."

